AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory, OR THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

BEING

A Complete Body thereof,

FROM

The beginning of the World till the Monarchy of Constantine the Great. 5th of

WHEREIN

Are deſcribed the ſeveral Empires, and the Contemporaries with them, all diſtinctly and by themſelves, and yet linked together by Synchroniſms.

AS ALSO,

The Forms and Models of Governments, with the Power and Nature of their reſpective Magiſtrates, Cuſtoms, Laws, and Antiquities.

All in ſuch unbroken Order and Method as yet Never was Extant.

The Second Edition with large Additions.

By William Howel, LL. D. ſometimes Fellow of Magdalen College in Cambridge.

Ἡ γὰρ ἐκ τῆς ἱϛορίας μάθησις ἑτοιμοτάτη διώρθωσις, καὶ ἀληθεινοτάτη παιδεία. Polybius.

Neſcire quid antequam natus ſit acciderit, id eſt ſemper eſſe puerum. Cicero.

Unde facilius quam ex Annalium Monumentis aut res bellica aut omnis Reipub. diſciplina cognoſcetur? Idem.

LONDON,
Printed for Henry Herringman, Thomas Baſſett, at the George in Fleetſtreet, William Crook, at the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, and William Cademan at the Pope's Head in the New Exchange. 1680.

x 8909
H839i
1680 v.1
cop.2

TO THE
KINGS
Moſt Excellent and Moſt Sacred MAJESTY.

Sir,

Although the quality of this work be truly ſuch, that, conſidering the brightneſs of Royal Majeſty, and the obſcurity of its own extraction, it cannot expect a bare acceptance, much leſs plead any merit in this addreſs; yet doth it find more reaſon for hope than deſpair; for as much as the whole World hath taken notice that your Majeſty's Grace and Clemency is founded more upon the tranſcendent goodneſs of your own Diſpoſition than the qualifications of your Subjects. Allowance hereby being made for what is mine, it were needleſs to inſiſt upon the Nobility and uſefulneſs of the Subject, the excellency whereof as humane tranſcendeth not your Orb, and the utmoſt improvement of which is within the Sphear of your activity. It were a piece of pedantry to ſhew to your Majeſty that Hiſtory is the ſtore-houſe whence Precedents may be fetched for all ſorts of Actions, Publick and Private, Military and Civil; that it is a Mirrour of prudence to ſhew both their beauty and deformity, a Touchſtone to diſcover deceits, an Incentive to virtue, and a Terror unto vice; that in it are contained the Prudence of times, imbecillity and ſtrength of Nations, Reaſons of State, Councils of Peace, and Stratagems of War; that in it Monarchy triumpheth over the Confuſions, Alterations, and Seditions of Popular Government. And ſhould I go about to inſtance in the various helps it affoardeth to the management of Civil matters, I might juſtly incur more than the cenſure that light upon him, who was ſo impertinent as to read a Lecture of the Art of a General in the preſence of Hannibal. For it may juſtly be ſaid

10N43C04

Gen Res D33 Eat 4 vin 3

854713

UMI

that your Majeſty hath improved Hiſtory to the utmoſt ; that your actions have ſo far imitated antient Patterns as to exceed them. Others have waſted and deſtroyed Nations, you have recovered and reſtored three dying ones. Others have raged with fire and ſword, have rooted out, overturned, and made deſolate ; your Majeſty by Mercy and Grace hath replanted, ſettled, and inriched. Alexander conquered the effeminate Perſians, and ſubdued other Nations whom their own unfitneſs for Military matters helped him to overcome. Cæſar tamed the naked Galls, and painted Britains, whom fool-hardineſs and barbariſm had armed againſt themſelves ; or if there be any other Atchievements of them, or others, which ſeem more glorious, yet the valour of their Soldiers, the experience of their times and viciſſitude of humane affairs, challenge to themſelves the greateſt ſhare of reputation. Your Majeſty hath ſubdued thoſe things which are beyond Mars his reach : You have tamed wild and extravagant paſſions of men, Conquered ſtubborn and perverſe diſpoſitions, laid low prejudice, and convinced ſuch, whom all theſe Diſtempers had rendred affectedly ignorant and diſobedient. Your Majeſty's Conqueſts therefore ſo much more excel the commendations of others, as it is more glorious to cure than kill, to reſtore than to deſtroy, to follow the dictates of Compaſſion and Mercy, than of indignation and revenge, to Conquer the mind than the Body ; and indeed to overcome one's ſelf than ſubdue others. That this is no flattery Hiſtory will aſcertain future times, and both the mouths and hearts of your People at preſent do teſtifie, which, though in other matters they may diſagree, yet all unite in this concent, that you are the True Father of your Countrey. In our acclamations during thoſe ſolemnities of your Majeſty's Royal Coronation, ſeeing there is no need of wiſhing you the Goodneſs of Trajan, we ſo much the more pray that the Happineſs of Auguſtus may light upon you, and that thoſe ſolemnities may in one part imitate the Sæcular ones amongſt the Romans, that though ſome of us have heretofore ſeen the like, yet through the length of your happy Reign none of us may do it for the time to come. I for my part, though a well-wiſher to Hiſtory, unfeignedly deſire, that not till after very many years ſo great an acceſſion of glory may come to it, as will accrue from the paſſages of your Majeſty's Government ; and that in the mean time your Majeſty may be as happy in the Love and Loyalty of your People, as they are in your Princely clemency and care. To this, both a ſenſe of merit and duty binds me, being

Your Majeſties moſt Loyal Subject

WILLIAM HOWEL.

PREFACE.

THe French (who firſt Introduced this Cuſtom into the World of writing Prefaces before the works of others) have uſed that liberty with ſo much exceſs in the commendation of their friends, that they have rendred it not only ſuſpected to the Reader, but prejudicial to their repute whom they intended to honour by it. But as I cannot approve the indiſcreet zeal of thoſe perſons that would rather abrogate a good Office when abus'd, than indeavour to reform it, I would neither wave an imployment which gave me the occaſion of hinting to the Reader ſome ſuch things as may be of concernment to him in the peruſal of this work, and which the modeſty of the Author would not permit him to communicate, neither on the other ſide would I willingly recede from the ſtrictneſs and ſeverity of truth. So that whatſoever ſhall fall from me to his advantage ſhall not need any favourable conſtruction to make it paſs, nor ſhall I take that freedom to mix Fiction and Hiſtory together: The uſe of this latter is ſo obvious to every eye, that it is needleſs to ſpeak much of it, it ſhall ſuffice me in ſhort to ſay, that by the knowledge of Hiſtory we are taught wisdom, and led to virtue, there being nothing in the Actions or Fortunes, either of publick or private perſons, to which ſomewhat in former Ages bore not a reſemblance, and which by a due conſideration of the circumſtances we may not with profit apply to our preſent occaſions. How much we are excited to virtue by it, they that know the power of Emulation in noble minds will eaſily conclude: which is manifeſt by the famous examples of Themiſtocles, whom the victories of Miltyades robbed of his repoſe, of Alexander, who was ſtirred up to the deſire of glory by reading the actions of Achilles, as Cæſar by reflecting upon his; add to this, that ſuch perſons whom theſe Precedents of virtue will not encourage to it, are aw'd by Hiſtory from running headlong into vice, when they cannot but look on the writers of the preſent Age to be ſet as ſpies upon their Actions, and muſt expect when they are dead to be expoſed without fear or flattery to the Impartial cenſure of the living. For who is there that would ſo much value the pleaſure of a glaſs of Wine, as not to abſtain from drinking it, if he knew it had been all night ſteep'd in Antimony.

Theſe, beſides many others, are the benefits which accrue to us by the knowlege of Hiſtory in general, but that I may inform the World how much it is acknowleging to the worthy Author of this Inſtitution in particular, and wherein thoſe excellencies of his conſiſt, which diſtinguiſh him from the ordinary crowd of Hiſtorians, Ut poſſit digito monſtrari & dicier hic eſt, I muſt take leave to inſiſt upon theſe enſuing heads, wherein I ſhall plainly make appear to the equal and candid Reader, that Hiſtory is reduced by him in this work to ſuch order, and exact Method, as never yet in any Language.

For, firſt you have here all the Empires in diſtinct Chapters by themſelves, with the Contemporaries of them diſtinguiſhed in the ſame manner from each other, and from the Empire to which they were coætaneous. Whereas both in Syſtems and in larger Volumes of General Hiſtory they are mingled together with a ſtrange confuſion, like the ſeveral ingredients of an Olio in the ſame Diſh, where the variety of the Meats deſtroy the taſte of one another, and he that would read any Hiſtory by it ſelf, finds it immediately embroyl'd and interwoven with the affairs of other Nations, ſo that he will not eaſily form a perfect Idea in his mind of that which is given him but in parcels.

In the next place this Author has furniſhed you with a general Deſcription of Greece, its antient Kingdoms and Commonwealths, from their firſt Originals, the ſucceſſions of Kings, changes of Government, and forms of the ſeveral Republicks, with the power and nature of their reſpective Magiſtrates and Officers, not omitting the moſt conſiderable Cuſtoms, Laws, and Antiquities of each of them, deduced from the beſt Hiſtorians, whom you ſtill find quoted in the Margent; this, as it hath never been intirely performed by any Author heretofore, ſo ought it to ſet a peculiar mark of Honour upon ours, who hath been careful to give us an exact account of that Countrey, which was the Mother of Arts and Sciences.

After this, if we will turn our eyes upon the Macedonian Empire, and the ſeveral parts and branches of it, as the Kingdoms of Syria, of Macedon, and Ægypt, we ſhall ſtill have greater occaſion to admire the learn'd diligence of the Author. The Græcian Monarchy after the deceaſe of Alexander not being more diſmembred and rent in pieces by his Succeſſors, than by thoſe Writers who have tranſmitted the memory of it to poſterity, particularly, the Aſian and Ægyptian Kingdoms under the Seleucidæ and Ptolomies have never been compiled in one Hiſtory, and I have often wondred in my peruſal of this Inſtitution, by what means the Author of it could arrive at ſo clear a knowledge of thoſe perplex'd ſucceſſions. It was certainly a work of great labour to compare Hiſtorians, and to weave theſe ſeveral Arguments and looſe pieces into one entire Loom, which I the rather mind the Reader of, becauſe it is not eaſily perceiv'd by every ordinary capacity; for the uniformity of the ſtyle, and the unbroken order of the whole is ſuch, that they only who are converſant in Antiquities are able to judge what travel and ſtudy were required to it.

The Roman Hiſtory next invites our obſervation; wherein the ſucceſs of this Author hath ſufficiently recompenced his worthy pains; I dare confidently affirm, No modern Pen hath yet carried it on with ſo great light from the Original of the City to the time of Conſtantine. For from the baniſhment of Tarquin to the new modelling of the Government by Auguſtus, you have all the Intermediate Changes, Alterations, and Seditions of it, while yet a State; as, the conteſts of the Patritians and Commons, with the ſeveral motives of them; The diſplacing and reſtoring of Annual Magiſtrates, the Deſcription of their Offices, the Rites and Ceremonies of their Religion; all collected with great diligence from the Fathers of Roman Hiſtory, but never given us in one body by antient Authors, or by any of later days. I confeſs I have read a French Hiſtorian, who from the Reign of Auguſtus almoſt to that of Juſtinian hath given me the greateſt ſatisfaction of any man; Yet he often amuſeth himſelf (as ſome of our bad Chroniclers at home have done) with paſſages of ſmall concernment, and below the Dignity of an Hiſtorian to relate: and from the Foundation of the City to Auguſtus, pays his Readers with a bare tranſlation of Florus. Sr. Walter Rawleigh (never to be mentioned without honour) concludes his Hiſtory with the end of the Macedonian War, and the converſion of that Kingdom into a Roman Province: much about the ſame time we are forſaken by our beſt Guide Livy, whoſe Decads from the Captivity of Perſeus to the time of Octavius Cæſar (whoſe Contemporary he was) are wholly loſt: for in the concluſion of his fourty fifth Book (the laſt which is left us) he introduces King Pruſias ſpeaking to the Romans, whom he came to viſit, in theſe words; Deos qui urbem Romam incolerent Senatumque & Populum Romanum ſalutatum ſe veniſſe, & gratulatum quod Perſea Gentiumque Reges viciſſent, Macedonibuſque & Illyriis in Ditionem redactis, auxiſſent Imperium. But as this Author hath ſupplied the Defects of Livy, and continued the Roman Hiſtory five hundred years beyond Sr. Walter Rawleigh, ſo in the alteration of the Government from a Commonwealth to a Monarchy by Auguſtus, the reaſons which induced the Emperour to make that change, the manner how, and the form of it, are delivered with ſo great care, and deſcrib'd with ſo much life, That I could not but take a particular notice of it; and (with the civility of thoſe that carve to others where themſelves beſt like) invite the Reader to a more exact obſervation of that which hath given me ſo great contentment.

Neither hath he deſerved leſs of Chriſtian than prophane Hiſtory: for from the Primitive times till Conſtantine the Great he hath deduced the Succeſſions of Biſhops in the principal Sees, with the practice of the Chriſtians, and a faithful relation of their ſufferings in all the perſecutions.

For what concerns our own Iſland, I think he hath perform'd the part of a true Engliſh-man, and a lover of his Countrey: for he hath vindicated the Antiquity of its firſt Diſcovery by the Phœnicians, and that not only by the probable reaſons alleged by that great Perſon Bochartus for the Etymology of the word Britannia, but by other indeniable, and convincing Circumſtances, which as it redounds to the honour of our Nation, ſo reflects a part of that glory to our Author.

One particular of no ſlight conſequence I had almoſt omitted: That as the Reader may without any intervening matters impertinent to his preſent purpoſe read the Hiſtory of any Empire, or Kingdom Contemporary to it, by it ſelf, ſo he may likewiſe obſerve that the principal paſſages in all of them are link'd together by Synchroniſms, not only placed in the Margent, but in the beginning or end of every notable Occurrence.

Thus I have briefly and with much ſincerity couch'd together ſome of thoſe Excellencies, which amongſt many others I have obſerved ſerved in this Inſtitution of Hiſtory: of which if I may preſume to give my private opinion, (though I am conſcious to my ſelf how little it ought to ſignifie to the World) I think the work taken altogether is for the order of it handſomly and judiciouſly contrived, for its ſtile perſpicuous, and for the learning in the ſeveral parts of Hiſtory, Antiquity, and Chronology, uncommon. Thoſe who deſire a greater politeneſs in the ſtyle may conſider, that the florid way of writing, which hath undeſervedly acquired ſo great a name to ſome of our own Age and Nation, is nothing proper to an Hiſtorian, and that our Author buſied himſelf in matters more ſerious, and of greater uſe, he choſe rather the plain but comely ſtrength of the Dorique Pillar, than the Effeminate, though curious ſhape of the Corinthian. For my own part, I confeſs that plainneſs and unaffected ſimplicity is pleaſing to me: and I think no Intelligent Perſon that goes upon buſineſs, will leap Hedges out of the open and direct Road, to Travel over Flowry Fields, or painted Meadows.

AN

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory: OR THE
Hiſtory of the World.

The Firſt Part.

BOOK I.

CHAP. I.

From the Beginning of the World to the Beginning of the Firſt EMPIRE.

1. IN (a) the beginning God created the Heaven and the Earth. By (b) Faith we underſtand that they were framed by his Word, ſo that things which are ſeen, were not made of things which do appear.

(a) Gen. 1. 1.
(b) Heb. 1. 3.

Man created.

Gen. 1. &c.

2. Mans Habitation being made and conveniently furniſhed the ſixth day; then (and not till then) was he made of the Duſt of the Earth, and, God breathing into his Noſtrils the Breath of Life, he became a living Soul. Being placed in the Garden of Eden, and a meet Help wanting to him, Eve was framed of one of his Ribs. Of all the Trees of the Garden, except that of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, they might ſafely eat; and at ſuch time as they ſhould eat of it, they were ſurely to die. But the Serpent beguiled the Woman, who did eat thereof, and giving to her Husband, he did alſo eat. Hereby they rendred themſelves guilty of Temporal and Eternal Death; they were condemned to Labour and Sorrow; and thoſe not confined to their own Perſons, but extended to their whole Poſterity, involved with them in the ſame Guilt: the demonſtrating whereof might ſeem the Scope of this preſent Work; nothing having ſucceeded but Vanity and vexation of Spirit; nothing but Labour and Travail under the Sun.

Falleth.

Expelled Paradiſe.

3. Adam, being expelled Paradiſe, to till the Ground, begat of Eve his Wife Cain and Abel; though in what Years is not expreſſed. Abel was a Keeper of Sheep, and Cain a Tiller of the Ground. By Faith, Abel offered to God a more excellent Sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witneſs that he was righteous, and contracted ſuch Envy, that his Brother ſlew him in the Field. The voice of his Blood cried to God from the ground, and drew down this puniſhment upon Cain, (beſides that of the Ground formerly laid upon his Father) to be a Fugitive and Vagabond in the Earth: Then departed he from the preſence of the Lord, and went into the Land of Nod, where he built a City, and called it Enoch, after the name of his Son. His Family was propagated to Lamech, the fifth in deſcent from himſelf, by whom the Jews * have thought him to have been ſlain, by reaſon of Lamech's words to his two Wives: that he had ſlain a man to his wounding, and a young man to his hurt: if Cain ſhall be avenged ſeven-fold, then Lamech ſeventy and ſeven fold.

Cain killeth Abel.

* Vid. Mercerum in Gen. 1. & Pererium.

Seth's Birth.

fold. After the death of Abel, Adam begat Seth, in the hundred and thirtieth year of his Age, as Moſes (a) maketh expreſs Mention; neglecting the Account of Time in the Family of Cain, becauſe his wicked Race periſhed in the Flood: the Church of God being to be continued in the Poſterity of Seth, of whom alſo (as to the Fleſh) his Son himſelf was to proceed.

(a) Gen. 3.

And poſterity.

4. In the Race of (b) Seth, is laid down the Account of Years from the Creation to the Deluge. For Seth, being born when Adam was 130 years old, begat (*) Enos, at the age of 105; Enos being 90, begat Cainan; and Cainan when he was 70, begat Mehalelec. From the Birth of Mehalelec, to that of his Son Jared, paſſed 65; from Jared's to Henoch's, 162; and thence, to that of Methuſalah, 65. Methuſalah, when he begat Lamech, was aged 187 years; Lamech, when he begat Noah, was 182; and Noah at the Time of the Flood, had lived 600 years; all which amount to the ſumme of 1656; each year of the Father's age being ſuppoſed compleat at the Birth of his Son. All theſe, by Divine Providence, for the propagation of Mankind, obtained a very long time upon the Earth. Though Enoch had the ſhorteſt, yet he never died, being taken up by God, after he had walked with him 365 years. Methuſalah his Son, of all others, arrived at the greateſt age, being 969 when he died. Yet, in a certain ſenſe, Adam lived longer than he; for being Created in his perfect ſtrength, and fit for Generation, he had the advantage of 60 Years, before which age, we read of none of them to have had any Children; Nature then requiring a longer time for maturity. If 60 now be added to 930 Years, which he lived, the number exceeds that of Methuſalah's age by 21. Seeing the World required it, it cannot but be preſumed, that each of theſe begat other Children, and ſome of them before theſe here mentioned. But ſuch being but collateral to that Line, which was to be brought down to Noah, (who was to continue the Generation of Mankind, and to re-people the Earth) Moſes, upon that account, had no occaſion to make mention of them.

(b) Gen. 1.

* Here the Word begat, is to be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe as the Hebrew ילד, the Greek γεννᾶν, and the Latin gignere, which are applied to Mother as well as to Father, & betoken Birth rather than Conception. The Latin word genitus & natus ſignifie the ſame thing. Tune ille Æneas quem Dardanio Anchiſæ Alma Venus Phrygiæ genuit Simoentis ad undas? Vide Gen. 40. 20. Mat. 11. 1. Luc. 1. 47. 1 Pet. 2. 2.

Vide Plin. l. 7. c. 1.

Man's wickedneſs cauſeth a Deluge.

5. In the 480 year of the life of Noah, God ſeeing all Fleſh to have corrupted it ſelf, and as well the Poſterity of Seth, as that of Cain, to be given up to all wickedneſs; it repented him that he had made Man. He reſolved not alwayes to ſtrive with him, yet gave him the ſpace of 120 years to repent in. If no amendment appeared in that time, he fully determined by an univerſal Deluge to deſtroy Man and Beaſt, with the creeping thing, and the Fowls of the Air. Yet Noah, a juſt man, found grace in his ſight, and being a Preacher of Righteouſneſs to the wicked world, the Lord was graciouſly pleaſed to make choice of him and his Family to be a Remnant and a Seed, out of which Mankind and his Church might be propagated and repaired. He commanded him to build an Ark of * Gopher wood, into which he was to take his Wiſe, his Sons and their Wives, with ſome of every living thing of all fleſh; of the clean by Seven, and the unclean by Two. On (c) the tenth day of the ſecond Month, he commanded him to bring the living creatures into the Ark: On the ſeventh after, he entred it; and on the ſame day the Rain began to fall, and ſo continued for 40 days, and as many nights. For 150 days the Waters prevailed upon the Earth, (reckoned from the firſt Fall thereof;) inſomuch that fifteen Cubits upward the Mountains were covered, and all Fleſh died that moved upon the Earth, both of Fowl, and of Cattel, and Beaſt, and of every Creeping thing that creepeth upon the Earth, and every Man. But God remembring Noah, and every living thing, and all the Cattel that was with him in the Ark; after the forty days, the windows of Heaven were ſtopped, and the Rain from Heaven was reſtrained; and at the end of 110 more (which make up the 150) the Waters were abated. This fell out on the 29th day of the 6th Month, and the 196 of the Year conſiſting of Lunar Months; or the 17th day of the 7th Month, if they were Solar.

Noah and his family preſerved in the Ark

The order of the Deluge.

Gen. 5.

A. M. 1656.

* Some interpret it Cedar, others Cypreſs, than which, no wood is ſtronger; of which the doors of the Temple of Epheſus were made, the coffins of thoſe that died in the ſervice of their Country, Jupiter's Scepter, and Ships in Babylon and Aſſyria.

(c) Vide Lud. Capellum in Chronol. ſacra.

The Ark reſteth on Ararat.

6. On the 17th day of the 7th Month the Ark reſted upon the Mountains of Ararat, according to the Hebrew; if, in this place the Verſion of the 70, and S. Hierom in the Vulgar, be not rather to be credited (which have the 27th,) ſeeing it is not probable that the Ark ſhould reſt the ſame day, or two days before the Waters began to decreaſe. On the firſt day of the 10th Month were the tops of the Mountains ſeen; and forty days after, Noah ſent forth a Raven which went to and fro, until the Waters were dried up from off the Earth. The Raven returning no more unto him, ſeven days after he ſent forth a Dove, to ſee if the Waters were abated, which finding no reſt for the Sole of her foot, returned unto him. He ſtay'd yet other ſeven days, and again ſent forth the Dove, which in the Evening brought in her mouth an Olive-leaf; ſo that he knew the Waters to be abated. Then, ſeven other days paſſed, he ſent her out the third time, and ſhe returned not to him any more, the waters being now ſo much fallen, that the ordinary Hills might be uncovered, wherein ſhe might continue and feed; although the Plains and Vallies were ſtill overwhelmed. On the firſt day of the firſt Month of the 601 year of Noah's Life, the Waters were dried from off the face of the Earth; yet ſo, as it ſtill remained moiſt and dirty, having been ſo long a time ſoaked with ſuch a quantity of moiſture. Therefore he ſtai'd yet 55 days more, till the 27th. day of the ſecond Month, before he went out of the Ark; ſo much time having been requiſite for drying the Ground (eſpecially in low places) and for the growth of Graſs, and other things neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of Living Creatures, which had continued in the Ark 365 days, or a full Solar Year, which exceedeth the Lunar eleven days.

Where Ararat is.

7. The Ark reſted upon the Mountains of Ararat; by which place moſt underſtand Armenia, rejecting the pretended Verſes of Sibylla, which place it upon a Mountain of Phrygia, near to the City Celænæ, and out of which the two Rivers Marſyas and Meander do iſſue. Some will have it to have reſted about Araxene, a Plain of Armenia, through which the River Araxes runneth, by the foot of the Mountain Taurus. But the far greater number conſiſting both of Heathens, Jews, and Chriſtians, pitch upon the Mountains of the Gordyæans, otherwiſe called Carduchi, Cardiæi, Cordyæi, Corduëni, Gordi, Cordæi, Curdi, &c. the Hill it ſelf being variouſly named Kardu, Cardon, Kurud, Kardynus, Cordyæus, &c. What Hill ſoever it was, it muſt have ſtood Eaſtward of the Countrey of Shinar or Babylonia, and the Vine muſt have naturally grown there; upon which, and other accounts theſe Gordyæan Mountains are rejected by a Learned (*) Writer of modern times, who affirmeth that Ararat named by Moſes, is not any one Hill, ſo called, no more than any one Hill among thoſe Mountains which part Italy from France, is called the Alpes; and will have the ſame Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, to keep the Name all along, and even in India to be called Ararat. For that the beſt Vine naturally groweth on the South-ſide of the Mountains Caucaſi; and, becauſe of other excellencies of that Soil, he thinketh it moſt probable that Noah there ſetled himſelf, and planted his Vineyard. And he alloweth beſt of the Opinion of Goropius Becanus, who conceiv'd the Ark to have reſted on the higheſt Mountains of that part of the World.

Vide Bocharti Phaleg. *l.*1.*c.*3.

(*) Sir Walter Raleigh. lib. 1. c. 7. ſect. 10.

The Teſtimony of the Heathen concerning Noah's Flood.

8. Of this Deluge a Tradition remained amongſt the Heathen. (a) Beroſus the Caldæan, Prieſt of Belus, and Contemporary with Alexander the Great, wrote of the Ark's reſting upon the Cordyæan Mountains of Armenia, and how thoſe that came to ſee the Reliques of it (which yet were to be ſeen in his time) plucked off ſome Pitch, which they uſed to carry about them, as an Antidote againſt Infection. Hierome the Ægyptian, who wrote the Antiquities of Phœnicia, related the ſame; beſides Mnaſeas, and many others: amongſt whom Nicolas of Damaſcus is conſiderable, who in his 96th Book ſpake of the Hill Baris, in the Countrey of the Mynians, (a People in Armenia) upon which many ſaved themſelves in a Deluge, and one being carried thither in an Ark, there reſted; who might (ſaith he) be the ſame man concerning whom Moſes the Law-giver of the Jews wrote. Xiſythrus by one (b) is related, being forewarned of a Deluge by Saturn, to have fled by Boat into Armenia, where, the Waters decreaſing, he ſent out Birds to diſcover dry Land; which, finding none, returned to him again. He is ſaid by (c) a ſecond to have eſcaped a great Deluge which hapned in his dayes (being alſo forewarned by Saturn thereof) by providing an Ark, wherein, with himſelf, Birds, Creeping things, and Beaſts were preſerved. (d) A third brings in an Ægyptian Prieſt, declaring to Solon, out of the Monuments of Antiquity, that before the particular Ogygian and Deucalionæan Deluges, there was an univerſal one, by which the Earth was much defaced. (e) Another yet telleth a Story like in all things to the Hiſtory of Moſes, but that Deucalion is placed in the room of Noah. The particular Deluges which hapned afterwards in Greece, and other places, have by the Ancients been confounded with this; and (f) ſome think they did not in reality differ from it.

(a) Joſephus *Antiqu.l.*1.*c.*3.

(b) Abydenus apud Euſebium, præpar. Evang. lib. 9.

(c) Alex Polyhiſtor. apud Cyrill. contra Julian. lib. 1.

(d) Plato in Timæo.

(e) Lucian. in lib. de Dea Syra

(f) Vide Gerard Johan. Voſſii Chron. Sacr. Iſagog. Diſſert. 4. c. 3. Vide eundem Diſſert. 5. c. 1.

Noah's progeny.

9. Noah, before the Flood, begat three Sons, Sem, Ham, and Japhet; of which the laſt in order ſeemeth to have been the firſt in Nature, although the contrary is defended; and yet ſo, as Cham is never accounted the Eldeſt. (g) Noah is, with great probability, thought to be Saturn, ſo much talked of by the Heathen; for many things concur to perſwade us to it. He was the common Father of all Mankind after the Flood, which thing is by Orpheus attributed to Saturn. Not only a juſt perſon, as Saturn (h) was, but a Preacher of Righteouſneſs. From the time of the Flood to the Diviſion of the Earth, he had a Natural Dominion over all Mankind, which ſpace fitly anſwereth to the Golden Age under Saturn. In that Age there was but one Language, which Mythologiſts (a) ſo far extended as to make men and Beaſts to have ſpoken in the ſame Dialect. Noah is called an Huſbandman, (or, in the Hebrew phraſe, a man of the Earth;) and Saturn's wife, Rhea, is the ſame with the Earth: he (b) being alſo ſaid to have taught Janus the Uſe of the Vine, and Sickle, in imitation of Noah, who planted a Vineyard. From Noah's once being overtaken with Wine, the liberty of the Saturnalia might proceed; and from his Curſing of Cham with Servitude, the Cuſtom (c) obſerved amongſt the Romans during that Solemnity, of exerciſing ſervile Offices. The occaſion of the Curſe was Cham's ſeeing his Father's Nakedneſs, and making a jeſt thereof; and the Poets (d) feign'd a Law made by Saturn, that none ſhould ſee the gods naked and go unpuniſhed. Saturn and Rhea are ſaid (e) to have been begotten of the Ocean and Thetis, and thence the Ancient Romans would have (f) the Badge of Saturn to be a Ship; which things much accord with the Hiſtory of Noah. Saturn devoured all his Children but theſe three, Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, who divided the World amongſt them, as did Sem, Cham and Japhet. Of theſe, Cham, the youngeſt agreeth with Jupiter, being named Jupiter Hammon. Japhet with Neptune, for that he had his portion in Iſlands and Peninſula's. And Sem, being for his Goodneſs hated by Idolaters, might by them be condemned to Hell, and termed Pluto.

He is compared with Saturn.

(g) Bochart. Phaleg. *l.*1.*c.*1.

(h) Diodorus *lib.*5. & Aurelius Victor de Orig. Rom.

Cham is Jupiter. Japhet Neptune. Sem Pluto.

The poſterity of Sem.

10. Two years after the Flood, Sem being an hundred years old, begat Arphaxad, who is rationally (g) thought his eldeſt Son; although Elam and Aſſur be named before him; the Scripture in Genealogies not always obſerving the Order of Birth. Arphaxad at the Age of 35 years, begat a Son call'd Selah, according to the Hebrew; but the Greek Tranſlation of the 72. maketh him at the Age of 135. to have begat Cainan, which is followed by Luke in the Genealogie of Chriſt. Much is ſaid on both ſides for theſe ſeveral Readings; but moſt likely it is that this Cainan was neither thought of by Moſes, the 72 Interpreters, nor S. Luke; but that by a miſtake of the Tranſcribers, he crept into the Copies of Luke, and the 70. Beza had a Copy of Luke very ancient, and now in the Publick Library of the Univerſity of Cambridge, wherein he is not found; and, what is more, he was not acknowledged by the Primitive Church, as appeareth by (h) Irenæus: That the Verſion of the 72. moſt anciently had him not, is probably inferred from Joſephus; who, though he wrote in Greek, and uſually followeth that Tranſlation, nameth him not; neither doth Epiphanius againſt Hereſies; nor Hierome in his Hebrew Traditions, though he there diſcourſeth of the differences betwixt the Hebrew and Greek Copies. Neither is he read in all Copies of the 1 Chron. 1. In Moſes he is no where to be found, either in the Hebrew Text, or the Chaldæan, or Samaritan Verſions. Selah (or Schelach) at the Age of thirty years begat Heber, from whom many think the Hebrews, and the Hebrew Tongue to be ſo named. Heber being 34 years old, begat Phaleg, ſo called, becauſe in his days the Earth was divided.

The building of Babel.

11. The Diviſion of the Earth was occaſioned by the confuſion of Languages; and this, by building of the Tower of Babel. (i) Joſephus telleth us that God had ſeveral times admoniſhed men to ſeparate themſelves, and inhabit the Earth: which they impiouſly taking in an ill ſenſe, as though he did it upon deſign to deſtroy them; at the inſtigation of Nimrod, the Son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, (who now ambitiouſly affected Dominion over them) agreed to build a ſtately City, and a Tower which ſhould reach to Heaven, to defend them from danger, in caſe another Deluge ſhould overwhelm the Earth. They came from the Eaſt into the Land of Shinar, and there began their Work. Some put no other diſtinction betwixt the City and Tower but will have it only a City adorned with Towers. Others place them at a great diſtance from each other; but it (k) ſeemeth evident, that ſome one notable Tower was begun, and that in the City which was ſituate upon the River Euphrates.

Confuſion of Languages.

To put an end to this Deſign, God confounded their Language, that they underſtood not one another's Speech, and hereupon the City was called Babel, ſignifying Confuſion; and the Land of Shinar, afterwards known by the Name of Babylonia, ſometimes called Babel it ſelf, and the City Babylon, in ſeveral Languages.

Mentioned by Heathens.

Of this great Paſſage a Tradition alſo remained amongſt the Heathen, as appeareth by (l) Abydenus, Hiſtiæus, and Sibylla, who made mention of it; the Land of Senaar, and of Babylon, which they acknowledge was ſo called from Babel, in the Hebrew Tongue ſignifying Confuſion.

The Fable raiſed thereupon by the Poets.

Hence alſo the Fable aroſe concerning the Giants fighting againſt the gods, and their making a way to Heaven by heaping Mountains one upon another; which Attempt was blaſted by Jupiter's Thunderbolts.

12. What

(a) Plato in Polit.

(b) Servius in Virg. Æneid. 8.

(c) Athenæus lib. 14.

(d) Callimachi Hymni.

(e) Plato in Timæo.

(f) Vide Aurelium Victorem de Orig. Gentis Roman. ad initium.

(g) Jacobus Capellus in Hiſtor. ſacra & exotica. p. 34.

(h) Lib. 3. c. 33. Vide de hac re Jacob. Capell. Hiſt. ſacr. & exotic. p. 35, &c. Gerard. Johan. Voſſium in Diſſert. de genere Jeſu Chriſti ad Aphor. 5. Et Chron. ſacr. Iſagog. Diſſert. 5. c. 2. Greg. Anglum in Opuſculis. Bocharti Phaleg. l. 2. c. 13. Uſſerii Chron. ſacr. c. 6.

(i) Antiquit. l. 1. c. 4.

(k) Vide Bocharti Phaleg. l. 1. c. 9.

(l) Apud Joſ. quo prius. Et Euſeb. Præpar. Evang. l. 9.

The Diviſion of the Earth.

Sem's Inheritance.

His five Sons.

1. Elam.

12. What the Sons of men (in oppoſition to the People of God ſo called) laboured to prevent in the Building of Babel, was thereby brought upon them; the Lord ſcattering them abroad upon the face of the Earth, and yet doing them more good than they intended to do themſelves. Some will have the three Sons of Noah to have divided the Earth by Lot, which, as yet could not be ſufficiently known; and at ſuch a City (namely Rhinocoluca) as was not built till many Ages after, by (a) Actiſanes, King of Ægypt and Æthiopia: Nay, one (b) proceedeth ſo far, as to brand him with Hereſie whoſoever doth not believe it. Cham, though the youngeſt, was advanced by the Heathen above the reſt, and named Jupiter: Japhet, as the Eldeſt, had the Prerogative of Birth-right; but Sem, for his Piety was preferred by his Father, through God's diſpenſation, and obtained the choiceſt Inheritance, which extended to this, and a better World. He hath five (c) Sons mentioned in Scripture, Elam, Aſſur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram. Of Elam deſcended the Elamites, or Elymæans, Neighbours to the Medes, and whom Luke placeth betwixt Media and Meſopotamia; from whom alſo the Neighbouring Regions were named: For Suſan, the Metropolis of the Suſians, is by Daniel placed in the Province of Elam; and, beſides that, (d) Gabriana, Carbiana, Maſſabitica, and Suſiana, as far as to the River Eulæus; near the Mouth of which alſo upon the Perſian Gulf, Pliny and others place the Elymæans.

(a) Diodorus lib. 1. pag. 38. in margine notata.

(b) Philaſtrius, Hæreſ. 70.

(c) Gen. 10. 22.

(d) De his omnibus, vid. Bocharti Phaleg. l. 2. &c.

2. Aſſur.

3. Arphaxad.

4. Lud.

5. Aram.

13. From Aſſur deſcended the Aſſyres, called afterwards Aſſyrians, and from him was named Aſſyria, properly ſo called, (which was the Countrey lying about Ninas, or Ninive) named alſo anciently (e) Aturia, and (f) Atyria, and in latter times (g) Adiabene. In it Strabo placeth the Babylonians, Elymæans, Paraetacans, Gordiæans, Meſopotamians, Arabians and Syrians (from Ægypt to Pontus, where the Leuco-Syrians dwell) called alſo Aſſyrians. Syria and Aſſyria were of old time promiſcuouſly uſed; but at length Cuſtom obtained that Euphrates, or Tigris parted them. From Arphaxad, Joſephus would have the Chaldæans iſſued, which, as he and others ſay, were anciently called Arphaxadæans; but in Scripture they are conſtantly read Chaſdim, from Cheſed, or Chaſed, Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, and therefore owe their Original rather to him; and from Arphaxad ſeemeth to have received its Appellation part of Aſſyria, called Arphaxitis, and named Arrapachitis by Ptolomy. From Lud came the Lydians, anciently alſo known by the name of Mæones, as we have it from Herodotus, and others; the Carians and Myſians alſo, who inhabited the South part of Aſia, beyond the River Mæander, being reckoned of the ſame Original by him. Of Aram deſcended the Aramæans and the Arimi, called Syrians, after the growth of the Aſſyrian Empire. Four Sons of Aram are mentioned by Moſes, which (*) elſewhere are reckoned amongſt the Sons of Sem, viz. Huz, Hull, Gether, and Mas, or Meſech.

Vide eundem.

(e) Strabo lib. 16. pag. 736, 737.

(f) Dio in Trajano.

(g) Suidas.

Lib. 1.

(*) 1 Chron. 17.

The four Sons of Aram.

1. Huz.

2. Hull.

3. Gether.

4. Mas.

Joctan the ſecond Son of Eber had thirteen Sons.

14. Huz, or Uz, by general conſent of the Ancients, built Damaſcus. There being two beſides of the ſame Name, this hath made a confuſion amongſt Writers. One (h) was the ſon of Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, whoſe Seat is called Auſitis (i) in the Greek, and his Poſterity Auſitæ, a People of Arabia the deſert, mentioned by Ptolomy. (k) Another of the Poſterity of Eſau, or Edom; who fixed in Arabia the Stony, on the Borders of Canaan, from whom Idumæa is (l) called the Land of Uz. Hull (by Joſephus named Otrus) as they ſay, inhabited part of Armenia. Gether was the Father of the Bactrians, according to Joſephus; according to Hierome, of the Carians, and Acarnanians: and Mercerus ſtrangely joyneth all theſe Nations, ſo far diſtant in place, together in Original. Mas (called alſo (m) Meſech) is thought by Joſephus to be the Founder of the Meſanæans, a People near the Camp of Paſinus, about the Mouths of Tigris. Hierome maketh him the Father of the Mæones; being the ſame with the Lydians, whom he himſelf deriveth elſewhere from Lud. (n) Others will have him to have given Original to the People inhabiting the North-part of Syria, between Cilicia and Meſopotamia, near the Mountain Maſius; or to the Inhabitants of this Mountain, called Maſieni, and Maſiani. Eber the Son of Selah, beſides Phaleg, had another Son, named Joctan, whoſe thirteen Sons Moſes relateth, as the Founders of ſo many Nations; Almodad, Sheleph, Hazermaxeth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab. Their dwelling was from Meſha, as thou goeſt, ſaith Moſes, unto Sephar, a Mount of the Eaſt. They inhabit, ſaith Joſephus, from Cophenes, a River of India, that Countrey of Syria which lieth upon it; as now the Text is: which cannot but be falſe Geography. And for Syria, Aria is rather to be read; which, as Pliny ſaith, according to the Judgment of others, included three other Provinces of the Gedroſi, Arachotæ, and Paropamiſidæ, being terminated with the River Cophetes.

(h) Gen. 22. 21.

(i) Job 1. 1.

(k) Gen. 36. 28.

(l) Lam. 4. 21.

(m) 1 Chron. 1. 17.

(n) Junius, Bochartus.

15. But neither in this place is there any thing to be met withal like Meſha, or Sephar, or any people thereabout of the ſame name with Joctan, or his Sons; neither could that Ophir, to which Solomon ſent for Gold by Sea, and which they alſo will have denominated from one of the thirteen, be near Aria, which lieth Their Seat. at the foot of the Mountain Paropamiſus, at a vaſt diſtance from the Ocean. Great Bochartus therefore placeth them in the Mediterranean parts of Arabia the Happy, the Inhabitants whereof, if they may be heard, challenge Joctan for the Founder of
1. Almodad. both the Arabian Nation and Language, calling him otherwiſe Cahtan. From Almodad then, deſcended the Amodæans, by the Greeks called Allumæotæ, whom Ptolomy placeth in the middle of Arabia, near the Head of the River Lar, which emptieth
2. Sheleph. it ſelf into the Perſian Sea. From Saleph the Salapeni, who lived more remote upon the Borders of Arabia Deſart, not far from the Spring of the River Betius.
3. Hatſarmaveth. From Hatſarmaveth (which word is variouſly written, and by the Arabians called Hadramauth or Chadramauth) were named the Regions Adramyta, Chatramis, Chatramitis, and the Inhabitants Athramotitæ, Chatramotitæ, Chatramotæ, Atramitæ, and Adramitæ, whoſe Metropolis was anciently called Sabota, Sabbata,
4. Jerach. Saubata, at this day Sebam. From Jerach came the Alilæi, a People inhabiting near the Red Sea: Jerachæi in Hebrew, and Alilæi in Arabick, being the Sons of Jarlach, Hilal, or the Moon.

5. Hadoram. 16. From Hadoram iſſued the Drimanti, placed by Pliny upon the Perſian Gulf,
6. Uzal. near the Macæ. From Uzal, the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Alieman (in the Eaſtern part of Arabia) ſeem to be deſcended, Sanaa the Metropolis, being by
7. Dicklah. the Jews ſtill called Uzal. Dicla, in the Chaldæan and Syrian Tongues ſignifying a Palm; from him muſt that part of Arabia have been called, wherein that Tree
8. Obal. moſt grows, inhabited by the Minæi, Obal (in the Arabian Tongue Aubal and Abal) ſeemeth to have paſſed over the Gulf into Arabia Troglodytica, and to have
9. Abimael. given Name to the Mart-Town and Bay of Abalites or Avalites. Abimael was the Father of the Malitæ, whom Thophraſtus maketh to have inhabited one of the four 10. Shebah. Regions fruitful in Spices. Of Seba came the Sabæans, properly ſo called; named alſo Sabatæ, who dwelt by the Red Sea, betwixt the Minæans and Catabanes, which Nations alſo, together with the Chatramotæ, are by Writers often included amongſt the Sabæans. Beſides this Seba, there were three others of that Name, and Founders of Nations. As (a) one the Son of Chus, another his Nephew by Ragmah. and the (b) third the Son of Jockſhan, and Nephew of Abraham. Seba the Son of Joctan joyned to the Arabian Sea; the reſt to the Perſian; ſo that the Sabæans, (of whom the Greeks and Romans know no diſtinction) are ſaid by Pliny, to live from Sea to Sea. The Son of Jokſan lived on Robbery; but the reſt by Commerce
11. Ophir. with other Nations. Ophir (in Arabick, Auphar, ſignifying moſt rich) gave Name to that part of Arabia near the Sabæans, which was inhabited by the Ceſſanitæ, Caſandres, or Gaſandræ, ſo called from the Treaſures; Gold, for its plenty, being here in little requeſt. Another Ophir there was alſo in India; in the Iſland Taprobane, as moſt probable; the Phœnicians being accuſtomed to give old Names to 12. Havilah. new-found places. From Chauila the Son of Joctan (for there was another of this Name, Son to Chus) deſcended the Chaulonitæ, called otherwiſe Carbi, and Cerbani, the moſt warlike of the Arabians, whoſe Seat is yet called Chaulan. Of 13. Jobab. Jobab, the laſt of the thirteen, came the Jobabitæ, placed by Ptolomy next to the Sachalites. This was the Habitation of the Sons of Joctan from Meſha, called otherwiſe Muſa and Muza, a famous Port upon the Red Sea, as one goeth to Saphar a Mountain Eaſtward, where was a City of the ſame Name; both Port and City being well known to the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, who uſed to trade into theſe parts. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Sem, the choiſeſt of all, though contained only within Aſia.

Japhet's portion. 17. To Japhet fell a very conſiderable part of Aſia, and Europe, the leaſt of the Diviſions of the Earth, but better improved than the reſt, and far more populous; of later times the Seat of Learning, & of two Empires, which extended their power to the Inwards both of Aſia and Africa; and in an eſpecial manner bleſſed with Japetus. more than worldly proſperity, ſince Japhet dwelt in the Tents of Sem. The Greeks Japhet's ſeven Sons. acknowledged him for their Founder, by the name of Japetus, than whom they thought nothing more ancient. Moſes reckoneth ſeven of his Sons, and as many
1. Gomer. Nephews. The Sons are (c) Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meſhech and Titas. Joſephus maketh Gomer the Father of the Galatians, which if ſo, the ſame Original muſt be extended to the Gauls, of whom the other were but a Colony; and to ſome the Names of Cimmerii and Cimbri, whereby the Inhabitants of the Weſtern parts have been known, as alſo thoſe of Kumero, Kumeri and by Cymbro, which

(a) Gen. 10.7.
(b) Gen. 5.3.
(c) Gen. 10.2.

Bochartus lib. 3. cap. 8.

which our ancient Britains (of the ſame ſtock with the Gauls) called themſelves, ſeem to own no other Original. But another thinketh the Land of Gomer to be that part of Phrygia called Catecaucemene, lying upon the Rivers Cayſter and Mæander, and the City Philadelphia; the Plains of which conſiſt of a burnt kind of Earth like Aſhes, and the Hilly parts are all Stony, the whole Countrey being brittle, aduſt, and eaſie to be inflamed. This he gathereth from the ſignification of Gomer and Phrygia, both which import Burning: Moſes (according to his Judgment) not alwayes calling the Founders of Nations by their true and proper Mames, but by the Names of the Countries which they planted. Ever when the word is of the Plural Number, as of the Sons of Javan, Chittim, and Rodauim; and all the Sons of Miſraim and Canaan (except Sidon and Heth) muſt needs be Names of Peoples, not of particular Men. Hatſarmaueth he proveth to be the Name of a Place only; for that it ſignifieth the Region of Death; as Dikla, a place of Palm-trees; Ophir, a rich; Jobab, ſo called from the Deſart, and ſeveral others.

Gomer's three Sons.
1. Askenaz.
2. Riphath.
3. Togarmah.
(a) Chap. 58. & chap. 27. v. 14.

18. Gomer hath three Sons mentioned by Moſes; Aſhkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah. From Aſhkenaz thoſe deſcended, according to Joſephus, by the Greeks called Regines; which who they were, is not to be underſtood. Moſt probably, by Aſhkenaz is ſignified Bithynia, in which is the Bay Aſcanius, beſides a Lake and River of the ſame name; or Troas and Phrygia the leſs, in which were Aſcanea, both Countrey and City, and Iſland Aſcaniæ. From Riphat, Joſephus deriveth the Paphlagonians, a People of Aſia the leſs, near Pontus, and Neighbours to the Phrygians. Togarma is variouſly expounded by Writers. It appeareth out of Ezekiel (a) that Gomer and Togarma were not far diſtant; both North of Judæa: and that from Togarmah came Horſes and Mules to be ſold at Tyre. Hereto well agreeth the Opinion of Joſephus, who placeth Togarmah in Phrygia, to which Cappadocia was near adjacent, North to Judæa, and excelled in the Breed of Horſes and Mules.

2. Magog.
The ſame with Prometheus.
(b) Vide Bochartum l. 1.
3. Madai.
4. Javan.
(c) cap. 8. v. 21.

19. From Magog, Japhet's ſecond Son, deſcended the Scythians, according to Joſephus and others; Gog and Magog, being that part of Scythia about Caucaſus, which the Colchi and Armenians (whoſe Language was half Chaldæan) called Goghaſan (i.e. the Fort of Gog) and thence the Greeks, Caucaſus: to whom alſo Gogarene was known, which Stephanus deſcribeth to be between the Colchi and Eaſtern Iberi. Magog ſeemeth to be the ſame with Prometheus. For as Prometheus was the Son of Japetus, ſo Magog of Japhet. Prometheus was feigned to be fixed to Caucaſus, and Caucaſus was the Seat of the Scythians of old time, till they expelled the Cimmerii, and ſucceeded them: Prometheus brought down Fire from Heaven, which might take Original from Magog his finding out of Metals in Colchis and Iberia. And the Fable of his Heart or Liver being eaten by an Eagle, may be found in (b) the word Magog, which ſignifieth to be diſſolved, or to decay. Hierapolis, a City in Syria, ſeemeth to have been called alſo Magog from him; ſeeing Deucalion the Scythian, and Son of Prometheus, is by Lucian ſaid to have conſecrated the Temple there to the Syrian Goddeſs. From Madai it's generally granted, that the Medes are iſſued; the Medes and Perſians being conſtantly in the Book of Daniel and Eſther, named Mædai and Paras. From Javan deſcended the Iones, (or all that inhabited Greece, from Thrace to the Iſthmus of Corinth, the Macedonians being included) Homer calling them Iaones, and Alexander being ſignified by (c) Daniel under the Name of the King of Javan.

His four Sons.
1. Eliſa.
2. Tarſhiſh.
* 2 Chron. 20. 36.
3. Kittim.

20. The Sons of Javan were Eliſa, Tarſhiſh, Kittim, and Dodanim; from whom four Provinces took their Names. From Eliſa, Æolis, according to Joſephus; but rather Elis (the moſt ancient and ample Region of Peloponneſus, part whereof is by Homer called Aliſium) to be taken for the whole Peninſula. From Tarſis, Joſephus and others derive Tarſus, the great City in Cilicia; ſome Carthage; another Tunis; but Euſebius and Bochartus underſtand the Iberians or Spaniards, amongſt whom was a place called Tarleſſus. Beſides this, there was another (*) Tarſis in the Indian Sea, whither Ships went from Eſion-gaber; and indeed, whatever the word originally ſignifieth (whether Cilicia or any other place) it is ſecondarily applied to the Mediterranean Sea, which reacheth unto Phœnicia, and ſometimes ſeemeth to denote the Ocean it ſelf. Joſephus will have Cittim to have poſſeſſed himſelf of the Iſland Cyprus, where was a City called Citium, the native place of Zeno the Stoick; and hence, he ſaith, the Hebrews called all Iſlands and maritime places by the name of Chethim. Others will have the Chians, ſome certain Nations of India; others Cilicia, ſome, Macedonia to be underſtood by this word. The Romans are by Daniel ſignified under this name, and in Italy were of old the Cities Cetia, Echetia, and the River Cetus; and Chittim imports the ſame thing with the word Latinum,

4. Dodanim, or rather Rhodanim.

Chap. 11. v. 29, 30.

um, betokening to lie hid. The Opinion therefore of Joſephus is very probable, that theſe Iſlands and Coaſts of the Mediterranean might be known to the Hebrews, under the Name of Chethim. Dodanim (omitted in Joſephus) by ſome is interpreted Dardanians, by others Dodonæans. But moſt anciently it was read Rhodanim, which the Greek rendreth Rhodians, though the Name of Rhodes is later than Moſes his time. Bochartus therefore placeth this People in Gaul, about the River Rhodanus (now Rhene) which he proveth not to have been ſo named from Rhoda, a Town there Founded by the Rhodians. Rhodanim, he ſaith, ſignifieth Yellow, or Saffron-coloured, which agreeth well with the colour of the Hair of the ancient Gauls, either Natural, or Affected; wherein alſo the Britains ſhewed themſelves deſcended of the ſame Stock; as Jornandes judgeth.

5. Tubal.

6. Meſech.

Chap. 27. v. 13.

7. Tiras.

21. Tubal and Meſech (the fifth and ſixth Sons of Japhet) are joyned in Scripture, moſt commonly, together; as near to each other. Joſephus, from them deriveth the Iberians, and Cappadocians, who had a City in his time, known by the Name of Mazacha. Bochartus underſtandeth by Meſech and Tubal, the Moſchi and Tibareni, which are ſo joyned together by Herodotus, as Meſech and Tubal in the Scripture. The Moſchi (beſides Moſchica, properly ſo called) poſſeſſed all from Phaſis, as far as Pontus of Cappadocia; the Moſchian Mountains reaching ſo far. Then next ſucceeded the Tibarens, according to Strabo, who extendeth their Borders to Pharnacra, and Trapezond, the Moſchian and Colchian Mountains: ſo that they lay betwixt the Trapezuntians, and the Inhabitants of Armenia the leſs. Tubal and Meſech are noted by Ezechiel, to abound in Slaves, and Braſs; which, by the Conſent of Authors, fitly agreeth with the Regions of Pontus; eſpecially Cappadocia. From Thiras, moſt Authors derive Thrace; a Woman of which Countrey was called Threiſſa; and many Names there, both of Places and Perſons, perſwade the ſame thing. This was the Portion of Japhet, anſwerable to the Bleſſing of his Father; that God ſhould enlarge him. For unto it belonged all Europe, how big ſoever, beſides Aſia the leſs, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and thoſe vaſt Tracts towards the North, inhabited of old by the Scythians, and now by the Tartars: To ſay nothing of the New World, into which it's probable the Scythians paſſed by the Straits of Anian. To his Poſterity belong the Northern parts, which by Jornandes, an Hiſtorian of the Goths, are deſervedly termed, The Work-houſes of People, and Sheaths of Nations.

Cham's portion.

Plutarch in Iſide.

22. Curſed Cham was not excluded from Earthly Bleſſings. To his Lot fell Ægypt, and all Africk, a great part of Syria, and Arabia, beſides Babylonia, Suſiana, Aſſyria, and other Countries, which his Grand-ſon Nimrod poſſeſſed himſelf of. David very often calleth Ægypt the Land of Cham or Ham: the Ancient Inhabitants themſelves, Chamia, or Chemia. In Arabia and Africk the Name of Ammon, (the Aſpiration being taken away) was univerſally known, as appeareth by Ammon, a River in Arabia, the Promontory Ammonium, and the People called Ammonii. In Africk, the City Ammonis upon the River Cinyphus. The Chappel of Ammonis in the Iſland Meroe. In Marmarica, the City Ammonia, vulgarly Parætonium: And the Ammonian Countrey, where was the famous Oracle of Ammon. Nay, all Africk was called Ammonis, or Ammonia. Ham ſignifieth Hot: in which reſpect it agreeth well with the Greek word Zeus, the Name of Jupiter. Ham was Noah's youngeſt Son; ſo was Jupiter the youngeſt of Saturn. From Cham's living in Africk, the hotteſt part of the World, Jupiter may be called the Lord of Heaven. And Saturn's being made an Eunuch by his Son Jupiter (or Cælius by his Son Saturn, as Macrobius hath it) ſeemeth to relate to that Fault, for which Cham received from his Father a Curſe inſtead of a Bleſſing. Of theſe things Bochartus giveth abundant ſatisfaction, to name no more.

His four Sons.
1. Chus.

(a) Vide Bochartum lib. 4. cap. 2. Raleium l. 7. c. 8. ſec. 10.

His ſix Sons.

Their Seat.

Mizraim.

23. Four Sons of Cham are recorded by Moſes; Chus, Miſraim, Phut, and Canaan. From Chus, by a general Miſtake, the Æthiopians in Africk have been thought to be deſcended; whereas, by the Land of Chus, in Scripture is meant (a) part of Arabia, inhabited by the Chuſæans, called alſo Cuthæans; of whom were the Madianites, and Sephora the Wife of Moſes, who did not flie into Æthiopia, and there marry her. They inhabited above Ægypt upon the Perſian Gulf, in part of Arabia the ſtony and the happy; thought by ſome to be the ſame with the Ancient Scenites, and the Modern Saracens, being called Scenites from dwelling in Tents; and Saracens, from their Robberies. Chus hath ſix Sons mentioned; viz. Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha and Nimrod. Raamah hath two, Sheba, and Dedan. All theſe inhabited about the Perſian Sea; except Nimrod, whom Moſes affirmeth to have fixed his Seat at Babel. By the Name of Mizraim, is to be underſtood the Father of thoſe who inhabited Ægypt, thrice in Scripture called Maſor (the Singular Number of the word Mizraim) as it's thought, from the ſtraightneſs of it, being extended out in length from the Sea towards Syene. From Mizraim, Moſes deriveth ſeven People or Nations: Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Pathruſim, Caſluhim (out of whom came Philiſtiim) and Caphtorim.

24. Joſephus will have the eight Sons of Miſraim to have poſſeſſed all the Country lying between Gaza and Ægypt, though Philiſtin only gave Name to it; from whom the Greeks called it Palæſtina. Lybis, he ſaith, led a Colony into Libya, which he named after himſelf; but as for the reſt, he confeſſeth both their Names and Affairs to be obſcure, their Cities being overthrown, as he ſaith, in the Æthiopian War made by Moſes; concerning which he bringeth a meer Fable, taken out of Artapanus, and the Inventions of the Helleniſts. As for Ludim, Bochartus by ten Arguments proveth the Æthiopians to be meant thereby, whom he will have alſo a Colony of the Ægyptians. By Anamim the Nomades of Africk, who inhabited about Ammonis, and in Naſamonitis, and for Anamians, might eaſily be called Amonians and Ammonians; they being alſo a Colony of the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, as appeareth out of Herodotus. Of the ſame Original he maketh the Naſamones, Amantes, Hammanientes (who * made their Houſes of Salt) and the Garamants. Lehabim or the Lehabæans are thought to be the ſame with the Libyans bordering upon Ægypt, from whom this Denomination might paſs to thoſe that inhabited the greateſt part of Africk. Naphtuhim he placeth in Marmarica upon the Mediterranean Sea; Pathruſim in Thebais, a Province of Ægypt, called Pathros, and by many diſtinguiſhed from Ægypt, though Peopled from it.

Miſraim's 8 Sons.

1. Ludim.

2. Anamim.

3. Lehabim.

4. Naphtuhim.

5. Pathruſim.

Antiq. l. 1. c. 6.

* Solinus. c. 31.

25. Caſluhim he maketh to ſignifie the Colchi, though ſo far diſtant from Ægypt, out of which they deſcended; and from Paleſtine, the Inhabitants whereof deſcended from them; both their Language and Life in all particulars ſo abſolutely agreed with the Ægyptians, of whom, by the Heathen alſo, they have been thought a Colony, left there by Seſoſtris in his Expedition, though they be of more Antiquity than he. The Caphtorim ſeem to have been Neighbours to him; from whom alſo, together with them, the Philiſtines deſcended, as appeareth from ‖ Scripture. They are therefore to be placed in that part of Cappadocia, which lieth next to Colchos about Trapezond. It is probable that, upon the Report of the Richneſs of theſe Places, the Ægyptians ſent out a Colony (for this drew thither Phrixus, Jaſon, Seſoſtris, the Medes and Perſians, and of later times the Saracens out of Arabia:) which, finding the Climate too cold, or the Countrey not to anſwer expectation, or perhaps moleſted by the Scythians and others; part thereof reſolved to return home, and in their way ſeated themſelves in Paleſtine, after they had expelled thence the * Anims. The Captain of this Expedition ſeemeth to have been Typhon, reported by the Greek Poets, to have made War againſt the Gods, and to have pierced as far as Caucaſus; but, after many Battels, being ſtricken of Jupiter with a Thunderbolt, to have fled into Paleſtine; where he died at the Lake of Serbonis, and ſtill lyeth buried.

6. Caſluhim.

7. Caphtorim.

‖ Jer. 47. 4. Amos 9. 4.

* Deut. 11. 23.

26. The third Son of Cham was Phut, who divided Africk with his Brother Miſraim. To Miſraim fell Ægypt, and moſt part of Africk, as far as the Lake of Tritonis, which divideth Africk into two equal parts. To Phut, all from the Lake, as far as the Atlantick Ocean; as may be gathered from (a) Herodotus. As far as the Lake, he ſaith, all the Africans uſed the Cuſtoms of Ægypt; but thoſe beyond them towards the Weſt, a far different kind of Life. Some Names retained a Memorial of Phut, as the City Putea; a River of Mauritania Tingitana, called Phut; and the Haven Phthia, mentioned by Ptolomy, Pliny, and others. Canaan is the fourth Son reckoned in order by Moſes. He begat Sidon, his Firſt-born, and Heth, the Jebuſite, the Amorrhite, the Girgaſite, the Hivite, the Arkite, the Sinite, the Arvadite, the Zemarite, and the Hamathite. By Canaan was inhabited the Land, which thereupon bore his Name, and was afterwards conquered by the Hebrews. His Family was propagated as far as the Sea, the Phœnicians being deſcended of him, as Eupolemus an Heathen Writer, in his Book of the Jews, bare witneſs, ſaying, That Saturn begat Belus and Chanaan; and the later begat the Father of the Phœnicians: beſides, one Cna is ſaid by Sanchoniathon (a moſt ancient Phœnician Writer) to have been the firſt Man that was called Phœnician; whence, by Stephanus, Phœnice is called Cna, and the Phœnicians, Cnai. But, what is more, the Scripture calleth Phœnicia the Land of Canaan.

3. Phut.

4. Canaan. His Poſterity and Seat.

(a) Lib. 4. c. 185, 187.

Euſeb. Præpar. Evang. l. 9.

27. Sidon, the Firſt-born of Canaan, was the Father of the Sidonians, or the Builder of the City Sidon, which was more ancient than Tyre, and the Metropolis to it; the Sidonians having led a Colony thither, and founded Tyre, according to Trogus (b) before the deſtruction of Troy; 240 years before the building of Solomon's Temple, as Joſephus counteth. The Children of Heth dwelt in the Land of

1. Sidon.

2. Heth.

(b) Lib. 18. Antiq. l. 8. c. 2.

3. The Jebuſite.
4. Ammonite.
5. Gergaſite.
6. Hivite.
7. Arkite.
8. Sinite.
9. Arnadite.
10. Zemarite.
11. Hemathite.

Canaan, about Hebron and Barſeba towards the South; and from them the Anakims deſcended. The Jebuſites held Hieruſalem, and the Caſtle of Sion until David's time. The Ammonites paſſed the Mountains of Judæa, and paſſing over Jordan, made War upon the Moabites and Ammonites; ſeized upon Baſan, Heſbon, and all the Country lying between the River Jabbok and Arnon: in memory whereof, one of their Poets wrote a Poem, which Moſes (a) hath inſerted into his Writings. The Gergaſites ſeem to have continued about Gereſa, or Gadara, over againſt Galile, beyond Jordan, (b) till Chriſt's time. The Hivites dwelt in Mount Hermon, towards the Eaſt of the Land of Canaan, from whom deſcended the Gibeonites, living nigh to Jeruſalem, and the Sichemites dwelling near to Samaria, more towards the Weſt. The Arkites inhabited Arca, or Arce, a City in Libanus, mentioned by Joſephus and Ptolomy. The Sinites had a City called Sin, not far from Arce, according to Hierome: but Bochartus placeth them at Peluſium; Sin ſignifying Mud or Clay, as Pelos in Greek. The Arnadites, or Aradites, ſeized upon the Iſland Aradus, on the Coaſt of Phœnice, at the Mouth of the River Eleutherus, and part of the Neighbouring Continent, where was Axtaradus, Marathus, and Laodicea. The Zemarites, or Semerites, dwelt (as it's thought) about Fineſa, a notable City of Cœloſyria, upon the River Orontes, and built Semarajim in the Tribe of Benjamin. And the Hemathites were ſeated about the City of Syria, called Epiphania, and not at Antiochia, which is at too great a diſtance. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Canaan, whoſe Border was from Sidon, as thou comeſt to Gerar unto Gaza, as thou goeſt unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim, even unto Laſha; which ſome interpret Cæſarea Philippi, others Callichoë; but Bochartus thinketh it to be Lyſa, a City of the Arabians, in the mid-way between the Dead, and Red Seas.

(a) Num. 21. 27.
(b) Mat. 8. 28. Mark 5. 1. Luke 8. 27.

Thus was the Earth moſt anciently divided, and poſſeſſed after the Flood. How it hath ſince, in the ſeveral parts of it, changed its Inhabitants, ſhall be diſcovered, upon occaſion, as the Work will bear.

CHAP. II.

Of the Babylonian Empire, from the firſt Founding thereof, to its utter Subverſion by Cyrus.

The Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom.

1. After the Diviſion of the Earth, Nimrod, as we ſaid, the Son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, fixed his Seat at Babel, and therein firſt began a Kingdom; having joyned to it (a) Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the Land of Shinar. By Erech, the Ancients underſtood Edeſſa; and by Accad, Niſibis: But neither the Names nor Situation of theſe Cities do agree; they being in that part of Meſopotamia which lieth towards Armenia, and very far from Babylon. Therefore Erech is rather to be taken for Arecca, a City of Suſiana upon Tigris, mentioned by Ptolomy, which alſo ſeemeth to be the ſame with Arderica or Anderica (b) in Herodotus; Ard in the Perſian Tongue ſignifying Great. And well Arecca might ſo be called, which was ſo long, that ſailing up the River, one ſhould meet with it three ſeveral days, one after another; as the Hiſtorian relateth. Bochartus thinketh Acchad (called alſo Archad) to have given Name to the River Argad, which ran through Sittacena, a Province near to Babylonia, and ſince called Apolloniatis. By Calneh (which is alſo Calno and Cauno) is to be underſtood that City, by the Parthians re-built, and called Cteſiphon. It ſtood upon Tigris, three Miles from Seleucia, being the Metropolis of Chalonitis, a Province denominated from it, and mentioned by Strabo, and others. Babylon was exhauſted by the Building of Seleucia, as Pliny (c) telleth us; and the Parthians built (or re-built) Cteſiphon in Chalonitis, three Miles off, to drein Seleucia.

(a) Gen. 10. 10
(b) Lib. 1. c. 185.
(c) Lib. 6. c. 26.

The Beginning and Duration of the Aſſyrian Empire.

2. The Duration of this Babylonian or Aſſyrian Empire, till Sardanapalus, is variouſly aſſigned; the cauſe of which ſeemeth to be, for that ſome derived the Original thereof from the Birth of Chus, as Cappellus * thinketh; and ſo Herodotus might aſſign 1520 years to the continuance of it. Others from the Beginning of the Babylonian Kingdom, as Diodorus, who reckoneth 1400 years to the Death of Sardanapalus. Some from the Building of Ninive, as Cteſias, who hath 1360.

* Ad A. M. 1822. p. 45.

And laſtly, others from the Death of Belus, as Trogus and Euſebius; who give to it 1300 years. That Nimrod ſhould begin his Kingdom within an hundred years after the Flood, is not very probable; as neither, that the Building of the Tower of Babel happened within that time: which would have been too ſhort a ſpace for the propagation of Mankind to ſo great Multitudes. An hundred years after the Deluge, Phaleg was born; in whoſe days it was that the Earth was divided. Some make the Diviſion to have been at the ſame time of his Birth, and thence his Name impoſed, as from a thing already done, or in doing. Others aſſign it to the latter end of his days, and will have his Name prophetically given by his Father: But there are not wanting, who take a middle way betwixt theſe two, and think the Diviſion made when he was come to ripeneſs of Age, or in the middle of his Years; the Number of which amounted to 239. When Alexander the Great had conquered Babylon, which fell out about the 3675th year of the World; Calliſthenes the Philoſopher, who followed him in his Wars, at the deſire of Ariſtotle his Kinſman, enquired into the Antiquities of the Chaldæans, and could find no Obſervations of any longer date than 1903 years; which being caſt back from the foreſaid years, fall in their beginning, into 1772 from the Creation, the 116th from the Deluge, and the 16th of Phaleg's Life.

A. M. 759.

Lege Voſſii Iſag. Chron. Diſſert. 5. c. 5, 6.

Porphyrius apud Simplicium in Ariſtot. de Cœlo. l. 2.

Nimrod named Belus.

3. Nimrod, the Founder of this Empire, was by his Subjects named Bel, or Belus, which ſignifieth Lord, or Sovereign. That he was the Ancient Belus, is thence proved; that (*) moſt of the old Writers accounted Belus the Builder of Babylon, although ſome attributed it to Semiramis; herein relying upon the Credit of Cteſias, which now is deſervedly ſuſpected by Learned men, and in no caſe worthy to ſtand in Competition with that of Beroſus, the famous Babylonian Prieſt (who, as Pliny ſaith, had a Statue erected to his Memory at Athens, with a Gilded Tongue) nor with that of Abydenus, who alſo collected his Hiſtories out of the Chaldæan Archives. After Moſes hath ſpoken of the four Cities, which were the Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom; we read that out of that Land (of Shinar) Aſſur went forth and built Niniveh, and the City Rehoboth, and Calah, and Reſen, between Niniveh and Calah. Some, according to this Tranſlation, will have this Aſſur to have been the Son of Sem, who having built Niniveh, and founded the Aſſyrian Kingdom, Nimrod diſpoſſeſſed him, or his; or ſome manner of way obtained, and joyned it to the Babylonian, as Julius Africanus hath delivered. But others contend, that this Aſſur is the Name of the Countrey, and not of a man; and that it is to be read, And out of that Land went (Nimrod) into Aſſur, (i. e. Aſſyria) and builded Ninive, &c. Otherwiſe they think it would be out of the way for Moſes to mention the Son of Sem in this place, where he is in hand with the Genealogy of Cham; neither could it be peculiar to him to go out of this Land, and build Niniveh; ſeeing all Mankind almoſt, at the Diviſion of the Earth, went out of it. The laſt Reading only maketh the Senſe entire; for how elſe could the four Cities properly be ſaid to be the Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom, except he added more unto it? Laſtly, this ſeemeth very urgent, that, in Scripture Aſſyria is called the Land of Nimrod.

* Semiramis eam condiderat vel, ut plerique credidere, Belus, cujus regia oſtenditur. Curtius. l. 5. c. 1.

Beroſus apud Joſeph. contra Apionem, lib. 1.

Abyden. apud Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. 9.

Dorotheus, Sidonis poeta apud Julium Firmicum.

Whether he built Niniveh.

Mich. 5. 6.

4. He was a mighty Hunter before the Lord; or, therein none was to be compared with him; things being ſaid to be ſuch before God, as were ſo indeed, or in an eminent manner; He judging not according to outward appearance, but as they are in their own Natures. By the means of Hunting it is probable that he made way unto his Monarchy: For under pretence of what was very neceſſary at this time (when men were few, ſcattered, and lying abroad, without defence againſt wild Beaſts, which ever eſpecially abounded about Arabia and Babylon) he might gather a Band of men, and by ſuch Exerciſes (which the Heathens (a) by their Practice, as well as Opinion ſhewed to be convenient for breeding of Warriours) train them up, till he converted their force from Beaſts, to Men. What was performed by him, ſeemeth to have been attributed to his Succeſſors. Ninus is (b) ſaid to have gathered an Army of Arabians, and therewith to have ſubdued the Babylonians; which ſeemeth to have related to his Conqueſt of that Countrey. For being a Chaſæan, and conſequently an Arabian, he might by the Aſſiſtance of his own Countrey-men and Kindred effect it; whom he (c) rewarded with that Region beyond Tigris, which thence, was, by the Hebrews, called Chus; by the Chaldæans, Chuth; Ciſſia, by the Greeks; and Chuzeſtan, (i. e. the Province of Chus) by the Perſians. From this uſurping the Right of Noah, ſome think the Fable to have ſprung, of Saturn being caſt out of his Kingdom by Jupiter; the Word Nimrod ſignifying a Rebel, and anſwerable to his Carriage. He is alſo judged to be the true Bacchus; this word being little changed from Bar-Chus, that is, the Son of Chus;

Made way to his Kingdom by Hunting.

The true Bacchus.

(a) Xenophon de venatione & in Cyropædia.

(b) Diodorus. l. 2. p. 64. A.

(c) Bochartus l. 4. c. 12.

Chus. Bacchus was the Son of Jupiter, and he was the Grand-ſon of Jupiter Hammon. The moſt ancient Name of Bacchus was Zagreus, which ſignifieth a ſtrong Hunter, anſwerable to the Epithete given to Nimrod. He undertook an Expedition into the Eaſt, wherein ſeemed to be contained the Facts of Nimrod, and his Succeſſors. Bacchus was feigned to be born at Nyſa in Arabia; and Nimrod was alſo an Arabian. And not unlikely might Nimrod be called to be over the Vines, who firſt reigned at Babylon, where was that moſt excellent kind of Wine, dignified by the Ancients with the Name of Nectar. To the Reign of Belus, or Nimrod, 65 years are given by Julius Africanus.

Athenæus.

Ninus.

His Conqueſts.

Ninive.

5. Ninus, his Son, ſucceeded him, and Canonized him for a God; which gave, as 'tis ſaid, the firſt occaſion to Idolatry. He made a Confederacy with Arieus, King of Arabia (which Countrey withſtood moſt Conqueſts;) and then invading Armenia, forced Barzanes the King thereof, to ſubmit to his Vaſſallage. Next, he entred Media, where he took, and crucified Phamus, the King; and then, being pricked on by deſire of Glory, and encouraged by his Succeſs, he ſubdued all the People of Aſia in ſeventeen years, except the Indians and Bactrians; the latter whereof, under Conduct of their King Zoroaſtres (or rather Oxgartes; for Zoroaſter, the great Magician, lived many Ages after) ſtoutly oppoſed him, and yet at length were brought under, as we have it from Diodorus, who reporteth alſo that Ninus built Ninive, which he ſo named after himſelf. Whether he, his Father, or any other built it, a City it was of great Bigneſs, Strength, and Ornament, being in Compaſs ſixty Miles; of a Quadrangular form, incompaſſed and fortified with a Wall a hundred foot high, and of ſuch a Breadth as three Chariots might have been driven together a-breaſt upon it; adorned alſo with Towers 200 Foot in height. The place of it is not agreed of, and (b) ſome think there were two Cities of this Name; one upon Euphrates in Comagena, and another in Aſſyria, beyond Tigris. As for Ninus, many things done both by his Father, and Succeſſors, ſeem to have been attributed to him. He reigned 52 years; and the manner of his Death is diverſly related: (c) One ſaith, he was ſhot with a Dart as he lay before a Town. (d) Another writeth that Semiramis his Wife (whom he had choſen for her admirable Beauty, and now doated on) obtained leave to wear his Royal Robe, and reign over Aſia five dayes; and then, when ſhe had got the power into her hands, commanded one of the Guard to kill him: But a (e) third only relateth him to have been ſecured in Priſon.

His Death.

(a) Biblioth. l.2. p.65. ex Cteſia Cnidio.

Juſtin. lib. 1.

(b) Lege Bocharti.Phaleg. l. 4. c. 20.

(c) Oroſius.

(d) Dinon apud Ælian. *var. Hiſt. l.*7. c. 1.

(e) Diodorus *ubi ſupra.*p.76. D.Ex Athenæo & aliis.

Semiramis, his Wife, counterfeiteth her Son.

Her Acts.

6. He left a Son by Semiramis, named Ninyas, who being but young, ſhe put on Mans Apparel, and counterfeiting his Perſon, as well as Sex, is reported to have done very great things; part of which might rather be challenged by the two foregoing Kings, and by ſome that followed her. The Reſemblance of her Son in all the Lineaments and Proportion of her Body took away Suſpition; for the further prevention whereof, ſhe commanded the ſame kind of Garment to be worn by the People. At length, when ſhe thought ſhe had got Fame ſufficient, ſhe made her ſelf known; which detracted not from her Glory, but added to the Luſtre of it. She re-edified and enlarged Babylon, incompaſſing it with a Wall made up of Brick, Sand, and a certain Clay, or Slime, clammy like Pitch, which there abounded; and * reſtrained, by new works, the violence of Euphrates, which, formerly was wont to overflow into the Town. Not content with the Empire, as her Huſband left it, ſhe enlarged it with the Conqueſt of Æthiopia, and made War upon India, though without Succeſs; in which Undertaking, ſhe only had Alexander the Great her Æmulator, as Juſtin affirmeth. But, after ſhe had reigned 42 years, either for that ſhe would have had to do unlawfully with her Son (being reported exceeding vicious of her Body,) or, becauſe he was impatient of her ſo long retaining the Power, he ſlew her; although ſome ſay, ſhe voluntarily reſigned the Kingdom. After her Death, ſhe was feigned to be turned into a Dove, and worſhipped for a Goddeſs under that ſhape: the occaſion of which ſeemeth to have been the Bearing of that Bird pourtraied in her Enſign.

Juſtin. ex Trogo. l. 1.

Diodorus, ut prius.

* Herodotus. l. 1. *c.*184.

Ninyas.

7. Ninyas, or Ninus, (as Juſtin calleth him) ſucceeding, imitated neither Grandfather, Father, nor Mother; but giving up himſelf wholly to an effeminate courſe of Life, would be ſeen of none except Concubines and Eunuchs. Yet to him is aſcribed that politick ordering of the Militia, which was imitated conſtantly by his Succeſſors. A yearly Choice was made of Officers and Soldiers out of each Province, to lie in Garriſon in the City, and to be ready at all Eſſays, there to continue for one year; at the end of which, they were ſucceeded by new Levies. Hereby, the Subject was contained in Obedience; and yet, by ſuffering the Souldiers no longer to continue together, all Conſpiracies and Plots were prevented, which might elſe have riſen amongſt ſuch multitudes; the ſpace of a year not being ſufficient for ſuch through and intimate acquaintance, as might produce any conſiderable Stirs. Thoſe that followed Ninyas, for thirty Generations, trode, for the moſt part, in his paths; nothing either memorable, or certain, remaining of them, except Teutamus the 20th. from Ninyas, to whom Priamus King of Troy, when he was beſieged by the Greeks, ſent for Aid. This Teutamus is ſaid to have ſent him a Supply of 10000 Æthiopians, and as many of the Inhabitants of Suſiana, with 200 Chariots, under the Command of Memnon, who bearing himſelf very valiantly againſt the Beſiegers, was at length, by the wiles of the Theſſalians, circumvented and ſlain. From the Beginning of the Aſſyrian Empire, to the Deſtruction of Troy, Euſebius reckoneth 943 years, Cappellus from the Building of Niniveh, 995.

Diodorus. l. 2. p. 77. A.

Teutamus.

Sardanapalus.

A. M. 3166.

8. The 30th in order, was Tonos-Concoleros, by the Greeks and Romans called Sardanapalus, ennobled only above the reſt, for his exceſs in Effeminateneſs, and his ruine cauſed thereby. He ſpent all his time among Women; with whom he would ſit and ſpin, imitating them in all things poſſible, ſo as ſcarce ever in his whole time was he ſeen of the other Sex. This extraordinary corruption in Manners gave occaſion to two of his greateſt Officers to compaſs his Deſtruction. For, Beleſis (or Belochus) the Governor of Babylon, a great Magician and Aſtrologer, out of the Doctrine of the Stars, foretold to Arbaces Governor of Media, (otherwiſe called (a) Arbachus, (b) Orbachus, and (c) Pharnaces,) that one day he ſhould obtain the whole Principality of Sardanapalus, and excited him to Attempts ſutable to ſuch an Atchievement. Arbaces herewith puffed up, promiſed him the poſſeſſion of Babylon, if his Prediction ſhould take, and laboured to ingratiate himſelf with the Captains of the ſeveral Provinces. Then having a great deſire to ſee what manner of Life the King lived, he hired an Eunuch to bring him into the Palace; where, beholding with his Eyes his diſſolute Carriage, he deſpiſed him, and much more encouraged himſelf in the hope given him by Beleſis. They now reſolved, the one to draw the Medes and Perſians, and the other the Babylonians, to revolt; and Arbaces communicated his Deſign and Purpoſe to the Governour of Arabia, his great Friend.

Beleſis and Arbaces conſpire againſt him.

(a) Juſtin.
(b) Strabo.
(c) Gaterculus.

Diodorus.

9. Theſe things being as diligently put in practice, as readily undertaken, the next year an Army of 400000 men coming up to Niniveh, where the King then lay; under pretence of relieving the former years Guard, reſolved to employ their Force in the Ruine of the Aſſyrian Kingdom. Sardanapalus, having timely notice of the Revolt, drew out ſuch Forces as were in the City, and falling upon the Rebels in the Plain, put them to the Rout. They flying to the Mountains, and recollecting their Courage, came down again, and engaged; but with the ſame ſucceſs: after which they retreated to the ſame place. Hereupon, Arbaces calling the Officers together, to adviſe what was to be done, all of them were for diſbanding the Army, and departing home, except Beleſis, who, urging them with what the Stars portended, prevailed with them to ſtay; but to no other purpoſe than that the King might gain the third Victory, which ſhortly happened. Now they fully reſolved to be gone; when Beleſis, his Credit being deeply engaged, ſpent the whole night in viewing the Stars; out of the Myſtery of which, he was bold to affirm, that Help would come of its own accord, and great Changes follow, if they would have Patience but five dayes longer. They being yet prevailed with for this once; before the five dayes were expired, News came, that great Forces were coming from Bactria to the aid of the King. To them Arbaces ſent, and eaſily perſwaded them to joyn with the Conſpirators.

He obtaineth three victories over them.

10. Sardanapalus knowing nothing of this, and puffed up with his Succeſs, returned to his former Courſe of Life; which Arbaces underſtanding from certain Fugitives, and how his Army lay in a ſecure and careleſs poſture, drew down upon it in the Night, and made a great Slaughter, and drove thoſe that eſcaped, into Niniveh. Hereupon the King committed the Conduct of the Army to Salæmenes, his Wives Brother, and took upon himſelf the Defence of the City; but the Rebels twice in the Field overthrew his Forces, and killed the General with moſt of his Souldiers. Then was the City cloſely beſieged, and many Nations revolted to the Conſpirators; which the King conſidering, and ſenſible of his Condition, ſent out his three Sons and two Daughters, with a great Treaſure, to Cotta, the Governour of Paphlagonia; and, diſpatching Courriers into ſeveral Provinces, took what care he poſſibly could for the making of New Levies.

Is worſted twice.

11. Neither was he behind-hand in providing all things within, that were neceſſary for Reſiſtance. There being no fear of Storming the Town, by reaſon of the wonderful ſtrength and height of the Walls. He conſidered the main danger to lie in the Affections of the Inhabitants; to whom, that they might have no cauſe to attempt any new thing, he ſupplied all Neceſſaries in a plentiful meaſure. Two years and above he held out, and doubted not but to be able to do it, till Relief ſhould come; and the rather, for that they had an Oracle that Niniveh ſhould never be taken, till the River firſt proved an Enemy to it; which he never could ſuſpect. But in the third year fell ſuch Rains, that Euphrates (or Lycus, upon which, ſome conceive that Strabo placeth the City, and not Euphrates, nor Tigris, as others) ſwelling with abundance of Waters, made a Breach in the Wall twenty Furlongs in length. At this, the King utterly diſcouraged, as judging the Oracle to be fulfilled, leſt he ſhould fall alive into the hands of his Enemies, he built a Pile of Wood in his Palace, upon which he heaped his Treaſures, and rich Attire; and, making a little Room in the midſt, wherein he beſtowed himſelf, his Concubines and Eunuchs, ſet fire to the Heap, and ſo periſhed with this Company and the Palace. Such was the end of him, who placed all his Felicity in his Senſual Appetite, which he would have alſo recorded in his (a) Epitaph, and adviſed the Reader to imitate. He is reported to have built (but rather he reſtored) two Cities of Cilicia in one day, viz. Tarſus and Anchiala; in the latter of which was his (b) Monument to be ſeen, being a Statue of Stone, with the Finger and Thumb of the right hand joined together, as about to give a Fillip. Upon the Monument was written in Aſſyrian Characters, Sardanapalus the Son of Anacyndaraca built Anchiales and Tarſus in one day. As for thee, Friend, Eat, drink, and play; for all things elſe are not worth this, viz. that Fillip. In him this Line of the Aſſyrians failed, the Empire being divided into two Principalities, after it had continued about 1400 years, reckoned from the Building of B*abylon.* This Fall of Sardanapalus happened about the year of the World 3186, 43 years before the firſt Olympiad.

to

The River ſwelling with Rain, breaks the Wall.

Sardanapalus burneth himſelf in his Palace.

(a) Athenæus lib. 1.

(b) Strabo. l. 14 Edit. Cauſab. p. 672 A.

Hæc habeo quæ edi, quæque exſaturata libido hauſit, at illa jacent, multa & præclara relicta. Epitaph. à Cicerone verſ. Tuſc. l. 5. Quid aliud, inquit Ariſtoteles, in Bovis, non in Hominis Sepulchro incideres? Hæc habere ſe dicit, quæ ne vivus quidem diutius habebat, quàm fruebatur.

Arbaces made King.

Granteth Babylon to Beleſis.

12. The (c) Beſiegers underſtanding what was become of Sardanapalus, preſently entred in at the Breach, and took the City. Then, inveſting Arbaces with a Royal Robe, they created him King; who rewarded them according to their Deſerts, and allotted the Provinces to their ſeveral Governors. B*eleſis*, according to Agreement, having received the Principality of B*abylon*, and underſtanding from an Eunuch, how great Treaſure Sardanapalus had burnt with himſelf, begged the Aſhes of Arbaces, under pretence of having made a Vow, in the Heat of the War, to carry them to B*abylon*, and therewith to raiſe a laſting Monument of the Deſtruction of the Aſſyrian Empire. He being ignorant of his covetous Deſign, granted his Requeſt; but, when the Matter was diſcovered, referred his Judgment to a Council of Officers, who condemned him to Death: Yet, being deſirous to begin his Reign mildly, he not only remitted this Puniſhment, but permitted him to enjoy all the Gold and Silver already tranſported; and, what remained, which amounted to many Talents, he conveyed it to Ecbatane, the chief City of the Medes. (d) Diodorus and (e) Strabo tell us how he levelled Ninus (or Ninive) with the Ground. Some (f) think it was only the Caſtle; ſeeing the City had afterwards Kings, if not comparable to the reſt, yet great and powerful, which they think might deſcend from B*eleſis.*

(c) Diodorus. l. 2. p. 81. A.

(d) L. 2. p. 816.

(e) L. 16. p. 737

(f) Jacob. Cappellus. Hiſt. Sacr. & Exotica. p. 170. Simſon in Chronico ad A. M. 3187.

What kind of Government was in Media.

Kings of M*edia* according to Cteſias.

13. Herodotus (g) writeth, how the Medes, having freed themſelves from the Aſſyrian Yoke, lived for many Ages without a King, in a way of Popular Government. But (h) Cteſias of Cnidus, an Author of ſomething a later Date (who ſerved Cyrus the younger, in his Expedition againſt his Brother Artaxerxes, and being taken Priſoner in the Battel, was for his excellent Skill in Phyſick, which he profeſſed, received into Favour by the King, and lived in good Eſteem in his Court 16 years, pretending to tranſcribe his Hiſtory out of the Records of Perſia,) reported that Arbaces, after the Overthrow of the Aſſyrians, reigned 18 years: and as he left the Dominion of Aſia to the Medes, ſo alſo the Sovereignty of them to his Son Mandauces. That Mandauces, having reigned 50 years, left the Kingdom to Seſarmus, who reigned 30. Him followed Artias, and reigned 50; then Arbianis 22; Arſæus 40; in whoſe time the Caduſians revolted, through the Procurement of Parſodas, the Preſident of his Council, whom he had offended. Artynes 22. Artibanes, 14; (in whoſe Reign the Parthians revolted, and gave up themſelves to the Sacæ.) And laſt of all, Aſtyages his Son, who being overthrown by Cyrus, the Empire was thereby devolved upon the Perſians.

(g) L. 1. c. 95.

(h) Vide Droderum ut ſupr. p. 84.

According to Euſebius.

14. That Cteſias out of Deſign, wrote things contrary to Herodotus, is probable enough, and that he is Fabulous, cannot be denied; yet have we a Succeſſion of Kings elſewhere (a) recorded, though ſuch an one, as ſcarce in one Name agreeth with that of his. Soſarmus is ſaid to have ſucceeded Arbaces, and continued 30 years; then Medidus, 40; Cardiceas, 13; and then Deioces, whom Herodotus will have to have firſt obtained Sovereignty over the Medes. For having, as he (b) writeth, an Ambition that way, he made himſelf Popular by pretence to the Love of Juſtice, which then ran at a low Ebb amongſt them, for want of Authority. He firſt took upon him to decide the Controverſies of his own Village; which, performing with much Equity and Conſcience, thence became known to other Parts; and at length became ſo Famous, that few would bring their Cauſes before any other Judge than him alone. Being aware of this, he withdrew himſelf, giving out, that no longer could he undergo ſuch a Burden, and thereby neglect his Private Affairs. Hereupon, Robberies, Violence and Oppreſſion returned throughout the Countrey; inſomuch, that the People, gathering together from all Quarters, after a ſerious Debate, concluded there was neceſſity of having a King, under whoſe Protection every man living might the better mind his Domeſtick Matters. Deioces was choſen by univerſal Conſent, who, having got the Power into his Hands, cauſed them to build a City for his Reſidence, which he called Ecbatane; and having ruled with abundant Severity, 53 years, left the Kingdom to his Son Phraortes. He, after he had Reigned 22, left, for Succeſſor, his Son Cyaxares, who having long ſtrugled with Various Fortune, (as afterwards will be ſeen) gave place to his Son Aſtyages, Father to Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus.

Deioces, how he got the Kingdom.

Phraortes.

Cyaxares.

Aſtyages.

(a) Euſeb. in Chronico.

(b) Lib. 1. c. 9, 7, 98, &c.

Beleſis his Succeſſors.

Nabonaſar.

15. Beleſis obtained Babylon, as was ſaid; but how long he held it, or who ſucceeded him immediately, is not known. About 71 years after, Nabonaſar, or Nabonaſſar, obtained the Kingdom there; from the Beginning of whoſe Reign, that Famous Æra, or Epoche, known by the Name of Æra Nabonaſari, is derived. It is counted from the firſt Day of that Ægyptian Month Thoth (Febr. 26.) which fell out 746 Julian years, and 310 days before the Æra of Chriſt, as Cappellus, and others reckon; 424 years before the Death of Alexander the Great; according to Ptolomy (c) the Prince of Mathematicians, in the 8th. Olympiad. This Author hath preſerved the Names of ſuch as Succeeded Nabonaſar, in his Catalogue of Kings. He Reigned 14 years; after him, Nadius, 2; then Chezirus, or Porus, 5; Jugæus, or Ilulæus, 5, and then Mardocempadus, 26. In his Time happened the (d) three moſt Ancient Eclipſes of the Moon, obſerved by the Babylonians: The firſt of them in the firſt of his Reign, and the 28th. of the Month Thoth, and the 27th year of Nabonaſar. The ſecond, in his Second year, on the 18th of Thoth. And 176 days, 20 hours and an half after this, the third Eclipſe fell out, on the 15th day of the Month Phamenoth. Scaliger and others, think this Mardokempad to be the ſame with him, who, in the (e) Scripture is called Merodach-Baladan, the Son of Baladan. But Cappellus conjectureth there were two Merodachs, Sons of Baladan, and Nephews of Nabonaſar, whereof the one was called Merodac-Kempad, and the other, Merodac-Baladan.

Ptolomie's Catalogue of Kings.

(c) Magn. Syntax. l. 3. c. 8.

(d) Idem l. 4. c. 6, 7.

(e) 2 King. 20. 12.

16. Mardokempadus, having Reigned 12 years, was ſucceeded by Arkianus, who ruled 5. Then followed an Inter-regnum for two years; after which, Belibus obtained the Kingdom for 3; then Apronadius, 6; Rigibelus, 1; Meſeſſimordak, 4; after whom, another Inter-regnum enſued for eight years; he being alſo written Meſeſſi-cardac. Now the Royal Race ſeemeth to (f) one, to have failed, and Eſarchaddon the King of Aſſyria, to have again ſubjected the Babylonians to his Kingdom; and his Reaſon is, for that he who followed at the end of this Inter-regnum, is by Ptolomy called Aſſaradinus, which he thinketh to differ only from Eſarchaddon in the Sound of ſeveral Languages. If ſo, this is he, who brought out of the Eaſt-Countrey, Strangers to inhabit Samaria; whence, Salmaneſſer had, 40 or more years before, tranſported the Ephramites. He is alſo, by the Poſterity of this new Colony, called the Great and Noble Aſnapper. But how this Aſſyrian Kingdom had ſprung up again, during theſe two Principalities of the Babylonians and Medes, is to be conſidered.

(f) Uſſerius in Annal. Vet. Teſtament. ad A. M. 3323.

The Ariſing anew of the Aſſyrian Kingdom. How, when, and by whom.

17. It is not probable that the vaſt Empire of Sardanapalus was all (nor perhaps the greateſt part) ſubject to Media and Babylon; but that, although Arbaces left not the Medes to their Liberty, yet ſeveral People he did, for want of Power to keep them under: Hence, in ſome time, the People beyond Euphrates, weary of that Anarchy and Confuſion under which they laboured, might be willing to admit of a Prince again, though not of the Old Stock of Belus; whoſe Succeſſors, having far excelled in Power and Dominion, the Greeks accounted Sardanapalus the Phul.

Tiglath-Pileſar.

Salmanaſſer.

the laſt King of the Aſſyrians. Who this new Prince ſhould be, remaineth very obſcure. One (a) thinketh him that ſame Phul who made an Incurſion into the Land of Iſrael, in the Time of Menachem, fixing the Beginning of his Reign in the 4th Olympiad, 17 years before that of Nabonaſar. Another (b) will have Tiglah-Pileſer (or Thilgath-Pilneſer, or Theglath-Phalaſſar) to be the man (in Ælian, he ſaith, called Thilganus) whom alſo he accounteth the ſame with Ninus Junior, mentioned by Euſebius, (c) having aſſumed the Name of the firſt Founder of the Aſſyrian Empire. This Tiglath-Pileſar, at the Invitation of Judah, went up againſt Rezen (d) King of Damaſcus, and killing him, tranſported his Subjects into Kir, a place, (as Joſephus will have it) of Upper Media. He died when he had Reigned 19 years, and was ſucceeded by Salmanaſſer; to whom (e) Hoſea King of Iſrael refuſed to pay Tribute, entring into Confedracy with So King of Ægypt againſt him: But Salmanaſſer Beſieged him in Samaria, and at the End of three years, taking the City, carried the Iſraelites into Captivity into Chelach, Chebar, and Nehar-geſan, Cities of Media; where he, as well as his Predeceſſor, might have Power, if, (Deioces, as yet, not having obtained the Kingdom) that Countrey was ſtill ſubject to a Popular Government, or rather in a Confuſed Anarchy.

Senacherib
A. M. 3287.

18. After the Subverſion of the kingdom of Iſrael, he over-ran all Phœnicia and Syria. He ſent an Army againſt the Tyrians, at ſuch time as Elulæus their King, made War upon the Cittæans, which had Rebelled; but a Peace was preſently made, and he drew back his Forces. Not long after, Sidon, Arce, Palætyrus, and other Towns revolted from the Tyrians, to him; ſo that they alone ſtanding out, he returned; and having a Supply of 60 Ships from the Phœnicians, ingaged with them in a Sea-Fight; but they having but 12, yet overthrew his Fleet, and thereby obtained great Credit. At his Return, he ſet Guards upon the River, and Water-Courſes, and there kept them five years together; which conſtrained them to make a Shift with Wells and Pits, as Menander (f) related out of the Tyrian Annals, Tranſlated into the Greek Tongue, wherein the Name of Salmanaſar was Recorded. Salmanaſar dying, Senacherib his Son ſucceeded him; called alſo Sargon in (g) Scripture, as ſome think. He infeſted all Aſia and Ægypt with War; into the latter of which as he deſcended, in his Retreat he ſore (h) diſtreſſed Hezekiah King of Judah, who making his Application unto his God, obtained Deliverance, to the Confuſion of the Aſſyrian and his Army. Herodotus (i) telleth a Story, How when he came to Peluſium, Sethes, the Prieſt of Vulcan, then King of Ægypt, by his Prayer to his god, procured all the Habiliments of War to be eaten with Mice; ſo that being rendred unable to fight, he was forced to draw back his Army. But the Prophecies againſt Ægypt aſcertain us, that this Expedition proved very diſaſtrous to it, and that many Captives were thence led away; yet the Prieſts, from whom Herodotus had his Information, hid this, and all other things that tended to the Diſhonour of their Countrey.

19. Returning from Ægypt into Paleſtine, he Beſieged (k) Lachiſh, and thence removed to Libnah, where he wrote a Blaſphemous Letter to Hezekiah. For, hearing that Tirhakah King of Æthiopia (or Arabia) (by Joſephus called Tharſices; by Strabo, Tearkon) was coming againſt him in behalf of the Ægyptians, he removed for Fear; and God ſent his Angel into his Camp, who ſlew in one Night 85000 men; which thing, as a Plague, was alſo recorded by (l) Beroſus. Then returned he (as God had promiſed Hezekiah) with great Conſternation into his own Land; where, raging againſt the Jews that dwelt at Niniveh (if Credit be to be given to the Book of Tobit) he was, after 44 days, ſlain in the Temple of his Idol Niſroch, by his two Sons Adramelech and Sharezer, (who fled for it into the Land of Ararat, or Armenia) and Eſarchaddon his Son Reigned in his ſtead.

Eſarchaddon
the ſame with Aſſaradinus.

Saoſduchinus.

20. This Eſarchaddon is thought (and that probably) to be the ſame with Aſſaradinus, mentioned by Ptolomy, in his Cataloge of Kings, and who ſubdued Babylon. It is alſo thought that (m) this is he, who, when he brought a new Colony into Samaria from Babylon, Cathah, Ana, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, at the ſame time making an Inrode into Judæa (as 'tis very probable) took (n) Menaſſeh, the King thereof in the Thorns, and carried him in Captivity into Babylon; for it appeareth from both theſe Paſſages mentioned in Scripture, that at this time that City was ſubject to the King of Aſſyria. After Eſarchaddon (or Aſſaradinus) had Reigned thirteen years, Saoſduchinus ſucceeded him, according to Ptolomy; and not Merodach, whom the general Opinion will have (being King of Babylon) to have killed him, and again overthrown the Empire of the Aſſyrians. For this Succeſſion is founded upon a feigned (o) Author impoſed on the World, with ſeveral others

(a) Jacobus Cappellus ad A. M. 3236.

(b) Uſſerius ad A.M. 3257.

Hiſt. Anim. l. 12 c. 21.

(c) In Chron. ex Ceſtore Rhodio.

(d) 2 King. 15. 16.

(e) 17.

A. M. 3273.

(f) Apud Joſephum, Antiq. l. 9. c. 14.

(g) Iſa. 20. 1.

Beroſus apud Joſephum. Antiq. l. 10. c. 1.

(h) 2 King. 18.

(i) Lib. 2. c. 141

Iſa. 18.

(k) 2 Chr. 32. 1 King. 19. Iſa. 37.

(l) Apud Joſephum, ut ſupr. c. 2.

(m) 2 Kin. 17

(n) 2 Chr. 33.

(o) Pſeudo-Metaſthenes apud Annium vit. Erbenſem. fol. 221. De cujus fictis Authoribus. vide Joh. Goropium Biblioth. Hiſp. Tom. 2. p. 356. Gaſp. Barterium. ibid. p. 386, 407, 417, 431. Seth. Calvis. Iſagog. Chronol. cap. 28, 29. & Chron. p. 171. A. Non eſt germanum opus. Pam. in Tert. Apol. n. 287.

others of the ſame Credit, and therefore deſerveth to be rejected. The time of this Saoſduchinus falling in with that of Deioces (who according to Herodotus, built Ecbatane the Metropolis of Media) if any Credit be to be given to the Book of Judith, we may judge him to be that Nabuchadonoſor mentioned there to have overthrown Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and Builder of that City in the great Plains of Ragan. After he had taken him in the Mountains, he ſlew him, plundred Ecbatane, and then returned Victoriouſly unto Niniveh, where he Feaſted his Army for 120 dayes. The Year after, entring into Conſultation how to ſubdue the ſeveral Nations about him; he ordained Holophernes his General, who ſtraightly Beſieged Bethſara, a Town of Judæa; by the Wiſdom and Courage of Judith, the Widow of one Manaſſes of the Tribe of Ephraim, was circumvented, and had his Head cut off in his Tent.

Chuniladanus.

21. Saoſduchinus (or Saoſducmus) having Reigned twenty years, Chuniladanus Succeeded him, thought alſo to be the ſame with Saracus, mentioned by Alexander Polyhiſtor. Againſt him came (a) Phraortes, the Son of Deioces, in revenge of his Father's Death; after he had firſt of all others ſubdued the Perſians, and the reſt of Aſia. But his good Fortune here forſook him, and he periſhed with the greateſt part of his Army, in the 22th. year of his Reign. His Son Cyaxares Succeeding, is ſaid to have been more puiſſant than his Anceſtors, and the firſt that diſtinguiſhed the People of Aſia into ſeveral Provinces, and Souldiers into their ſeveral Ranks of Pikemen, Horſemen, and thoſe that uſed Darts. He fought with the Lydians; at which time ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun happened, that the Day ſeemed to be turned into Night. Having brought to his Obedience all Aſia, beyond the River Halys, he gathered his Forces together, and went againſt Niniveh, with Intentions to deſtroy the City. He overthrew the Aſſyrians in Battel, and Beſieged the Place; but it happened at this time that a great Army of Scythians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, under the Conduct of Madyes, the Son of Protothya (called otherwiſe Judathyrſus) their King, ſtill followed them, and from the Lake Mæotis, leaving the Mountain Caucaſus on their right hand, pierced into Media.

(a) Herodotus. l. 1.102.&c.

The Scythians obtain Aſia 28 years.

22. Cyaxares hereby was conſtrained to raiſe his Siege, went, and gave them Battel; but was overthrown, and loſt the Dominion of Aſia; which, the Scythians having obtained, marched ſtraight for Ægypt. Pſammetichus the King met them on their way, when they had new entred Palæſtine, and by good Words, back'd with Money, prevailed with them to go no further. They enjoyed the Dominion of Aſia 28 years; after the expiration of which Term, managing their Affairs with as great Neglect, as formerly they had uſed Diligence in polling and rifling the Countrey; the greateſt part of them being entertained by Cyaxares, were made drunken, and ſlain, and the King recovered his Dominion. During theſe things, (b) Nabopolaſſar a Babylonian, and General to the Aſſyrian King, contracted Affinity with Aſtyages the Son of Cyaxares, and Governor of Media: Nebuchadneſar, the Son of Nabopolaſſar, marrying Amylis Daughter to Aſtyages. The Effect of this Alliance was, that they jointly ſet upon Barachus, or Chynaladanus in Niniveh, and taking the City, ſlew him therein, after he had Reigned 22 years. At this time the Prophecies againſt Niniveh ſeem to be fulfilled in its Deſtruction. For in the latter end of the Greek Book of Tobit it is written, that Nebuchadonoſor and Aſſuerus took Niniveh, Tobius being yet alive, who is ſaid to have lived 127 years (or, as the Latine hath it, 99.) 95 having already paſſed from the taking of Samaria; at which time he was carried Captive with his Father into Aſſyria by Salmanaſar.

Loſe it

(b) Polyhiſtor apud Cedrenum, vide Uſſerium in Annot. vet. Teſt. ad A. M. 3378.

Nabopolaſſar.

23. Chynaladanus being dead, Nabopolaſſar (or Nabulaſſar) obtained his Kingdom in the 123^d year of Nabonaſar, according to (c) Ptolomy, whoſe Canon of Kings alſo (as to the Term of Years collected from the particular Reign of each) directly anſwereth to this Account. (d) Againſt him came up Pharoh Necho, and took Carchemiſh, a City ſituate upon Euphrates, killing Joſiah the King of Judah, who attempted to ſtop his paſſage. He holding this Town, the (e) Governour of Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, revolted from the Babylonian; who, being now unable to undergo the Trouble of War, made his Son Nebuchadneſar King with him, in his 17th. year, and ſent him with an Army to ſubdue Ægypt and Syria; with him joyned (f) Aſibares, King of the Medes, whom ſome think to be Cyaxares, and others, more probably, Aſtyages his Son. In this Expedition he made Jehojakin King of Judah, his Tributary, and drew him from the Obedience of Ægypt; which Necho taking in Diſdain, came up againſt him, and engaging once more at Carchemiſh, was overthrown, and ſlain, as may be gathered out of Scripture.

(c) Magn. Synt. l. 5. c. 14.

(d) 2 King. 23. 2 Chron. 35.

(e) Beroſus apud Joſeph. l. 1. contra Apion.

(f) Alexand. Polyhiſt. apud Euſeb. præp. evang. l. 9.

ture. Whilſt Nebuchadneſar was proſecuting his Victories, overrunning all from the River of Ægypt to the River Euphrates; in the mean time his Father, being ſick at Babylon, died; after he had Reigned twenty one years, as it is now in the Catalogue, for which ſome Learned men think, 29 is to be read. He underſtanding hereof, diſpoſed of the Affairs of Ægypt and other Countreys, and giving Order for the Conveyance of the Judæan, Syrian, Phœnician, and Ægyptian Priſoners, he himſelf made haſt through the Deſart, and took Poſſeſſion of the Government reſerved for him by the Chaldæans.

Nebuchadneſar.

Jerem. 46.

Beroſus apud Joſeph. ut prius: & Antiqu. lib. 10. cap. 11.
A. M. 3410.
Olymp. 46. an. 2.
Romæ 159.

His great Exploits and Buildings.

24. He diſtributed the Captives into Colonies about Babylon, adorned the Temple of Belus (which Semiramis had built) with the Spoiles; repaired and increaſed the Buildings of the City, and fortified the Chanel of the River, that the Enemy ſhould not make Uſe of it againſt the Town. He added a new City to the old, and compaſſed both with three Walls of Brick. He raiſed divers remarkable Ædifices, built a new Palace, and about it a Garden or Wilderneſs, ſo much celebrated by the Græcians. His Wife being a Mede, and, according to the Nature of her Country, delighting in mountainous woody Proſpects, brought him to imitate with Art, what was wanting in the Plains of Babylon. This Garden was made four-ſquare, taking up in Compaſs ſixteen Acres, in height equalling the Walls, ſet with tall and beautiful Trees. It was borne up by ſtone-Pillars; upon which a Pavement of four-ſquared Stones being laid, Earth was heaped up in great Quantity, and Engines were made for the Conveyance of Moiſture out of Euphrates to water it. The Trees that grew upon it were (many of them) eight Cubits in Compaſs at the Bole; and fifty Foot high, bearing Fruit as plentifully as in their Native Soil. Jehojakim the King of Judah, rebelling againſt Nebuchadneſar, he came up againſt him, waſted the Country, and taking him, caſt him out unburied, as the Prophet Jeremiah had foretold. Four Moneths after, he alſo carried away Captive Jechonias, or Jehojachim his Son, and made Mattaniah his Uncle King in his ſtead. This Mattaniah, whom he named Zedekiah, rebelled againſt him, notwithſtanding his ſolemn Oath of Fealty taken at his Inſtitution; and therefore in the eleventh year of his Reign he was alſo taken by the Babylonian, had his Eyes put out, and was ſo carried to Babylon: the Temple and City were burnt with Fire, and the People led into Captivity, as will appear in its proper Place.

Vide Diodor. lib. 2. p. 70. B.
Curtium lib. 5.

2Kings 23. &c.
2 Chron. 36.
Jerem. 22.

His Pride.

25. Nebuchadneſar returning home, was exceeding Proud, and puffed up at his Succeſs. He erected a great Image of Gold; in the Dedication whereof, all his chief Officers were commanded to fall down and worſhip; which was obeyed by all except three Jews, Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, the Companions of Daniel. For their Puniſhment they were caſt into a fiery Furnace, heated ſeven times hotter than uſual, and ſo miraculouſly preſerved from the Fury of the Flame, that not an Hair of their Heads was ſing'd; though it killed thoſe that caſt them in. At this, the King aſtoniſhed, by publick Edict acknowledged Gods Power, and forbad the blaſpheming of him. Yet repented he not of his Pride, and notwithſtanding a ſufficient Warning given him by God in a Dream, exalted himſelf in the conceit of the Greatneſs and Splendour of Babel, which he had built for the Houſe of the Kingdom, by the Might of his Power, and for the Honour of his Majeſty. But the ſame Hour, as he was anſwered by a Voice from Heaven, the Kingdom departed from him, he was driven from men, made to eat Graſs as Oxen, and his body was wet with the Dew of Heaven, till his Hairs were grown as Eagles Feathers, and his Nails like Birds Claws, and ſeven times paſſed over him, till he knew that the moſt High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomſoever he will. And this time prefixed being expired (ſeven years as moſt ſuppoſe, though ſome reckon but three and an half, counting for times, Winter and Summer) his Reaſon returned to him, with the Glory of his Kingdom, his Honour and Brightneſs; his Councellors and his Lords ſought unto him; he was eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, and excellent Majeſty was added to him. Therefore he ſhamed not by a publick Writing to own the thing, praiſed, honoured and extolled the King of Heaven, all whoſe works he confeſſeth to be Truth, his wayes Judgment, and that thoſe that walk in Pride he is able to abaſe.

Daniel 3.

Puniſhed.

What is found recorded of him by the Heathen.

26. Of theſe ſtrange Paſſages the Heathen were not utterly ignorant. Abydenus wrote, that being exceeding proud, and going up upon his Palace, he was taken with a divine Fury. This he had out of the Annals of the Chaldæans, who fancied him to have been ſeized on with a prophetick Spirit, and ſo to have vaniſhed. Megaſthenes in his fourth Book of India, endeavoured to ſhew how this King in valiant Exploits exceeded Hercules by far; that he ſubdued the chief City of Africk, and a good part of Spain. Diocles, in his ſecond Book of Perſia, made mention of him, and Philoſtratus both in his Hiſtories of Phœnicia and India; writing, that he fought againſt Tyre thirteen years, which, 'tis probable, at length he took by Compoſition, and there placed Baal King in the room of Ithobalus. What he did againſt this City, God taking as Service done to himſelf, promiſed him the Land of Ægypt for his Wages, which we muſt accordingly believe to have been paid. At length, having foretold that Babylon ſhould be loſt to Cyrus, as Abydenus wrote; he died after he had reigned forty three Years, being in Ptolomies Catalogue of Kings, called Nabocolaſſar, which may be corruptly written for Nabocodolaſſar.

Apud Euſeb. præp. Evang. lib. 9.
Apud Joſephum, ubi prius.

Ezek. 29.

Evilmerodach.

Neriglissor.

Laboroſardochus.

Nabonidus.

27. Evilmerodach his Son ſucceeded him, who lifted up the Head of Jehoiakim King of Judah, in the 37th year of his Captivity, ſpake kindly unto him, ſet his Throne above the Throne of the Kings that were with him in Babylon, and changing his Priſon-Garments, allowed him a continual Diet all the days of his Life. But for his Wickedneſs and Debaucheries, he continued not long, being circumvented by Neriglſſor his Siſter's Huſband, and ſlain when he had reigned but two years. Neriglſſor after his Death, reigned four. After him came his Son Laboroſardochus, who being of an untowardly Diſpoſition, was made away by his Relations, after nine Moneths, and they preferred to his Place one Nabonidus a Babylonian, by Ptolomy called Nabonadius, by others, Nabannidochus and Labynitus. [Who reigned ſeventeen years, for which ſome think twenty ſeven is to be read.] This Succeſſion we have from Beroſus the Chaldæan, atteſted by Ptolomy, who yet leaveth out Laboroſardochus, either for his ſmall Continuance, or becauſe he reigned together with his Father. But learned men do not agree in the manner of reconciling this Hiſtory, with what Daniel hath written of Belſhazar. Some will have Labynitus or Nabonodus, to be Belſhazar, Nabonodus being the laſt of the Kings, which Belſhazar alſo ſeemeth to be; at his Death, Babylon being taken by Cyrus, as the Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall hinteth: Peres, Thy Kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians. As for Darius the Mede, he ſeemeth to them to be noother than Cyaxares, the Son of Aſtyages King of Media, and the Uncle of Cyrus, who of his own Accord delivered Babylon to him: and they think this ſufficient to prove that Laboroſardochus could not be Belſhazar, becauſe he hath but nine Moneths aſſigned him by Beroſus, whereas we read in Daniel of the third year of Belſhazar.

A. M. 3440. Olymp. 53. an. 4. Romæ condit. 189.

Apud Joſephum lib. 1. cont. Apionem.

Whether the ſame with Belſhazar.

28. Others think they have ground enough to deny Nabonidus to be Belſhazar, who is called the Son of Nebuchadneſar; in regard no ſuch Relation is mentioned by Beroſus, that can intitle him to ſo much as his Grand-child, which Laboroſardochus was by his Daughter, being called his Son by a common Hebraiſm: For the Latin Verſion of Joſephus, which maketh Nabonodus of the Blood; it is in no caſe agreeable to the Original, which plainly relateth him to have been of the Conſpiracy. For the fifth year of Belſhazar, it well enough agreeth with Laboroſardochus, becauſe he reigned four years with his Father; and after his Fathers Death, nine Moneths by himſelf. Now the Hiſtory of Daniel only relateth Belſhazar to have been ſlain, not that Babylon was then beſieged by Cyrus: it being improbable, ſay they, that a time of ſo great Danger, the King and his Nobles ſhould ſpend in Feaſting and Jollity; but rather likely, that behaving himſelf too inſolently in that drunken Fit, he was knocked in the Head by his Companions, as Beroſus hinteth, and the Scripture rather ſeemeth to approve than contradict. As for the Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall, it might note what was already determined, and within a little time was to be accompliſhed, concerning Cyrus the Perſian, who being at that time known to the World, could not be hid from Daniel, who had met with his name long before in the Prophecy of Iſaiah, and had his Mind, without Doubt, fixed upon the 70 years of Captivity foretold by Jeremiah; to which a Period ſhould ſhortly be put by that Perſon. That Darius Medus was of Median Deſcent, appeareth, but that he was King of the Medes, can no way be evinced; eſpecially ſeeing that no ancient Greek Hiſtorian maketh mention of Cyaxares the Son of Aſtyages, (whom we read to have had but one Daughter) except Xenophon; and he either one Purpoſe ſeemeth to thwart Herodotus, or to have written his Cyropædia, rather (a) to ſhew, what a Prince ought to be, than what Cyrus was indeed, and ſo to have taken ſome of that Liberty of Invention which others (b) have done of late upon the ſame and other Subjects. But though Joſeph Scaliger may ſeem to ſhew more Reaſon for this latter Aſſertion, yet Pererius truly affirmeth the thing to be obſcure, perplexed, and difficult.

ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς ἐπισυστάσεως.

ἀπὸ τῶν φίλων ἀπετυμπανίσθη.

(a) Cicero ad quintum fratrem. Ep. 1.

(b) As the Grand Cyrus of George de Scudiry Governour of Noſtre Dame de la Garde, a Romance of 10 Volumes.

Cyrus.

The Sum of what Herodotus hath written concerning his Birth and Fortune.

29. If Laboroſardochus be taken for Belſhazar, then Nabonodus muſt be the ſame with Darius Medus; whom further, ſome would have to be the Brother of Aſtyages, not his Son, and yet called Cyaxares. In him the Empire of the Babylonians ceaſed, and was derived upon the Perſians by Cyrus, whoſe firſt Beginnings are to be viewed, with the Progreſs of his Actions, which made way to that Pitch of Greatneſs whereat he arrived. Herein Hiſtorians do not relate the ſame things. That Aſtyages was his Grand-father is acknowledged by all, except Cteſias, who will have them nothing akin, and calleth him Aſtyigas: His Father's name is granted to be Cambyſes, his Country Perſia, but his Condition is diverſly reported of. Herodotus writeth how Aſtyages dreaming two Dreams concerning his Daughter Mandane, (which by the Wizards were interpreted to portend the Loſs of his Kingdom, through the Greatneſs of her Iſſue) gave her in Marriage to one Cambyſes a Perſian, of obſcure Fortune; and not ſatisfied in this Security, ſent for her when ſhe was with Child, and as ſoon as the Boy was born, gave him to one Harpagus to be made away. Harpagus fearing he might afterwards be called to an Account by the Mother, for Violence offered to the Babe, delivered him to the Kings Shepherd, to be expoſed in the Woods to the Mercy of the wild Beaſts. This being done, and the Shepherd's Wife lately brought to Bed of a ſtill-born Child, ſhe prevailed with her Huſband to fetch him home; nurſed and brought him up as her own Son amongſt the Shepherds. At ſeven years of Age being choſen King of the Boyes in their Play, he executed the Office with Severity, towards ſuch as were diſobedient, and for this was complained of by their Parents to the King. Being ſent for and accuſed of the Crime, he would acknowledge none, alledging he had done like a King; and ſtanding in his Juſtification without the leaſt Change of Countenance, Aſtyages was ſtruck with Admiration, and preſently called to mind his Dream. Upon Examination of the Shepherd, he got out the whole matter; owned him for his Grand-ſon, becauſe he thought the Dream fulfilled in his boyiſh Reign amongſt the Shepherds; only he thought it good to ſend him out of the way into Perſia.

30. But to puniſh Harpagus for his Diſobedience, he invited him to Supper, and cauſed to be ſerved up to the Table his only Son; of which, after he had eaten heartily, and approved the meat, he let him ſee his Entertainment, by the Head, hands and Feet, reſerved in another Platter, Harpagus for the preſent kept down his Paſſion, ſeeming to acquieſce in the Kings Pleaſure, untill Cyrus came to mans Eſtate. Then, hearing of his Activity and Forwardneſs, he reſolved by Preſents to make him his Friend, meditating a convenient way of Revenge by the means of this Youth, from whom he expected ſomething anſwerable to his Grand-fathers Dream. Knowing Aſtyages his tyrannical Carriage towards the Medes, he inſinuated himſelf into the chief of them by Degrees, and ſecretly perſwaded them, that it was convenient he ſhould be removed from the Government, eſpecially ſeeing they might with ſome Plauſibility place Cyrus in his Seat. Having thus made War, he wrote Letters to the young man into Perſia, (which, to prevent Diſcovery, he ſowed up in the Belly of an Hare) wherein recalling to his Memory what he had ſuffered from his Grand-father upon his Account, he ſollicited him to draw the Perſians to revolt; then to come down with an Army into Media, where he might be ſure of him or any other the Kings Generals, and ſo eaſily become Maſter of all.

Cyrus overthroweth Aſtyages his Grand-father.

31. Cyrus conſidering of a way how to accompliſh this Buſineſs, which now he made no leſs than a Deſign, called the Perſians together; firſt gave out, that he was choſen their General by Aſtyages, and then eaſily perſwaded them, by laying open, how much Liberty was to be preferred before that Slavery they now underwent, to cloſe with him and break out into open Rebellion. The old man hearing this, ſent a Meſſenger for him; but he returned Anſwer, he would come ſooner than he ſhould have cauſe to deſire his Company; whereupon he armed his Subjects of Media, and forgetting how he had formerly injured Harpagus, committed the Army to his Conduct. Harpagus revolting, he loſt thereby the firſt Battel, yet was not daunted, but threatned Cyrus, nailed to Croſſes the Magicians who had perſwaded him to diſmiſs him, and arming all both old and young that were in the City, led them out to a ſecond Engagement, wherein his Succeſs was worſe than before, he being taken Priſoner. When Harpagus, boaſting of his Revenge, inſulted over him, he taxed him of Imprudence and Injuſtice: of the one, for that having Power to make himſelf King he ſhould transferr the Dignity to another; and of the other, becauſe for to revenge a private Injury, he had enſlaved the whole Nation of the Medes, out of which he might rather have choſen one to the Kingdom, refuſing it himſelf, than Him, who would now ſo order the matter, that the Perſians, Slaves before, ſhould be Lords and Maſters of all. Thus Aſtyages loſt his Kingdom, after he had held it thirty five years, enjoying all things elſe at his Grand-ſon's hands, till his natural Death: And the Medes became ſubject to the Perſians, after they had enjoyed the Dominion of Aſia beyond the River Halys, the ſpace of 128 years, (except that Space wherein the Scythians kept them under) and in the ſecond year of the 55th Olympiad, of the World 3446.

Provoked by Crœſus King of Lydia.

A. M. 3446. Olymp. 55. an. 2. urbis conditæ 195.

32. Cyrus having obtained the Sovereignty of Perſia and Media, was within a while provoked by Crœſus King of Lydia, who at this time was grown eminent, having improved the Inheritance which deſcended upon him from his Anceſtors.

Lydia whence ſo called.

Lege Bochartum. Phalag. lib. 2. cap. 12.

Herodotus lib. 1. c. 7. Strabo lib. 13. p. 586. c. Plin. l. 5. c. 29. Diodorus Halicar. lib. 1. Diodorus l. 3. p. 165.

Tertul. de Spectac. lib 5. Dionyſ. Halic. lib. 2.

(a) Herodotus lib. 1. c. 95.

Athenæus l. 12. Plut. Sym. l. 4. Herodotus lib. 1. c. 49.

(b) Λυδὰς καπηλεύει.

The Lydian Nation was of great Antiquity, ſo named from Lud the Son of Sem, or rather deſcended of him who by Moſes is ſo called; both he and they having obtained this name from that Country, which from the crookedneſs and Winding of the River Mæander took the Appellation of Lud, in the Phœnician Language ſignifying crooked or winding: The Greeks ſay, that the Lydians were firſt called Mæones, and Lydia Mæonia, from Mæon, an ancient King of Phrygia and Lydia, who was thought to have been the Father of Cybeles, Mother of the Gods, and that long after him reigned Lydus the Son of Atys, and Brother of Tyrrhenus, from whom they fancy the Country to have been named. Better is the Opinion of Stephanus, who deriveth Mæonia from the River Mæon or Mæander. For, though the Greeks might call them Lydians, yet that their right name was Ludians, appeareth from the Latin words, Ludus, Ludo, Ludio, &c, thence derived; ſeeing it is granted, that the firſt Players came from Lydia into Hetruria, ſo to Rome, as the Lydians (a) boaſted themſelves to have been Inventors of thoſe Games, which afterwards were common with them to the Greeks. Hence it appeareth that though the Country might be called both Lydia and Mæonia, from the ſelf-ſame thing; yet moſt ancient was the name of Lud. After the Poſterity of Lydus, reigned the Heraclidæ or thoſe that were deſcended from Hercules, by his Son Alcæus. The firſt was Argon, ſaith Herodotus, the Son of Ninus, Grandſon of Belus, and great Grand-ſon of Alcæus; the laſt was Candaules the Son of Myrſus, by the Greeks called Myrſitus. Candaules, or Candylos, ſignified a certain kind of Lydian meat made of Flower, Cheeſe, Honey, Bread and Fleſh; the Lydians being accounted the firſt (b) of all Nations, that buſied themſelves in Cookery, inſomuch that they became a Proverb for it.

Euſeb. in Chron.

The Royal Families of Lydia.

Herodotus l. 1. c. 8, &c.

33. The Antiquity of the Lydians appeareth further out of the ancient Fables, Attis, Tantalus, Pelops, Niobe and Arachne, being of this Country: Their Fruitfulneſs, from the Colonies they ſent out into Peloponneſus and Caria, into Etruria alſo as they ſay. Their Valour and Power is ſhewn to have been of great Antiquity from their holding the Dominion of the Sea 92 years, which they took from the Cretians about the time of Jepthe, and 1200 years before Chriſt, loſing it again and recovering it afterwards. But Candaules with his Family being extinct, and the Kingdom devolved upon the Mermnadæ (of whom Crœſus deſcended) the Power of the Nation grew greater alſo at Land. Theſe Heraclidæ, held it the ſpace of 505 years, through twenty two Succeſſors unto this Candaules, who ſo far being enamoured of his Wife, as he eſteemed her the moſt beautiful of all Women, conſtrained his Servant Gyges to ſee her naked. She eſpying Gyges whilſt therein he only ſatisfied his Maſters Will, offered him the Choice of killing her Husband, and marrying her with the Kingdom, or of ſuffering Death himſelf; one of their two Lives being the leaſt ſhe could require in way of Juſtice. He in ſo great a Strait, preferring his own Safety before his Maſter's Life, ſlew him in his Bed-chamber, the place where the Fault was committed, and ſo enjoyed the Queen with the Kingdom; wherein he was confirmed by the Oracles of Delphos, to the Sentence of which, he and his Adverſaries had agreed to ſtand.

Vide ſuprà paragraph. 21.

34. Gyges reigned thirty eight years; in which Space, he made War upon Miletus and Smyrna, and took the City Colophon; Ardys his Son and Succeſſor ſubdued Priene, fought againſt Miletus; and in his time the Cimmerians being expelled their Seats by the Scythian Nomades, paſſed into Aſia, and took Sardis, all but the Caſtle. He reigned forty nine years, his Son Sadyattes twelve, who gave Place to Alyattes his Son and Succeſſor. Alyattes waged a War with * Cyaxares King of Media, and expelled the Cimmerians out of Aſia; took Smyrna, and ſet upon Clazomenæ. In the ſixth year of the War betwixt the Median and him, whilſt they fought upon equal Terms, the Sun was eclipſed, which Thales, one of the ſeven wiſe men, had foretold to his Mileſians. Both the Armies ſeeing the Day beginning to be turned into Night, left off fighting, and then by the Mediation of Syenneſis the Cicilian, and Labynitus the Babylonian a Peace was concluded; Ariena the Daughter of Halyattes being marryed to Aſtyages the Son of Cyaxares. From the Tables of Ptolomy (or of Hipparchus) it appeareth that this Eclipſe happened in the fourth year of the forty fourth Olympiad, the 147*th* of Nabonaſar, the fourth day of the Ægyptian Moneth Pachon, (which anſwereth to the twentieth of September, three hours and twenty five Minutes before noon; nine Digits being eclipſed, and the Duration almoſt two hours. Halyattes purſued alſo the War left him by his Father, againſt Miletus, the Inhabitants whereof received from him two great Blows, for that none of the Ionians helped them except the Chians, in way of requital for the Aid they had afforded them againſt the Erythræans. At length, having Notice that he intended to ſend a Meſſenger into the Ciey, at the Command of Thraſybulus their Prince, they brought all the Proviſion they had into the Market-place; which appearing to be much, and as ſuch related to Alyattes, he thinking himſelf miſtaken in his former Belief of their diſtreſſed Condition, made Peace with them; and died after he had reigned fifty ſeven years.

Herod. ad ſupra. c. 26. &c.

35. Crœſus his Son ſucceeded him, at the Age of thirty five years. He made War upon Epheſus, which when he beſieged, the Towns-men for their Security gave up the City to Diana, by a Rope faſtned from the Wall to her Temple; but for all this he brought them under, and ſubdued all the reſt of the Greek Cities in the Continent. He brought into his Subjection all the People of Aſia, within the River Halis, as the Phrygians, Myſians, Bythinians, Paphlagonians, the Mariandyni, Chalibes, Thracians, Thyni, Carians, Ionians, Dorians, Æolians, Lycians and Cilicians. Being grown great, and flowing with Wealth, and flouriſhing with Glory, the choiceſt Wits of Greece flocked to Sardis, and amongſt the reſt Solon the Athenian, who being now in his Travels, had been with Ameſis of Ægypt, and now came to viſit Crœſus. He kindly entertained him, and ſhewing him his Treaſures, out of a vain Conceit of his own Felicity, demanded of him, whom he thought the happieſt man. He anſwered, he eſteemed for ſuch one Tellus an Athenian, who having lived in good Credit, and leaving divers Children and Nephews of honeſt and vertuous Carriage, died in the War at Eleuſine, after he had firſt helped to put to flight the Enemy; for which he was honoured by his Citizens with a publick and ſtately Funeral. Crœſus expecting, if not the firſt, yet the ſecond place, asked him, Whom he accounted next to Tellus, he replied Cleobis and Biton, two Brothers of Argos, who had ſufficient to live on, and being very ſtrong, had gotten the better in Trial of Maſteries. On a time at the Feaſt of Juno, their Mother being to be drawn in a Chariot to the Temple, and the Heiffers not at hand, they yoked themſelves, and drew her thither. She being much affected with the Piety of her Sons, prayed the Goddeſs, that whatſoever was beſt for Man, might be beſtowed on them, who ſleeping that night in the Temple, were found dead in the Morning, and honoured by the Argives with two Statues, erected to their Memory at Delphos.

36. The King was troubled that his Felicity ſhould be ſo little valued, as not comparable to that of private men. But Solon plainly told him, that all things were uncertain in this Life, and no man ought to be accounted happy till his End; for which Philoſophy, as ſtrange to the Courtiers, he was diſmiſſed with ſmall Reputation for Learning. Crœſus, growing exceeding proud and irreligious; to humble him, had a Dream, That the choiſeſt of his two Sons, (whereof one was dumb) ſhould be ſlain with the iron Head of ſome Weapon. Hereupon he removed all things of that Nature out of the way, looked to him diligently, and married him out of hand. But at this time it hapned, that a certain wild Boar haunted about the Mountain Olympus in Myſia, which, doing great harm to the Inhabitants, they were in no wiſe able to maſter, and therefore ſent to Crœſus, deſiring him to ſend his Son, accompanied with a ſufficient Train, to hunt and kill the wild Beaſt. He plainly denied, becauſe of his Dream, to let him ſtir from home; but the young man, having a great deſire to the Exerciſe, thereby to approve himſelf for Activity to his new married Wife, obtained Leave to be ſent, ſaying, that no ſuch thing would be uſed in the game as that of which he had dreamed. He committed him then to the Care of one Adraſtus, the Son of Gordius (and he of Midas) King of Phrygia, who having at unawares killed his Brother, had been baniſhed by his Father. When they came into the Field, and had diſlodged the Boar, Adraſtus throwing a Dart at him, chanced to hit the young man, and ſo fulfilled the Dream; for which, offering himſelf to be killed, upon Crœſus his Refuſal, as done without any Intention, he yet ſlew himſelf. Crœſus took the Accident very heavily, and kept himſelf in Mourning two years.

Crœſus Halym greſſus, magnam pervertet opum vim,

37. This Mourning was broken off by the Proſperity of Cyrus, who having now overthrown the Kingdom of the Medes, advanced highly the Affairs of Perſia. Herein he found himſelf exceedingly concerned, ſo as to withſtand, if poſſible, his Succeſs, and make an Addition thereby to his own Fortune. For Encouragement in this Deſign, he ſent to enquire of the Oracles far and near; which anſwering with one Conſent, that he ſhould overturn a great Principality, he was much incouraged, not doubting but that of the Perſians was meant thereby; and much more, after the Oracle at Delphos had (in Anſwer to his Requiry, whether his Empire ſhould long continue) bid him look to himſelf, when a Mule ſhould have Poſſeſſion of the Sovereignty of Media; taking this in a literal Senſe, notwithſtanding the conſtant Ambiguity of ſuch Anſwers. Now (the Oracle giving way to it) he ſent to make a League with the Lacedæmonians, who being obliged to him, eaſily complied; though no Supplies do we read of ſent to him. For he, being in great Haſte, prevented the ſending of any; and, with all the Force he could make, invaded Cappadocia, to revenge, as he pretended, upon Cyrus, the Injury offered to Aſtyages his Brother-in-Law; but indeed to lay that fertile Country to his own Dominions. Having paſſed the River Hayis, he came into a place of Cappadocia called Pteria, the moſt ſafe of all the Country, near to the City Sinope, which was ſituated upon the Euxine Sea. Taking up his Quarters here, he made Incurſions, took the City of the Pterians, with all the reſt round about, and baniſhed the Syrians (ſo were the Cappadocians called by the Greeks, till ſubjected to the Perſian Empire) though they had nothing ill deſerved at his hands.

Crœſus invadeth Cappadocia.

38. Cyrus coming againſt him ſent to the Ionians, to draw them to his Party; but they ſtanding off, he proceeded, and pitcht his Camp againſt Crœſus. After ſome Skirmiſhes the Armies ingaged, and a very hot Diſpute continued, till night parted them, many falling on both ſides. Crœſus, though neither Party owned any Defeat, was blamed by his Souldiers for Ingaging with ſo numerous an Army; ſo that, Cyrus not ſtirring out againſt him the next day, he thought it beſt to retreat to Sardis, and ſent out of Hand for Aid to Ameſis King of Ægypt, and Labynitus of Babylon, whom he had by a League obliged to him: to the Lacedæmonians alſo, to diſpatch their Auxiliary within five Moneths, with which, reſting that Winter, he would re-invade the Perſians the following Spring. Accordingly he diſmiſſed all his Mercenaries, ſtanding then in no need of them, as he thought; which Cyrus hearing, reſolved with all Speed to follow him to Sardis, hoping he might utterly defeat him before he could recollect his Forces: and accordingly marching into Lydia, he prevented any Meſſage of his Coming. Crœſus, though exceedingly perplexed at ſo unexpected a thing, gathered his Subjects together, as time would give Leave, and provided for his Defence; which the other perceiving, and fearing the Power of his Horſe (wherein the Lydians excelled all other People of Aſia) took off the Burthens from all the Camels that followed the Camp, and ſetting Riders upon them, placed them in the Front; the ſmell of which (when the Armies joyned) the Horſes not enduring, turned aſide. Yet were not the Riders thereby deterred from Fighting, but diſmounting, performed on Foot what could be expected, till over-powered, rather with number than Valour, they were put to Flight, and beſieged in the City.

Retreateth to Sardis.

Overthrown in Battel,

And beſieged.

39. Crœſus thinking he might poſſibly be able to hold out ſome conſiderable time, ſent again to his Confederates to haſten their Succours. But Cyrus, on the fourteenth day of the Siege offering a great Reward to him that ſhould firſt mount the Wall, one Hyræades, a Mardian, having taken notice of a place, which becauſe of its Height and Precipitancy was held impregnable, and therefore neglected by the Beſieged (where yet he had ſeen a Souldier come down to fetch his Helmet, he had let fall) made means to climb up, and after him more and more followed, till the City was thereby ſurprized. All Places being full of Slaughters, a Souldier not knowing Crœſus, was about to kill him; which he neglected, as willing to dye with his Kingdom. But his dumb Son, affrighted at the Danger he ſaw him in, is ſaid to have broken Silence (or Dumbneſs) with this Expreſſion; Man, do not kill Crœſus, and thenceforth to have enjoyed the Uſe of his Tongue. Thus Crœſus overturned a great Principality, as the Oracle had foretold, after he had reigned fourteen years, and been beſieged ſo many Days.

Sardis taken.

Vide Herod. lib. 1. c. 85. Aul. Gellium. l. 5. c. 9. Val. Max. l. 5. c. 4. Ext. Exem. 6.

Cyrus

Crœſus condemned.

His Life ſpared.

Solinum. c. 7.

A. M. 3460. Olymp. 58. an. 4. Cyri 15.

Cyrus adjudged him to Death, and had burnt him alive, but that he, almoſt too late, remembred the words of the wiſe Law-giver of Athens, and cryed out Solon, Solon, Solon! Cyrus commanded the Interpreters to demand of him whom he invocated (thinking it to be ſome God he mentioned:) to which he anſwered, when compelled to ſpeak, that he named one whom, rather than any thing, he would have to ſpeak with all Princes; and being urged to explain himſelf, told the whole Story concerning the Diſcourſe betwixt him and Solon. Herewith the Conquerour was ſo affected, that, conſidering the Uncertainty of his own proſperous Condition, though the Pile was already kindled, yet commanded he the fire to be quenched, and receiving him into his moſt inward Counſels, held him ever moſt dear, and in great Eſteem for his Wiſdom; wherein, after ſuch manifold Experience, he excelled. This hapned in the fourth year of the 58 Olympiad, the fifteenth year of the Reign of Cyrus. A. M. 3460.

Herodotus l. 1. c. 141. &c.

Pactyas revolteth.

Taken.

(a) Λυδιάζειν ventri indulgere, Λυδοϖαθεῖς voluptatibus deditus. (b) Λυδοφοίτης unguentarius. Lege Athenæum. lib. 15. c. 12.

40. When the Ionians and Æolians heard that Crœſus, with ſo little ado, was utterly ſubdued, they ſent to Cyrus, offering to put themſelves into his hands, on the ſame Terms as the Lydians were received; but he returned them no Satisfactory Anſwer, becauſe of their Refuſal formerly to joyn with him. All of them then (except the Mileſians, thoſe having yielded themſelves) made their Application to the Lacedæmonians, who refuſed to grant any Aid; but ſent ſome to make Diſcovery how matters went in Aſia. The Meſſengers finding Cyrus at Sardis, according to Order acquainted him with the Pleaſure of that Republick, not to ſuffer him to moleſt any of the Greek Cities. He enquiring what the Lacedæmonians were, preſently ſlighted them, and anſwered, That if the Gods preſerved him, they ſhould have Cauſe to bewail their own Calamities, and not buſie themſelves with what concerned the Ionians. He committed Sardis to the Cuſtody of Tabalus, a Perſian; to Pactyas a Lydian, the Treaſure of Crœſus and others: and ſo ſet out for Ecbatane, making little Account of the Ionians (againſt whom he intended to ſend ſome Lieutenant) in Compariſon of Babylon, the Bactrians, Sacæ and Ægyptians, upon all which he had caſt an hungry Eye with purpoſe to invade them. After his Departure Pactyas revolted, and drawing into Rebellion the Maritime Coaſts, beſieged Tabycus; whereat Cyrus being angry, as eſteeming it a Plot of the Lydians, Crœſus fearing worſe things might come upon them, after an Excuſe of the Generality, adviſed him to take from them the Uſe of Arms, and enure them to effeminate Courſes, whereby they would eaſily be kept under. Cyrus according to his Advice, diſpatched away with an Army, one Mazares a Mede, who finding Sardis deſerted by Pactyas, put in Execution what Crœſus had adviſed. By this Courſe was brought to paſs, that the Lydians, to whom for Valour no Nation in Aſia could be compared, grew infamous for Effeminateneſs and Luxury; ſo that gluttonous (a) and voluptuous Perſons, (b) ſuch as made it their Profeſſion to afford Incitements to Debauchery, received Epithets from their name.

The Ionians ſubdued.

41. Pactyas having fled to Cuma, Mazares ſent to demand him of the Citizens; but, they diſmiſſing him, he fled to Mytilene, and thence to the Chians, who ſold him to Mazares. He then reduced ſuch as had revolted, and haraſſing the Country of Priene, with that lying upon Mæander and Magneſia, fell ſick and died. Harpagus the Mede ſucceeded him, and out of hand undertook an Expedition againſt the Ionians. The Phocæans being firſt beſieged, obtained Truce for a day, and then ſhipping themſelves, left their ancient Seat, and paſſed over into the Iſland Chius, and thence (for that the Chians refuſed to ſell them the Iſlands Oenuſæ, leſt they ſhould thither carry the Traffique) to Cyrnus, where twenty years before, they had built a City called Alalia. Here playing the Pirates, they were after five years defeated in a Sea-fight by the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians, and then thoſe that remained paſſed over to Rhegium in Italy, where they built a City named Hyela, in the Territories of Oenotria. The Teians alſo, after their Example departed into Thrace; where they built up a City called Abdera, the Foundations of it being formerly laid by one Temeſius a Clazomenian, whom the Thracians thence expelled. The reſt of the Ionians ſtood it out againſt Harpagus, who yet utterly ſubdued, and forced them to undergo the Yoke the ſecond time, having refuſed to follow the Counſel of Bias the Prienæan, (one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece,) who adviſed them to ſhun Servitude by going to Sardinia, and there Planting themſelves in one great and common City; as they had formerly rejected the Advice of Thales the Mileſian (another of that number) to ſet up one common Court at Teus in the middle of Ionia. After the Conqueſt of the Ionians, Harpagus ſubdued the Carians, Caunians, and Lycians, Lycians, and brought all the lower Aſia under the Dominion and Sovereignty of Cyrus, who in the mean while not idle, did as much by the upper Provinces; leaving nothing in his way, but clearing all before him.

And the Aſſyrians or Babylonians.

42. Having conquered the reſt of the Continent, he went againſt the Aſſyrians, who, being aware of him, had furniſhed themſelves in Babylon for a long Siege. Coming to the River Gyndes (which riſing in the Mantienean Mountains, runneth through the Country of the Dardaneans, and emptieth it ſelf in Tigris) he could find no Ford to paſs it, and a certain white Horſe, ſacred to the Sun, boldly taking the Water, was overwhelmed in the Floods. Hereat being exceeding angry, he threatned to reduce it to ſuch a Condition, as it ſhould not be knee-deep, and accordingly ſetting all his Army on work, derived it into 360 Rivulets, in which Employment he ſpent all that Summer. The Spring following, he marched for Babylon, the King whereof (Labinitus) oppoſed him; but, being defeated, retreated into the City, to which he then laid cloſe Siege. In vain for a long time did he attempt the Taking of it. At length he divided his Army, and leaving the two ſtronger parts of it, the one at that ſide of the Town where the River entred, the other there where it came out; with the third he retired into the adjoyning Fens, and digging great Ditches derived the River into them. Hereby he brought it to ſuch an Ebb, that his Souldiers eaſily paſſing it, became Maſters of the City, and he of the Babylonian or Aſſyrian Empire. This is the Sum of what Herodotus hath written concerning the proſperous Fortune of Cyrus.

The Sum of Xenophon's Cyropædia.

43. Xenophon, contrary to the former Story, will have Cambyſes his Father no obſcure man; but King of Media: not a word from him of his Grand-father's Dream, or Expoſing of the Infant. When he was twelve years old, he was ſent for by Aſtyages into Media, where having tarried till almoſt a man, and being admired for Underſtanding and Abilities far above his Age; he returned to his Father, and entred into the College of Youth, where he was trained up in all ſtrict Diſcipline according to the Cuſtoms of Perſia. Aſtyages dying, Cyaxares his Son ſucceeded him, at what time the King of Aſſyria having ſubdued all the Syrians, Arabians, Hyrcanians, and had now fallen upon the Bactryans, promiſed himſelf the abſolute Empire of the Eaſt; if he could but bring under the Medes and Perſians. He ſent therefore to all his Neighbours; to Crœſus King of Lydia the King of Cappadocia, to both the Phrygians, Caſians, Paphlagonians, Cilicians, and Indians, accuſing theſe two Nations of ambitious Deſigns to enſlave them all, and procured them to joyn with him in an offenſive and defenſive League againſt them. Cyaxares hearing this, deſired of Cambyſes his Brother-in-law to ſend down Cyrus to him, with an Army; Cyrus being accordingly choſen General by the People, firſt ſubdued the Armenians, who becauſe of this Combination of the Princes, had denyed to pay their accuſtomed Tribute to Cyaxares, and then perſwaded his Uncle to invade the Aſſyrians, to keep the War from his own doors.

Lege de inſtitutione Perſarum, Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 1. ad initium.

44. Making then an Inroad into Aſſyria, the King thereof, Crœſus of Lydia, and divers other Confederates came againſt them, but in the firſt Engagement were worſted, and beaten back into their Camp, and amongſt others the Aſſyrian himſelf (Nerigliſſor, if any) was ſlain. The Night following, all brake out of the Fortifications and fled; whereupon Cyrus prevailing with his Uncle to ſuffer him to purſue them, with as many of the Medes as would follow him of their own Accord, in his way entred into Confederacy with the Hyrcanians, through the Conduct of whom he overtook, and again defeated them: they alſo ſlew the Kings of Cappadocia and Arabia. After this he invaded the Territories of the Babylonians, went up to the City it ſelf, and challenged the King to a ſingle Combat, who refuſing it, he, after ſome few Skirmiſhes thereabout returned to Cyaxares, upon the Borders of Media, to deliberate about carrying on the War: He found him greatly diſcontented at his Succeſs (out of Apprehenſion that he had robbed him of all the Glory) and much averſe to the War; but at length he appeaſed him, and ſo wrought under hand upon the Officers of the Army, that they unanimouſly voted the War to be carried on. Some time being neceſſary then for Preparation, he choſe out a convenient place for the Army's Quarters; and not long after, underſtood by certain Fugitives and Priſoners that the King of Aſſyria was gone towards Lydia with much Treaſure.

45. Cyrus, ſuppoſing his Deſign to be for raiſing men, prepared for the main Chance, by horſing his Perſians, inventing new and more convenient Chariots, and, to get Intelligence of the Enemie's Purpoſes, ſent one Araſpes into Lydia, who, under Colour of a Revolt, ſhould inſinuate himſelf into their Counſels. This Device taking, he diſpoſed of his Affairs according as he ſaw behooveful, modelled his Army, and marched againſt the Confederates, whom without any great Difficulty he overthrew, all but the Ægyptians. They put him to ſore Trouble, and endangered his Life; but having fall'n in upon their Rear, and thereby diverted the Front, he ſo overpowered them behind and before, as, glad they were to deliver up their Arms, and, upon Promiſe of better Entertainment, willing to change Maſters and ſerve him. Crœſus now, who commanded in Chief, fled amain to Sardis, whither Cyrus purſued him, and getting the Caſtle into his hands, by the Help of a Perſian, who had been Slave to an Officer in it, got Poſſeſſion both of the City and its King. He, coming to Cyrus, acquitted the Oracle of Delphos from all Blame, and took the Fault upon himſelf, in that he, overweening of his own Condition, had fooled himſelf continually in a fond Opinion of Happineſs. After this the Carians falling into two Factions, both ſent unto him: and he diſpatched to them Aduſias with ſome Forces, who overpowering both the one and the other, compounded their Differences.

46. Then ſent he Hyſtaſpes into Phrygia, who ſubdued the Country, and took the King Priſoner; at what time the Greeks of Aſia ſubmitted themſelves, procuring by Gifts, that they ſhould not be conſtrained to receive any Gariſon, but only pay Tribute, and ſerve in the Wars. Afterward, in his March to Babylon, he brought under the greater Phrygia, ſubdued the Cappadocians and Arabians. He ſate down before that City with a vaſt Army, the Walls whereof after he had viewed, he concluded there was no ſtorming of it, and reſolved, the beſt way was to pine them out. Underſtanding then, that they were provided within for a whole year, he divided his Army into twelve parts, aſſigning to each a Moneth to lye in Leaguer, at which the beſieged ſcoffed, as utterly out of Danger. But Cyrus taking Notice how the River ran through the City, cauſed deep Ditches to be made, which by dreining, rendred it fordable, and ſo taking Advantage of a ſolemn Feaſt, entred by night, and ſurprized them all in their Cups. The King was ſlain by Gobryas and Gadatas, who both, being formerly injured by him, had revolted to Cyrus. The Inhabitants, commanded upon pain of Death to deliver up their Arms, inſtantly obeyed. And thus the Babylonian Empire being quite overthrown, Cyrus aſſumed to himſelf Royal Majeſty, ſettling his Court with great Wiſdom, wherein Xenophon, in his moſt exquiſite Hiſtory, maketh him to have excelled, in all things, to Admiration.

The Sum of that wherein Cteſias diſſenteth from other Hiſtorians concerning Cyrus.

Ex Photii Bibliotheca.

47. But Cteſias will have Aſtyages (whom he calleth Aſtyigas) nothing akin to Cyrus; tells us how he fled to Ecbatane, where he was hid by his Daughter Amytis, and her Husband Spitama: and how Cyrus coming upon them, put them both to the Rack, to make them confeſs where he was, with their Children Spitaces and Magabemes. Aſtyigas, rather than they ſhould be tortured, diſcovered himſelf, and was firſt bound with Fetters, but afterwards honoured as a Father by Cyrus, who at length married Amytis, having killed Spitama, becauſe he had denied he knew where he was. After the Marriage, the Bactrians gave up themſelves to Cyrus and Amytis, though formerly they made great and effectual Reſiſtance. He relateth alſo how Cyrus made War upon the Sacæ, whoſe King Amorges he took Priſoner; but Speretha the Queen gathered an Army of 300000 Men, and 200000 Women, and therewith overthrowing Cyrus, took him with other Priſoners, and thereby redeemed her Husband. With the help then of Amorges, he made War upon Crœſus, and beſieged Sardis, which City he took by a Stratagem taught him by Oebares; making Images of the Perſians, and placing them upon the Walls, at which the Defendants were affrighted. But before this, Crœſus, deluded by a Spectrum, gave out his Son, an Hoſtage to Cyrus, and delaying to perform what he had promiſed, procured his Death, which the Mother beholding from the Wall, tumbled her ſelf down headlong, and yet was not killed; but the City being taken, fled to Apollo's Temple, and died there.

Vide Julium Frontinum Stratagem. l. 3. cap. 8.

48. Crœſus being bound in the Temple, by an Art he had of Deceiving the ſight, three times was looſed, though the Place was ſecured, and committed to the Care of Oebares; for which they that were bound with him loſt their Heads. Then was he brought into the Palace and more ſtrongly fetter'd, but was looſed again by Thunder and Lightning. Hereat Cyrus his Anger abated, and giving him his Liberty, he uſed him ever after with great Reſpect, and beſtowed on him a great City called Barene, near to Ecbatane. After this, Cyrus ſent Petiſacas his Eunuch to fetch Aſtyigas from the Barcanians, both he and his wife having a great Deſire to ſee him: But Petiſacas through the Inſtigation of Oebares left him in a deſart Plaee, where he was famiſhed to death. The Treachery was revealed by Dreams, and Petiſacas was given up into the hands of Amytis, who plucked out his Eyes, his Skin over his Ears, and then crucified him: Oebares fearing the like Puniſhment, though Cyrus promiſed him Indemnity, killed himſelf. As for the Body of Aſtyigas it was ſumptuouſly buried, having been guarded by Lions in the Wilderneſs, till Petiſacas fetched it away. Theſe improbable things are related by Cteſias.

What Beroſus and Abydenus wrote of him.

49. Beroſus the Chaldæan left recorded, that, in the 17th year of Nabonidus, Cyrus having ſubdued all Aſia, with a great Army, turned againſt Babylon. That Nabonidus meeting and engaging with him in Battel, was overthrown, and betook himſelf into a Town of the Borſippians. Cyrus beſieged Babylon, and conſidering it was not to be taken in haſt, returned to Borſippus, where Nabonidus not expecting a Storm, yielded himſelf; and Cyrus uſing him kindly ſeni him from Babylon into Caramania, where he allotted him an Habitation. Abydenus further added, that Cyrus beſtowed upon Nabonidus, now above eighty years old, the Government of Caramania. This is the Sum of what the moſt ancient Hiſtorians delivered concerning Cyrus his Attainment of the Empire of the Eaſt; which happenned about the year of the World 3465, the firſt of the 60th Olympiad, 538 years before the Æra of Chriſt.

Apud Joſeph. cont. Apion. l. 1.

A. M. Olymp. 6. an 1. V.C. 214.

Apud. Euſeb. præpar. Evang. lib. 9.

Of Sacred Hiſtory,

CHAP. III.

Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

SECT. I.

From the time of Phaleg, and the Diviſion of the Earth; to the Departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt.

Phaleg.
Reu.
Sarug.
Nahor.
Terah.

1. PHaleg being thirty years old, begat Reu, otherwiſe called Rehu and Ragau by the 70: Reu 32 years old, begat Sarug. He at thirty years of Age, had a Son named Nachor. And Nachor, one (when he was 29) called Terah or Thare. Gen. 11.

Abram.

2. Terah being ſeventy years old begat Abram, Nachor, and Haran. Not that all theſe were born at the ſame time, or are to be accounted in Age as we find them in Order; Priority in years not being conſtantly obſerved in Scripture; but rather that of Piety and true Worth. Haran is to be reckoned as the eldeſt; who died at Ur of the Chaldees, before his Father departed thence, and left three Children, viz. one Son named Lot: and two Daughters Milcah married to his Brother (and her Uncle) Nahor and Sarai (or Iſcah) to Abram. The ſecond was Nahor, Father to Cheſed (or Chaſed;) and ſo Abram the youngeſt; becauſe he was born, not in the 70th as hath been thought; but 130 year of his Father. For Terah lived in all 205 years, and died in Charran. Abram, when he came out of Charran (which Stephen ſaith, was after his Father's Death) was 75 years old; which being deducted out of 205, 130 years will remain. But if he was born in the 70 year of his Father; then, at his Death, was he 135 years old; and having Iſaac born to him, when 100, in the Land of Canaan, he muſt with him have returned back to Charran (which ſeemeth very incredible;) or elſe he left it not at his Fathers Death, as Stephen muſt make us believe he did.

Verſ. 26.

What year of his Father he was born.

De iſtis lege Ludov. Cappellum, Chronol. Sacra. notis ad Tabulam 5. Joh. Gerard. Voſſii. Iſagog. Chronolog. Diſſert. 5. c. 6. Jacob. Cappell. Hiſt Sacra & Exotica ad A.M. 2003, & multos alios.

Verſ. 32. Acts 7. v. 4. Gen. 12. 4.

3. Abram therefore was born in the 130 year of his Father's Life, and the 2008 of the World, as is clear from the Ages of all his Progenitors, taken at the Births of their Sons, and laid together. About the 70 year of his Age, God commanded him to leave his Father's houſe, and come into the Land which he ſhould ſhew him, promſing to make of him a great Nation, to bleſs him, and in him all the

A. M. 2008.

He cometh from Ur to Charran.

A. M. 2078.

Thence into Canaan.

Families of the Earth. He, obeying this Command, drew on his Father alſo with him, and ſo (together with Lot the Son of Haran, and Sarai Abram's Wife) they came from Ur of the Chaldæans to Charran, and dwelt there. Dwelling there, ſeemeth to imitate a longer Stay than of one year; ſo that ſome probably think five Years to have been there ſpent. For Terah, now very old, might detein them by his Weakneſs; they being unwilling to leave him, till they ſaw him either recovered or dead: But after his Death, mindful of Gods Command, they left Charran, and came into the Land of Canaan. This Journey from Ur to Charran, was the Beginning of the four hundred thirty years of him, and his Poſterity's, ſojourning in a ſtrange Land; the Promiſe alſo made to him being ſo many years before the Promulgation of the Law in Mount Sinai, as the Apoſtle Paul hath obſerved.

Gen. 12.

Sojourneth in Ægypt.

Chap. 13.

4. The firſt Place of Canaan in which Abram made any Stay, was Sichem; where God again appeared to him, and renewed his Promiſe; another of giving that Land to his Seed being added to it; and in this place he built the firſt Altar to the Lord. Thence he removed towards the hilly Country, and the Eaſtern Tract of Luz, (afterwards called Bethel) where he built another Altar, and ſo proceeded into the Southern Coaſts, whence a Famine drove him into Ægypt. There he ſojourned, and taught the Ægyptians Aſtrology, which Joſephus ſaith they were ignorant of, till he communicated to them the Knowledge of it, and of Arithmetick. His Wife being beautiful; for fear of his Life, he counterfeited himſelf her Brother, ſo that Pharaoh began to caſt his Affections on her, till, plagued by God, he was conſtrained to diſmiſs them both in Peace, Out of Ægypt then he returned to that place, between Hai and Bethel, where he built the ſecond Altar: Now was he and Lot grown ſo rich, that no longer could they conveniently live together. Lot being departed to the Plains of Sodom, God again renewed his Promiſe to Abram, which he more largely explained, both as to the Giving of the Land, and the Propagation of his Poſterity. After this, as he was commanded, he went and viewed the Land; then pitch't his Tents in the Plain of Mamre near to Hebron, where he built another Altar to the Lord.

Chap. 14.

Recovereth Lot and the Booty from the four Kings.

5. At this time four Kings about the River Euphrates, viz. Amraphel King of Shinar or Babylonia, Arioch King of Ellaſar, (thought to be Arabia, becauſe of a City upon the Borders of that Country, called Ellas) Chedorlaomer King of Elam (afterwards Perſia) and Tidal King of Nations, (thought to be many petty Kingdoms, adjoyning to Phœnicia and Palæſtine) came and fought againſt the five Kings of the Pentapolis; viz. Bera of Sodom, Birſha of Gomorrah, Shinah King of Admah, Semeber of Zebojim, and the King of Bela (afterwards called Zoar;) all who, had twelve years ſerved Chedorlaomer; and in the thirteenth rebelled. They overthrew theſe five petty Princes, led away much Pillage, and many Captives, amongſt which was Lot, who then ſojourned in Sodom. Abram hearing this, armed 318 Servants; and purſuing them, recovered Lot, and all the Prey, which he reſtored to the Owners. In his Return, Melchiſedech (whom ſome improbably make Sem) King of Salem (or Jeruſalem,) Prieſt of the moſt high God, brought forth Bread and Wine, and bleſſed him; to whom he gave the Tithes of all. In this Story Abram is firſt called an Hebrew by Moſes (And there came one which had eſcaped and told Abram the Hebrew) which Word, in Scripture, is not found applied to any other before him.

Why called an Hebrew.

Vide Bochartum Phaleg. lib. 2. c. 10.

(a) Lege Ludov. Cappell. Chronol. Sacra. p. 111, &c.

περάτης.

Artapanus apud Euſeb. & Charax. apud Stephanum.

6. Some think he was ſo called from Heber the Son of Salah; and that this Appellation only was proper to his Family, becauſe it kept the moſt ancient or Hebrew Tongue incorrupt. But (a) others finding the word to ſignifie one that cometh from beyond the Water, or a Stranger; think it was given to Abram upon no other Account, than becauſe he came from beyond Euphrates: None of Heber's Poſterity being called ſo, but only he, and ſome of his; they think, addeth much to their Reaſon. They conclude, that the Hebrew Language was not appropriate to Heber as a Reward of his Piety, becauſe thoſe that deſcended of him uſed it not always; and to others, beſides his Poſterity, it appeareth to have been natural. They inſtance, that Laban ſpake Syriack, and the Canaanites and Philiſtines the Hebrew naturally; as the names of their Men, Places, and Rivers, &c. do ſhew. Therefore they judge it moſt probable, that Abram ſpeaking the Chaldæan Language before, (which only differeth in Dialect from the Hebrew) got both the Name and Language, after his Arrival in the Land of Canaan. The Heathen (a) Writers thought them to have been called Hebrews from Abraham, as corrupted from Abrahæans, out of Ignorance of the Language. Auguſtine alſo once inclined to this Opinion, which he afterwards renounced.

7. Abram, after his Victory over the Kings, received a more large promiſe from God, who ingaged to become to him a Shield, and a ſufficient Reward; and (for that it troubled him to go childleſs) to give him Iſſue, from which ſhould proceed an innumerable Poſterity, that, inhabiting a ſtrange Land four hundred years, was to return and poſſeſs this of Canaan, when the Iniquity of the Amorites would be full, in the fourth Generation. This League made betwixt God and Abram, was confirmed by Sacrifice; yet, Sarai, ſeeing her ſelf barren, perſwaded her husband to go in unto Hagar her handmaid, of which he had a Son born to him, and named Iſmael, in the eleventh year after his coming into Canaan, the 86 of his Age, and of the World, the 2094. In the thirteenth year after, God made another Covenant with him concerning the ſeed of Iſaac, who was to be born the year following, and Circumciſion was inſtituted as a Seal thereof. Now, whereas his name before was Abram or an High-father, it was changed into Abraham, or Father of a great multitude. And Sarai, which ſignifieth My Princeſs, or Lady, (as of one Family) was altered into Sarah, or a Princeſs abſolute; as of many Nations. Not long after, God made known to Abraham his purpoſe to deſtroy Sodom, and the other Cities, for their abominable wickedneſs. He interceded hard for them; but there being not ſo many as five righteous Perſons in Sodom, God having taken care for Lot and his Family, rained Fire and Brimſtone down upon the Cities, which, together with the Plain were utterly deſtroyed; only Bela was ſpared for Lot's ſake, who fled thither. Of the reſt the Dead Sea (into which the Ground was converted) remaineth a laſting Monument to this day. In this Sea (or Lake) no living Creature is bred, having nothing but a Sulphureous matter thence taken in great quantities. It is deſcribed to be 72 miles in length, and 19 in breadth. Nigh to it fair and pleaſant Apples grow, which being touched, turn into a Sulphureous Vapour: and a Tradition remained amongſt the Heathen, of theſe Cities being deſtroyed with Thunder and Lightning from Heaven. Lot's Wife, after ſhe had got out of Sodom, looked back, and was turned into a Pillar of Salt. His two Daughters, thinking all Mankind to have periſhed, made their Father drunk, and lay with him; from which inceſtuous Copulation came Moab and Ammon, Fathers of the Moabites and Ammonites, two great and powerful Nations.

Retractat. l. 2. c. 16.
Gen. 15.
Chap. 16.
Iſmael born.
Chap. 17.
A. M. 2094.
Abraham and Sarah.
Sodom, &c. deſtroyed.
Vide John Biſſelium Jeſuitam, de Illuſtribus ruinis.
Lege Tacitum Hiſtor. l. 5.

8. A little after (in the ſame year) Abraham having continued in the Plain of Mamre about eighteen years, departed unto Gerar the Metropolis of the Philiſtines; where hapned the ſame thing concerning his Wife, as formerly had done in Ægypt, Abimelech the King having taken her into his Houſe, who therefore was plagued till he reſtored her with large Gifts. The year being preciſely finiſhed, Sarah bare to him Iſaac (ſo called becauſe he laughed when God made mention of it to him) he being now an hundred years old, and ſhe ninety; four hundred before the Departure of his Poſterity out of Ægypt. At the weaning of Iſaac, Sarah ſeeing Iſmael mocking, procured him and his Mother to be baniſhed the Houſe, God bidding Abraham fulfill her Deſire herein, and promiſing to make of him a great Nation. When Iſaac was grown up (though of what Age, is not expreſſed, ſome gheſſing thirty years; others (improbably) ten, or twelve, becauſe he muſt have been of ſufficient Strength to carry wood) God to try his Fathers Faith, commanded him to offer him up for a burnt-offering on Mount Moriah, where afterwards the Temple of Solomon ſtood. He, out of Obedience, went about to do it; but God accepting his Will for a Performance, renewed his Promiſe to him. Sarah died aged 127 years, and after her Death Abraham married another Wife, called Keturah, by which he had other ſix Sons. To thoſe he gave Gifts, and before his Death ſent them away from Iſaac, the Heir of the Promiſe.

Gen. 20.
A. M. 2108.
Chap. 21.
Iſaac born.
Chap. 22.
Sarah dieth.
Chap. 23.

9. When Iſaac was forty years old, his Father procured him to Wife Rebecca, the Daughter of Bethuel, who was Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham. She (married at fourteen years of Age, according to the Tradition of the Jews) was barren twenty years; but then her Husband beſeeching God for her, ſhe brought * forth Twins (Eſau and Jacob) which ſtruggled in her Womb; the elder being, as God foretold, to ſerve the younger. Fifteen years after, Abraham died, being 175 years old, having ſojourned in the Land of Canaan a hundred years; twenty two after the Death of Sem, four before that of Heber; in the days of Inachus King of the Argives, 1821 years before the Æra of Chriſt, in the 2183 year of the World. Of Abraham (beſides Artapanus and Charan before mentioned) Beroſus the Chaldæan had ſome Knowledge, though he named him not. Hecatæus not only made mention of him, by the way, but wrote an Hiſtory of him. Nicolaus Damaſcenus, in the fourth Book of his Hiſtories, related that Abra-

Iſaac married.
Chap. 24.
A. M. 2148.
Chap. 25.
* A. M. 2168.
Abraham dieth.
Apud Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 7.

ham, a certain Stranger, reigned at Damaſcus; having come from a Country about Babylon, ſaid to be that of the Chaldæans. That he departed thence with his People into the Land of Canaan, afterwards called Judæa, where his Poſterity grew very numerous; concerning which he ſhould ſpeak in another Place. In Joſephus his time the name of Abraham was famous at Damaſcus; where was ſhewn a certain Village, called Abrahams dwelling.

Gen. 26.

Iſmael dieth.

His Poſterity.

Strabo l. 16. p. 779.

Lib. 19. p. 722. A.

10. After the Death of Abraham, God bleſſed Iſaac, and made the ſame Covenant with him. In a time of Famine, he alſo ſojourned in Gerar, where diſſembling concerning Rebecca his Wife, the ſame thing happened to them as formerly to Abraham and Sarah, from another Abimelech, which name was common to all the Kings of the Philiſtines. Some years after, Iſmael died, aged 137 years, 48 after his Father, in the year of the World 2231. From his eldeſt Son Nebaioth, deſcended the Nabathæans, who inhabited part of Arabia, from the River Euphrates to the Red-ſea, called Arabia Petræa, from Petra the Metropolis of the Country; which, wanting Fruits, abounded in Sheep and Cattel. Diodorus deſcribeth it to have lyen like a Wilderneſs untilled, as without Inhabitants; without Rivers or Fountains. It was unlawful with them to ſow or plant, to drink Wine or build Houſes, being extraordinary deſirous of Liberty, and judging theſe things but Temptations, to ſuch as were ſtronger, to inthral them. Some of them kept Camels, others Sheep; ſome uſed to convey Spices, brought out of Arabia the Happy, to the Sea. When they were invaded by an Enemy, they betook themſelves into the Wilderneſs, which being vaſt, and without water, afforded them ſufficient Protection. Another Son of Iſmael, named Kedar, gave name to a Place of Arabia the Deſart, often mentioned in Scripture. It is thought that, though the Chuſæans, Madianites, and Iſmaelites were of ſeveral Originals, yet they dwelt promiſcuouſly together, and grew up into one Nation of the Saracens.

Gen. 27.

Chap. 28, 29, 30.

Jacob flieth from his Brother into Meſopotamia.

A. M. 2246.

His Iſſue.

11. Fifteen years after this, Iſaac being 138 years old, and blind, ſent his eldeſt Son Eſau to Hunt for Veniſon, that he might eat and bleſs him before his Death. But Jacob, by his Mother's Help, ſupplanted him, and got the Bleſſing, having formerly bought his Birthright for Pottage. Hereat Eſau, inraged, determined to kill him after his Fathers Death; which Rebecca knowing, ſent him into Meſopotamia to her Brother Laban, that he might thence alſo take a Wife out of her own Kindred, and not make his Choice amongſt the Hittites, of which Eſau had married two Wives. In his Journey God appeared to him in a Dream, and bleſſed him; for which Cauſe he changed the name of the Place from Luz into Bethel. Coming to Laban, after a Moneths time, he covenanted to ſerve him ſeven years for his youngeſt Daughter Rachel; which being ended, Leah, the eldeſt, was given to him in her ſtead, and preſently after, Rachel; for which he agreed to ſerve him other ſeven years. Rachel, moſt beloved, continued barren; and Leah, becauſe neglected, obtained Favour of God to be fruitful, which raiſed ſuch Emulation betwixt them, as Rachel firſt, and then Leah, gave her Maid to his Bed, accounting the Children begotten on them, as their own. Within ſeven years, he had by Leah ſeven Sons, viz. Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Iſſachar, Zabulon, and a Daughter named Dinah; by Bilhah, Rachel's Maid, two Sons, Dan and Naphtali; by Zilpah, Leahs Maid, alſo two Sons, Gad and Aſher. Laſtly, by Rachel, her ſelf one Son, named Joſeph, and born the fourteen year of his Service ending. Six years longer he ſerved Laban for Wages (being to have the Cattel of ſuch and ſuch a Colour) which his hard Maſter changed ten times; but could not withſtand the Providence of God, in his growing rich.

His Return.

Chap. 31, 32, &c.

A. M. 2266.

12. Having ſerved his Father-in-law and Uncle twenty years, and obſerving what Envy he had contracted from him and his Sons, he ſtole away with all he had, and proceeded three days on his Journey, ere his Departure was known. Then Laban with his Friends purſuing, overtook him after ſeven days in Mount Gilead, which from the Event of this Meeting had its Name. After ſeveral Expoſtulations, they made a Covenant (Laban being warned by God not to hurt him) and, in Teſtimony thereof, laid together an Heap of Stones, which Jacob called Galead; but Laban, in his Syrian Tongue, Jegar-Sehadutha. Jacob then continued his Journey towards Canaan, wreſtling with God's Angel in his Way; from which he received a Bleſſing, and the Sirname of Iſrael. His Brother Eſau alſo met him, and lovingly received him, contrary to his Fears. The firſt place he ſtayed at was Succoth, ſo called becauſe there he built an Houſe, and made Booths for his Cattel. Thence he paſſed over Jordan, and came to Sichem, where he bought of Hamor, the Father of Sichem, a Field, for a hundred Lambs, or ſo many pieces of Money. How long he continued in either of theſe places is not expreſſed. Demetrius and Alexander Polyhiſtor wrote that he abode ten years in Socot, ſaying nothing of Sichem; perhaps becauſe he made little Stay there. Indeed Dinah ſeemeth to have been Raviſhed not long after their firſt coming thither; Hamor ſpeaking to his Citizens concerning them, as perſons lately come, and her curioſity to ſee the Women of that Country, probably may be thought to have proceeded from the ſtrangeneſs of it. At the end of theſe ten years ſhe was Raviſhed, then ſixteen years old; being born a little before Joſeph, and perhaps the ſame year. To be revenged upon Sichem, who committed the Rape, her two Brothers Simeon and Levi ſlew him, and put the whole City to the Sword, coming upon them when they were yet ſore by Circumciſion, which he had procured them to admit of, that he might obtain the Maid for his Wife.

Apud Euſeb. præparat. Evang. lib. 9. cap. 21.

Dinah raviſhed.

13. Jacob much troubled hereat, was commanded by God to go to Bethel, having Buried all the ſtrange Gods and the ear-rings of his Family under the Oake in Sichem. At Bethel he erected an Altar to the Lord, and here Deborah the Nurſe of Rebecca died. Thence he removed to Ephrath, being 107 years old, and when they had almoſt reached the place, Rachel died in Travel of Benjamin, having (as Demetrius and Alexander wrote) lived with her Husband 23 years. Eleven years after Jacob's Return into Canaan, when he was now 109 years old, Joſeph being hated of his Brethren, becauſe he had brought to their Father their evil report, and for his Dream (which preſaged his preheminence over them) they ſold him to the Iſmaelites; who carried him down into Egypt, where Potiphar Captain of the Kings Guard bought him, being now ſeventeen years old. Ten years he lived with him: Till refuſing to ſatisfy the wanton Deſires of his Miſtreſs, he was falſely accuſed by her of her own fault, and caſt into Priſon. The year after, he Interpreted the Dreams of the chief Butler and Baker of Pharaoh, both which were in Priſon with him; and accordingly the Baker was hanged, but the Butler reſtored, who yet forgot Joſeph.

Rachel dieth.

Chap. 38.

Joſeph ſold.

A. M. 2277.

14. At this time his Grand-father Iſaac died; aged 180 years, in the 2288 year of the World. He was buried in Hebron, by his two Sons Eſau and Jacob; the former having (as ſome think they have Ground in Charity to believe) reconciled himſelf to his Brother, and joyned himſelf to the Church; not being eſtranged from the Grace of God, but only from the ſpecial and particular Covenant, as to the promiſed Seed; which they have the ſame Reaſon to think concerning Iſmael: The Funeral paſt, and the Goods divided betwixt them, being both exceeding rich, and therefore requiring large Room, Eſau departed to his former Poſſeſſion of Mount Seir; Providence ſo ordaining it, that when the Iſraelites ſhould afterwards come to inherit Canaan, his Poſterity might neither be deſtroyed, nor diſplaced. He was otherwiſe called Edom, and from him Idumæa took it's Name, which ſeemeth from Strabo to have alſo included the Country of the Nabatæans. And likely enough it is, that he who married the Siſter of Nebaioth, might joyn himſelf to them, and preſide over them. This is the famous Heroe, from whom not only Idumæa, but alſo the adjoyning Erythræan, Edomæan, or Redſea, (all ſignifying the ſame thing) was ſo called; being known to the Greeks, by the name of Erythras, the ſame with Edom.

A. M. 2288.

Iſaac dieth.

Edom.

Vide Fulleri Miſcell. 4. c. 20.

15. But two years after Joſeph had interpreted the Dreams of the Servants of Pharaoh, he was called up out of Priſon, to explain the meaning of one, which the King himſelf had dreamed. This, betokening ſeven years of great Plenty to come, and after them as many of Famine; and it being neceſſary, as he hinted to Pharaoh, to chuſe out ſome wiſe Man, who being ſet over the Land, ſhould gather and preſerve the Fruits of the Earth, againſt the time of Want; Pharaoh made Choice of him, being about thirty years old, for this purpoſe: he appointed him next to himſelf, and gave him in Marriage Aſenath the Daughter of Potipherah, Prieſt of On (or Heliopolis, where Strabo writeth, that the Prieſts of old time had their Habitation) on which he begat Ephraim and Manaſſes. According to his Prediction, ſeven moſt plentiful years enſued, wherein he gathered into Store-Houſes the Corn that abounded; and after them came ſeven other of Famine, which prevailed ſore both in Ægypt and the neighbouring Countries of Canaan and Arabia. Jacob, amongſt others, wanting Proviſions, in the ſecond year of the Famine, ſent his Sons down into Ægypt to buy Corn. Joſeph knowing them, though undiſcovered, accuſed them for coming as Spies, caſt them into Priſon, and diſmiſſed them not, till, Simeon (the eldeſt of thoſe which conſpired againſt his Life) was bound and left as an Hoſtage, for their bringing down of Benjamin; that ſo their Story might be confirmed, of their being one Mans Sons, and that their youngeſt Brother was left behind. The next year, being preſſed with Famine

Gen. 41.

A. M. 2290.

Joſeph advanced.

A. M. 2297.

Chap. 42, 43, &c.

Jacob goeth into Ægypt.

A. M. 2298.

mine, they returned, and Benjamin with them, whom their Father was conſtrained to let go. Now, after ſome further terrifying of them, he made himſelf known, and ſent for his Father down into Ægypt. Jacob underſtanding of his Son's Life and Promotion (whom he had given over of a long time, for dead) gladly went down, and with him 66 Souls, beſides his Son's Wives; in the third year of the Famine, of the World the 2298th, aged 130 years.

Chap. 47.

Chap. 48, 49.

Dieth.

A. M. 2315.

Gen. 50.

16. By Pharaoh's Conſent, Joſeph placed them in the Land of Goſhen, and there nouriſhed them during the Famine. He ſold to the Ægyptians the Corn formerly treaſured up, and therewith purchaſed for the King all their Money, Goods and Lands, except the Lands of the Prieſts, which were not alienated. The Grounds he afterwards granted to the former Owners, paying the fifth part of the Profit to Pharaoh's Uſe. After Jacob had lived in Ægypt ſeventeen years, he adopted the two eldeſt Sons of Joſeph; viz. Manaſſes and Ephraim, of whom the younger he preferred before the elder: He called his Sons together, bleſſed them, and told them apart, what ſhould befall them in their Poſterity. From Reuben his firſt born he took the Preheminence, becauſe he had defiled his Bed, and gave it to Judah. He propheſied of Chriſt's Coming, commanded them to bury him in the Cave of Machpelah, in the Land of Canaan, with his Anceſtors, and then died at the Age of 147 years, in the year of the World 2315. Joſeph cauſed his Servants the Phyſitians to embalme Iſrael, and a Mourning of ſeventy days (or ſeventy two,) was obſerved for him, which number in that Country was only proper to Kings; Then, obtaining Leave of Pharoah, he and his Brethren, with a great Company of Courtiers, carried him into the Land of Canaan, and buried him there, according to his Will, where they alſo mourned for him ſeven days.

Joſeph dieth.

A. M. 2370.

Lib. 36. c. 2.

17. Being returned into Ægypt, Joſeph forgave his Brethren the Fault they formerly had committed againſt him (which now they feared he would revenge, after their Fathers Death,) and as long as he lived, he nouriſhed them and their Children. This ſpace of time was fifty four years after his Fathers Death, at the end whereof, having exhorted them to Unity and Concord, foretelling them their Departure out of Ægypt, and commanding them thence to carry his Bones, he dyed at the Age of 110 years, when he had governed Ægypt, under ſeveral Kings, the ſpace of 80. Trogus Pompeius (as appeareth out of Juſtin his Epitomizer) wrote many things concerning him, partly taken out of the Sacred Hiſtory, partly mixed with ſuch Fables as the Heathen were not wanting to invent concerning the Jews. Abram, Moſes, and Iſrael, are made by him Kings of Damaſcus, which City took it's name from their Predeceſſor. Iſrael had ten Sons, to whom he committed the Kingdom, and commanded them to call themſelves Jews, from Judah, who died before the Diviſion, and whoſe Portion was divided amongſt them all. The youngeſt of the ten Sons was Joſeph, whoſe excellent Wit his Brothers fearing, they ſold him to ſome Merchants that carried him down into Ægypt. Here learning the Magick Arts, he became very dear to the King, having skill in working Wonders, and Interpretation of Dreams: moreover, nothing either Divine or Humane was beyond his Reach; inſomuch, that he foretold the Barrenneſs of the Ground ſeveral years before it hapned, and all Ægypt had periſhed with Famine, but that the King, by his Advice, cauſed Corn to be treaſured up many years: finally, ſuch was his Knowledge, that his Anſwers ſeemed rather the Oracles of a God, than the Replies of a Man. Then followeth, that Moſes was his Son, who both wiſe and beautiful, became a Leader to ſuch Ægyptians as were infected with Scab and Itch, and ſo returned to Damaſcus, the Country of his Anceſtors. Which Lyes (with others hereafter to be mentioned) are to be attributed to the Malice of the Ægyptians. With the Life of Joſeph endeth the firſt Book of Moſes his Hiſtory, called by the Greeks, Geneſis, which containeth the Account of 2369 years of the World. The next to it in order of time, the Book of Job is thought to be; of which Moſes alſo is reputed Author, by the common Conſent and Opinion of the Hebrews.

Exod. 1.

The Iſraelites oppreſſed in Ægypt.

Chap. 2.

Vide Pererium in 2 Exodi.

18. After the Death of Joſeph, and all that Generation, the Children of Iſrael increaſed abundantly, and grew exceeding mighty; ſo that the Land was filled with their numbers. But a certain King ariſing, which knew not Joſeph; to keep them down, he preſſed them with ſore Labour; and leſt they ſhould increaſe, gave order to the Midwives to drown all the Male Children in the River. At this time (fifty eight years after the Death of Joſeph, and forty one after that of Levi) Aruram, the Son of Caath, and Grand-ſon of Levi by Jochabed the Daughter of Levi (ſo called by an Hebraiſm, and not Caath's own Siſter, as ſome have thought)

Moſes born.

A. M. 2428.

thought) was made Father of a Son, whom for his Beauty they hid three Moneths, not fearing the Kings Command, and when he could no longer be concealed, put him in an Ark of Bull-ruſhes, daubed within and without with Pitch, and laid him on the Brink of the River. Hither the Kings Daughter (by Joſephus called Thermutis) coming down to waſh her ſelf, found the Babe; and moved with Compaſſion, ſent for a Nurſe, which was Jochabed her ſelf, through the Procurement of Miriam her Daughter, which had watched what would become of the Child, and unknown, had offered her ſelf for a Meſſenger. Being nurſed up, ſhe educated him as her own Son, and called him Moſes, becauſe ſhe had taken him out of the Water. Moy in the Ægyptian Tongue, as Joſephus ſaith, ſignifying Water, and Yſes taken out, though Moſche in the Hebrew is no compounded word, ſignifying drawn out, delivered, or rather a Deliverer; not without a Myſtery; he being a Type of that great Deliverer of Mankind. He was learned in all the Learning of the Ægyptians, and became mighty in Words and in Deeds.

De nominibus Hebræis à Joſepho verſis vid. Jacob. Capellum Hiſt. Sacra & Exotica ad A. M. 1719.

19. But Moſes being grown up, by Faith refuſed to be called the Son of Pharaoh's Daughter, and deſpiſed the Pleaſure of his Court; having, according to Joſephus his Hiſtory, thrown down his Crown, ſet upon his head when a Child, and trampled it under his Feet; for which, as an ill Omen, the Prieſt (who had foretold, that his Nativity would prove diſaſtrous to the Ægyptians) would have had him ſlain; but he was ſpared through the Affection of Thermutis. Being forty years old, he viſited his Brethren the Iſraelites; and looking upon their Burdens, when he ſaw an Ægyptian ſmiting one of them, he killed him, and hid his Body in the Sand. But this coming to Pharaoh's Ear, he was forced to fly for his Life, into the Land of Midian, where he kept the Sheep of Jethro, or Hebab Prieſt of that Country, who gave him Zipporah his Daughter to wiſe. Forty years he continued with him, till the Burthens of the Children of Iſrael were grown ſo intolerable, after above eighty years Continuance, that God being moved with their Cries, called to him out of a burning Buſh, as he was feeding Sheep, to ſend him on a Meſſage to Pharaoh, about their Diſmiſſion. He laboured by all means to make Excuſe; but at length, confirmed by Promiſe of divine Aſſiſtance by Miracles, and the Company of his Brother Aaron, (three years elder;) he undertook the Employment.

A. M. 2468.

Exod. 3, & 4.

Sent to Pharaoh.

Chap. 5, & 7, &c.

The ten Plagues of Ægypt.

20. This Meſſage was ill reſented by Pharaoh, and greater Burthens impoſed on the People; no Straw being now allowed them, for the making of Brick, in which ſervile work they were imployed. Many Signs and Wonders were wrought by Moſes in the Kings Preſence, which little availed; Jannes and Jambres, Magicians, doing the ſame with their Enchantments. Ten Plagues alſo by the Miniſtry of Moſes, God inflicted upon the Land. 1. The Waters were turned into Blood. 2. Frogs ſwarmed in the Land. 3. Lice. 4. Flies and other Inſects. 5. A Murrain followed amongſt the Cattel. 6. Ulcers in Man and Beaſt. 7. Thunder and Rain mingled with Fire and Hail, that deſtroyed the Corn with the Trees of the Field. 8. Locuſts covered the Face of the Earth, and conſumed the Fruits thereof. 9. Enſued Darkneſs throughout the Land of Ægypt, ſuch, as no Ægyptian could ſtir out of his Houſe, yet the Iſraelites had Light in their dwellings. 10. Laſt of all the firſt-born were ſlain, from Pharaoh that ſate upon the Throne, to the firſt-born of the Captive in the Dungeon, and the firſt-born of Cattel.

The Iſraelites depart.

Exod. 12.

A. M. 2508.

21. The nine former Plagues Pharaoh's heart was ſo hardened as to withſtand; but the tenth forced him to let the People go. Upon the Death of the firſt-born, he and his Subjects thruſt them out with Haſte, out of the Land, and forgot the Jewels of Silver and Jewels of Gold, which they had lent them. For the Iſraelites were commanded by God, to borrow theſe things; and, the Night before their Departure, to kill a Lamb; with the Blood of which they were to ſprinkle the Lintels of their Doors, that the Angel appointed to do this Execution upon the firſt-born, might paſs by their Houſes, at the ſight thereof. And in Memorial of the thing, this they were to do every year, on the tenth day of that Moneth (thenceforth commanded to begin the year, being called Abib) eating a Lamb in a travelling Poſture, with their Loins girt, and Staves in their hands. Thus left they Ægypt, 430 years after the firſt Promiſe made to Abraham, and his Leaving Ur of the Chaldæans, 400 after the Birth of Iſaac, 210 after Jacob's Deſcent into Ægypt, in the 2508*th.* year of the World. This their Departure is alſo atteſted by Heathen Writers; but related to have been upon ſuch Grounds, as the Ægyptians themſelves invented; who, as it ſeemeth, took Occaſion from the Plague of Ulcers, which they ſuffered in their own Perſons, to feign, that becauſe of Leproſie they were forced out of the Land; as will largely appear in the Hiſtory of Ægypt.

SECT. II.

From the Departure of the Iſraelites out of Ægypt, to the Death of Solomon, and the Rent of the Kingdom.

The number of the Iſraelites at their Departure.

1. THE Number of the Children of Iſrael may be eſteemed by what is recorded concerning their men of War, of the Age of twenty years and upwards. Of theſe went out about 600000, beſides Women and Children; ſo that if thoſe of that Age be reckoned as two parts of five, of the whole Multitude, (which is the uſual Account amongſt all Nations, to reckon men for War, as forty to a hundred, in reſpect of the whole Body) then the total number of all, both old and young, amounted to about 1500000. To theſe muſt be added a mixed Multitude; which, having taken up their Religion, went out with them, and is thought by ſome to have conſiſted of as many more; ſo that the whole Sum of all together, at that rate, would ariſe to 3000000. As for the number of the Iſraelites, it need not ſeem incredible, that from about 70 Perſons in the ſpace of 210 years, ſo many ſhould proceed. For if but one man, in the thirtieth year of his Age, ſhould begin to be a Father, and had but in all ten Children, who alſo with their Poſterity ſhould beget at the ſame Age, that one man, before 200 years, would have deſcended from him, of the ſixth Generation 1000000. of the fifth 100000. of the fourth 10000. of the great Grand-Children 1000. of Grand-Children 100. and of Children 10. But that the Iſraelites began to be Fathers before the Age of thirty is more than probable; Nature * ſometimes not requiring half that time, and there is ground ſufficient to think that they often exceeded the number of ten Children. The Scripture relateth Abdon to have had forty Sons, Abizara thirty, and as many Daughters, Gideon ſeventy Sons, and Ahab as many. Ægyptus, Danaus, Priamus, and Darius, are reported to have had fifty Children; Artaxerxes, Juſtin relateth to have had 115. and Hierotimus 600. Theſe things (to add no more) prove the great Increaſe of the Iſraelites to have been poſſible in the courſe of Nature, although not without an eſpecial Providence.

Vide Pererium in 12.cap.Exod.

Vide Jacob. Cappell. ad A.M. 2293.

* Mea memoria in civitate Lactoratenſi Novempopulentiæ, puer minor annorum duodecim genuit ex puella conſobrina ſua quæ nondum decimum annum expleverat. Rem notam narro, & cujus memoria adhuc recens eſt in Aquitania. Pater hoc ipſe de ſe patri meo teſtatus eſt, quod alioqui tunc ne pueri quidem ignorabant. Scaliger. in Parei orat. 1.

The Paſſover annually to be obſerved.

2. Moſes had gathered the People together, as Joſephus writeth, about Rameſſes the chief City of Goſhen, that they might be in a Readineſs; and thence they came to Succoth where was their ſecond Station. Here Moſes propounded the Command of God concerning the annual Obſervation of the Paſſeover, and the Conſecration of the firſt born. A ready way hence to the Land of Canaan would have been through that of the Philiſtines; but becauſe the Iſraelites were born in Slavery, and therefore had but low and poor Spirits; to exerciſe them, to ſtir them up, and leſt, for want of Experience, they ſhould be ſo terrified as to return, God lead them another and longer way. From Succoth therefore they came to Etham in the end of the Deſart, in two days; whither God conducted them by a Pillar of a Cloud by day, and Pillar of Fire by night, that never forſook them, till they came to the Borders of the promiſed Land. From Etham they journeyed to Pihahiroth, aud thence to the Red Sea. Hither Pharaoh purſued them with all his Forces, repenting he had let them go. They were there exceedingly ſtruck with Terrour, and murmured againſt Moſes, for bringing them out of Ægypt. In this Extremity God divided the Waters of the Red Sea, which being as a Wall on both ſides to them, they paſſed over on dry Ground. The Ægyptians eſſayed alſo to purſue them in this place, but the Pillar then removed from before them, and placed it ſelf between them, giving light to the Iſraelites, but cauſing great Darkneſs to their Enemies. Hereupon enſued great Conſternation, and a pannick Fear amongſt the Ægyptians, which cauſing great Diſturbance, the Lord alſo ſo fought againſt them, and they fled. But then the Waters returned to their Place and overwhelmed them all, ſo that neither Pharaoh, nor any one of his men eſcaped. This place of the Red Sea being here not at all fordable, the ſole Power of God procured their Paſſage; though Joſephus, to gain Credit to the Story from the incredulous Heathen, taketh off from the Miracle, by an unſuitable Comparing of it to Alexander the Great his Paſſing the ſhoar of the Pamphylian-Sea, which at low Water was ever bare, and at other times not very deep.

The Iſraelites paſs the Red-Sea.

Vide Strabonem. l. 14. p. 666. D.

Quails and Manna.

3. From the Red Sea they journeyed three days through the Wilderneſs of Etham; (which, as it ſeemeth, ſtretcheth forth it ſelf to both the ſides of the Sea) where they found no Water. Thence they came to Marah, where they found Water, but bitter, and thence the Place had its name; which Bitterneſs was removed by the caſting in of a certain Tree which God ſhewed to Moſes. From Marah, they came to their fifth Station at Elim, where were twelve Fountains of Water, and ſeventy Palm-trees, and thence to the Red Sea; which name ſeemeth to be applied to ſome Bay or Creek thereof. From the Sea they came into the Deſart of Sin, where they pitched their Tents on the fourteenth day of the ſecond Moneth after their Departure. Here murmuring for Fleſh, Quails were rained down upon the Camp at Evening, and in the Morning was there found Manna, which continued every Morning to fall, all the forty years they abode in the Wilderneſs. This Wilderneſs of Sin being very large, and reaching as far as Mount Sinai, they had ſeveral Stations in it. The ninth was at Diphka, the tenth at Aluſh, the eleventh at Rephidim; where the People again Murmuring for Water, the Rock being ſtruck by Moſes guſhed out into Streams. Whilſt they here continued, the Amalekites (deſcended from Amalek, who was the Son of Eliphaz, and Grand-ſon of Eſau) fell in upon their Rear, and made Slaughter of the weaker ſort. Moſes againſt them ſent Joſhua the Son of Nun, he himſelf in the mean time praying to God in the Mount. And as long as his hands were lifted up the Iſraelites overcame, but when he let them down the Amalekites prevailed; ſo that Aaron his Brother, and Hur his Siſter Miriam's husband, bore them up till the Going down of the Sun.

Exod. 17.

Chap. 19, 20.

The Decalogue.

4. In the third Moneth they removed, and took up their Station in the Deſart of Sinai, over againſt the Mountain Horeb (which 'tis thought was ſome part of Sinai) and here they continued almoſt a year; to the twentieth day of the ſecond Moneth of the next year. Upon this Mountain, God gave the Law of the ten Commandments in a terrible manner, on the fiftieth day after their Coming out of Ægypt, as ſome of the Ancients apprehended. The day after, ſeveral other Laws were promulgated, as it were Commentaries upon the Decalogue both Judicial and Ceremonial. Then Moſes having offered Sacrifice, read the Book of the Law to the People, and made a Covenant betwixt God and them, and went up into the Mountain, where he remained forty days, ſix in the lower and cloudy, and thirty four in the higheſt and fiery Part. In this ſpace of time he received Advice concerning the Structure of the Tabernacle, the Ornaments and Conſecration of Prieſts, &c. From this familiar Converſing of God with Moſes, the Heathen Law-givers took occaſion to feign ſuch a Privilege to themſelves. As amongſt the Getes, Zamolxis gave out he received two Laws from Veſta; Zathrauſtes amongſt the Arimaſpians from a good Dæmon; Mneves, amongſt the Ægyptians, from Mercury; Minos the Cretian, from Jupiter; Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian, from Apollo; and Numa the Roman, from the Goddeſs Egeria. To this number * Diodorus, out of Ethnick Ignorance, addeth Moſes himſelf, writing that he counterfeited Conference with the God Jaus.

Hieronymus ad Fabiolum: & Leo Serm. 1. de Pentecoſte.

* Biblioth. l. 1. p. 59. B. in Margine notat.

The molten Calf.

5. But the People miſſing Moſes ſo long a time, and not knowing what was become of him, raiſed a Tumult, and cauſed Aaron to make them a God that might go before them. The Hebrews have a Tradition, that Hur, oppoſing this, was ſlain; but Aaron, overcome with their furious Importunity, made them a molten Calf of Gold, after the Faſhion of the Ægyptians, who worſhipped two Heifers, Apis and Mnevis, which they accounted Gods. Forty days, and as many Nights being ended, God gave Moſes two Tables of Stone, wherein was written the Decalogue by his own Finger, and ſent him down, telling him wherein his People were employed. Moſes ſomething appeaſing Gods Wrath, came down from the Mount; but ſeeing them dance before the Calf, in a great Rage caſt the Tables out of his hands, and brake them. He put the Calf into the fire, and grinding it to Powder threw it into the Brook, and made them to drink of the Water:

Chap. 31, &c.

then commanded the Levites to take every man his Sword, and ſlay his Neighbour; ſo that of the People fell that day about 3000 men. After this going up into the Mount the ſecond time, he interceded for the People, and at his Return, removed the Tabernacle, or Tent, wherein he uſed to ſpeak with God, out of the Camp, in token of the Lords Diſpleaſure. He hewed two new Tables of Stone, like to the former, and having given order for the making of an Ark of Wood, and all things about the Tabernacle, according to the Pattern ſhewed him in the Mount, he went up the third time, and continued there forty dayes and as many nights,without eating any thing, as before. In this time God wrote anew the Ten Commandments; and, being pacified, renewed the League conditionally, and propoſed other Laws to the People. When Moſes returned, his Face ſhone, ſo that he put thereon a Vail when he ſpake to the Multitude, to which he declared Gods Commands, urged the Obſervation of the Sabbath, and the Offering for making of the Tabernacle; in the Work whereof, the latter part of this year was ſpent by Bezaleel, and his Companions.

The Tabernacle reared.

Chap. 40.

Num. 19.

N*um.* 1.

Chap. 10.

Chap. 23.

The Sanhedrim.

Chap. 11.

6. On the firſt day of the firſt Moneth of the ſecond year, was the Tabernacle reared, and in this Moneth were theſe things done which are ſpoken of in the third Book of Moſes, called Leviticus. On the fourteenth day was the Paſſeover celebrated in the Wilderneſs of Sinai. On the firſt of the ſecond Moneth God commanded Moſes to number all the Iſraelites, except the Tribe of Levi, from twenty years old to ſixty; the number of whom amounted to 603550. juſt ſo many as had been found ſeven Moneths before, when the Contribution was to be made for the Tabernacle. On the twentieth of the ſame Moneth, the Cloud which reſted on the Tabernacle, removed, and they following it in four Armies came from the Wilderneſs of Sinai to that of Paran, where they ſtayed twenty three dayes, in the thirteenth Manſion of Kidroth-Hattaavah. Here the People, weary of their Heavenly Bread, luſted after the Fleſh of Ægypt, and were puniſhed with a ſudden Fire, which devoured many, and was at length quenched by the Prayer of Moſes. Here alſo Moſes complaining to God of the great Burthen which lay upon him; the Sanhedrim of the ſeventy Elders was inſtituted. In this place, moreover God gave the People Quailes for a whole Moneth, on which they ſurfeited, ſo that a Plague aroſe whilſt the Fleſh was yet betwixt their Teeth, and many periſhed. Hence the Place had it's name of Kibroth-Hattaavah, or the Sepulchres of Concupiſcence.

Miriam ſtruck with Leproſie.

Chap. 12.

Chap. 13.

The Spies ſearch the Land.

Chap. 14.

7. From Hattaavah they removed to Hezeroth, where Aaron and Miriam ſpake againſt Moſes about his Wife; Miriam for that, was ſtruck with Leproſie, and caſt out of the Camp, till Aaron confeſſing their Fault, and interceding to Moſes for her, he prayed to God, and ſhe was healed. She being after ſeven dayes received again into the Camp, they removed, and came to Rithma, near unto Cades-barnea, in the ſame Deſart of Paran. In the fifth Moneth of the ſecond year, and the time of Vintage, Caleb the Son of Jephunne, Joſhua the Son of Nun, and ten other principal men were hence ſent to ſpy the Land of Canaan. After forty days they returned, bringing with them of the Fruit of the Land. Caleb and Joſhua incouraged the People, but the reſt utterly diſheartned them, cauſing them to deſpair ever to poſſeſs it, becauſe of the Strength of the walled Towns,and the Gyants which there lived. This raiſed ſuch a Mutiny, that they not only murmured againſt Moſes, but ſpake of making them a Captain, and of returning into Ægypt, threatning to ſtone Caleb and Joſhua, who laboured to the contrary. This ſo highly provoked the Lord, that he threatned ſuddenly to deſtroy them, and being prevailed with by Moſes to mitigate his Wrath, denounced that none of twenty years and upwards ſhould ever enter into the promiſed Land, but wander up and down till their Carkeiſes fell in the Wilderneſs; except Caleb and Joſhua. And this Sentence was preſently executed upon the ten, which had cauſed the Sedition.

The Iſraelites commanded to turn back.

8. When they had therefore now arrived at the Borders of the promiſed Land, they were commanded to turn back again into the Wilderneſs towards the Red Sea. But to make ſome amends, as they thought, for their late Fear and Cowardiſe, they aroſe in the Morning; and againſt the expreſs Command of Moſes, went up into the Mountain to fight, where the Amalekites and Canaanites that there inhabited, ſmote and diſcomfited them even unto Hormah. At their Return they wept before the Lord, but were not heard; and upon this Occaſion, and the Death of thoſe that fell daily in the Deſart, Moſes, as it's thought, compoſed the 90 Pſalm, wherein complaining of humane Frailty and ſhortneſs of Life, he ſignifieth, that mans Age was reduced to 70 or 80 years: and ſo now the third time was it, as it were, cut ſhorter by the half; the two former having been immediately after the Flood; and again, in the time of Phaleg, at the Diviſion of the Earth.

Their Manſions for thirty ſeven years.

Numb. 33.

Miriam dieth.

Chap. 20.

9. Thenceforth, from their Departure from Cades-barnea, are numbered ſeventeen more Stations in the Wilderneſs of Paran, wherein they ſpent 38 years, wandring about, till all the rebellious ones were conſumed. The things which hapned in thoſe years, cannot certainly be fixed upon any particular one, Moſes herein being ſilent. Yet it is thought, that the Hiſtory of the Man that gathered Sticks on the Sabbath day, and for it was ſtoned; of the Rebellion of Corah and his Companions, of Aaron's Rod that budded, &c. are to be referred to the latter part of the ſecond year; none of the forty, except the two former and the laſt of all, being taken notice of by Moſes, who recordeth only the ſeventeen Manſions which were taken up, during the 37 years that paſſed between. The ſeventeenth and the laſt of theſe (being the thirty ſecond Manſion reckoned from the Beginning) was at Ezion-gaber, upon the Red Sea in the Country of the Edomites, whence they came to Cades, where they took up their 33 Manſion. Hierom and others, account this Cades the ſame with Cades-barnea, the fifteenth Station, making the Iſraelites to have after ſo many Windings and Turnings, in ſo many years, returned to the ſame Place. But, others finding Cades-barnea in the Southern Confines of Canaan, will have this Cades or Kadeſh, a place different from it, and near to Ezion-gaber upon the Red Sea, (whence they immediately paſſed to it) in the Deſart of Zin. Whilſt they remained in Cades, Miriam died at the Age of 126 years, and was there buried. After this the People murmured, becauſe the Water which had hitherto followed them from the Rock Rephidim, here failed, being, as ſome think, ſwallowed up of the Red Sea. Hereupon Moſes and Aaron were commanded only to ſpeak to a Rock in that Place, to give out Water; but Moſes, wearied with the Untowardneſs of the Multitude, uttered ſome words of Impatience and Diffidence, and ſtruck the Rock twice, ſo that the Water guſhed out in great Abundance. Becauſe they did not ſanctifie God in the Eyes of the People, he was angry with them, and excluded them both from Entering into the Land of Promiſe.

Aaron dieth.

Chap. 21.

The King of Arad vanquiſhed.

10. Moſes afterwards ſent to the King of Edom, deſiring Leave to paſs quietly through his Country; but, he oppoſing, he led the People by the Borders from Kadeſh unto Mount Hor, where Aaron, died, ſome four Moneths after his Siſter Miriam, at the Age of 123, in the 40 year of their wandring in the Wilderneſs; and Eleazer his Son ſucceeded him in the Office of High-prieſt. In the ſixth Moneth of the 40 year, the King of Arad, who inhabited the Southern parts of Canaan, came out againſt them, and took many Priſoners; whereupon, they vowed, if God would deliver his Country into their hands, to deſtroy his Cities. Hereunto God aſſenting, they went up, and proſpering, gave to the Country the name of Hormah, which is the ſame with Anathema or Curſed. Then journeyed they from Mount Hor, to compaſs about the Land of Edom (againſt which God had charged them not to fight, becauſe of their Anceſtors) and came to the thirty fifth Manſion of Tſalmona, which ſignifieth an Image. For here the People murmuring againſt the Lord and Moſes, becauſe of the Tediousneſs of the Journey, and loathing Manna, were bitten by fiery Serpents ſent by God (the Greeks call them Dypſades, and Ælian maketh them chiefly to breed in Arabia;) ſo that many periſhed without Remedy. At length, Moſes by God's Appointment erected on a Pole a brazen Serpent, upon which as many as looked, were preſently made whole.

Chap. 33, & 34.

11. From Tſalmona they came to Punon, thence to Oboth, and ſo to Jie-Abarim, on the Borders of Moab, in the Deſart thereof, towards the Sun-riſing. Here runneth the Brook Zared, towards which, when they paſſed, God commanded them not to make War upon the Moabites, who had formerly beaten hence Giants called Emmim, as their Brethren the Ammonites had alſo outed others, known by the name of Zamzummim. Thirty eight years after their Removal from Kades-barnea, the Iſraelites paſſed Zared, all the Carkeiſes of the rebellious being in that ſpace fallen in the Wilderneſs, and came to their thirty ninth Manſion of Dikon-Gad. Thence they travelled to Almon-Diblathaim, ſtill in the Deſart of Moab, and being to touch upon the Borders of the Ammonites, God forbad them to moleſt theſe alſo, becauſe deſcended of juſt Lot. He commanded them to paſs over the River Arnon; which having done, they removed to their 41 Manſion, in the Mountain of Abraim, over rgainſt Nebo.

12. Out

Sect. 2.

Sihon King of Heſhbon.

Og King of Baſhan.

Deut. 11. Numb. 21. Antiq. lib. 4. cap. 5. Numb. 22.

12. Out of the Wilderneſs of Kedemoth, Moſes ſent to Sihon, the Amorite, King of Heſhbon, to deſire Leave peaceably to paſs through his Borders; but he refuſed, and oppoſed them at Jahaz, where he was diſcomfited and ſlain. The Iſraelites thus became Maſters of his Cities and Country, which (as Joſephus writeth) lay like an Iſland between three Rivers; Arnon on the South, Jabock on the North, (which falling into Jordan, loſeth it's Name) and Jordan it ſelf on the Weſt; being on the Eaſt bounded with the Mountains of Arabia. As they proceeded by the way of Baſan, Og King thereof, who remained of the Giants called Rephidim, oppoſing them, was alſo ſlain, and his Country wholly ſubdued, with the Deſtruction of its Inhabitants; and in like manner all Argob (afterwards called Trachonitis,) wherein were ſixty Cities. After theſe Victories, they removed from the Mountains of Abarim, and came to their forty ſecond and laſt Manſion (taken up by Moſes) near Jordan, lying from Jeſimoth unto Shittim, or Abel-Shittim, in the Plains of Moab, which was ſo called, becauſe the Moabites formerly poſſeſſed them, till driven beyond Arnon by the Amorites. Here they continued till they were led thence by Joſhua, to paſs over Jordan.

Balaam.

By his Advice the People drawn to Idolatry.

Numb. 22, 23, 24. Chap. 1 Cor. 10. Numb. 26.

13. When Balack King of Moab had heard all that the Iſraelites did to the Amorites; leſt under Pretence of Paſſage, they might alſo ſeize upon his Kingdom, he conſulted with the Midianites, and ſent into Meſopotamia for Balaam the Son of Beor, the Soothſayer, to come and curſe them; intending afterwards, to fall upon them. Balaam, having the Pleaſure of God revealed to him, at firſt feared to come: and though he came at the ſecond Meſſage, and laboured all he could to curſe them; yet was he over-ruled, and his Curſe turned into a Bleſſing. But although he had no Power to curſe, yet he adviſed the King to that which tended eſpecially to their Deſtruction; to ſend ſome of the moſt beautiful Women into the Camp, to draw them both to Carnal and Spiritual Fornication; the latter of which was committed with Baal-peor, the Idol of the Moabites. God being angry hereat, commanded the Principal of the Idolaters to be hanged up before the Sun, and Moſes gave order to the Judges, to ſlay every one his men: A Plague alſo brake out amongſt them, whereby in one day, fell 23000 Men: to which thoſe that were hanged and fell by the Sword, being added, advance the number to 24000. Phineas the Son of Eliazar the Prieſt executing Judgment upon Zimri an Iſraelite, and Cozbi a Madianitiſh Woman, in the Act of Fornication; the Wrath of God was thereby appeaſed, and the Plague ſtayed.

Moſes numbereth the People.

Balaam ſlain.

The Land beyond Jordan divided.

Chap. 31. Chap. 32.

14. A little after, God commanded Moſes the third time to number the People. In this Space of 40 years all the men of War were periſhed, except Caleb and Joſhua, which amounted to the number of 603000. Yet was there by this time ſuch a Supply of young ones grown up, that they almoſt equalized the number of their Fathers; there being found 601730, from twenty years old and upwards, beſides 23000 Levites, reckoned from a Moneth old. After this, Moſes, by Gods Command, ſent Phineas with 12000 men againſt the Midianites, who had conſpired with the Moabites againſt them. He deſtroyed them, and amongſt them Balaam the Soothſayer, who, as it appeareth, was not yet returned. The Women they brought away Captives; whereof the married ones they ſlew, and kept the Virgins for themſelves. Now were the Lands of Sihon King of the Amorites, and Og King of Baſhan, divided amongſt the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manaſſes, on this Condition, that they ſhould accompany their Brethren over the River Jordan, and aſſiſt them in the Conqueſt of the Land of Canaan, ſo long as need ſhould require.

Moſes dieth.

Deut. 1, &c. Deut. ult. A. M. 2548. Antiq. l. 4.

15. The time now drew near, that Moſes muſt dye, being not to paſs over into the Land of Canaan. Therefore in the eleventh Moneth of the fortieth year, he made a Repetition of the Law to the People, related God's Benefits beſtowed on them, and exhorted them to Obedience. The Law he wrote in a Book, and commanded it to be read every ſeventh year, at the Feaſt of Tabernacles. He alſo, at the Command of God, wrote a Song concerning the future Idolatry, and Afflictions of the Iſraelites. Joſhua being then ordained Captain of the People in his ſtead, he aſcended from the Plains of Moab to Mount Nebo, part of the Mountains of Abarim, and whoſe Top is called Phaſga or Piſgah, looking towards Jericho. There God having ſhewn him the Land of Canaan, from the one ſide to the other, he died ſome five Moneths after Aaron, being 120 years old (the third part of which time, ſaving one Moneth, he ſpent, as Joſephus writeth, in Government) in the fortieth year ending, after he had brought the Iſraelites out of Ægypt, the year of the World 2548. God buried him in the Valley of Moab over againſt Beth-Peor, and no man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day. Concerning his Body, a Conteſt hapned between Michael the Arch-Angel and the Devil; the reaſon of which is thought to be, becauſe Satan would have had the place thereof known, that the People might be drawn to Idolatry out of Reverence to ſo great a Perſon. The Iſraelites mourned for him thirty days, and with his Life endeth the Pentateuch, or his five Books. The Book of Joſhua followeth, taking it's Beginning from the 41 of the Departure out of Ægypt, and the 2549*th* year of the World.

Joſh. 1, 2, 3, 4. Chapters.

The Iſraelites paſs over Jordan into the Land of Canaan.

A. M. 2549. ineunte Chap. 5.

16. Whilſt the Iſraelites were ſtill mourning for Moſes, the two Spies were ſent over Jordan, (as ſome think) to ſearch the Land. The next morning after their Return, the whole Hoſt removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, where they lodged that night, and the next day paſſed over the River. As ſoon as the Feet of the Prieſts which bare the Ark touched the Water, it fell off on both ſides, and made a way; ſo that they went over on dry Ground, the Floods not returning to their place, ſo long as the Ark remained in the Chanel. On the tenth day of the firſt Moneth Niſan, they arrived in the Land of Canaan, and took up their firſt Manſion at Gilgal, not far from Jericho. Here (it's thought the next day) God commanded that all the Males ſhould be circumciſed, this Sacrament being omitted ever ſince they left Mount Sinai; becauſe they were in conſtant expectation of Travel: upon which account neither had they kept the Paſſeover ſince that time. Three days they reſted, and on the fourth they did eat the Paſſeover, and the day following unleavened Bread of the Corn of the Land, at which time Manna ceaſed, after it had continued forty years.

Chap. 6.

Jericho deſtroyed.

Chap. 7, 8, 9.

Chap. 10.

The Sun and Moon ſtand ſtill.

Codomannus.

17. The firſt place they fell upon with War, was the City of Jericho, which having compaſſed with the Ark ſeven days, on the ſeventh the Walls fell down of their own Accord, the City was taken, and all therein put to the Sword, except the Family of Rahab (ſhe, having harboured the Spies, had Security promiſed from them) whom Salmon of the Tribe of Judah married, to whom ſhe bare Boaz. All the Goods found therein were alſo accurſed, nothing thereof to be made Prey; which Law Achan tranſgreſſing, cauſed Iſrael to be diſcomfited at Ai, and for that was firſt ſtoned, and then burnt, with all that belonged to him. The Kings of Canaan, ſtartled at Joſua's Succeſs, combined againſt him; but the Gibeonites, fearing the worſt, counterfeited a Meſſage to him as from a far Country, and procured ſafety to themſelves and Poſterity; yet ſuch as ſlavery was joyned therewith. Adoniſedeck King of Jeruſalem, and the Kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachiſh, and Deber, enraged hereat, conſpired againſt them and fell upon their City; to the Relief whereof Joſhua being called, raiſed the Siege, and proſecuting his Victory againſt the Kings, at his Command the Sun ſtood ſtill over Gibeon, and the Moon in the Valley of Ajalon. Upon which ſtrange miraculous accident this is obſerved, that Ajalon being ſcarce a German Mile Weſtward off Gibeon, the Moon, as 'tis probable, was then decreaſing, or in the Wane, and theſe two Luminaries ſtanding ſtill and moving together, the aſtronomical Account was thereby nothing at all diſturbed.

Joſhua vanquiſheth the Kings.

Chap. 11, &c.

In Vandalius.

18. Joſhua drave the five Kings to that Streight that they hid themſelves in a Cave at Makkeda, where after he had utterly vanquiſhed and deſtroyed their Armies, he took them, and killing them, hanged their Carcaſes on five Trees till Sun-ſet: then caſt them into the Cave and laid a great Heap of Stones thereon. After their Death he warred with many other petty Kings, as with the King of Libnah, Lachiſh, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and the reſt: there was not one City that made Peace with Iſrael, ſave the Hivites, the Inhabitants of Gibeon; all others they took in Battel, and utterly deſtroyed, except ſuch as it pleaſed God to reſerve, for a Laſh and Scourge, wherewith to reduce them in times of Rebellion and for their Exerciſe to be as Thorns in their Eyes, and Goads in their Sides. The Canaanites being thus deprived of their ancient Habitation by Joſhua and the Iſraelites; Many of them, as is conjectured, removing to the Mediterranean-Sea, (where they were known afterwards by the name of Phœnicians) continued not all there, but ſpread themſelves abroad, and ſent Colonies far and wide into many Places of Europe, Aſia, and Africk, concerning which that excellent Book of Bochartus, called Canaan, is to be conſulted. That is remarkable, which Procopius mentioneth concerning Pillars erected in the Province of Africk, called Tingitana, with a Phœnician-Inſcription to this Purpoſe: We are they who fled from the Face of Joſhua the Robber, the Son of Nane. How

Sect. 2.

How long this War continued till the Diviſion of the Land, is not expreſſed in Scripture; yet is thence to be gathered. For Caleb being forty years old, when with others he was ſent by Moſes to ſearch the Land, was at the time of the Diviſion, as he ſaith, forty five years older. Now the Spies were ſent out in the fifth Moneth of the ſecond year, after their Departure out of Ægypt, or ſooner; ſo that from that time to the Entrance into Canaan, followed almoſt 39 years; (the Iſraelites being fourty years in the Wilderneſs) which being deducted out of the ſaid forty five, ſix years and ſome few, Remain; during which, the War in Canaan muſt have continued.

The Clerouchia, or Diviſion of the Land.

19. The Clerouchia then, or Diviſion of the Land, fell out in the Beginning of the ſeventh year from their Entrance into Canaan, and in the year of the World 2555 alſo beginning. It continued about one year, as ſome gather from the Story. First of all, an Inheritance was given to two Tribes and an half, viz. The Tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manaſſes. Then met the Iſraelites together in Shiloh, becauſe ſeven other Tribes yet remained undiſpoſed of. Therefore certain men were ſent from that place to bring a Survey of all the Land, which could not be done in a few days; and then, after their Return the Diviſion was perfected; for all which no leſs than the ſpace of a year ſeemeth neceſſary. So, there are from the Beginning of the World to the end of this Diviſion, 2555 years, containing juſt ſo many Weeks of Years, as there are natural Days in the year, viz. 365. Or if we make a great year conſiſting of ſo many years as the ſolar Year conſiſteth of Days; then have we ſix (or ſeven) ſuch great years. It is further obſervable, that from the Beginning of the World, to the Entrance of the Iſraelites into Canaan may be reckoned ſo many Jubilies of years (viz. 52.) as are Days in the ſeventh part of a Solar year, one only excepted. The War having endured ſix years, they reſted on the ſeventh, wherein the Diviſion was made, as in the Sabbatical year.

A. M. 2555.

Chap. 14, 15, &c.

Vide Ludov. Capellum in Chronol. Sacr.

The Riſe of Sabbatical years and Jubilies.

20. The Riſe therefore, and Beginning of the Sabbatical year, and of Jubilies, ſome chuſe rather to fetch from the firſt Entrance into Canaan, than from the Diviſion of the Land. For though they began not to ſow the Land on this ſide Jordan till after the Diviſion; yet before this, had they taken Poſſeſſion of the Country lying beyond the River, which was divided betwixt the two Tribes and the half; whereof, though it muſt be granted that thoſe which were fit for War, accompanied their Brethren over Jordan, according to the Charge laid upon them by Moſes, yet it is to be ſuppoſed that thoſe which ſtayed behind were nouriſhed by the Fruits of that Soil. For Manna had already ceaſed, and the Corn which the other reaped of the Enemies ſowing being but gotten by Degrees, according as they conquered the Country, could ſcarce maintain them without ſending for Supplies to thoſe that ſtayed beyond the River. When they had ended the Diviſion, the Children of Iſrael gave for an Inheritance to Joſhua that which he asked, even Timneth Serah in Mount Ephraim, where he built a City, and dwelt therein. The Tabernacle of the Congregation was ſet up at Shiloh by the whole Aſſembly. As for the Levites they had no Inheritance aſſigned them, but (the Lord being their Inheritance) they were to live of Tythes and Offerings. Only 48 Cities on both ſides of Jordan, were ſet apart for them to dwell in, which were alſo to be Cities of Refuge, whither thoſe that were guilty of caſual Homicide might fly from the Avenger of Blood, and there remain in Security till the Death of the High prieſt. Joſhua being very old at the Diviſion, is by the Jews ſaid to have lived paſt the firſt Sabbatical year, but to have died before the next arrived. Some give to this Government 20 years, and ſome above; but others think he died, not long after the Diviſion. There is no Certainty thereof from Scripture; but that he lived a hundred and ten years is expreſly recorded.

Joſh. 18.

Chap. 20.

Joſhua dieth.

Chap. 24. v. 29. Judge ii. 8.

The Iſraelites fall to Idolatry.

21. After Joſhua and that Generation were dead, which had ſeen the Wonders of the Lord, another aroſe after them, that knew not the Lord, nor the Works he had done; ſo that the Children of Iſrael followed other Gods, ſerving Baal and Aſhtaroth. For this Cauſe the Anger of the Lord was hot againſt Iſrael, and he delivered them into the hands of Spoilers which ſpoiled them. He ſold them into the hands of their Enemies round about, inſomuch that they could not ſtand before them; but whitherſoever they went out, the Hand of the Lord was againſt them for Evil, as he had ſaid and ſworn. Nevertheleſs he raiſed them up Judges to deliver them out of the hands of thoſe that ſpoiled them; and yet they would not hearken to their Judges, but went a whoring after other Gods, and bowed themſelves unto them. Hereupon the Lord reſolved not to drive out thenceforth any Nations before them, which Joſhua left when he died, that that by them he might prove Iſrael whether they would keep his way, and to teach them War. There were left five Lords of the Philiſtines with all the Canaanites, the Sidonians and Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal Hermon, unto the entring of Hamath. The Children of Iſrael dwelt amongſt the Canaanites, Hittites, Ammorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebuſites: They took their Daughters to be their Wives, gave their Daughters to their Sons, and ſerved their Gods.

Chap. 3.

Cuſhan oppreſſeth them.

Verſ. 8.

22. For this, the Anger of the Lord was hot againſt Iſrael, and he ſold them to the hand of Cuſhan-riſhathaim King of Meſopotamia. How long this was after the Diviſion, the Scripture expreſſeth not. We read that he oppreſſed them eight years, but ſome think it ſhould be read in the eighth year, viz. after the Diviſion, or eighth years, becauſe this Servitude ended in the eight. But that it began not immediately after the Diviſion, neither after the Death of Joſhua, ſeemeth evident, becauſe the Iſraelites ſerved the Lord as long as that Generation laſted which had ſeen his Wonders; which cannot be conceived extinct at the ſame time with him. Others think a longer time than ſeven years to have paſſed betwixt the Diviſion and this Oppreſſion, aſſigning fourteen years to the Government of Joſhua after the Diviſion, then ten more to the Government of the Elders after his Death, who might very well live longer than ſo; none that were twenty years old when they came out of Ægypt having entred Canaan, except Joſhua and Caleb. After that, as many years they attribute to an Anarchy, in the ſixth year of which they will have the Civil War to have broken out betwixt Benjamin and the reſt of the Tribes, wherein all the Benjaminites, except ſix hundred, were ſlain. Four years after this War, and at the end of the tenth, Cuſhan the King of Meſopotamia afflicted Iſrael for its Idolatry eight years. But concerning this there is no Certainty.

Lud. Cappellus.

Jacobus Cappellus.

Judg. 20.

Othniel delivereth them.

Judg. Chap. 3.

23. At the end of the eight years, God ſtirred up for a Deliverer, Othniel of the Tribe of Judah, Nephew to Caleb by his younger Brother Kenaz, and his Son-in-law. Into his hands the Lord delivered Cuſhan, and the Land had reſt forty years. After his Death (which is ſet to the end of theſe forty years) Iſrael turned again to Idolatry, and the Lord delivered them up to Eglon, King of Moab, for eighteen years. At the end of this Term he ſtirred up Ehud a left-handed man of the Tribe of Benjamin, who under Colour of a Meſſage ſtabbed Eglon into the Belly, and gathering the Iſraelites together on Mount Ephraim, ſlew 10000 of the Moabites, all men of War. After this, the Land is ſaid to have reſted eighty years, the words being taken literally; but then ſome think none of the years of the Tyrants or Oppreſſors, are to be counted ſeverally, and by themſelves, but to be included herein as other years after mentioned; elſe the Account will ſwell much larger than the whole number of years which the Scripture ſeemeth to allow of. If we take in all the years aſcribed to the Tyrants, then they will have it an Enallage (frequent in all Languages) and inſtead of 80, Ehud governed, or the Land reſted under him only eight years; but others think they have as much reaſon to take them literally.

Eglon oppreſſeth them.

Delivered by Ehud.

Shamgar judgeth Iſrael.

Chap. 4.

24. After Ehud, Shamgar the Son of Aneth judged Iſrael, but no mention is made of any time. It followeth, when Ehud was dead, the Children of Iſrael did Evil again in the ſight of the Lord, and he ſold them into the hand of Jabin, King of Canaan, whoſe General was Siſera, and who had 900 Chariots of Iron: he mightily oppreſſed them twenty years. It is moſt probable that in this time the Government of Shamgar was included, (he ſlew with an Oxe-goad 600 of the Philiſtines, who at this time might alſo afflict Iſrael) or elſe it being but ſhort might fall betwixt Ehud's Death, and the Oppreſſion of Jabin; there being Probability enough that ſome time paſſed after his Death, before the Iſraelites ſo highly provoked the Lord as to be given up into Jabin's hands. At the end of theſe twenty years Deborah, the Wife of Lapidoth (judging Iſrael at this time in Mount Ephraim) moved by God, ſent for Barak the Son of Abinoam from Kadeſh-Naphtali, and made him Captain. He, with 10000 men of Zebulon and Naphtali, overthrew Siſera, who flying on his Feet to the Tent of Heber the Kenite (deſcended of Jethro, Father-in-law to Moſes) Jael his Wife killed him, by a Nail driven into his Temples as he lay aſleep. So the Land reſted under Deborah forty years, as we read it, another interpreting it in the fortieth year, viz. after the Reſt reſtored to it by Ehud.

Jabin oppreſſeth them. And the Philiſtines.

Deborah and Barach deliver them.

Uſher.

Jud. 6.

The Midianites oppreſs them.

25. This time expired, and the Iſraelites relapſing to Idolatry, God gave them up into the hands of the Midianites, and other People of the Eaſt, which afflicted them ſeven years, deſtroying their Corn, driving away their Cattel, and making Havock of all things. This made them cry to the Lord, who firſt reproved them

Sect. 2.

Gideon delivereth them.

Chap. 7. Chap. 8.

by a Prophet; and afterwards, by an Angel ſtirred up Gideon, the Son of Joaſh, of the Tribe of Manaſſes, to deliver them. He having pulled down the Altar of Baal, and burnt his Grove, out of 23000 men choſe 300. with which number marching againſt the Midianites, he ſo affrighted them by a Stratagem of Lamps and Pitchers, that he routed their whole Army. The Ephraimites took Oreb and Zeeb: Gideon following the Chace beyond Jordan wholly diſcomfited them, and took, and ſlew two Kings of the Midianites; Zeba and Zalmanna. After ſo great a Victory the Iſraelites offered him the Kingdom; but he refuſed it, and asked only the Earings of the Prey, wherewith he made an Ephod, which afterwards gave Occaſion to Idolatry (all Iſrael going a whoring after it) and became a Snare to him and his Houſe. But thus Midian being ſubdued, the Country was in Quietneſs under Gideon forty years, as moſt read it; but, as others, was quiet in the fourth year; viz. after Quietneſs reſtored to it by Deborah and Barach.

Abimelech his Son maketh himſelf King.

Chap. 9.

26. Though Gideon refuſed the Sovereignty, yet Abimelech his baſe Son thinking ſuch a thing was not to be neglected, dealt with the Sichemites, of whoſe City his Mother was Native, to make him King: and by their Help he ſeized on the Kingdom, having ſlain his ſeventy Brethren upon one Stone; Jotham the youngeſt only eſcaping. The Iſraelites, after Gideon's Death, had again turned after Idols, and therefore God not only ſubjected them to the Dominion of this moſt wicked of all Parricides, but to inteſtine Diſſentions, by reaſon of him. For after he had tyrannized three years, Gaal with the Sichemites conſpired againſt him, which having timely diſcovered, he deſtroyed them and their City (ſowing it with Salt) and burnt the houſe of their God Berith, with a thouſand Men and Women which had fled to it. Then went he againſt Thebez, and took it, the Inhabitants whereof retired for Defence into a ſtronger Tower. Here, as he was about to ſet Fire to the Door, a Woman caſt down a Piece of a Mill-ſtone upon his Head, and ſo brake his Skull, and he cauſed his Armour-bearer to kill him, leſt it ſhould be ſaid, that he died by the hands of a Woman. After his Death, Tolah, the Son of Puah, the Son of Dodo, a man of Iſſachar, that dwelt at Samir in Ephraim, aroſe to defend Iſrael, and judged it twenty three years. After him Jair a Gileadite 22 years, thought to be deſcended of that Jair who took the Towns of Argob, and called them after himſelf Hanoth-Jair; as his thirty Sons in like manner, after that Example, named ſo many Cities, which they poſſeſſed in the Land of Gilead.

Tolah judgeth Iſrael.

Chap. 10.

Jair.

Judg. 10. ver. 8, 9.

The Philiſtines and Ammonites oppreſs Iſrael.

27. Jair being dead, the Iſraelites returned to their evil Courſes, ſerving Balaam, Aſhtaroth, the Gods of the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Philiſtines; for which God ſold them into the hands of the Philiſtines and Ammonites. It is written, And that Year they oppreſſed the Children of Iſrael eighteen Years, all that were on the other ſide Jordan, in the Land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. Moreover, the Ammonites paſſed over Jordan, to fight alſo againſt Judah and Benjamin, and the houſe of Ephraim; ſo that all Iſrael was ſore diſtreſſed. Some will have this Oppreſſion but to begin at the Death of Jair; others think, they had oppreſſed Iſrael eighteen years before, and now paſſed over the River, to afflict the other Tribes. The Iſraelites cried to God, and being reproved, put away their Idols: hereupon, the Ammonites being got together in Gilead, and the Iſraelites aſſembled in Mizpah in the ſame Country, Jepthah the Son of Gilead, begotten on an Harlot, was ſent for by the Gileadites and made Captain, being a mighty man of Valour: He firſt ſent to expoſtulate with the King of Ammon, and to demand the Cauſe of the War. He anſwered, it was becauſe Iſrael took away his Land, when they came out of Ægypt, from Arnon unto Jabbock, and unto Jordan; of which he required Reſtitution. Jepthah replyed, that in their Journey from Ægypt, they ſent to the Kings of Edom and Moab, to deſire Paſſage through their Coaſts; but this being denied, they turned aſide through the Wilderneſs, and compaſſed about the Lands of Edom and Moab, not coming within the Borders of Moab, and ſo at length came and pitched on the other ſide of Arnon, which was the Limit of Moab's Coaſts; Then, that Sihon King of the Amorites denying them Paſſage, and fighting againſt them, the Lord God of Iſrael delivered him into their hands: and they poſſeſſed the Land of the Amorites from Arnon unto Jabbock, and from the Wilderneſs unto Jordan.

Chap. 11.

28. Seeing the God of Iſrael had diſpoſſeſſed the Amorites, he demanded a Reaſon, why he ſhould poſſeſs that Country; and whether he was any thing better than Balack the Son of Zippor, King of Moab, who never ſtrove nor fought againſt Iſrael. Laſtly, he asked him, why he recovered not the Land all the 300 years which the Children of Iſrael had enjoyed it, and appealed to God for righteous Judgment betwixt them. Theſe 300 years, if they be reckoned exactly, the years of the Oppreſſions, and of the Judges, muſt all along be counted in Length, without including the one in the other; but if this be done, ſtill many more than 300 will be found, and a hundred years more will ariſe in the Account of time, from the Coming out of Ægypt to the Building of the Temple, than the Scripture in another Place alloweth of. Some ſay, if ſo many years really paſſed, betwixt the laſt year of Moſes, ſave one, and this time of Jepthah, as thoſe Succeſſions do make; 400 years was rather to have been mentioned, ſeeing the number exceeded that of 300; and therefore accounting the other way ſhort of 300, they alledge, that it is uſual, when a full or round Number is choſen, rather to make Uſe of that which moſt favoureth their Cauſe; and therefore Jepthah meant by 300, about, or almoſt ſo many. On the contrary, others believe, that the Scripture doth not ſuffer them to omit the years of Servitude, and contain them under thoſe of the Judges, which they ſuppoſe clearly appeareth out of thoſe words before mentioned, which in General deſcribe the Condition of the Iſraelites, as ſucceſſively guilty of Idolatry, then puniſhed, and delivered; after which, falling into an Anarchy at the Death of their Deliverer, they again relapſed into the ſame Sin. They will have alſo the particular Accounts of theſe things in Scripture, by their Order and Diſtinction, to hold out no leſs unto us. Judg. 11. 18.

Jeptha overthroweth the Ammonites.

29. But the King of the Ammonites not hearkening to Jepthah, was overthrown with a very great Slaughter. Jepthah at his going forth, vowed, if the Lord would deliver the Enemy into his hands, that whatſoever came firſt out of his Houſe to meet him at his Return, ſhould ſurely be the Lord's, and he would offer it for a Burnt-offering. It hapned that his only Daughter came out to meet him with Timbrels and Dances; and after ſhe had bewailed her Virginity, he is ſaid to have done to her according to his Vow. Some obſerve that for And in the place may be read Or, as if, he would offer the thing, if it were to be offered, or, however to conſecrate it to the Lord. And their Opinion ſeemeth moſt probable, who hold ſhe was not offered up as a Burnt-offering, but conſecrated by perpetual Virginity and Auſterity of Life, being altogether ſeparated from Humane Society, except four days in a year, for a little Refreſhment; it being ſaid, that he executed his Vow upon her, for that he did not redeem her with Money, according to the Law mentioned in Exodus, but left her conſecrated to God in an unmarried State, leſt ſhe ſhould ſeem to be another's and not the Lord's. Chap. ult. Jepthah, after this, warred againſt the Ephraimites, who ſpake againſt, and threatned him and his Houſe. Judg. 12. He cut off forty two thouſand Men, all being ſlain in their Paſſage over Jordan, that could not pronounce Shiboleth. Having judged Iſrael ſix years, he died, and was buried in Gilead.

Abzon. Elon. Abdon Judges. The Philiſtines vex Iſrael.

30. After Jepthah aroſe Ibſan of Bethlehem, and judged Iſrael ſeven years, then Elon a Zebulonite ten, and Abdon the Son of Hillel a Pirathonite, after him eight years. Now the Philiſtines again vexed Iſrael forty years. Seeing neither of theſe three are ſaid to have delivered the Land, ſome think thoſe forty years, to have included ſome of Their Government. There are that fetch the Beginning of them from the fourth year of Ibſan, and end them at the Death of Sampſon, whom they will have the immediate Succeſſor of Abdon. Of thoſe that are for the lengthening out of the time, ſome think they are to be reckoned from the Death of Sampſon. Abdon, and end at the Beginning of Sampſon's Government, which others again Uſher. inferr, by good Arguments, to be included in them, or elſe twenty of them muſt fall in with the time of Eli; the ſeventy Interpreters accordingly, giving to Eli not forty years, as the Hebrew Copies, but only twenty. Still there are not wanting, who think Eli to have ſucceeded Abdon, and Sampſon's 20 years (who was yet unborn) to have been included in his 40. They fetch the Riſe of the forty years of the Oppreſſion, from ſeventeen years before the Beginning of Eli, and end them ſo many after his Death. Sampſon was a Nazarite from his Mothers Womb, no Razor coming on his Head, and keeping himſelf from Wine and ſtrong Drink all his time. Hence, as his admirable Strength is ſaid to have lain in his Hair, ſo others have aſcribed it to his Abſtinency, as if it had not proceeded from the eſpecial Providence and Power of God. He was the Hercules of the Iſraelites, really performing ſuch things as the Greeks would ſcarce attribute to their's, on whom yet they heaped thoſe things that were done by many. He afflicted the Philiſtines much in his Life, but much more at his Death, by throwing down the Houſe of Dagon upon the chief of them, being therein aſſembled to make themſelves Sport with ſo great an Adverſary, whom having got into their Power, they had deprived of his Sight.

Eli.

31. Had Eli preceded Sampſon, he would have been reckoned amongſt his Predeceſſors; according to general Apprehenſion. The High-prieſt-hood which hitherto had continued in the Family of Eliazar for five Generations, (viz. in himſelf, Phineas, Abiſna, Bukki, and Uzzi, according to Joſephus) was in Eli tranſlated to that of Ithamar, another of Aaron's Sons. The Sons of Eli being very lewd, grievouſly abuſed their Power, and he uſed not his Authority in Correcting them, whereby he ſo far incurred Gods Diſpleaſure, that he threatned to deſtroy his houſe; as it came to paſs. The Iſraelites, towards the end of his forty years, fought with the Philiſtines, but were worſted, and loſt four thouſand men. To better their Succeſs, they then ſent for the Ark of God from Shiloh, promiſing to themſelves Victory in it's Preſence; but of the next Battel the Iſſue was the ſame. Hophni and Phineas the Sons of Eli were ſlain, and the Ark taken. This News being brought to Eli, upon mention of the Captivity of the Ark, he fell backward from a Seat, and being 98 years old, his Neck brake. The Philiſtines placed the Ark in the houſe of their God Dagon, which Idol fell down twice before it; and the Multitude was ſo plagued with the Hæmorrhoides, that they were glad to return it back with Preſents.

1 Sam. 2, 3, 4. Chap.

The Ark taken.

Returned.

Samuel.

ἔτεσι τετρακοσίοις.

32. To Eli ſucceeded Samuel, both a Levite and a Prophet, to whoſe Government, from the Diviſion of the Land, paſſed 450 years, according to St. Paul, as the Text of Luke now hath it. But to this Place another in the firſt Book of the * Kings, expreſly ſeemeth to contradict, which maketh the Foundation of the Temple to be laid in the 480*th* year after the Iſraelites Departure out of Ægypt. This later number exceeded the other but by 30. although in it muſt be comprehended, beſides what is in the former, the forty years of their Stay in the Wilderneſs, the ſix years which paſſed before the Diviſion, the time of Samuel's Government, the Reigns of Saul and David, with the three years of Solomon, that paſſed before the Building of the Temple; all which make up the number of 129; ſo that the literal Senſes of theſe two cannot ſtand together: Some go about to reconcile them by drawing down the Beginning of the 480 years, lower than the Text will bear; and by removing that of the 450, higher than is convenient: to whom others joyn, in attempting the Reconciliation both of thoſe Numbers, and clearing up the matter concerning the 300 years aſcribed by Jepthah, to the Poſſeſſion of the Land of the Amorites before mentioned. But there are, who find a Neceſſity of confeſſing a Miſtake, either in the one or other Copie of theſe Places. Theſe are divided in their Opinions; one Party thinking they have better Reaſon to ſtick to the Place of the Kings, which is not ſo liable to any Corruption (through the great Care of the Jews) as the Greek Text hath that, by Reaſon of the Similitude of Words, might well be changed from one to another, through the Ignorance of Tranſcribers. Another will have the 450 years to belong to the Diviſion of the Land, and not to the Judges: all which have been miſtaken through the wrong Reading of the words.

Acts 13. 10.
* Chap. 6. 1.

From τριακοσίοις to τετρακοσίοις.

33. Others both of ancient and modern times, are very confident, that, all conſidered, the Fault muſt fall upon that Place of the Kings, which giveth but 480 years, to all that time that paſſed from the Departure out of Ægypt to the founding of the Temple; and that, inſtead of 480, 580 was anciently written. For when any one Place diſagreeth with the whole Series of Hiſtory, clearly held out elſewhere, it is rather to be corrected in its number (which may eaſily be altered by a Miſtake of one Word) than many Places wreſted to a Compliance with it. Now all the times of the Anarchies, Liberty, War and Servitude, of the Iſraelites laid together, without Confuſion of years (for which there is no ground at all,) clearly hold out a hundred years more than this Place of the Kings; and ſo exactly from the ſeveral Particulars make it up, that it ſeemeth to take away all Doubt. From the Departure out of Ægypt to Moſes his Death, intervened 40 years; thence to the Beginning of Othniel 34. whereof 26 are given to the Government of Joſhua and the Elders, and eight to the Servitude under Cuſhan. Then Othniel governed 40 years, the Oppreſſion of the Moabites followed for eighteen. Ahud ruled 80. The Canaanites tyrannized 20. Deborah and Barak governed 40. the Madianites oppreſſed the Iſraelites 7. thence Gideon judged Iſrael 40. Abimelech reigned 3. Tolah 23. Jair 22. and then the Ammonites oppreſſed Iſrael 18. All which numbers amount to 385 years. After this, Jepthah judged Iſrael 6 years, Ibzan 7. Elon 10. Abdon 8. the Philiſtines vexed Iſrael 40. and Heli ruled 40. which make up the Sum of 111 years. Then Samuel and Saul governed 40 years (as will be ſeen) ſeen) David alſo 40. and S*olomon* 3. before the Foundation of the Temple was laid, which make up 83 years. Now all theſe numbers laid together amount exactly to 579 years, to which if the fourth year of Solomon be added, wherein the Temple was founded, there ariſeth the full number of 580. They perceive therefore it was not without Reaſon that ſo many of the Ancients diſſented from that Place of the Kings, which might alſo be lyable enough to the Careleſsneſs of Scribes. According to this Account, Students in Hiſtory and Chronology are to take Notice that a hundred years are to be added to the more ordinary Æra of the World.

Uſſerius Chronologiæ Sacræ. Cap. 12.

Vide Gerard. Joh. Voſſii Iſag. Chronol. Diſſert. 8.

1 Sam. 7.

The Philiſtines overthrown.

Chap. 8.

Chap. 11.

The Iſraelites deſire a King.

Saul is King.

Hoſea 13.

34. In the days of Samuel, the Philiſtines grievouſly afflicted Iſrael, till ſuch time as by his means, the People being turned to the Lord caſt off their Idols, and ſolemnly repented at Mizpah: Hereat God was pleaſed to ſpare them, and thundring upon the Philiſtines, when they were ready to joyn Battel, diſcomfited them utterly, and ſo terrified them that they forſook the Cities formerly ſeized on, leaving only one Garriſon in the Country; and no more afflicted the Children of Iſrael ſo long as Samuel had the chief Power in his Hands. When he grew old he made his Sons Judges over the Land; who perverting Juſtice by Bribery, the People thence gladly took Occaſion to deſire a King, that in Government they might be conformable to other Nations, Their moſt urgent Reaſons were, for that the Philiſtines yet kept an Hold in their Country, and Nahaſh the King of the Ammonites threatned them with War; at which they were ſo affrighted, that neither truſting in God's Providence (who hitherto had been their King, and Avenger) nor to the Juſtice and Prudence of Samuel, would they be ſatisfied, or put off without a King. God therefore gave unto them Saul the Son of Kiſh of the Tribe of B*enjamin*.

1 Sam. 7. 2.

35. In the Book of Samuel no certain years are either given to his own Government, or to that of S*aul*, but it ſeemeth probable from Scripture that he governed about twenty years alone, from the Death of Eli to the Election of S*aul*. For it is ſaid, that the Ark of God abode in Kiriath-jearim twenty years; and that, the time being long, all the houſe of Iſrael lamented before the Lord at Mizpeh; which Paſſages are joyned unto the ſerious Exhortation of S*amuel* to move them to Repentance. So then the end of twenty years, the Exhortation, their Repentance hereupon, and their moving for a King, with good Reaſon ſeem to have been about the ſame time; ſo that 20 or 21 years and an half are to be given to his Government, which began at Eli's Death. Now Heli died when the Ark was taken; which ſtaying ſeven Moneths in the Land of the Philiſtines was then ſent away and came to B*ethſhemeſh*, where the Inhabitants loſing 50610 of their number, for their Curioſity of looking into it, ſent Meſſengers to thoſe of Kiriath-jearim to fetch it unto them, with whom it remained twenty years; and theſe years the Iſraelites counted along.

Chap. 10.

Chap. 11.

Raiſeth the Siege at Jabeſh-Gilead.

Chap. 13. &c.

David anointed.

36. Saul was firſt by Samuel privately anointed, and afterwards publickly declared King at Mizpah. Not long after (a moneth it's thought) Jabeſh-Gilead was beſieged by Nahaſh, who refuſed to grant Peace to the Inhabitants upon any other Terms than to put out all their right Eyes, and lay this for a Reproach upon Iſrael. They deſired Truce but for ſeven days; in which Space, if no Relief came they promiſed to come out to him. But Saul, hearing of their Diſtreſs, got together an Army of 300000 of Iſrael, and 30000 of Judah, with which he eaſily overthrew the Ammonites, and raiſed the Siege. Hereupon, at the Procurement of Samuel, the People again met at G*ilgal*, where the Kingdom was eſtabliſhed, and confirmed unto S*aul*: at which time S*amuel*, upbraiding them with their Unthankfulneſs to God and him, terrified them with Thunder and Rain in Wheat Harveſt; and again comforted them in the Mercy of God. Saul having reigned two years, the Philiſtines again afflicted the Land, with whom he had ſore War all the days of his Life. He fought againſt his Enemies round about; againſt Moab, the Children of Ammon, Edom, and the Kings of Zobah: he ſmote the Amalekites, and delivered his People out of the hands of them that ſpoiled them. Yet, his heart not being upright before the Lord, God choſe him out a man after his own heart, and rejected him and his Family. This man was David, the youngeſt Son of Jeſſe, of B*ethlehem-Judah*, whom Samuel was ſent to anoint ſome years before his own Death, and more before that of S*aul*. In this ſpace, S*aul* perſecuted him from Place to Place; yet ſuch ardent Affection was there betwixt Jonathan his Son, and David, that the Love of a Kingdom it ſelf, joyned with the deep Diſpleaſure of a Father, was nothing able to interrupt it.

Sect. 2.

37. The Apoſtle Paul declareth, that, after God had deſtroyed ſeven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by Lot, he gave unto them Judges for the Space of 150 years, untill Samuel the Prophet. And afterward, they deſired a King, and God gave them Saul, the Son of Kis, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, by the Space of forty years. Some take the words as giving ſo many years to his Reign alone; but by general Conſent the Government of Samuel is to be included in them. Samuel ſeemeth to have died not long before Saul (two years it's ſuppoſed) at ſuch time as David was provoked by the Churliſhneſs of Nabal; and is ſaid to have judged Iſrael all the days of his Life. Hence is it certain, that Saul reigned not alone all thoſe fourty years, and probable that Samuel having governed alone for one half of them, had ſtill an hand in the publick Affairs of the Nation. At length Saul was overthrown in Battel by the Philiſtines, and loſt his three Sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Melchiſua. And he himſelf being ſore wounded, after he could not prevail with his Armour-bearer to kill him, fell upon his own Sword and died. His Son Isboſheth, by the means of Abner Captain of his Hoſt, ſucceeded him at the Age of fourty years; but the Tribe of Judah anointed David King over them in Hebron, who had formerly been conſecrated to this Office by Samuel: and he reigned over that Tribe alone, ſeven years and ſix Moneths. Isboſheth is ſaid to have reigned over Iſrael two years; which is to be interpreted peaceably, and not diſturbed by War; as his Father is ſaid to have reigned one year, viz. unmoleſted by the Philiſtines.

Acts 13. 21.
1 Sam. 25.
Verſ. 55.
Chap. 31. and 1 Chron. 10.
Saul's three Sons ſlain, and he killeth himſelf.
2 Sam. 2. 3. &c.
Ishboſheth ſucceedeth him.
A. M. 2944.
1 Sam. 13. 1.

38. For, after theſe two years were expired, a long War enſued betwixt David and him, his ſide growing weaker and weaker, as David's grew ſtronger and ſtronger: David to ſtrengthen himſelf married Maacha, the Daughter of Talmai, King of Geſhur, on which he begat Abſolom and Tamar. At length Abner conceiving a Diſpleaſure againſt Isboſheth, becauſe he had reproved him for medling with his Father's Concubine, revolted to David, and laboured to transfer the Kingdom to him; but coming to viſit him about this Affair, he was treacherouſly ſlain by Joab, David's General, and Nephew by his Siſter Zerviah. All being out of order now in Iſrael; Baanah and Recab two Benjamites, the Servants of Iſboſheth, ſlew their Lord as he ſlept in his Chamber, and brought his head unto David. He rewarded them with Death, and was by the Captains and all the Elders of the Tribes, anointed the third time King at Hebron, over all Iſrael; which Government he held 33 years. A little after this Inſtallment he took Jeruſalem from the Jebuſites, and made it the Seat of his Kingdom; himſelf building and fortifying the City of Sion, and Joab repairing the reſt. Then twice he overthrew the Philiſtines in Rephidim, who came up againſt him after they heard he was made King. The Ark of God he removed from Kiriath-Jearim, to the houſe of Obed Edom the Gittite, and thence, after three Moneths, into Sion. He purpoſed to build God an Houſe, but was forbidden (becauſe a man of Blood) that Work, which was to be reſerved for Salomon. For beſides his Wars in his younger time, all the Space betwixt this and the Birth of Solomon, ſeemeth imployed in Wars; wherein he overcame the Philiſtines, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans and Syrians. The Borders of his Empire he very much inlarged, not only from Shihor of Ægypt to the entring in of Hamath, but alſo as far as Euphrates, the utmoſt Limits promiſed by God unto Abraham; and only poſſeſſed by him, and his Son and Succeſſor Salomon.

2 Sam. 2. 3. &c.
Iſhboſheth ſlain after ſeven years.
1 Chron. 12.
2 Sam. 5. 6, 7, &c.
1 Chron. 12 &c.

39. Salomon was the ſecond Son begotten on Bathſheba, the Wife of Uriah the Hittite; with which Woman David firſt committed Adultery, and then for a Cover added to it the Murder of her Huſband. After he had been reproved by Nathan the Prophet he repented, and wrote the fifty firſt Pſalm upon this Occaſion. Yet the Infant conceived in Adultery, died as ſoon as it was born; and, though Salomon was born the next year (as it's thought) yet this Sin eſcaped not without a further Puniſhent. For within a while, his eldeſt Son Amnon raviſhed his half-Siſter Tamar, and for that was killed by Abſalom. Some years after, Abſalom by the Advice and Policy of Achitophel ſeized upon the Kingdom. David hereupon fled to God as his Rock of Refuge, and compoſed the third and the fifty fifth Pſalms: then oppoſing Force to Force, overthrew Abſalom in the Wood of Ephraim by Joab his General, who thruſt the young man through with a Dart as he hung in an Oak, contrary to David's Order, who had charged all the Captains to deal gently with him for His Sake. This Rebellion was followed by a new Sedition raiſed amongſt the Iſraelites, by one Sheba, upon this Occaſion; becauſe they had not the chief hand above the Tribe of Judah, in bringing back the King to his houſe; but this was happily ſuppreſſed, after Joab had procured the Inhabitants of Abel to cut off Sheba's head.

David's Adultery and Murder.
1 Sam. 11. 12, 13.
Puniſhed.
A. M. 2957.
Amnon raviſheth Tamar.
Davidis 14.
Abſalom rebelleth.
Chap. 15, 16, 17, 18.
The Conſpiracy of Sheba.
Chap. 19. 20.

40. After

Sect. 2.

2 Sam. 21.
1 Chron. 20.
2 Sam. 24.

40. After theſe things, ſeveral Battels inſued with the Philiſtines, in one of which (the laſt wherein he was preſent) David hardly eſcaped the hands of Iſhbi-benob, one of the Sons of the Gyant; being reſcued by Abiſhai his Nephew, who ſlew the Philiſtine. Not long after, tempted by Satan and his own Ambition, he numbred the People: for which God being angry, propoſed to him three ſorts of Puniſhments, viz. Famine, Sword, or Peſtilence; as to which, he choſe rather to fall into the hands of God, than of man. Then God ſent a Plague, whereby periſhed in one day 70000 men; but, as the Angel was alſo about to deſtroy Jeruſalem he was commanded to deſiſt. David at length having arrived at ſeventeen years of Age, was ſo decayed and ſpent by his many Labours and Troubles, that he could not receive any heat from Cloaths, and therefore a young Maid, one Abiſag, a Shunamite was choſen out, to lye in his Boſom. Adonijah his Son taking Advantage at this Infirmity, by the Aſſiſtance of Joab the General, and Abiathar the Prieſt, ſeized upon the Kingdom. When he had Notice thereof, according to the Prediction of God, and his Promiſe unto Bathſheba, he eſtabliſhed Solomon in his Throne, and having given him a Charge, died about ſix Moneths after, when he had reigned over Judah alone in Hebron ſeven years and ſix Moneths, and in Jeruſalem over all Iſrael and Judah 33 years; in the year of the World (according to the vulgar way of reckoning, without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the Hiſtory of the Judges) 2985.

David numbreth the People.

1 Chron. 20. 7.

1 Kings 1.

1 Chron. 28. 29.

Maketh Solomon King.

Dieth.

A. M. 2985.

41. David being dead, and Solomon eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom, Adonijah asked Abiſag the Shunamite to wife, and for that was put to Death, as affecting the Sovereignty. Abiathar was removed from the Prieſthood, and Zadok, of the Poſterity of Phinehaz, placed in his Room, as had been foretold by God, againſt the houſe of Eli, from which the Prieſthood now returned; Joab for Fear fled to the Horns of the Altar, and there was ſlain by Benaiah, who was made General in his ſtead. Simei, who had curſed David when he fled from Abſalon, was commanded to build him an Houſe in Jeruſalem, and not to ſtir thence beyond the Brook Kidron, upon pain of Death; which he after two years ſuffered, having broken the Order. Solomon within a year after his Father's Death, married the Daughter of Pharaoh; after which, offering 1000 Burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the Tabernacle then reſted, God appeared to him in a Dream, and offered him whatſoever he would ask. He asked only Wiſdom to govern his People, and neither Riches nor Honour; with which God was ſo well pleaſed, that he made him to excell therein all meer men, and accumulated alſo the other upon him.

1 Kings 2.

Solomon putteth Adonijah and others to Death.

Chap. 3.

42. Having all things in a Readineſs for building an Houſe to the Lord, (for which David his Father had made large Proviſions) Vaphres King of Ægypt ſupplying him with 80000 Men, and Hiram King of Tyre with as many, beſides an Architect named Hypero (whoſe Mother was an Iſraelitiſh Woman, of the Tribe of Judah;) he laid the Foundation of the Temple in the fourth year of his Reign, and the ſecond day of the ſecond Moneth Zif. The Structure being in building ſeven years, the Work began (according to their Computation, who by reckoning the years of the Judges, and the Oppreſſions ſeverally, add 100 years to the Æra of the World) in the 3089*th* year from the Creation entering, was dedicated in the 3095*th* ending, and in the 587*th* year after the Departure out of Ægypt, alſo ending; from which if we ſubſtract thoſe 40 they lived in the Wilderneſs, then 547 years will be found to have paſſed from the Original of Jubilies to the Dedication of the Temple, which make up eleven Jubilies, and eight years. So the Service therein began in the eighth year of the twelfth Jubilie, or in the firſt year of the ſecond week of the twelfth, which ſeemeth agreeable to the Ceremonial Law, wherein moſt things conſiſt in the number of ſeven, and are reckoned by Sabbatical years and Jubilies. And if we divide 3025 by ſeven, we ſhall find the Temple dedicated in the firſt year of the 442 Week from the Creation, almoſt twelve intire Jubilies after the Service thereof had been firſt appointed on Mount Sinai.

Chap. 6.
Clemens
Stromat. lib. 4.

The building of the Temple.

Ludov. Capellus.

43. About the ſame time Solomon built a Navy at Eſion-gaber, on the Shoar of the Red Sea, in the Land of Edom. This furniſhing with his own Subjects and the Tyrians (then, by reaſon of the Situation of their Country, the beſt Sailors in the World) ſent to him by Hiram, he diſpatched to Ophir, once in three years, for Gold and other Merchandize, whence they brought him 420 Talents. The Country of Edom David had formerly ſubdued, and thence Solomon his Son had the Privilege of building his Ships there. Æleth or Eloth, called by other Writers Ælana and Ælanum, was then a famous City, ſeated upon the Arabian Gulf, to part whereof, lying about it, it gave Appellation. As Eſion-gaber was the Ar-

Solomon's Navy.

1 Kings 1.

nal for building the Navy; ſo this City ſeemeth to have been the Emporium or Mart-town: and, as long as the Edomites continued under the Obedience of the Kingdom of Judah, it is probable, that thence Merchandiſe was tranſported to Petra, the chief City of Arabia, and ſo to Jeruſalem. But when the Edomites revolted (which happened after the Death of Jehoſaphat) the Courſe was altered from Jeruſalem to Rhino colura, a City in Phœnicia upon Ægypt; and there continued long, till ſuch time as the Ptolomies with much ado, brought down the Trade to Alexandria. To effect this, they made two Ports upon the Borders, whereof the one bare the name of Berenice, and is miſtaken by Joſephus for Eſiongaber, that lying at a great Diſtance both from this and Elath, which ſeemeth to be the ſame Place, mentioned in (a) Strabo, by the name of * Albus Pagus.

* Λευκὴ κώμη.

(a) Strabonem lege lib. 16. p. 780. D. & 781. A. B. &c. Vide Fullerum in miſcellaneis.

44. As this Navigation of the Tyrians gave a Beginning to their Fame in that Art; ſo from it (as is probably conceived) came the name of the Red Sea, or that of Edom, firſt to be famous in other Countries. Their Traffique increaſing, they might well ſend out Colonies into other parts; and hence, as Herodotus writeth, the Sea-coſt of Arabia might be inhabited by them; but as for their coming from theſe parts to inhabit Phœnicia (which Opinion ſeemeth to have taken it's Original, from the Journey of the Iſraelites out of theſe Coaſts) it is a meer Fable. Sailing out of the Arabian into the Perſian Gulf, the name of Red Sea might upon this Occaſion be given by them to both (which is uſually to be expounded of both in ancient Writers) the word Edom, being changed into others of the ſame Signification in ſeveral Languages. As for Ophir, if we think this Country denominated from the Son of Sem, (or him from it) either immediately by his Habitation therein, or rather mediately by the Tyrians impoſing that name upon it, which properly belonged to a place in Arabia; then need we not ſeek for it in America, and feign ſtrange Circuits to have been made, from the Red Sea round about Africk to ſail thither; as thoſe, who place it in that part of the World, are forced to do.

His Buildings.

45. Solomon after the Dedication of the Temple, fortified Jeruſalem with a treble Wall, and repaired Hazron, the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites; ſo did he Gaza of the Philiſtines; he built Bethoron, Gerar, and the Millo, or Munition of Jeruſalem. He alſo built Megiddo in Manaſſeh on this ſide Jordan, Balah in Dan, and Thadmor; which may be either Thameron, in the Deſart of Judæa, mentioned by Ptolomy, or Palmyra, as Joſephus thinketh, ſituate in the Deſart of Syria, on the Borders of his Dominions; which being many Ages after rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, was named after him Adrianopolis. He built for himſelf in thirteen years time a Palace, and an Houſe for his Wife the Daughter of Pharaoh. After this, he offered twenty Towns, bordering upon the Tribe of Aſher, to Hiram King of Tyre, as a Reward for the Aſſiſtance he offered him in his Buildings; but he refuſing them, he placed Colonies therein. And from his Refuſal the Country came to be called Cabul.

His Incontinency and Idolatry.

1 Kings 11.

46. In the latter part of his Reign, he fell into great Incontinency, and thence became acceſſory to abominable Idolatry. He loved many ſtrange Women, as (together with the Daughter of Pharaoh) Women of the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, and Hittites: of the Nations, wherewith the Children of Iſrael were forbidden to marry. He had 700 Wives, and 300 Concubines, which turned his Heart after other Gods, ſo that he went after Aſhtaroth the Goddeſs of the Sidonians, and Milcom the Abomination of the Amorites: he built an high-place for Chemoſh the Abomination of Moab, in the hill before Jeruſalem, for Molech the Abomination of the Children of Ammon; and ſo did he for all his ſtrange Wives, which burnt Incenſe, and ſacrificed to their Gods. This provoked the God of Iſrael, who had twice appeared to him; inſomuch, that for his horrible Ingratitude, he determined Evil concerning his Kingdom, to be fulfilled in his Son. Yet have we ground to judge well of his eternal Condition, ſeeing he made a Recantation of his former Errors, and was uſed as a Pen-man of Scripture by the Holy Ghoſt. He died after he had reigned 40 years, being without Parallel for Wiſdom, Magnificence, and Humane Frailty. A. M. 3025.

His Death.

A. M. 3025.

SECT. III.

From the Death of Solomon and the Rent of the Kingdom, to the Deſtruction of the Kingdom of Judah.

1 Kings 12.

Ten Tribes fall off from Rehoboam.

2 Chron. 11. Ver. 13, 14.

Joſh. 19. 9.

2 Chron. 31. 2. & 28. 19.

1. SOLOMON being dead, Rehoboam his Son, by Naama an Ammonitiſh Woman, reigned in his Stead. The Tribes, when they met at Sichem to make him King, petitioned for a Relaxation of their Burthens impoſed by his Father; to which he anſwered ſo churliſhly (deſpiſing the Counſel of the ancient and grave men,) that ten Tribes revolted from him, and made King over them Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who had fled into Ægypt for fear of Solomon, after that God's Intentions came to be known of giving him part of the Kingdom. With Rehoboam yet remained the two Tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and the greateſt part of the Levites, who left their Poſſeſſions and ſetled themſelves in Judah and Jeruſalem, becauſe Jeroboam and his Sons had caſt them off from executing the Prieſt's Office. With the Tribe of Judah is alſo to be reckoned that of Simeon, whoſe Poſſeſſions were within the Inheritance of Judah, for which that part of the Diviſion that fell to it was too much. Part alſo of the Danites had its Seat within that of Judah; for it appeareth that they had ſome Towns in the Diviſion of the Land, which formerly had been aſſigned to the Children of Judah, who (as hath been obſerved) had ſo large a Country at firſt aſſigned to them, rather to protect and defend, than ſolely to poſſeſs it. All theſe ſtill remained the Subjects of Rehoboam, though ten Tribes are ſaid to have revolted, the Tribe of Dan being attributed to Jeroboam, for that Dan the chief City, was within his Dominions; and becauſe the Tribe of Manaſſeh being ſeparated and divided into two parts, might be reckoned for two Tribes. The Kingdom thus divided, the Northern parts fell off; but the Southern continued in Obedience to the Son of Solomon, whoſe Succeſſors henceforth are called Kings of Judah, as thoſe of Jeroboam, Kings of Iſrael; and yet this Diſtinction is not always obſerved, Jehoſaphat being called King of Iſrael, and alſo Ahaz; though we know they were both Kings of Judah; of that Diviſion only.

1 Kings 12. 14.

He and his Subjects rebell againſt God.

Afflicted, they humble themſelves, and are delivered.

2. Rehoboam purpoſed to make War upon the Tribes, but, admoniſhed by God, gave over the Enterprize of Invading them with 180000 Men; although there was continual War betwixt the two Kings all their Days. The Prieſts and Levites that were driven into Judah, reteined it in the true Religion three years; but when Rehoboam had eſtabliſhed himſelf, he forſook the Law of the Lord, and all Iſrael with him, committing Sins above all that their Fathers had done. They built them high-Places, Images, and Groves on every high hill, and under every green Tree: there were Sodomites in the Land, and they did according to the Abomination of thoſe Nations, which the Lord caſt out before the Children of Iſrael. Becauſe of this, the fifth year of his Reign, Shiſhak King of Ægypt, (perhaps invited by Jeroboam, who had lived with him in Exile) came up againſt him with 1200 Chariots, 60000 Horſemen, and innumerous People, out of Ægypt: the Lubims, Sukkiims, and Æthiopians, with which he took Garriſons in Judah, and pierced as far as Jeruſalem. Rehoboam, and his Princes humbling themſelves at the Preaching of Shemaiah, thereby obtained Deliverance; which yet, was to be bought at an high Rate. For Shiſhak took away the Treaſures of the houſe of the Lord, and the Kings Houſe, with all the golden Shields which Solomon had made, in the room of which Rehoboam put others of braſs. He died after he had reigned ſeventeen years.

Abiah.

A. M. 3043.

2 Chron. 11. 20.

(a) Chap. 13. 2.

1 Kings 15.

3. Abiah his Son ſucceeded him, whoſe Mother is in one place named Maachah the Daughter of Abſalom, and in another (a) Micajah, Daughter to Uriel of Gibeah. Some think ſhe was the Daughter of Tamar, which might be married to this Uriel, and adopted by Abſalom, who ſeemeth to have left no Iſſue. He imitated the Impiety of his Father, his heart not being perfect before the Lord his God; and yet God remembring the Covenant made with David, brought him by a fatherly Correction into order, and Acknowledgment of his Sovereignty. He alſo warred with Jeroboam all his days, who coming up againſt him with 800000 Men, he joyned Battel with him having but half ſo many, and yet truſting in God, obtained Victory, and killed 500000 Iſraelites, the greateſt number we read to have fallen in one Battel. He took from him Bethel, Jeskanah, and Ephraim, with their Towns; neither did Jeroboam recover his Strength in his time. Abijah waxed mighty, married fourteen Wives, begat 22 Sons and 15 Daughters. Yet he reigned but three years.

Aſa. A. M. 3046. 1 Kings 15. & 2 Chron. 14. 15, 16. Chap.

4. Aſa his Son ſucceeded him in the twentieth year of Jeroboam ending, and did that which was righteous in the Sight of the Lord. He reformed what was amiſs, commanding his Subjects to ſeek the God of their Fathers: in his time the Land had reſt ten years. In his 11*th* year, according to Joſephus, came Zerach the Æthiopian againſt him, with 1000000 Men, of Caſhæans (inhabiting Arabia, where alſo Zerach his Æthiopia is only to be found) and Labæans, beſides 300 Chariots. To thoſe he oppoſed himſelf with 300000 of Judah, and 280000 of Benjamin; and calling upon his God, obtained the Victory, which he proſecuted, and got much Booty. Returning to Jeruſalem, he was ſo wrought upon by the words of Azariah the Prophet, the Son of Obed, as together with his own Subjects and others, (that fell to him in Abundance out of Iſrael) he ſacrificed to, and made a Covenant with God. Then proceeding in the Reformation of his Kingdom, he removed Maaca his Grand-mother from her Dignity, becauſe ſhe was the Patroneſs of Idolatry. Baaſa who now reigned in Iſrael, provoked with the Revolt of his Subjects, and jealous of the growing Power of Aſa, came up againſt him, and built Ramah, in the 36*th* year from the Diviſion, leſt any ſhould go in or out to him. Aſa to divert him, hired Ben-hadad the King of Syria, to invade Iſrael. This Ben-hadad was the Son of Tabrimmon, and Grandſon to Hezrin, or Rezin, the firſt King of Damaſcus, and from him the Sirname of Hadad deſcended upon his Poſterity. He ſmote Jion, Dan, Bethmach, all Civeroth, with the Land of Napthali, and conſtrained Baaſa to leave off building Ramah. Aſa then deſtroyed Ramah, and with the Stones thereof built Seba and Mizpah; but was checked by God for not truſting in him, but putting his Confidence in the King of Syria; and War for this was denounced to be upon him all his Days. Hereat he grew angry with the Seer that brought the Meſſage; and oppreſſed ſome of his People: and for this was puniſhed with the Gout in his latter days, for a Remedy to which, he had Recourſe to the Phyſitians, and not to God. So he died, in the 41 year of his Reign.

Jehoſaphat. 1 Kings 22. A. M. 3087.

5. Jehoſaphat ſucceeded him, to a good Father a better Son. In this third year he ſent the Levites throughout the Cities to teach the People, having removed the Sodomites out of the Land. He married his Son Jehoram to Athaliah the Daughter of Ahab King of Iſrael, and in his eighteenth year made him Vice-King. This Affinity drew him down with Ahab to fight againſt Ramoth-Gilead, where Ahab received his Death-Wound, and he eſcaped narrowly with his Life. For joyning himſelf with this wicked King, he was ſorely chidden by Jehu the Prophet, the Son of Hanani; which ſo affected him, as he reformed his Subjects, travelling himſelf from Beerſheba unto Mount Ephraim to accompliſh it: he alſo conſtituted Judges, to whom he gave a pious and ſtrict Charge. After this the Moabites, Ammonites, and a great Multitude of others invaded him; againſt which he firſt ſtrove by Prayer to God, and thereby obtained Victory, his Enemies being ſo ſtricken with Madneſs, that they fell upon, and ſlaughtered one another. Afterwards intending to ſend Ships for Gold to Ophir; becauſe he joyned with wicked Ahaziah King of Iſrael, the Lord ſpoiled the Works, and the Ships were broken at Eſion-geber. Some think he made his Son Partner in the Kingdom it ſelf, having formerly been but his Vicegerent, a year or two before he died. He reigned 25 years, or rather 24, with ſome odd Moneths. 2 Chron. 19, 20, 21. Chap.

Joram. 2 Chron. 21. A. M. 3109.

6. To Jehoſaphat ſucceeded Joram being thirty two years old, to the beſt Father the worſt Son; who being eſtabliſhed in his Seat, made away all his Brethren, and ſome of the Princes. In his days the Edomites, or Idumæans, who hitherto, from the time of David, had been in Subjection to the Kings of Judah, revolted. They had heretofore been governed by a Vice-Roy, choſen either out of themſelves or the Jews; but now they made themſelves a King; the Prophecy of Iſaac, the common Progenitor of both Nations, being now fulfilled, that though Eſau ſhould ſerve his younger Brother Jacob, yet the time ſhould come, when he ſhould break the Yoak from off his Neck. Gen. 27. 40. At the ſame time Libnah (a City of the Prieſt's in the Tribe of Judah) revolted, becauſe he had forſaken the God of his Fathers; for having married Ahab's Daughter, he followed the Example of his Houſe, making high-places in the Mountains of Judah, and cauſing his Subjects to commit Idolatry therein. Becauſe of this, there came a Writing to him from the Prophet Elijah, rebuking him for his Sin, and foretelling his Puniſhment. Elijah being before this taken up to Heaven, the Jews have believed that this Letter was ſent down thence. 2 Chron. 21. verſ. 12. Some think, there was another Prophet of this name; but moſt are inclined to believe, that foreſeeing, before his Aſſumption, the Idolatry of this man, he left this Letter with his Scholars to be delivered to him in due time. According to the Threatnings therein contained, God firſt ſtirred up againſt him the Philiſtines and Arabians, who making an Invaſion took away all his Goods, his Wives, and Sons, except Jehoahaz the youngeſt, otherwiſe called Ahaziah and Azariah. Afterwards God ſtruck him with an incurable Diſeaſe in his Bowels, which after two years came out of his Body: ſo that he miſerably died, having reigned eight years; three whereof are to be reckoned in Conjunction with his Father. He was buried without Honour at Jeruſalem, not in the Sepulchre of Kings; not deſired, miſſed, nor lamented.

Ahaziah. A. M. 3116.

2 Kings 8. & 2 Chron. 22.

7. Ahaziah his Son ſucceeded him, who followed the Steps of his Grandfather, Ahab's wicked Family, and became a Patron of Idolaters. But having ſcarce reigned one year, he went down to Jezreel to viſit his Uncle Joram, King of Iſrael, where they were both killed by Jehu; Joram being ſlain outright, and Ahaziah dying ſhortly after of his Wound, at Megiddo. Athaliah his Mother ſeized upon the Kingdom, wherein to eſtabliſh her ſelf, ſhe deſtroyed all the Royal Seed. Only Jehoſheba the Daughter of Joram, and Wife to Jehojada the High-Prieſt, withdrew Joaſh an Infant, her Brothers Son, and hid him ſix Years in the Houſe of God. At the end of theſe years, Jehojada brought him out to the People, then ſeven years old, and anointed him King, ſlew Athaliah, reſtored the Worſhip of God, and deſtroyed the Houſe of Baal, whoſe Prieſt Matthan he ſlew before the Altar.

2 Kings 9.

Athaliah uſurpeth.

Chap. 11. 2 Chron. 24.

Joas.

8. Joas then ſucceeded his Father after ſix years, who did what was good and juſt as long as Jehojada the Prieſt lived, and through his Advice took Care to repair the Temple, which now had ſtood 155 years. But Jehojada being dead (who lived 130 years; the Jews obſerving that he, the Repairer of the Temple, was born the ſame year that the Builder thereof died) Idolatry brake out afreſh through his Connivance. The Prophets exclaimed againſt it in vain, eſpecially Zacharias, the Son and Succeſſor of Jehojada, againſt whom Joas was ſo far tranſported beyond the Bounds of Piety, and Gratitude to his Father's Memory, that he commanded him to be ſtoned, and that in the Court of the Houſe of the Lord. Whil'ſt as he died, he ſaid, The Lord look upon it and requite it. So he did; for after a years time, the Forces of Hazael, King of Syria, though but ſmall, invaded Judah, deſtroyed all the Princes of the People, and ſent the Spoil to their King. Joas himſelf they left very ſick of great Diſeaſes, but when they were departed from him, his own Servants conſpired againſt him for the Blood of the Sons of Jehojada the Prieſt, and ſlew him on his Bed, in the 40*th* year of his Reign. A. M. 3160.

2 Kings 12. A. M. 3122.

Chap. 14.

9. Amaziah his Son ſucceeded him, who alſo ſeemeth to have reigned with him the three laſt years; ſeeing he is ſaid to have begun his Reign in the ſecond year of Joas, King of Iſrael. When he was confirmed in his Seat, he put thoſe to Death that ſlew his Father, ſparing their Children, according to the Law of Moſes. In his twelfth year, he undertook an Expedition againſt the Edomites with 300000 of his own Subjects, and 100000 Iſraelites, which he hired for 100 Talents of Silver. But as he was about to begin his March, a Prophet dehorted him from joyning to himſelf the idolatrous Iſraelites, ſo that he diſmiſſed them, and they returned home in great Diſcontent. He proſpered againſt the Idumæans, but the Souldiers (diſmiſſed) fell upon his Cities, and ſmiting 300 of them, took much Spoyl. Yet he at his Return, to amend the matter, having brought home the Gods of the Edomites, ſet them up to be his Gods, bowed down before them, and burnt Incenſe to them. The Lord being ſore angry for this, ſent firſt a Prophet to him, whom he rejected. But burning with a deſire to be revenged upon the Iſraelites, he ſent and defied Joas their King, who admoniſhed him to be well adviſed, but this being in vain, they met, and joyned Battel, wherein Amaziah was taken, and led back to Jeruſalem; the Wall of which City Joas demoliſhed 400 Cubits, and plundering the houſe of the Lord, with the Kings Houſe then, departed. Fifteen years after, Amaziah lived; but then, having turned away from following the Lord, a Conſpiracy was made againſt him in Jeruſalem; whence he fled to Lachiſh, and there was ſlain by the Purſuers, after he had reigned 29 years.

2 Chron. 25. A. M. 3160.

Uzziah.

10. He left a Son named Uzziah and Azariah, who ſucceeded him; but being ſaid to have begun his Reign in the twenty ſeventh year of Jeroboam, King of Iſrael, an Inter-regnum of twelve years muſt needs have paſſed betwixt his Father's Death and his Beginning; the Kingdom all this time having, perhaps, been governed by a Lieutenant, or the High-Prieſt. When he came to the Age of 16 all the People of Judah took him, and made him King in the room of his Father, and under him the State of Judah much flouriſhed. He fought proſperouſly againſt the Philiſtines and Arabians that dwelt in Gur-Baal, and Mehunims, or Minæans, dwelling in

2 Kings 15. 2 Chron. 26. A. M. 3201.

Arabia the Happie upon the Red Sea: the Ammonites ſought to him with Preſents, and his name was great in thoſe Parts. About the 35*th* year was celebrated in Greece the firſt Olympiad, that great Help to our Underſtanding in the Diſtinction of times. He invaded the Prieſts Office in offering Sacrifice, and for that was ſtrucken with Leproſie, which continued upon him till his Death, living in an houſe by himſelf and Jotham his Son ordering the Affairs of the Kingdom. He reigned 52 years.

Jotham.

2 Chron. 27.
A. M. 3253.
Olymp. 5. *an.*4.

Ahaz.

A. M. 3269.
Olymp. 9. *an.*2.
2 Kings 16.
2 Chron. 28.

11. Jotham his Son ſucceeded him, who prevailed againſt the Ammonites, and forced them to pay Tribute two years. He became mighty, becauſe he prepared his ways before the Lord his God; he built the high-gate of the Temple much on the Wall of Ophal; Moreover, Cities in the Mountains of Judah, and in the Forreſts thereof Caſtles and Towers. Under him, his Predeceſſor, and his two Succeſſors, propheſied Iſaiah and Hoſea. Micah began in his time; and Nahnm alſo, according to Joſephus, propheſied the Deſtruction of Niniveh, which was fulfilled 115 years after; though others think the Beginning of theſe years ſhould rather be placed in the time of his Son. He reigned ſixteen years, and was ſucceeded by Ahaz his Son, whoſe Reign if it be compared with that of Pekah and Hoſea, Kings of Iſrael, it will appear that he reigned ſeven or eight years with his Father. He did that which was evil in the ſight of the Lord, walking in the ways of the Kings of Iſrael: he made molten Images for Baalam, burnt Incenſe in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, burnt his Children in the Fire, ſacrificed and burnt Incenſe in the high Places, on the Hills, and under every green Tree. Becauſe of this, God ſtirred up Pekah, King of Iſrael, and Rezin the Son of Remaliah, King of Syria againſt him, who invaded his Kingdom, and did much Hurt: Rezan got Elath, which Uzzias had recovered and built; the King of Iſrael gave him a grievous Overthrow: the Edomites alſo afflicted him; and the Philiſtines, whom Uzziah had brought under, made Inroads upon him. Suſpecting his Eſtate becauſe of theſe things, he ſent to Tiglath-Pileſer, King of Aſſyria, for help, preſenting him with the Silver and Gold, which was found in the Temple.

Nicol. Damaſcenus apud Joſephum Antiq. l. 7. c. 6.

Hezekiah.

A. M. 3276.
Olymp. 12. an. 3.
2 Kings 18.
2 Chron. 29. &c.

12. Tiglath-Pileſer accordingly came up, and taking Damaſcus, killed Rezin, in whom fell this Kingdom: which having continued ten Generations, and begun in a Rezin, ended in one of that name. Then turned he his Forces upon Pekah, tranſported into Aſſyria the Inhabitants of Gilead and Naphthali, as formerly he had done thoſe of Damaſcus. But Achaz, to procure thoſe things, having made himſelf his Vaſſal, was yet never the better, remained in great Fear of him, and ſtill continued in his Wickedneſs. He made his Son Hezekiah for his three laſt years Partner with him in the Kingdom, and at the end thereof died, having reigned together with his Father, and by himſelf, 16 years. Hezekiah ſucceeding, opened the Temple which his Father had ſhut, and reformed the Abuſes in Religion. He brake in pieces the brazen Serpent, becauſe the ſuperſtitious Multitude fancying ſome Divine Virtue therein, gave it ſuitable Worſhip. He ſhook off the Yoak of the King of Aſſyria, refuſing to pay Tribute; for which Cauſe in his fourteenth year, Senacherib, being to make War upon Ægypt, led part of his Forces into Judæa. Beſieging Lachiſh, Hezekiah bargained with him to depart; but he brake his Promiſe, and ſent Rabſhakes with others to Jeruſalem, who blaſpheming God, and reproaching the King, laboured to draw the People from their Obedience. This being to no Purpoſe, Rabſhakes returned to him, who had now departed from Lachiſh, and beſieged Libnah, a ſtronge City of Judah; removing ſtill nearer Jeruſalem, that he might ſeem to purſue what he had given in Charge to Rabſhakes to denounce againſt Hezekiah.

Eſay 38. 8.

The Sun returneth ten Degrees backward.

13. But lying before Libnah, News came that Tirhakah, King of Æthiopia (who, as it ſeemeth, had entred into Conſpiracy with the Ægyptian againſt him) was moving towards him; at which he was ſo terrified, that he brake up his Siege, and departed homewards. Yet having a greedy mind towards Judæa, he ſent a blaſphemous Letter, full of Threats to Hezekiah; but he loſt in one night by the Stroak of an Angel 180000 men (as ſome think being on his way towards Jeruſalem) and confounded hereat, returned to Niniveh, where he was ſlain by his two Sons, Adramelech and Sharezer, as he was worſhipping in the houſe of Miſroch his God. In the time of theſe Dangers, Hezekiah fell ſick unto Death, the Sentence of which he received from Iſaiah the Prophet. But by his Prayers and Tears he obtained a Prolongation of Life for fifteen years, and in Confirmation of the Promiſe, the ſhadow of the Degrees which was gone down in the Sun-dyal of Ahaz was brought ten Degrees backward; and it followeth, So the Sun returned ten Degrees, by which Degrees it was gone down. As for this Sun-dyal it's thought that in thoſe ancient times the Knowledge of Dyals was ſcarce amongſt the Hebrews. Yet it is poſſible that Achaz might have ſomething of that Nature, though imperfect, from the Gregory of Oxford.

Babylonians, who were of old much given to Aſtrology, he being otherwiſe too curious an Admirer of foreign things, as appeareth, in that he muſt needs have ſuch an Altar made, and erected at Jeruſalem as he had ſeen at Damaſcus. That the Sun went back, hath been generally believed: but one of late hath gone about to prove that the Shadow was lyable to Reduction, without Retroceſſion of the great Luminary.

2 Chron. 32. 31.

14. The Knowledge of this Miracle coming to the Babylonians (who by reaſon of their continual Obſervation of the Heavenly Bodies might have more Occaſion to take notice of it) Merodach-Baladan their King ſent to Hezekiah to congratulate his Recovery, deſirous, it's likely, of his Friendſhip whom he had underſtood to be ſo much in the Favour of God; eſpecially bearing no Good Will to the Aſſyrians. He in a vain Oſtentation of his Wealth ſhew'd the Ambaſſadours all his Treaſures, and whatſoever was in his Houſe; for which, Iſaiah the Prophet denounced the Carrying away all theſe things to Babylon. For the Pride of his Heart there was Wrath upon him and Judah; yet he humbled himſelf, both he and the Inhabitants of Judah, ſo that the Wrath of the Lord came not upon them in his days. He flouriſhed in Abundance of Riches and Honour, ſtopped the upper water-courſe of Gihon, and brought it ſtreight down to the Weſt-ſide of the City of David. He reigned 29 years (three whereof were together with his Father:) being dead, they buried him in the chiefeſt Sepulchers of the Sons of David, and all Judah, with the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, did him Honour at his Death.

Manaſſes.

2 Kings 21.
2 Chron. 33.
A. M. 3304.
Olymp. 19. an. 4.

15. Manaſſes his Son ſucceeded him at the Age of twelve years, and therefore was begotten by him after his Recovery. He did Evil in the ſight of the Lord above thoſe Nations, which the Lord had caſt out before Iſrael, being more idolatrous than any of his Predeceſſors; he was alſo given to Witchcraft and Divinations, built Altars for all the Hoſt of Heaven, which he ſerved in the two Courts of the Houſe of the Lord, wherein he alſo ſet up an Image of the Grove which he had made. He filled Jeruſalem with innocent Bloud; amongſt other Martyrs Iſaiah the Prophet (as it's ſaid) being ſawn aſunder with a wooden Saw, becauſe he was free with him in reproving his ungodly Life; although he was of the Blood Royal, as the Son of Amos, the Brother of King Amaziah, according to the Tradition of the Jews, who alſo have related him to have been Father-in-Law, nay (as ſome) Grandfather by the Mothers ſide, to Manaſſes himſelf. In ſuch Wickedneſs continued he for ſeveral years, till ſuch time as God ſent upon him the Captains of the King of Aſſyria (Eſarchaddon ſome think) who took him lying amongſt the Thorns, and carried him bound with Fetters unto Babylon, which City (as it appeareth from this Place) was now again under the King of Aſſyria. Here having Leiſure and Occaſion to bethink himſelf, in his Affliction he repented, was humbled greatly, and beſought the Lord, who heard his Prayer, and reſtored him to his Kingdom. After this, he knew that the Lord was God; and purged his Realm of Idolatry; which Reformation the Jews make to have been in the 33 year before his Death. He reigned 55 years.

Amon.

A. M. 3359.
Olymp. 33. an. 4.

16. Amon his Son ſucceeded him in his Kingdom and Idolatry, but not in his Repentance, worſhipping and ſacrificing to all the craved Images which his Father had made, and going on to treſpaſs more and more. After two years, his Servants conſpired againſt him and ſlew him in his own houſe, all whom the People of the Land put to Death, and made Joſiah his Son (a Child of eight years old) King in his ſtead. He in the eighth year of his Reign began to ſeek after the God of his Fathers, and in his twelfth to cleanſe his Kingdom, and all the Land of Iſrael, from Idolatry: although the greateſt part of the latter, was now Subject to the King of Aſſyria. In the eighteenth year of his Reign and of his Age the 26th, he commanded the Temple to be repaired, and the Worſhip of God therein reſtored: where alſo finding a Book of the Law, he renewed the Covenant between God and the People, and celebrated ſuch a ſolemn Paſſeover, as had not been kept in Iſrael ſince the time of the Judges. Now if the time of the Judges, and the Oppreſſions, be not confounded, but taken at their full Length; then this year being the 930th ending, or the 931ſt Beginning, from the entering into Canaan, was the 7th of the 133 week, or the laſt of the 19th Jubilie. Joſiah in his 21th year ending, diſguiſed himſelf that he might fight with Necho King of Ægypt (who was going up againſt the Aſſyrians) and would not hearken to his words from the Mouth of God, labouring with him to refuſe Fighting againſt the Lord, who had ſent him, and commanded him to make Haſte. Therefore joyning Battel with him in the Valley of Megiddo, he was ſore wounded, and being carried to Jeruſalem, died there; all Judah and Jeruſalem, mourning and making great Lamentation for him.

Chap. 34.

Joſiah.

2 Kings 23.
2 Chron. 35.
A. M. 3368.
Olymp. 35. an. 4.

Jehoahaz.

2 Chron. 36.
A M. 3392.
Olymp. 41. an. 4.

17. Whilſt Pharaoh was buſie in his Affairs againſt the Aſſyrians, the People made Jehoahaz the younger Son of Joſias, King; who continued but three Moneths in the Digni-

Sect. 3.

Jehoiakim.

Dignity. For Pharaoh having finiſhed his work at Euphrates, and in Cœloſyria, came to Jeruſalem, whence he led away into Ægypt this young King, and left his elder Brother Eliakim in his Place, whoſe name he changed into Jehoiakim, impoſing a Tax of a hundred Talents of Silver and a Talent of Gold upon the Land. Though Jeoahaz be ſaid to have reigned three years, yet ſome will have a year to have paſſed betwixt the 31 year of Joſias, and the firſt of Jehoiakim; partly for that Joſias ſeemeth to have reigned ſomething more than 31 years, and ſome ſpace would be taken up in ſo ſolemn a mourning for him, before the Inſtalment of Jehoahaz; and alſo to conſult about this thing, ſeeing it was againſt Right and Cuſtom to give this Honour to the younger Brother: laſtly ſome time (perhaps ſome Moneths) was requiſite for ſetling the Affairs of Judæa, about the Inſtalment of Jehoiakim, and the Tribute. Ludovicus Cappellus moreover, giveth a whole year to Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim (though the Scripture ſpeaketh but of three Moneths apiece) that the laſt year of Zedekiah might fall into the 390*th* year from the Rent of the Kingdom; of which more, when we arrive at that time.

18. Jehoiakim thus advanced by Pharaoh Necho, was twenty five years old when he began to reign; which if ſo, he was born in the fifteenth year of his Father's Age; as, if Jehoahaz was twenty three when he began his Reign, he muſt alſo have been born in the ſixteenth of Joſiah. This maketh Joſiah to have applied himſelf to Procreation of Children at leaſt in the fourteenth year of his Life; which ſeeming too early, and not agreeable to the Piety of that Prince, there are that ſuſpect for 25, ought to be read 15, and 13 for 23; ſo that the one might be born in the 24 and the other in the 25 year of his Father. But there is no Neceſſity for ſuch a Reading of the Text. The fourth year of Jehoiakim fell in with the firſt of Nebuchadneſar King of Babylon, and was the 23*th* from the 13*th* of the Reign of Joſias, wherein Jeremiah the Prophet firſt began to propheſie; and hence it alſo appeareth, that Joſias reigned at leaſt full 31 years, and that one paſſed between his Death and the Beginning of Jehoiakim, elſe 23 only had paſſed betwixt the 13*th* of the one, and the 4*th* of the other. In this year Pharaoh Necho fell upon the Babylonians with War, becauſe, as it ſeemeth, they had ſollicited Jehoiakim his Tributary to revolt, and fought againſt Nebuchadneſar at Carchemiſh near Euphrates, (by the Greek and Latin Writers called Cercuſium;) in which Battel he was overthrown and ſlain.

Jerem. 25. 1. & 3.

Chap. 6.

Pharaoh Necho ſlain.

A. M. 3396. Olymp. 42. an. 4.

19. After this Victory, came Nebuchadneſar to Jeruſalem, where he either took Jehoiakim Captive to lead him to Babylon, or at leaſt made him his tributary Vaſſal. Some account this year, as the Beginning of the Reign of Nebuchadneſar, ſo of the Captivity of Judah, and the Deſolation of that Country, becauſe that Jeremiah, having ſpoken firſt of the 13 years, in which he and the other Prophets had warned the People to no Purpoſe, afterwards addeth, that God would ſend Nebuchadneſar his Servant againſt the Land, which ſhould be a Deſolation and an Aſtoniſhment, and that theſe Nations ſhould ſerve the King of Babylon 70 years. But the Prophecy of Daniel beginneth thus: In the third year of the Reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadneſar King of Babylon to Jeruſalem, and beſieged it: and the Lord gave Jehoiakim King of Judah into his hand, with part of the Veſſels of the Houſe of God, which he carried into the Land of Shinar, to the Houſe of his God. This Place ſeemeth to contradict the other; ſome have choſen to cloſe with the literal Senſe of it, and to hold, that in the third year of Jehoiakim, began the Captivity of the Jews. Others ſee more Reaſon to ſtick to the other Place, and, to take away all Difference, interpret this third year of the third of the Sabbatical year, or the Week of Years, and thus would read it, In the third year, Jehoiakim the King of Judah reigned, came Nebuchadneſar King of Babylon unto Jeruſalem, &c. But the Jews with ſome modern Writers underſtand by this third year, the third of the Rebellion of Jehoiakim, againſt whom Nebuchadneſar coming, about the end of the fifth year of his Reign, made him his Tributary, and ſo he continued three years; viz. the 6, 7, and 8th, of his Reign. Afterwards, changing his Mind, he rebelled in the Beginning of his ninth year, and ſo continued for three years in Rebellion, which being expired, in the end of the eleventh, Nebuchadneſar took Jeruſalem, and carried Him Captive to Babylon, with part of the holy Veſſels, and others of the Royal and Princely Race, amongſt whom was Daniel; and ſo the Captivity of 70 years began not till this year.

Chap. 25. 9. & 11.

The beginning of the ſeventy years of Captivity, which is variouſly aſſigned.

20. That this third year cannot be underſtood of the third of Jehoiakim's Reign, is clear from Jeremiah, who joyneth his fourth with the firſt of Nebuchadneſar; and becauſe elſewhere is made Mention of his fifth: whence is apparent, that he could not be led Captive in his third year. The ſecond Opinion indeed is not amiſs; for this was really the third year of the Week or the third from the Sabbatical year. For, the 18*th* of Joſiah, in which the Paſſeover was celebrated, being the laſt year of the 19*th* Jubilie, and ſo the Sabbatical year; from that to the 11*th* ending of Jehoiakim, or the 12*th* Beginning, are counted 31 years: viz. four weeks and three odd years; this being uſual with the Pen-men of holy Story, to count their times by Sabbatical Years or Jubilies. Jacobus Cappellus would have Nebuchadneſar, at the Command of Nabopolaſſer his Father, to have come into Judæa in the ſecond year of the Reign of Jehoiakim, who then ſware Fealty to him; but in the third year rebelled: whence Nebuchadneſar came down again in his fifth year, and took him Captive. Then will he have him to have ſet Shallum over the Kingdom, till Jeconias his Son, an Infant of a year old, ſhould come to Age; but Jehoiakim himſelf there lived miſerably in Captivity, till the 11*th* year, reckoned from his firſt being made King by Necho. He being then dead, and News of it brought to Jeruſalem, they there made his Son Jehoiakim King in his ſtead. And he beginneth the ſeventy years of the Captivity in his fifth year, when he will have him carried to Babylon.

Ad A.M. 3391, & 3392.

21. But Ludovicus Cappellus his Brother replyeth, that in no Place is there any Mention made of Nebuchadneſar's coming up againſt him in the ſecond year of his Reign, the place thought to make for the Purpoſe, having as much Reſpect to the fifth, as the ſecond year. And as little Mention is there any where made of Jehoiakim's ſix years of Captivity, who if he had died at Babylon, the Scripture would never have attributed to him the Reign of eleven years, but only ſo many as he really reigned, viz. 5. The reſt, it would either have given to Shallum the pretended Vice-roy, or to J*ehoiakim* his Son; it being a thing improbable, that the Name ſhould be preſerved for J*ehoiakim*, whilſt Sallum indeed reigned. Beſides, the Babylonian King obſerved no ſuch matter afterward in J*ehoiakim*, whom taking away he really made King Zedekiah, without the Title of Vice-roy or Lieutenant. Nay, though J*ehoiakim* lived long at Babylon, and after the Death of Nebuchadneſar, being looſed out of Bonds, was honoured and eſteemed by Evilmerodach above any of his Condition (and therein excelled J*ehoiakim*, if he lived there ſo long;) yet is there no more time given to his Reign, than that wherein he only continued in his Principality. As for the Regency of Shallum, it is a meer Invention, there being no other, according to the Jews, than J*ehoahaz*, who was alſo called by that name. For in the place thought to make this out, they are bidden not to weep for the dead (viz. Joſias) but for him that goeth away (Jehoahaz taken away by Necho) for he ſhould return no more into his Native Country.

2 Kings 24. 1.

Jerem. 22.11. Conſule Ludov. Cappellum Chronol. Sacr. p. 202.

22. J*ehoiakim* therefore being taken to be led away Captive, in the third year of his Rebellion, and the eleventh of his Reign, died e're he went (as we may ſuppoſe) and was caſt out or buried, according to the Prophecy of J*eremiah*, who had foretold he ſhould be buried with the Burial of an Aſſe; being caſt forth beyond the Gates of J*eruſalem*, in the Day to the Heat, and in the Night to the Froſt, which could be done by none, except the barbarous Babylonians. After his Death, the Conquerour placed in his ſtead J*ehoiakim* his Son, called alſo Conias and J*echonias*, who did evil in the Sight of the Lord, as his Father before him, and Nebuchadneſar it ſeemeth, repenting of what he had done, leſt he ſhould be drawn from his Obedience, by the Example of his Father, and the Perſwaſions of thoſe about him, ſent his Army before him, (about a year after his former Expedition) to beſiege J*eruſalem*. When he himſelf came to the Siege, J*ehoiakim* came out to him with his Mother and Servants, and yielded his Perſon in the eighth year of Nebuchadneſar ending. Then the Babylonian entring J*eruſalem*, took away the Treaſures found in the Houſe of the Lord, and the Kings Houſe, brake all the golden Inſtruments which Solomon had made for the Temple, and ſo carried J*ehoiakim* with his Mother, Wives, and Servants unto Babylon. Beſides thoſe, he tranſported all the beſt ſort of the People from J*eruſalem*, with the ableſt and ſtrongeſt for War from other Places, in which number was Ezekiel the Prieſt, the Son of Buzzi. J*ehoiakim* in (a) one place is ſaid to have been but eighteen years old when he began to Reign, but in another (b) only eight. A Fault muſt needs be in the Reading of one place of the two, which may beſt be laid upon the former. For if J*ehoiakim* his Father was 15 years old when he began to Reign, (as ſome will have it) then was he born to him in the 18*th* year of his Age, being otherwiſe (according to this Tenent) abſurdly made to have been begot in his 7 or 8*th* year.

Chap. 22. 18, 19. & 36. 30.

Jehoiakim.

2 Chron. 36. 2 Kings 23. A. M. 3404. Olymp. 44. an. 4. Nebuchad. 8.

Ezek 1. 2, 3. (a) 2 Kings 24. 8. (b) 2 Chron. 36. 9.

23. Nebuchadneſar made King over the J*ews* that remained, Mattaniah the Son of J*oſiah*, from whom he received an Oath of Homage, and thereupon changed his name into Zedekiah. He trode in the Steps of his Brothers and Nephews, the people Zedekiah.

ple alſo being with him incorrigible. He rebelled againſt Nebuchadneſar, taking part with the King of Ægypt, who maintained a Quarrel with him, and therefore the Babylonian came up in the ninth year after his Eſtabliſhment, took all the Cities of Judæa, except Jeruſalem, Lachiſh, and Azcka, which he alſo beſieged. The year following Pharaoh came with an Army to his Aſſiſtance, which Nebuchadneſar underſtanding went to meet him, and he thereupon afraid to ingage, retreated into his own Land. Nebuchadneſar then returning ſate down again before Jeruſalem, wherein Famine at length prevailing, and Zedekiah ſtill refuſing to yield, though Jeremiah conſtantly adviſed him to do it, in the end of his 11*th* year, and the firſt day of the Moneth it was broken into by the Chaldæans. Zedekiah flying, was overtaken, and brought to Riblah: where he firſt ſaw his Children and Friends ſlain, and then, having his Eyes put out, was carried to Babylon, where he miſerably ended his days.

2 Kings 25.

Zedekiah taken.

Jerem. 39.

24. On the ſeventh day of the fifth Moneth, in the 19*th* year of Nebuchadneſar came Nebuzaradan, Captain of his Guard; and having got all things ready in two days, ſet the King's Houſe, with the Temple, and the reſt of the Buildings in the City on Fire. The ſame Moneth all the Walls were demoliſhed; they that remained in the City, with thoſe which before had revolted, and the reſt of the People, together with the Treaſures of the Kings and Princes, and the Utenſils of the Houſe of the Lord, did Nebuzaradan carry to Babylon. So went Judah into Captivity in the 12*th* year after the Death of Jehojakim, 390 after the Death of Salomon and the Rent of the Kingdom (which the Prophet Ezekiel was commanded to repreſent by Sleeping ſo many nights upon his left ſide, the Iniquity of the Children of Iſrael having from that time abounded) to which the two years being added wherein the Captivity was compleated at the Death of Gedaliah, and eight Jubilies are therein contained; 490 from the Beginning of Saul; ſo that the Kingdom of Judah continued 10 Jubilies, or 70 Weeks of years, ſo many as are given by Daniel to the Commonwealth of the Jews, from its Reſtitution, to the Meſſiah: From the building of the Temple 420. which therefore ſtood eight Jubilies, with four Weeks, or in all ſixty weeks of years; from the Entrance into Canaan 967, as Ludovicus Cappellus reckoned, containing 138 weeks: from the Departure out of Ægypt 1007. during which time Satan was as it were bound, and Gods People were free: Laſtly, from the Beginning of the World 3515, which make 502 Weeks, and 71 Jubilies with five weeks of years. The Concurrence of all theſe Accounts do mightily confirm the Diſcoverer in his Opinion of their Reality.

Jeruſalem and the Temple burnt.

A. M. 3415.
Olymp. 48. an. 4.
Nebuchad. 9.

Ezek. 4. 5.

25. Jeremiah the Prophet had Leave, either to go to Babylon, there to live honourably, or to ſtay with the ſmall Remnant that were left in the Land. The latter of theſe he accepted; and went to Gedaliah, who being appointed Governour kindly embraced him, and gave Encouragement to all the Jews left under his Charge, promiſing them Favour and Liberty, as long as they remained obedient Subjects to the King of Babylon: But e're the year went about, one Iſmael, a Prince of the Blood, who during the War had kept himſelf out of the way with Baalis King of the Ammonites, ſlew Gedaliah whil'ſt he lovingly feaſted him at Miſpah, with others, both Jews and Caldæans in his Company. The Reſidue then of the Jews being without a Governour, and fearing the Revenge of their Lords and Maſters, were minded to fly into Ægypt, and cauſed the Prophet to inquire of the Lord for them. Jeremiah anſwered, that if they would remain in Judæa, God would mercifully provide for them; but if they offered to ſave themſelves in Ægypt, they ſhould undoubtedly periſh. They, notwithſtanding this Warning, went down and conſtrained him, with Barach, to accompany them, where, by the Leave of Pharaoh, they inhabited near Taphanes. Here the Prophet often reprehending them for their Idolatry, and foretelling both their Deſtruction, and the Ruine of thoſe that harboured them, was by their wretched and ingrateful hands * ſtoned to Death; but is ſaid to have been exceedingly honoured by the Ægyptians, ſo that Alexander the Great tranſlated his Bones into Alexandria. In the 23*th* of Nebuchadneſar (who then beſieged Tyre) Nebuzaradan, Captain of his Guard carried away the Reliques of the Jews and Iſraelites, to the number of 745. which was the laſt Deportation. And the Prophecies both of (a) Jeremiah and (b) Ezekiel confirm us in this Belief, that the Jews in Ægypt, after Nebuchadneſar had ſubdued that Country, were partly ſlain and carried away Captive to their own Country with the Natives, being nothing reformed by the former puniſhments inflicted either upon themſelves, or their Nation.

Chap. 40.

Chap. 41.

Gedaliah the Governour ſlain.

Chap. 42, 43. &c.

The Jews conſtrain Jeremiah to go down with them into Ægypt, where they ſtone him.

* Zonaras Tomo 1. Tertullian in Scorpiaco. cap. 10. Jerem.

Jerem. 52.

The laſt Deportation.

(a) Chap. 43, 44, 46.
(b) Chap. 29, 30, 31.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

The Kingdom of Iſrael

From the Revolt of the Tribes, to their final Captivity under Salmanaſſer.

Jeroboam.

1 Kings 11. 12, 13, 14. 2 Chron. 11. 13.

1. THE ten Tribes, falling off from Rehoboam upon his churliſh Anſwer, choſe Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, of the Tribe of Ephraim to reign over them. He, being induſtrious in the Work of Fortifications, had been made by Salomon Ruler over all the Charge of the houſe of Joſeph; but the Lord, after he was provoked by the Idolatry of Salomon, ſent Abijah the Prophet to him, to promiſe him ten Tribes; which coming to the Ears of the King he ſought to ſlay him; whereupon Jeroboam fled for his Life to Shiſhak, King of Ægypt, with whom he ſojourned till Solomon's Death. Then he was ſent for out of Ægypt, and accompanied all Iſrael as their Speaker in their Addreſs made to Rehoboam; whom after they had rejected, they made him King, that the Lord might perform what he had promiſed by the Prophet. A. M. 3026.

2. In the beginning of his Reign he built up Shechem, which had lyen Waſte well nigh 260 years, from the time that Abimelech deſtroyed it. This place being ſituated in Mount Ephraim he firſt made his Habitation, till he went over Jordan, and built Penuel, whence afterwards he alſo removed his Seat to Tirza. He forſook the Lord, who promiſed him Eſtabliſhment, if he would keep his Statutes and Commandments, going about by carnal and wicked Policy to ſecure his Intereſt. For leſt his Subjects by going up to Jeruſalem to worſhip, ſhould be turned again from their Obedience to him, he ſet up two Golden Calves, the one at Dan, and the other at Bethel, having learnt Idolatry towards this ſort of Cattel in Ægypt. To that in Bethel he ſacrificed, inſtituting a Feaſt like to that of Tabernacles: and, though rebuked by a Prophet, he was ſtricken with Leproſie, and might have been convinced by other Miracles; yet neither theſe things nor the many Judgments of God againſt him and his Succeſſors, could reclaim either him or them. Rejecting the Prieſts of the Sons of Aaron, and the Levites, he made of the loweſt of the People Prieſts for the high Places: He had War with Rehoboam continually, and with Abiah his Son, who overthrew him in a great Battel, and ſlew 500000 of his men, although he added a Stratagem to the Force of his numbers (which doubled thoſe of his Enemy) compaſſing-in Abiah's Army whilſt he was ſpeaking to it. Some years after, he died, having reigned 22. Nadab his Son ſucceeding him, walked in the ways of his Father, and in his Sin wherewith he made Iſrael to ſin; but in his ſecond year, he and all Iſrael beſieged Gibbethon of the Philiſtines, Baaſa the Son of Ahijah, of the Houſe of Iſſachar conſpired againſt him, and ſlew him there.

Setteth up two Golden Calves.

Nadab.

A. M. 3047. Aſa 2. 1 Kings 15.

Baaſa.

3. Nadab is ſaid to have began his Reign in the ſecond year of Aſa, and to have reigned two years: yet Baaſa to have began to reign in the third year of Aſa. To this, either muſt be ſaid, that Jeroboam made his Son King whil'ſt he himſelf yet lived, or elſe not reigning twenty two years compleat, but ſome part only of the twenty ſecond year (ſo that the far greater part of the firſt year of Nadab muſt fall in with the greater part of the ſecond of Aſa) neither did Nadab reign two whole years, but one with a piece of another, and ſo the firſt year of Baaſa will fall in with the greater part of the third of Aſa. For in this comparing of the times of the Kings of Judah and Iſrael, is to be taken notice; That, 1. A year only begun is taken for a compleat one. 2. The fathers often, yet living, communicated the Royal Dignity to their Sons. 3. Some were twice inaugurated, as Joram in the Tribe of Judah, and Hoſhea in that of Ephraim. 4. That there were many Vacancies, eſpecially in the Kingdom of Iſrael. Baaſa cut off all the Poſterity of Jeroboam, not leaving one to piſs againſt the Wall, according as Abijah had foretold; ſo that here Jeroboam's Policy failed him, the Golden Calves having puſhed down his Family. When Baaſa ſaw that Aſa had reſtored Religion, and for that Cauſe many of his Subjects revolted to him, he had War with him all his days, and in his fourteenth year built Ramah to reſtrain Fugitives. Aſa to divert him hired Benhadad, King of Syria, who breaking the League formerly made with Iſrael came up with his Forces, and ſmote Jion (a City of the Tribe of Aſher)

Jeroboams Poſterity utterly deſtroyed.

2 Chron. 16.

Dan of the Danites, Abel-bethmaach of the Manaſſites, and all Cinneroth with the Land of Napthali; which forced Baaſa to leave off building Ramah, and return to Tirzah. He reigned 24 years, viz. 23 with part of another.

1 Kings 16.

Elah ſlain by Zimri.

4. Elah his Son ſucceeded him in the twenty ſixth year of Aſa, and reigned two years; at the end whereof his Servant Zimri, Captain of one half of his Chariots, ſlew him at Tirzah as he was drinking in the Houſe of Arza his Steward, and the Prophecy of Jehu, the Son of Hanani was fulfilled againſt the Houſe of Baaſa, that it ſhould be made like to that of Jeroboam, all of it being deſtroyed in like manner by Zimri. But Zimri himſelf reigned only ſeven days; for the People then beſieged Gibbethon, and underſtanding how things had paſſed at Tirzah, made Omri, the General of the Army, King. He preſently led them againſt Tirzah, and took it; Whereupon Zimri withdrew himſelf into the Palace, and ſetting it on Fire periſhed therein, becauſe he alſo walked in the Steps of Jeroboam. A Schiſm now followed, for one half of the People choſe Tibni, the Son of Gineth, and he reigned four years (imperfect) as the Jews have it: this Diviſion continued, till at Length Tibni dying, Omri reigned alone. He is alſo ſaid to have began his Reign in the 31*th* year of Aſa, which muſt be underſtood of his reigning alone, having ſlain Zimri in the twenty eighth year (beginning) of that King. After he had reigned ſix years at Tirzah, he tranſlated the Seat of the Kingdom to Samaria, which City he had built on a Hill, bought of one Shemer, from whom it took the name, Having done worſe than any that were before him, he died after he had reigned twelve years. Which if they be accounted from the Death of Zimri, and ſo contain his whole Reign, then reigned Ahab his Son, and Succeſſor but two years with him, his 11*th* year falling into the 38 of Aſa; but if they be reckoned from the Death of Tibni, then muſt Ahab have reigned about five years together with him.

A. M. 3071.
Aſæ 26.

Omri.

Tibni.

A. M. 3076.
Aſæ 31.

Vide Lud. Cappellum Chron. Sacr. pag. 179.

Ahab marrieth Jezebel.

5. Ahab exceeded in Wickedneſs all his Predeceſſors, not only living in the Sins of Jeroboam, but marrying Jezebel the Daughter of Ethbaal, King of Sidon, whoſe god Baal he ſerved and worſhipped. For this, through the Prayer of the Prophet Elijah, it rained not upon the Land for three years; but at the end thereof he prayed again, and the Heavens gave Rain. He took Occaſion to ſhew the Vanity of the Idol Baal, and then ſlew his Prieſts; for which being threatned by Jezebel, he fled into the Deſart to Mount Horeb. Againſt Ahab came up twice Benhadad, King of Syria; once with 32 petty Kings, and both times with great Forces, but ſtill was overthrown, and at the latter time yielded himſelf. Ahab honourably received him, and, making a League with him, let him go in Safety; for which he was ſharply rebuked by a Prophet, and told that his Life ſhould go for the Life of Benhadad, and his own People for his People; but there followed a Peace betwixt Iſrael and Syria for three years. In this ſpace Ahab fell ſick for Naboth's Vineyard, who being by Jezebel's Procurement accuſed of Blaſphemy, was ſtoned to Death, and ſo Ahab enjoyed the Vineyard by way of Confiſcation. For this ſo wicked a Fact ſevere Judgment was pronounced againſt him and Jezebel, by Elijah; the Execution whereof by a temporary Repentance they cauſed to be prorogued. But the three years of the Peace being expired, he renewed the War with Syria; for that Benhadad having engaged to reſtore ſuch Cities as he had taken, refuſed to ſurrender Ramoth-Gilead. Four hundred falſe Prophets perſwaded him to undertake the Expedition; only Micajah ſent from God diſſwaded him from it. With him joyned Jehoſaphat King of Judah, whoſe Son Jehoram had married Athaliah his Daughter. But going down both together, Ahab received a Wound by an Arrow, and thereof died, that day, in the 22*th* year of his Reign.

A. M. 3083.
Aſæ 38.

1 Kings 18.

Chap. 19.

Chap. 20.

Ahaziah.

6. Ahaziah his Son ſucceeded him, whom he had formerly made his Aſſociate in the Kingdom, and reigned two years in all; being ſaid to have begun his Reign in the ſeventeenth year of Jehoſaphat King of Judah, becauſe his Father then dyed, having reigned 21 years, and ſome part of another. After Ahab's Death, Moab fell off from Iſrael, to which it had been ſubject ever ſince the days of David. Ahaziah falling ſick, of a Fall which he had through a lattiſe in his upper Chamber, ſent to conſult Baal-zebub the god of Ekron about his Recovery; but the Lord commanded Elijah to meet the Meſſengers, and denounce Death to him for this his Sin. Hereat Ahaziah being angry, ſent two Captains with their Fifties, one after another, to fetch him to him; but he called for Fire down from Heaven, which conſumed them: then being intreated by the third, he went with him to the King, where denouncing the ſame to his Face, Ahaziah accordingly died, not long after him his Brother Joram followed, in the eighteenth year of Jehoſaphat

A. M. 3103.
Jehoſaphati 18.

2 Kings 1.

Joram.

King

Chap. 3.

King of Judah ending, who wrought Evil in the ſight of the Lord, but not like his Father and Brother; for he put away the Image of Baal, erected by his Father, yet cleaved to the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who made Iſrael to ſin, becauſe of his carnal Intereſt; all the Kings of Iſrael accounting it an eſpecial piece of Policy, to buſie the People in the Worſhip of the golden Calves.

7. Joram made War upon the Moabites which had revolted, in Conjunction with Jehoſaphat King of Judah, and the King of Edom his Tributary, Eliſha the Prophet miraculouſly providing the Armies of Water, and promiſing them Victory. When the Sun aroſe and ſhone upon the Pits full of Water, it appeared, to the Moabites, Blood; ſo that they concluding their Enemies to have fallen one upon another, came out to take the Plunder of the Field; but finding other Entertainment, were repelled with great Conſternation and Loſs. The Iſraelites then falling upon the Country, made Havock of all things, and beſieged Meſha King of the Moabites, in Kirhazereth, who being ſtreightened, attempted with 700 Men to break through to the King of Edom, but could not; whereupon taking his Son, (his own ſome think, others the King of Edom's) which ſhould have reigned in his Stead, he offered him for a Burnt-offering upon the Wall. This Spectacle ſeemed ſo horrible, as raiſed Indignation againſt Iſrael, and ſuch Pity towards the Man driven by extreme Neceſſity, (as Joſephus telleth it,) that being mindful of the Mutability of humane Affairs, they raiſed the Siege and departed.

8. Benhadad King of Syria made ſeveral Attempts upon Iſrael, and beſieging Samaria, reduced it unto extreme Neceſſity by Famine. Him Hazael his Servant ſlew, and poſſeſſed himſelf of his Kingdom; but having received, together with it, the Succeſſion of the War, Jehoram went up againſt him, and was accompanied by Ahazaah King of Judah, to Ramoth-Gilead. Here receiving a Wound, he returned to Jezreel, to be cured; but the Army was left under ſeveral Captains, amongſt which was Jehu the Son of Jehoſaphat; to whom Eliſha ſent one of the Sons of the Prophets, to anoint him King. He was preſently received as ſuch by the Army, and returning to Jezreel, ſlew Joram, (and gave Ahaziah his Death's Wound) after he had reigned twelve years. He cauſed Jeſabel to be thrown down out of a Window, where her Carkeiſe was eaten by the Dogs; after which, writing Letters to Samaria, he procured ſeventy Sons of Ahab to be ſlain, and their Heads ſent to him. Then going thither, he ſlew 42 perſons in his way, of the Kindred of Ahaziah King of Judah, who were going to viſit Jehoram and Jeſabel: at Samaria he put to Death all the Prieſts of Baal, and burnt the Temple with the Images. Yet took he no Heed to walk in the Law of the Lord God of Iſrael, with all his Heart, departing not from the Sin of Jeroboam. For his executing of Juſtice upon the Houſe of Ahab, the Lord promiſed that his Seed of the fourth Generation ſhould ſit upon his Throne; yet becauſe of the Rottenneſs of his Heart, he began to cut Iſrael ſhort in his days, by the means of Hazael, who now ſubdued not only the Gileadites, but alſo whatſoever the Iſraelites poſſeſſed beyond Jordan, raging with Cruelty againſt Man, Woman, and Child, as Eliſha had foretold him. Jehu coming to the Kingdom at the ſame time as Athaliah began her Uſurpation in Judah, reigned full 28 years, and then died.

Chap. 8.

Jehu anointed King.

Chap. 9.

A. M. 3117.
Athaliæ. 1.
Chap. 10.

Deſtroyeth the Family Ahab.

9. Jehoahaz his Son ſucceeded him, in the 23*th* year of Joaſh the Son of Ahaziah King of Judah, who did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, in the Sin of Jeroboam; a Grove being alſo in Samaria. Hazael mightily oppreſſed Iſrael alſo in his days, ſo that to him were left but 50 Horſemen, 10 Chariots, and 10000 Foot-men. Yet the Lord was intreated by him, and ſent Iſrael a Deliverer; notwithſtanding which, yet Prince and People remained incorrigible. After he had reigned ſeventeen years he died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Joaſh, who alſo reigned with him about three years, for that he began his Reign in the 37*th* year of Joaſh King of Judah, and is held by the Jews to be that Deliverer, mentioned to have been ſent by God. He overcame the Syrians thrice, as dying Eliſha foretold him (whom he viſited, and conſulted about the Affairs of his Kingdom;) and thereby recovered the Cities loſt to Hazael by his Father. Upon the Occaſion formerly mentioned, he took Jeruſalem, with Ahaziah the King of Judah, and, breaking down the Wall of the City 400 Cubits, plundred the Houſe of the Lord and the Kings Houſe. He alſo was guilty of Jeroboam's Sin, and died after he had reigned together with his Father, and by himſelf ſixteen years.

Jehoahaz.

Chap. 13.

A. M. 3145.
Joaſi 23.

Joaſh.

A. M. 3159.
Joaſi 37.

10. His Son came after him, Jeroboam by name, whom God made inſtrumental to preſerve Iſrael; nay to raiſe it to the higheſt Top of Greatneſs it arrived at. For he recovered Damaſcus and Hamath, which had by Right belonged to the Jeroboam the Second.

Chap. 14.

A. M. 3175.
Amaziæ. 16.

Tribe of Judah, with whatſoever the Syrians had taken from his Predeceſſors, from the ancient Border of the Entrance of Hamath, to the Sea of the Plains, or the Lake Aſphaltites, as Jonas the Prophet the Son of Amitthai had foretold, the ſame with him that propheſied againſt Ninive, being of Gath-Hepher, a Town of the Tribe of (a) Zebulon, in (b) Galilee of the Gentiles; out of which therefore aroſe a Prophet, though the learned Phariſees ſo earneſtly urged the contrary to Nicodemus. In the King's days alſo propheſied Hoſea, and Amos, called from the Herd in Judæa, to propheſie to the People of Iſrael. Notwithſtanding all that God did for Jeroboam, he did Evil alſo in his Sight, accompanying his Anceſtors in the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat. He reigned 41 years, and after his Death the Affairs of his Kingdom fell to decay; way being made for the Ruine of his Houſe, and an Anarchy enſuing for 24 years. For ſo it muſt be, if Zacharias his Son began not his Reign till the 38th of Vzziah King of Judah, the laſt of Jeroboam falling in with the 14th of this King, ſeeing Vzziah is ſaid to have begun his Reign in the 27th of his, and he reigned 41 years. This may well ſeem ſtrange in this Kingdom, where Princes were often made away by Uſurpers; but God had promiſed Jehu, that his Children ſhould reign to the fourth Generation; and this Zacharias might be a Poſthumus, or however very young, and therefore not admitted by the Nobility to govern, till he had attained to ſuch Ripeneſs, as was convenient for ſo great a Charge.

(a) Joſh. 19. 13.
(b) Iſa. 9. 1.

2 Kings 15.

Zachariah.

A. M. 3238.
Hazariæ. 38.

11. Zachariah, doing Evil in the Sight of the Lord, as did his Anceſtors, reigned but ſix Moneths, being then ſlain by Shallum the Son of Jabeſh, who reigned in his ſtead in the 39th year of Azariah King of Judah. He enjoyed his uſurped Royalty but a ſhort ſpace, being after two Moneths ſerved ſo himſelf by Menahem the Son of Gadi, who alſo reigned in his Stead. Menahem ſmote Tiphſah and all that were therein, with the Coaſts thereof from Tirzah, becauſe they opened not to him; and ripped up the Women with Child. He did Evil in the ſight of the Lord, not departing from the Sin of Jeroboam all his days; wherefore God ſtirred up the Spirit of Pul King of Aſſyria, who invaded the Land; but he gave him 1000 Talents of Silver, which he wreſted from the richeſt of his Subjects, to confirm the Kingdom in his hand. After he had held it ten years he died, and his Son Pekahiah reigned in his Stead, in the 50th year of Azariah; ſo that Menahem having begun his Reign in the 39th of that King, and reigned but ten years, here ſeemeth an Inter-regnum of a year or more to have happened after his Death, except that be admitted which ſome think, viz. that Menahem did not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom till about a year after Shallum's Death, purchaſing it then of Pul; ſo that beginning his Reign in the 29th of Azariah, or Vzziah, muſt be underſtood peaceably, and in that year ending. Then muſt Pekahiah have begun his Reign in the very beginning of the 50th year; and ſo a few Moneths being added to the ten years of Menahem, at the furtheſt, there will be no need of an Inter-regnum. Pekahiah treading in the wicked Steps of his Predeceſſors, reigned two years, and then was ſlain by Pekah the Son of Remaliah, one of his Captains, who poſſeſſed himſelf of his Seat.

Shallum.

Menahem.

Pul King of Aſſyria invadeth Iſrael.

Pekahiah.

A. M. 3250.
Hazariæ 50.

12. Pekah joyned with the King of Syria againſt Ahaz King of Judah, ſlew in Judah 120000 in one day, all valiant men, becauſe they had forſaken the Lord God of their Fathers. Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim, ſlew Maaſeiah the Kings Son, Azrikam the Governour of the houſe, and Elkanah that was next the King. Two hundred thouſand were alſo carried Captive, with much Spoil, all which Obed the Prophet, when they came to Samaria, procured to be ſent back. This made Ahab purchaſe the Help of Tiglath-Pileſer King of Aſſyria, who firſt deſtroyed the King and Kingdom of Damaſcus, carried the Inhabitants thereof into Captivity; and then came againſt Pekah, and tranſported the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manaſſes into Halah, Habor, Hara, and to the River Gozan: then croſſing Jordan, he ſet upon Galilee, and carried away the Inhabitants thereof with all the Napthalites (which remained of thoſe that were left by Benhadad) into Aſſyria. Pekah doing Evil in the ſight of the Lord, after he had reigned twenty years, was ſlain by Hoſea the Son of Elah who uſurped the Kingdom.

Pekah.

2 Chron. 28.

1 Chron. 5.26.

The Reubenites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manaſſes, carried Captives into Aſſyria.

13. Hoſhea the 19th King of Iſrael began his Reign in the 12th year of Ahaz King of Judah, who reigned ſeven or eight years with his Father Jotham, and began to reign by himſelf in the 17th year of Pekah; ſo that Hoſhea may truly be ſaid to have began his Reign in the 20th year from the Inauguration of Jotham; which we muſt ſay, except we allow of a kind of Inter-regnum for eight or nine years, during which time Hoſhea, for the Stirs that hapned could not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom; and then muſt we lengthen out the time of this Kingdom longer by ſo many years. Hoſhea did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, but not as the Kings of Iſrael which were before

2 Kings 17. 18.
A. M. 3272.
Achazi 12.

Hoſhea the nineteenth and laſt King of Iſrael.

before him. Againſt him came up Salmanaſſer King of Aſſyria, and made him his tributary Vaſſal, which he continued for ſome time, till weary of this Bondage, he conſpired with So King of Ægypt, and refuſed to pay his Tribute: Hereupon, Salmanaſſer ſubdued firſt the Moabites, leſt he ſhould have an Enemy at his Back, then invaded Iſrael and beſieged Samaria, in the fourth year of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the 7th of Hoſhea. At the end of 3 years (in the 6 of Hezekiah, and the 9 of Hoſea) he took the City, and carried the Iſraelites Captive into Aſſyria, where he placed them in Chalach, Chabor, by the River of Goſan, and in the Cities of Media, becauſe they had not obeyed the Voice of the Lord, but tranſgreſſed the Covenant. In their Seat he placed certain Perſians that inhabited by the River Chuthus, and afterwards, in Diſtinction from the Jews, were called Samaritans. This hapned to Iſrael, for their abominable Idolatry, 255 years after the Rent of the Kingdom; ſo that this Schiſm laſted five Jubilies and ten years; in the 832 after the Entrance into Canaan, according to Ludovicus Cappellus, and therefore in the end of the ſeventeenth Jubilie from that; in the year of the World 3380, or 3381. and ſo in the end of the 69 Jubilie from the Creation; 134 before the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the Captivity of Judah.

The Iſraelites carried away Captive.

A. M. 3280. Ezechiæ 6.

The Samaritans placed in their room.

CHAP. IV.

The moſt ancient Kingdom of Ægypt, Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

1. THIS Country falling, at the Diviſion of the Earth, to Cham and his Poſterity, ſeemeth alſo to have been inhabited by himſelf. For, thence (a) David knew it by the name of the Land of Ham; (b) Plutarch found it was called Chemia; Stephanus, Hermochymius; the Inhabitants themſelves calling it (c) Kam, who diſtinguiſhed their Nomi, by this Alluſion, into Chemmis, Pſochemmis, Pſittachemmis; the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon in Africk, and the names of Ammonis, and Ammonia, given to that Country, challenge no other Original. It is not probable that theſe names ſhould be only given to it upon this Account, that part of his Poſterity here fixed themſelves, for then the like might have been expected concerning many other places. Miſraim his ſecond Son ſucceeded him; or he, to whom Moſes giveth this name, as Father of the Inhabitants of the Land of Miſraiim; it ſcarce being the name of a man, becauſe not of the ſingular number. The Scripture calleth Ægypt (d) often by the name of Maſor, which ſeemeth the ſingular of Miſraiim contracted from Meſoraiim, and ſignifieth a fortified Place; no Country in the World being more fenced by its natural Situation. The Arabians at this day know the Metropolis Alcairo by the name of Meſre, and the Ægyptians anciently called their firſt Moneth Meſori. The dual word Miſraiim ſeemeth to hint at the Diſtinction of Ægypt into Upper and Lower; whereof the former, watered by the River Nile, running in one Channel, was divided into Thebais and Heptanomus. (Thebais being called the Land of Pathros, and diſtinguiſhed from Ægypt by Iſaiah and Jeremiah) and the lower part was by the Greeks called Delta, from the Triangular Figure thereof; the River being herein divided into many Branches.

Cham the firſt Inhabitant of Ægypt after the Flood.

Miſraim his Son.

(a) Pſal. 105. 23, 27.
(b) In Iſide.
(c) Iſiodorus & Hieronymus in Geneſim. vide cap. 1. Parag. 22.

Lege Bocharti Phaleg. l. 4. c. 24.
(d) 2. Kings 19. 24. Eſaias 19. 6. Mich. 7. 12.

Oroſius l. 1. c. 2.

2. This Miſraim is thought to be the ſame with Oſiris, ſo much ſpoken of by the Ægyptians, and accounted the Son of Saturn, the eldeſt of the Gods, and alſo the Son of Jupiter Hammon. For Oſiris being by the Greeks named Dionyſus, one telleth us that he had this Appellation both from his Father and Country, the former part of the word noting the one, and the latter the other, viz. Nyſa a City of Arabia Fœlix, built by Cham, in which he ſeemeth to have been born. From the Reign of Oſiris, to the Coming down of Alexander the Great into Ægypt, the Prieſts reckoned, ſome above 10000 years, others little leſs than 23000. But ſeveral Forms of years being uſed in ſeveral Nations we are to ſuppoſe theirs to have been meaſured rather by the Courſe of the Moon through the Zodiack, than that of the Sun. Jacobus Cappellus therefore thinketh 1889 years to have paſſed from the Reign of this Oſiris to Alexander his Going down into Ægypt, the beginning whereof he fixed at the 1778*th* year of the World; 100 and odd years after the Flood, about the ſame

The ſame with Oſiris.

Diodorus Siculus lib. 1. pag. 1.

time

Oſiris, and Iſis their Renowned Acts.

time that Nimrod his Nephew began his Principality at Babylon. This Oſiris is feigned by the Ægyptians to have married his Siſter Iſis, and they make them the true Bacchus and Ceres. Much they are both reported to have done for the Benefit of Mankind, by bringing it to Civility; to Him they aſcribe the finding out of Agriculture, and to Her the Invention of Corn and Laws. He built Thebes the ancient Seat of the Kings, with 100 Gates; travelled into the greateſt part of the World to teach men Civility with the Uſe of Corn and Wine, taking Pan along with him, who being had in great Reverence amongſt the Ægyptians, dedicated a City to him by the name of Chemmis. In his time lived Hermes, or Mercurius; and Hercules, who being otherwiſe called Gygωn, or Gygnωn, is ſaid to have helped the Gods againſt the Gyants. Oſiris, when he returned, was killed by his wicked Brother Typhon.

Oſiris killed by Typhon.

Typhon puniſhed by Iſis, and her Son Orus.

Diodorus.

3. Typhon, ſeizing upon the Kingdom, was by Iſis, through the Help of her Son Orus, diſpoſſeſſed again of it, and his Life; after which gathering together the 26 parts of her Huſbands Body (into which he had mangled it) ſhe inſtituted to him divine Honours, ordering that the ſeveral Tribes of the Prieſts ſhould dedicate ſome one of their living Creatures to him, and for him worſhip it as long as it lived; then at his Death, ſeeking out another of the ſame kind, to do as much to it. Several things were conſecrated in ſeveral Places, yet by a general Conſent the Sacred Bull, called Apis or Mnevis, was moſt valued, and chiefly adored, becauſe of the ſpecial Help that kind of Creature afforded to Tillage. This Bull was black all over, having only a ſquare white ſpot in his Forehead, ſaith Herodotus, on his right ſide ſaith Pliny, like to a Creſcent, being alſo ſacred to the Moon, as Marcellinus will have it. On the back he had the Image of an Eagle, a knot on the Tongue like to a Crab, and on his Tail double hairs. This kind of Beaſt did the Ægyptians worſhip as the greateſt God, with aſtoniſhing Veneration, as Macrobius termeth it, till it had lived ſeveral years; but not being ſuffered to paſs a certain Term, it was then drowned by the Prieſts. Being dead, a great and ſolemn Mourning there was, untill another could be found with the ſame Marks. Now ſome make this Beaſt to be worſhipped in Honour of Apis, King of the Argives, who going down into Ægypt, was there Deified after his Death, and called Serapis. But there having been ſeveral Kings in divers places, of that name, they are confounded one with another.

The Sacred Bull Apis.

Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 5.

4. Nothing, indeed, but Uncertainties attend the moſt ancient Hiſtory of that Nation; no two Authors agreeing betwixt themſelves, concerning the Succeſſion of the Ægyptian Kings. This is not only to be attributed to the Force of time, but the Unfaithfulneſs of their Prieſts, who having it committed to their Charge, to record the Memorables of their Country, foiſted things of their own heads into the Story, concealed from the Natives whatſoever made againſt their own Profit, and from Strangers all things that tended to the Diſhonour of their Country. Out of ſuch a kind of Deſign they related not the ſame things to ſuch as travelled thither with a Deſire to be informed; ſo that from the corrupt Fountains of their Records have proceeded the Hiſtories of ſeveral, who pretending to have taken them out of the very Archives, are no leſs diſſonant amongſt themſelves than from the Truth. The Catalogues of their Kings are full of inextricable Labyrinths; Manetho being of no Credit, becauſe of his notable Lying, and all thoſe who profeſs to follow him, as Joſephus, Africanus, Euſebius, Syncellus, Scaliger, Uſher, and others not agreeing in their ranking and ordering of them.

The Dynaſties of the Ægyptian Kings.

Euſeb.

5. Several Dynaſties are made to have preceded the time of Abraham, with whoſe Birth (as it is placed in the 43*th* year of Ninus) the beginning of the 16*th* is joyned. Much Labour is ſpent by ſome, in an Endeavour to clear the order of theſe Dynaſties, and to expound them. But, if they ſhould be allowed of, little more than 200 years are to be aſſigned to the Continuance of all the firſt 15. becauſe the Paſſage of Cham, and his Poſterity from the Mountains of Ararat into Ægypt, and the Eſtabliſhment of a formal Government there, could ſcarce be performed within one Century after the Flood; time for the Increaſe of mankind, and the unpaſſableneſs of the Earth duely conſidered; except we caſt the Beginning of the firſt Dynaſtie back beyond the Flood. It hath been thought therefore that theſe were not ſeveral Succeſſions of Kings, which continued for ſo ſmall a time, but rather certain Ranks and Orders of Governours under the Kings; who might be content to enjoy their Eaſe and Quiet, together with the Dignity (as the Kings did which Joſeph ſerved) whil'ſt the Management of publick Affairs was wholly committed to theſe Regents, or Lieutenants, of ſundry Lineages or ſorts of men, who by their Actions might leave greater Impreſſions upon Poſterity than the Kings themthemſelves, and ſo give Occaſion to the Ægyptians of vaunting them for ſo many Sovereign Princes indeed. That Euſebius might accommodate the times and Orders of theſe Dynaſties to the Hiſtories of other parts of the World, he is not afraid to tranſpoſe them as he findeth them in ſeveral Authors. Upon this Account Jacobus Cappellus thinketh it a vain thing to recite in his Chronicle the Series of the Kings, ſeeing Manetho, by whom Scaliger would amend Euſebius, is moſt worthy of Credit. But it being requiſite to give Beginners ſome Inſight into the Story, ſuch things muſt be briefly related, as out of ſuch Uncertainties carry the greateſt Shew of Probability.

Orus the laſt of the Ægyptian Gods.

6. After Typhons Death, Iſis, as Diodorus writeth, for ſome time governed the Kingdom; but ſo joyntly with her Son Orus, or Horus, that he is alſo ſaid to have ſucceeded after the Death of his Father, and is moreover accounted the laſt of the gods. He inſtituted a year conſiſting of three Moneths, and thence a year was called after him Horos. The Ægyptian Year, properly ſo called, conſiſted of 365 days; but beſides this, they had alſo monethly years of thirty dayes, and others of four Moneths apiece, or 120 days, that by this various, and cunning Account, as Cappellus thinketh, they might delude the Greeks. Of this latter way few Examples we meet with: but Diodorus maketh mention of it, aſſigning the Cauſe to have been, for that they divided their Solar year, not into four, but only three parts; and Cappellus maketh this following account to conſiſt of ſuch kind of years. After the gods, came men to the Government, and the Ægyptians boaſted that they had Kings of their own Country, and home-born, for the moſt part, during the Term of 4700 years; after Cambyſes Strangers, as Perſians and Macedonians, having governed them. Now theſe 4700 years he gueſſeth to conſiſt of four Moneths apiece, and to contain 1544 Julian years, which being deducted out of the years of the World, at the Period whereof Cambyſes came down into Ægypt, 1931 will remain; at what time Oſiris, or Orus his Son might perhaps die, who being the laſt of the gods, Kings began where they ended.

Lib. 1. p. 13. &c.

Cenſorinus, &c.

Vide Cappellum ad A. M. 1931. & 1941.

Menis the firſt King.

7. The firſt King that reigned after theſe gods was Menas, or Menis, which name by ſome is thought to have been only of Dignity, and that Oſiris was ſo called. Others think Mercurius Triſmegiſtus meant thereby, for that the Hebrew Word Meni ſignifieth an Arithmetician, and that Oſiris might well be termed Triſmegiſtus, being a great Conquerour, Philoſopher, and Benefactor to Mankind, in giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. Another would have Seſoſtris, whom he ſuppoſeth to have ſucceeded Oſiris, to be meant by Menas, as nothing inferiour to Oſiris in Proweſs and great Undertakings. But Seſoſtris the Great reigned not till many years after, and nothing hindreth but Menas in the Ægyptian Language (to ſay nothing of the Greek) might be a proper name as well as a Title of Dignity. But, who ſucceeded him is not known; the Prieſts feigning 52 Princes to have followed him in order for the ſpace of 1400 years, unto Buſiris, multiplying Kings, Years, Lies (or Fallacies) to make their Story the more admirable. We muſt therefore in this unknown Path, take the blind Conduct of the Dynaſties again, of which omitting the firſt ſeventeen, to which almoſt 4000 years are aſcribed, the 18*th* is by Cappellus made to begin nine years before the time whereunto Euſebius ſets it, viz. in the 107*th* year of the Patriarch Jacob, the firſt in order of it being Amos, or Amoſis.

Herodotus & Diodorus.

Amos or Amoſis.

A. M. 2274.

Chebros. Amenophis. Mephres. &c.

8. To his reign are given 25 years; ſo that, according to this Account, he it was who honoured Joſeph, and ſet him over the Land. He dying in the ſecond year of the Famine, Chebros ſucceeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and him Amenophis, who reigned 21, under whom Jacob died. To him ſucceeded Mephres, according to Euſebius, but Manethon after him placeth his Siſter Ameſſes, or Amerſes, to which he giveth 21 years and 9 Moneths. After this reigned Mephres twelve years, Mephramuthoſis 26, and Thuthmoſis (or Thomſis) 9. After him followed Amenophis (otherwiſe called Palmanothis and Phamenophis) who reigned 31 years, and by ſome is accounted that Memnon whoſe Image of Stone, at Thebes in Ægypt, ſounded like an Harp, when the Sun-Beams, firſt in the Morning beat upon it; which is witneſſed by many Authors of good Credit. To him ſucceeded Orus, or Horus, who reigned 38 years, and to him Acenchres, who reigned 12. Manetho maketh Acenchres the Daughter of Orus, and giveth to her 12 years and one Moneth; after her, he bringeth in Rathotis her Brother, to whom he giveth nine years. But after Acenchres, Euſebius placeth Achoris, and giveth to him but ſeven years, to whom ſucceeded Cenchris the twelfth King: who, being more wicked than his Predeceſſors, oppreſſed the Iſraelites moſt grievouſly, and continued eighteen years in his Tyranny, till an end was put to it in the Red Sea.

Euſeb.

A. M. 2508.

9. Above

The Iſraelites afflicted in Ægypt.

9. Above eight years had they vexed the Iſraelites with inſupportable Burthens, notwithſtanding which, they grew and increaſed exceedingly; nay, although Order was given to drown all the Male Children, leſt growing too numerous, they might in time of War joyn with their Enemies; elſe get them out of the Land with an high hand; or becauſe of a Prediction mentioned by Joſephus, that an Hebrew ſhould be born, who was to afflict and overthrow the Ægyptians. That the Jews lived amongſt them, is ever acknowledged by their Hiſtorians, accounting it an Honour, as all Nations do, to have ſet forth Colonies. But to take away Diſgrace, and to ſave the Honour of their Country, (which to the Prieſts was ever moſt ſolemn) abominable Lies have been made, and ſtrange Stories deviſed, concerning their firſt Coming into Ægypt, and eſpecially about their Departure: which briefly to relate ſeemeth agreeable enough to the Nature of our Deſign.

Manetho his Lies concerning the Original of the Jews.

In ſecundo Ægyptiac. apud Joſephum lib. 1. contr. Apionem.

10. Manetho, an Ægyptian Prieſt and Hiſtorian, pretending to deſcribe the Original of the Jews, relateth, That in the days of one of their Kings, Timaus by name, a certain ignorant People called Hycſos, (which ſignifieth Royal Shepherds, or Captives, as he himſelf interpreteth it) from the Eaſtern parts, with great Confidence invaded Ægypt, which eaſily obtaining without any Force of Arms, they burnt the City and Temple, and raged againſt the Natives with Sword and Servitude. At length they made them a King of their own Stock, named Saltis, who, coming down into the Country about Memphis, impoſed a Tribute upon the upper and neather Province, and put Garriſons in convenient Places. Eſpecially he took Care of the Eaſtern Coaſts, being jealous of the Power of the Aſſyrians; ſo that in the Principality of Sais, Eaſtward from the River Bubaſtis, he built up a City called anciently Anaris, which fortifying with moſt ſtrong Walls, he therein placed a Garriſon of 240000 Men. When he had reigned nineteen years, he gave place to Bæon, who governed 44, after him Apachnas 36 with ſeven Moneths, then Apochis 61, Janias 50, and one Moneth; then Aſſis 49. Under thoſe ſix firſt Kings, they ſore oppreſſed, and endeavoured utterly to dedroy Ægypt, and 511 years had they Power over it. Afterwards the Kings of the Province of Thebes, and the remaining part of Ægypt fell on them with a great and laſting War, and by a King named Aliſfragmuthoſis, were they overcome, and driven up into a place containing the Quantity of 10000 Acres of Ground, called Avaris. The Son of this King, Themoſis by Name, attempted the taking of this Place, beſieged it with 480000 thouſand Men; but, deſpairing of Succeſs, agreed with him, that leaving Ægypt, they ſhould go whither elſe they pleaſed; ſo that, departing with all their Goods, to the number of 240000 Perſons, they travelled through the Deſart into Syria, (for that they feared the Aſſyrians, who then obtained the Empire of Aſia) and built them a City in the Country, afterwards called Judæa, which might ſuffice for ſo many thouſands, and named it Jeruſalem.

11. To this Hiſtory taken out of the ancient Records, Manetho addeth, as he confeſſeth, fabulous Reports riſe amongſt the Vulgar, mixing with the Iſraelites a Multitude of Ægyptians languiſhing with Leproſie and other Diſeaſes; which he relateth, as having forgotten, that the Shepherds left Ægypt 518 years before, as may be gathered from the Series of the Kings, and the Diſtance of time betwixt Themuſis, who reigned when the Shepherds departed, and Amenophis, under whom the Lepers went out, the time of whoſe Reign neither dareth he to define; though he be exact, in the years of other Princes, as Joſephus noteth. Now this Amenophis, forſooth, was told by a Prieſt of the ſame name, That he might ſee the Gods, if he would cleanſe his Kingdom from Lepers, and other unclean Perſons. He, being a very religious man, gathered all the infirm out of the Land, to the number of 80000, whom he ſent with others to cut ſtones on the Eaſt of the River Nile; there being amongſt them alſo ſome of the learned Prieſts infected with Leproſie. Becauſe Favour was ſhewed towards them, the Prieſt, who would have had them deſtroyed, feared much the Diſpleaſure of the gods, as well againſt himſelf as the King, and foreſeeing they ſhould have Power over Ægypt for thirteen years, he durſt not tell the King ſo much, but wrote a Book concerning the matter, and then killed himſelf; which caſt the King (you muſt know) into a great Melancholy.

12. But being ſtill deſired to do ſomething for the Security of the diſeaſed People, he gave them Avaris, the City of the Shepherds, now not inhabited: whither being entred, and perceiving the place to be very advantagious for Rebellion, they made Choice of Oſarſiphus, one of the Prieſts of Heliopolis, for their Captain, ſwearing to obey him in all things. He preſently eſtabliſhed for Law, that they ſhould not worſhip the gods, nor abſtain from ſuch Creatures as were moſt ſacred to the Ægyptians; to marry with none but thoſe that were tied to them by the ſame League, and commanding many other things (eſpecially ſuch as he knew contrary to Ægyptian Cuſtoms) he prepared for War. Then ſent he to the Shepherds at Jeruſalem, formerly expelled by Themuſis, to open their Condition to them, and to invite them to give their Aſſiſtance againſt Ægypt. The Shepherds readily cloſed with the Motion, and all, to the number of 200000, marched down to Avaris. Amenophis much ſtartled hereat, eſpecially becauſe of the Prediction of the Prieſt, committed his Son, but five years old, to a Friend; and, together with Apis and his other gods, went into Æthiopia, where he was received with all his Multitudes of Subjects, and was kindly entertained by the King, who made Proviſion for them for theſe thirteen years. The Solymitans, or Shepherds, with the unclean Multitude, made now great Havock of all things in Ægypt, burning Villages and Cities, and raging againſt the ſacred Animals with their Prieſts, whom they compelled to be their Butchers, and drave away naked; the forementioned Prieſt ſtill giving Laws, and framing their Policy; who being from Oſiris the Heliopolitan-god called Oſarſiphus, now changed his Name into Moſes. But at the end of the thirteen years, Amenophis returned with great Power out of Æthiopia, and with the Aſſiſtance of his Son Rampſes, fell upon the Shepherds and unclean Multitude, whereof killing many, they purſued the reſt as far as the Borders of Syria.

Chæremon his ridiculous Lies.

13. Theſe ridiculous Lyes are much more augmented by others. Chæremon, who profeſſed to write the Hiſtory of Ægypt, giveth the ſame name Amenophis to the King, and of Rhameſſes to his Son; but addeth, that the Goddeſs Iſis appeared to the former, complaining that her Temple was deſtroyed by War. That Phritiphantes a ſacred Scribe, told the King, that if he would be freed from Terrours in the Night, he muſt purge Ægypt from polluted Men: he therefore gathered out 25000 diſeaſed Perſons, caſt them out of his Borders: That the two Scribes Moſes and Joſeph (the Ægyptian Name of the former being Tiſithes, and of the latter Peteſephis) became their Leaders, and, coming to Peluſium, found there 380000, which Amenophis having left behind would not convey into Ægypt: with thoſe they ſtruck up a League, and undertook an Expedition againſt the Land. Amenophis not expecting the Iſſue of their Attempt, fled into Æthiopia, leaving his Wife big with Child, which lying hid in a Cave, brought forth a Son called Meſſenes. He, when he came to age expelled the Jews, to the number of 200000 into Syria, and received back his Father Amenophis out of Ethiopia.

Lyſimachus his malicious forgeries.

14. Lyſimachus an Hiſtorian, going beyond the other two in the maliciouſneſs of his Lyes, wrote, that when Bocchoris reigned in Ægypt, the People of the Jews, infected with Leproſie, Scab, and other Diſeaſes, reſorted to the Temple to beg for their Living, and many being infected with this Diſaſe, Barrenneſs fell upon the Land. Bocchoris, ſending to the Oracle of Ammon about it, received this Anſwer, That the Temples were to be cleanſed from impure and prophane Perſons, who were to be caſt out into the Deſart; but the Scabby and Leprous ſhould be drowned, the Sun not enduring they ſhould live; which being done, and the Temples purified, fruitfulneſs would be reſtored to the Earth. Bocchoris accordingly ordered the Prieſts to gather all the prophane out of the Temples, and give them up to Souldiers, who were to carry them into the Wilderneſs; and the Leprous and Scabby to be wrapped in Lead, and caſt into the Sea; which being drowned accordingly, the other were expoſed to periſh in the Deſart. But thoſe, conſulting for their own Safety, kept Fires that Night, and ſtrict Watch; then, the day following, a ſolemn Faſt to God for their Preſervation. On the next, Counſel was given them by a certain Man named Moſes, that they ſhould march on in one Body, till they arrived at ſome good Soil. Then commanded he them to be kind to no man, to give bad Counſel rather than good, and overthrow the Temples of the Gods, as many as they ſhould find; which being approved of, they travelled through the Deſart, and after much Trouble, came to a fruitful Soil, where uſing the Inhabitants very injuriouſly, and rifling and burning the Temples, they arrived at length in that Country, ſince called Judæa, and building a City ſeated themſelves there. This City was at firſt called Hieroſyla, from the ſpoiling of the Temples; but afterwards, to ſhun the Diſgrace of the Occaſion, they changed it into Hieroſolyme, and took the name of Hieroſolymitans.

Apion his Lie.

15. Further than this; Apion a Grammarian of Alexandria, as he counterfeited himſelf, but born in Oaſis, a Town of Ægypt, amongſt ſeveral other Lyes againſt the Jews, wrote, that he had received from the eldeſt of the Ægyptians, how Moſes was a Heliopolitan, and, being brought up according to the Cuſtoms of his Country, changed the Rites thereof at his own Pleaſure: That he led the Leprous, Blind, and Lame, out of Ægypt; but fairly ſaith, it was in the firſt year of the ſeventh Joſephus lib. 2. contr. Apionem.

Olympiad, the ſame wherein Carthage was built by the Tyrians, which happened about 150 years after Hiram the King of Tyre (as appeareth out of the Phœnician Annals) with whom Solomon was contemporary. He mentioned the ſame number of infirm Perſons as Lyſimachus, but addeth a Reaſon why the Sabbath was ſo called. Travelling ſix days together, ſaith he, on the ſeventh day they reſted in Judæa, for that they were ſorely plagued with Ulcers in their privy parts, and named it Sabboth, from the Ægyptian Word Sabbatoſis, which ſignifieth that Diſeaſe. Notwithſtanding that he ſaith they finiſhed their Journey in ſix days, yet he further writeth, that Moſes hid himſelf for forty days upon the Mount Sinai (which lyeth betwixt Ægypt and Arabia) whence coming down, he gave Laws unto the Jews. As for the Jewiſh Religion, he was not aſhamed to write, that in their Temple was ſet the head of an Aſſe made of Gold, and of great Value, which being there worſhipped, was taken thence when Antiochus Epiphanes ſpoiled the Place.

Reaſons for theſe Lyes raiſed by the Ægyptians, and others againſt the Jews.

16. Such Abſurdities were delivered by the Ægyptians, and thoſe who out of deſire to gratifie them, have, after their Example, endeavoured to conceal the Truth; to which Joſephus in his two Books againſt Apion, hath abundantly anſwered. Several Reaſons have moved them to corrupt their Original Records. The Iſraelites growing great in that Country, out of it they returned to the promiſed Land by the ſtretched out Arm of God, to the great Reproach of their cruel and imperious Lords. The Difference of Religion raiſed alſo betwixt the two Nations (as betwixt the Jews and the whole World) mortal Enmity, whilſt the one worſhipped the only true God, and the baſe and degenerate Spirit of the other fell down to things far inferiour to themſelves; which Difference ſome (though but few) Perſons diſcerning, were ambitious to become Proſelytes to the Jewiſh Doctrine: Hence again aroſe ſuch Envy, that ſome deſcended to that Indiſcretion and Weakneſs, as to contradict their own moſt ancient and authentick Writers. The in-bred Blindneſs of men's Minds, increaſed by Education, hath ſo far prevailed, that the (a) greateſt part of Heathen Writers have in this Contention ſided with the Ægyptians, (otherwiſe contemptible enough in their Eyes) and ſubſcribed to what they have ſaid concerning the Original of the Jewiſh Nation; though ſome (b) have not given Credit to ſuch Reports.

(a) As Diodorus Siculus in Eclog. lib. 34. & 40. Tacitus Hiſt. lib. 5. ad initium. Juſtin. lib. 36.
(b) Strabo lib. 16. p. 761. Dion. Caſſius lib. 37.

Manetho his falſe Chronology.

17. As Manetho erreth in the Cauſe of the Departure of the Jews out of Ægypt, ſo alſo in the time thereof, though not ſo groſſely as his Friend Apion. Manetho nameth the King Themuſis, by whom they were expelled: Who, if the ſame with Amoſis, he lived 230 years before their true Departure; and that he is the ſame appeareth by Manetho's Catalogue, taken out of Joſephus. But (to go on with the Story of the Kings) Themuſis reigned, according to Manetho, 25 years and four Moneths after their Expulſion. Chebron his Son ſucceeded him, and reigned thirteen years; next him, Amenophis 20 with ſeven Moneths; his Siſter Ameſſes two, and nine Moneths. Mephres followed her, and continued twelve years and nine Moneths; him Mephramuthoſis, who reigned 25, and ten Moneths; then Themoſis nine, and eight Moneths; Amenophis thirty, and ten Moneths; Orus 36, and five Moneths. His Daughter Acencheres reigned ten years and one Moneth, Rathotis her Brother nine years; Acencheres twelve, and five Moneths; another of that Name twelve, and three Moneths; Armais four, and one Moneth; Armeſis one, and four Moneths; Armeſſes Miamun ſixty ſix, and two Moneths; and laſtly Amenophis nineteen, and ſix Moneths. In whoſe time one who, forſaking Euſebius, followeth Manetho, in ranking thoſe Kings holdeth the Iſraelites to have departed Ægypt, and conſequently will have this King drowned in the Sea. That Rameſſes Miamun was he who firſt began to afflict the Iſraelites, the length of his Reign (as * one ſuppoſeth) maketh probable; whoſe Name alſo ſeemeth to him to have given Appellation to one of the Cities, in building of which they were employed.

* Uſſerius Annal. Vet. Teſt. ad A.M. 2427. & 2494.

Manetho apud Joſephum l. 1. contr. Apionem.

A. M. 2422.

Sethoſis or Ægyptus.

18. After Amenophis reigned Sethoſis, who having great Forces both by Land and Sea, left his Brother Armais Deputy of Ægypt, and forbidding him the Diadem and medling with his Wife or Concubines, undertook an Expedition againſt Cyprus and Phœnicia, and then againſt the Aſſyrians and Medes, all which he brought under, either by the Sword or the Terror of his name, whereby, elevated in his mind, he confidently marched up and down the Eaſt Countries, overrunning the Cities and States thereof at his Pleaſure. Much time being herein ſpent, his Brother in the mean while acted all things in Ægypt contrary to his Injunctions, by the Advice of his Friends, aſſuming the Diadem and rebelling. Of this the Chief-Prieſt ſecretly gave him Intelligence, ſo that haſting back to Peluſium, he recovered his Kingdom. Manetho addeth, that this Sethoſis was alſo called Ægyptus, (from whence the Country took the Name of Ægypt) and this his Brother Armais had

His Brother Armais or Danaus.

Rameſſes Miamun the ſame with Neptune.

Amenophis his Son with Buſiris.

alſo the Appellation of Danaus. If ſo; then Amenophis, who was ſwllowed up of the Sea, muſt be taken for Belus, the Father of Ægyptus and Danaus according to the Greeks, who not being confounded with the Father of Ninus (as by Mythologiſts he is wont to be) is ſaid to have lived 322 years before the Deſtruction of Troy, which account Learned Uſher judgeth fitly to agree with the time of Amenophis. He alſo thinketh Rameſſes Miamun to be Neptune, Mia coming near to, and therefore ſeemeth to be derived from, Moy; which in the ancient Ægyptian Language, according to Joſephus, ſignifieth Water. Neptune is ſaid alſo to be Father of Buſiris, who at this time tyrannizing about the River Nile, cruelly ſlew ſuch Strangers as came near him. Such a Son indeed was worthy of ſo cruel a Father as Rameſſes Miamun; and it ſeemeth likely enough, that the Story of Buſiris might be taken from his and his Sons Cruelty to the Iſraelites, and ſo the thing may well enough be applied to Amenophis. Further, if we obſerve what * another telleth us, that the Poets are wont to call cruel and bloody men by the name of Neptune, as born of the raging and troubleſome Sea; then may we find more Reaſon for Rameſſes Miamun his being ſo called, becauſe of his Inhumanity towards the Iſraelites and their innocent Children.

What the Greeks write concerning Seſothis.

Lib. 2.

19. Now, to joyn this Story of the Ægyptians with that of the Greeks, (whom yet the other complain of, as corrupting their Antiquities) Apollodorus writeth, how Neptune, on Lybia the Daughter of Epaphas (who being the Son of Telegonus, and Io the ſecond Daughter to Jaſus King of Argos, built Memphis, as ſome ſay, and reigned in the lower part of Ægypt) begat two Sons Belus and Agenor, whereof the latter went into Phœnicia, and there reigned. Belus obtained Ægypt, and of Anchinoe the Daughter of Nilus begot Ægyptus and Danaus. He ſent Danaus to inhabit Africk or Lybia (ſo called from his Mother; and after Ægyptus had ſubdued the Country of the Melampodi, or Black-feet, named it Ægypt after himſelf, which according to Euſebius, was formerly called Aeria, and, according to others, Potamitis. But he whom Maneth, in Joſephus, calleth Seſothis, ſeemeth to be the ſame with Diodorus his Seſooſis, and Seſoſtris of Herodotus, concerning whom both of them record (as Manetho hath done) very admirable things. Agreeable to what Manetho delivereth of Seſothis, Herodotus writeth, that Seſoſtris ſubdued many Nations. (a) Diodorus ſaith, that Seſooſis conquered Arabia and Lybia before his Father's Death, and afterwards, having a great Ambition to do as much by all the World, firſt ſecured the Affections of his Subjects at home (to keep him in Obedience) by his Clemency and Bounty. Then with an Army of 600000 Foot, 24000 Horſe, and 27000 Chariots, he ſet upon the Æthiopians, towards the South, whom having conquered, he compelled to pay a Tribute of Ebonie, Ivory, and Gold. With a Navy of 400 Ships ſent into the Red Sea, he ſubdued all the maritime Coaſts, as far as India; he himſelf with a Land-Army overrunning not only thoſe parts of Aſia which afterwards Alexander ſubdued, but beyond Ganges all as far as the Ocean it ſelf.

His Conqueſts.

Lib. 2. c. 102, &c.

(a) Lib. 1. p. 34, &c.

20. After this, he conquered the Nations of Scythia as far as the River Tanais (which ſevereth Aſia from Europe) and left ſome of his Ægyptians to make a Plantation by the Lake Mæotis, that gave original to the Nation of the Colchi, which the Ægyptians ſuppoſed they ſufficiently proved to be their Colonie from the Uſe of Circumciſion, imagining that the Jews had alſo this Rite from Them. Finally all Aſia he ſubdued, with moſt of the Iſlands Cyclades; but then paſſing over into Europe, was in danger of loſing his Army for want of Proviſions, and by the Difficulty of Places: therefore in Thrace he put Bounds to his Expedition, having in all Places erected Pillars, wherein was written his Succeſs; and where he found Courage, he cauſed a Member of a Man to be ingraven, but where he met with Cowardiſe that of a Woman. At Length, after nine years, he returned home with much Spoil, where he refreſhed, and rewarded his victorious Army. Here he was not idle, but ſet himſelf to ſuch Works as he thought might eternize his Name, wherein he employed none of his natural Subjects, but the Captives he had brought with him. This the Babylonians not enduring, brake out into Rebellion, and, fortifying a place near the River, held it out in Deſpight of him, till at laſt by Compoſition they enjoyed a Seat, which they called Babylon, in Remembrance of their own Country. He raiſed up great heaps of Stones and Earth, and to them removed ſuch Cities, as by Reaſon of the Loweneſs of their Situation, were obnoxious to Inundations from the River: yet, leſt there ſhould be want of Water, and for Convenience of Trade, he cauſed Rivolets to be digged throughout the Land; he alſo fortified the Country by a Wall on the Eaſt, and otherwiſe provided againſt Invaſions.

* A. Gellius Noct. Attic. lib. 15. c. 21.

His Pride.

Sethoſis, or Seſoſtris, the ſecond, Son to the other.

Actiſanes King of Æthiopia.

21. For an Oſtentation of his Greatneſs, he cauſed ſuch, as being ſubdued held their Kingdoms of him, or had received new Principalities at his hand, at certain times to come down with their Preſents, whom he otherwiſe uſed with much Reſpect: but being to go to the Temple, or enter the City, he would looſe his Horſes out of his Chariot, and be drawn by four of theſe Princes. At Length, having excelled all men in Conqueſts, and other Royal Atchievements, he fell blind, and killed himſelf when he had reigned 33 years; for which Act he was the more admired by the Ægyptians. Theſe amongſt other things are reported of Seſoſtris, before whoſe Statue many years after Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes cauſing his own to be erected, the chief Prieſt contradicted it, alleadging that Darius had not yet excelled Seſoſtris in honourable Actions; with which Freedom the King was well pleaſed, and ſaid, if he lived, he would labour to come no whit ſhort of him. His Son ſucceeded him, of the ſame Name and Misfortune in the Loſs of his Sight, which to recover, he was bid by an Oracle to waſh his Eyes in the Urine of ſome Woman which never knew any other man than her own Huſband. Beginning with that of his own Wife, he proceeded to make Tryal of the Honeſty of many others, but found none effectual to the Cure, but the Wife of a certain Gardiner, which Woman he then married, and burnt all the reſt. Many after him followed in Order till one Arnoſis came to the Government, who by his Tyranny made way for Actiſanes, the King of Æthiopia. He uſing his Power with Moderation, put no Malefactor to Death, but, cutting off their Noſes, ſent them away into the Confines of Ægypt and Syria, where he built them a City, called from the Maimedneſs of the Inhabitants Rhinocolura, which was deſtitute of all ſorts of Proviſions through the Barrenneſs, and Unhealthfulneſs of the Place. The Soil he choſe on Purpoſe, that they might be diverted from idle, and vitious Courſes, by anxious and effectual Care for a Livelyhood, which they got by a Trade of Fiſhing in the adjoyning Sea.

Mendes.

After, an Anarchy.

Remphis.

Nileus, from whom the Nileans named.

22. After his Death the Ægyptians recovered the Sovereignty, and created a King of their own Nation, called Mendes. He ſpent his Life in making Proviſion for Death by a Sepulchre inimitable for Art, which he made under the Notion of a Labyrinth; according to which Pattern they believed Dædalus to have framed that he made for Minos King of Crete, wherein to keep the Minotaure. After Mendes an Anarchy followed for a long time, till one of ignoble Extraction was made King; by the Ægyptians named Cetes, but by the Greeks Proteus, who living in the time of the Trojan War, had great Skill in Aſtrology, and the Knowledge of Winds; whence, and becauſe the Kings of Ægypt were wont to have ſeveral kinds of living Creatures, Trees, Fire, and other things painted, and worn about their Heads, the Greeks took Occaſion to invent that Fable of his Turning himſelf into all manner of Shapes. Remphis his Son, and Succeſſor, ſpent his time in the Improvement of his Revenue and Cuſtomes, inſomuch that he died far richer than any of his Predeceſſors, having got together 400000 Talents of Gold and Silver. The next who was any thing conſiderable, was Nileus, who becauſe he took great Care about bringing Water from the River to furniſh the Country, changed the name of it from Ægypt into Nile.

Chemmis firſt buildeth a Pyramid.

Diodorus.

23. The 8*th* from Nileus was Chemmis, who being born at Memphis reigned fifty years, and built the greateſt of the three Pyramids, counted amongſt the ſeven Wonders of the World. Herodotus writeth that the firſt King who gave his Mind to this Work was Cheops, and that he proſtituted his Daughter to raiſe Money for this Purpoſe: That the biggeſt was twenty years in building by no fewer than 100000 Work-men, towards the Diet of whom the Price of Onions and Garlick only, amounted to 1600 Talents of Silver: That his Daughter, of every one who had to do with her begged a Stone, and therewith built a little Pyramid near adjoyning. Diodorus writeth that the Baſis of the greateſt, was on each ſide 700 Foot broad, the height above 600 Foot, and at the Top it was ſix Cubits broad, all of ſolid Stone very hard, and of an everlaſting Subſtance, which he proveth, for that the whole Structure in his time remained unchanged and uncorrupted, though raiſed 1000 years before. But others which within this hundred years have travelled into Ægypt relate how thoſe monſtrous Buildings which ſtand 13 Miles off from Memphis, and look like Mountains at a Diſtance, are on the North-ſide much eaten, and conſumed with that Wind; the Eteſian Winds being there as much putrifying as the Southern in other Parts. Theſe Piles of Stone ſtand in a ſandy Place which affordeth not any Quarries of Stone, ſome five Miles diſtant from the Nile, ſo that the Work may well ſeem right miraculous, though the Ægyptians raiſed many Fables thereupon. But ſo many thouſands of men were to be killed with this Toil that one might be ſtately buried; which yet they ſay hapned not to him: For the Vide Phocium lib. 36. c. 22.

People were ſo enraged hereat, that his Son durſt not there bury him, but laid him in another obſcure and ignoble place. And yet he could not contain himſelf, but to his Power muſt alſo imitate his Father's Madneſs.

Cephren. Herodotus. Diodorus.

24. Cephren the Brother of Chemmis ſucceeded him, and reigned 56 years, though ſome would have his Son Chabryis immediately to have followed him. He ſpent his time the ſame way, building another Pyramid in Workmanſhip like to the former, but much inferiour to it in Compaſs and Largeneſs; being alſo buried in an obſcure place, for Fear of the Rage of the Multitude. After Cephren followed Mycerinus (or Mycherinus) the Son of Chemmis, or Cheops, of whom the Ægyptians made great Account, becauſe he reformed much amiſs in his Father's and Uncle's Days. He alſo built a Pyramid leſs than the other, but in Excellency of Workmanſhip far excelling them. One Bocchoris ſucceeded next, according to Diodorus; in Body contemptible, but for Endowments of mind going beyond all his Predeceſſors. Then, after a long time came in Sabacon the Æthiopian, and reigned in Ægypt. But Herodotus writeth that Aſychis ſucceeded Mycerinus, and built a Pyramid of Brick; then followed Anyſis, who being blind, in his time Sabacus, or Sabacon, invaded Ægypt, and drove him into the Fens, where he hid himſelf: but Africanus relateth that Sabacon took Bocchoris alive, and burning him quick, reigned in his Stead eight years. This Cruelty is little agreeable to that Humanity which Herodotus aſcribeth to him, viz. that he put no Malefactor to Death; but, according to the Degree of Guilt, impoſed upon every one the Carriage of ſo much Earth to the Place where he dwelt; and hereby the Towns were made much higher, and leſs ſubject to Inundations at the time of the overflowing of the River. His Piety is much commended; for being told by one of the gods, that if he would reign quietly in Ægypt he muſt cut off all the Prieſts by the Middle, he made Choice rather to quit his Intereſt in the Kingdom, and the Poſſeſſion thereof, than to hazard the Quiet of it, or commit ſuch an Act of Cruelty. He is thought by ſome to be the ſame with Soo, King of Ægypt, who combined with Hoſhea of Iſrael againſt Salmanaſar.

Mycherinus.

Bocchoris.

Sabacon.

25. After his Departure Herodotus brings the blind man out of his lurking Hole, where he had now lien fifty years, and maketh him to have recovered the Kingdom. More likely it is that Sathon the Prieſt of Vulcan ſucceeded him, thought to be Senechus his Son, whom Africanus placeth after him; and it may ſeem probable enough that if he forſook the Kingdom himſelf, yet he might leave his Son in the Government. This Sathon (or Sethon) wholely devoted to his Superſtition neglected Military men, and therefore, when Senacherib King of Aſſyria invaded Ægypt, was quite forſaken by them; yet he is ſaid, by his Importunity ſo far to have prevailed with his god, that pitching his Tents at Peluſium, the Mice did eat the Thongs of the Aſſyrian Targets, and the Horſe-Bridles, ſo that his Enemies were rendred incapable of fighting; and, confounded with Fear at ſo ſtrange an Accident, retreated. But whatſoever was done at Peluſium, the * Prophecies againſt Ægypt clearly ſhew that the Aſſyrians pierced further into the Country, and led away a Multitude in Captivity. After Senechus, Africanus placeth Tiracus the Æthiopian, the ſame with Tirhaka, who affrighted Senacherib back into his Country, and is ſaid to have made an Expedition into Europe, and pierced as far as the Pillars of Hercules. Him followed an Anarchy of two years, and then happened the Government of twelve men together, which having continued fifteen years, Pſammeticus one of the twelve, aſſiſted by the Ionians and Carians, got the Power wholly to himſelf. He reigned 54 years, 29 whereof he ſpent in the Siege of Azotus, or Aſhdod in Syria. By placing his Ægyptian Souldiers in the left Wing of his Army, he gave them ſuch Diſtaſte, that diſdaining Strangers ſhould have the chief Place, 200000 forſook him, and do what he could, departing into Æthiopia, there ſeated themſelves, He, firſt of all Ægyptian Princes, invited the Greeks, and others to trade in his Dominions, from which they had been formerly diſcouraged, either by the ſeverity of his Predeceſſors, or by giving Credit to the Fable of Buſiris.

Sathon.

* Nahum 3. Eſay 20.30,31. 2 Kings 18.

Tirhaka. A. M. 3288.

Strabo. Diodorus. Herodotus.

Pſammeticus.

Pharoh-Neco. A. M. 3390. V. C. 139. Joſiæ 30.

26. He left the Kingdom to his Son Necos, called in Scripture Pharoh-Neco, who firſt undertook that Fruitleſs Task of cutting a Paſſage from the River Nile into the Red-Sea, and in that work ſpent the Lives of 120000 men. Undertaking a War at Gods Command againſt the Aſſyrian, Joſias King of Judah oppoſed him in the Valley of Megiddo, where he was worſted, and ſo mortally wounded, that he died within a ſhort Space. After his Return he diſpoſed of the Kingdom of Judah to Eliakim, to whom he gave the name of Jehoiakim, and made him his Tributary: Him Nebuchadneſar King of Aſſyria withdrawing from his Obedience, to his own Service, Neco went up againſt the Aſſyrian to Carchemiſh, and there was ſlain, as is before (a) ſhewn from Scripture. Herodotus (b) writeth that he got a Victory over the Syrians in Magdalum, and took Cadytis in Syria, which may well be that Kadeſh mentioned by (c) Moſes. He reigned ſixteen years, ſaith Herodotus, ſix ſaith Euſebius, and was ſucceeded by his Son Pſammis or Pſammetichus, who after he had reigned ſix years made an Expedition into Æthiopia and died. Him followed Apries his Son, called in Scripture Pharoh Hophra and Vaphres, who invading Phœnicia, made War by Land upon Sidon. He fought a Battel at Sea with the Tyrians, whom overthrowing, and returning home with great Spoil, he was ſo far puffed up, as to perſwade himſelf that no God could deprive him of his Kingdom; ſo ſtrongly did he think he had eſtabliſhed it. But making War upon the Cyrenæans, he received from them a great Overthrow, and the Souldiers thereupon mutined againſt him, as having wilfully expoſed them unto Danger. To appeaſe them, he ſent one Amaſis, whom they preſently choſe for their King, and he after ſome Pauſe accepted their Offer. Apries fled, but after ſome time was taken, and by Amaſis delivered up to his Subjects, who ſtrangled him, having reigned ſix years.

Pſammis.

Pharoh-Hophra, or Apries.

Amaſis.

(a) Chap. 3. Sect. 3. Paragr. 18.
(b) L. 2. c. 159.
(c) Num. 20. 16.
A. M. 3396.
V. C. 145.
Joakimi 4.

A. M. 3426.
Nebuchad. 30.
Aſtyagis 15.

27. With this Report of Herodotus agreeth Diodorus Siculus his Story, relating how Apries vanquiſhed the Cyprians and Phœnicians in a Sea-fight, took by Force and demoliſhed Sidon, wan the other Towns of Phœnicia, with the Iſle of Cyprus, and finally periſhed, as is before rehearſed, when he had reigned 22 years. But others of late conſidering the more ſure Teſtimony of Scripture, and how Ægypt was promiſed to Nebuchadneſar * as Wages for the Service he had done againſt Tyre; how Pharoh and his Army ſhould be ſlain by the Sword, and the Jews in Ægypt, and Pharoh Hophra delivered into the hands of his Enemies as Zedekiah had been; reſolve that the Ægyptian Prieſts notably deluded thoſe Hiſtorians, hiding the Diſgrace and Bondage of their Nation. Therefore it is thought fit rather to believe the Report of Joſephus, that Nebuchadneſar in the 23th year of his Reign, and the fifth after the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem conquered Ægypt; killed the King thereof, and appointed another in his Stead. Some think Amaſis might be uſed as an Inſtrument by Nebuchadneſar, and for that was made Governour by him; others, that the Deputy, or Vice-Roy, which he had ſet over the Land was ſlain by Amaſis. Agreeable to this latter Opinion, the Army of Ionians and Carians are held to have been none other than the Garriſons of Mercenaries left by the Aſſyrian, for the Guard of his Viceroy, and Cuſtody of this his new ſubdued Province: as likewiſe the Company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who, together with the Friends of ſuch as were ſlain in that Expedition, depoſed, and ſlue Apries, are conceived to have been the Ægyptian Fugitives, which then recovered their own Country, ſeeing that of the Prophet was verified: At the end of forty years will I gather the Ægyptians from the Poople where they were ſcattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Ægypt, and will cauſe them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their Habitation, and they ſhall be there a ſmall Kingdom.

* Ezek. 29. 18, 19.
Jerem. 43. and 44.

Herodotus.

Amaſis his Law.

Pſammenitus.

28. Amaſis being a man of mean Extraction, and perceiving himſelf upon that Account, deſpiſed of his People, took a Golden Veſſel wherein he and his Gueſts had uſed to waſh their Feet, and thereof made an Image of a God, which when the Ægyptians worſhipped with great Reverence, he called them together, and comparing his Original with the former Uſe of the Gold, convinced them of that equal Reverence which the Change of both ought to beget in them. Under him the Ægyptians boaſted that their Country was moſt happy, no fewer than 1020 Towns of good Note flouriſhing therein, in his days. He made a Law that all men ſhould yearly give Account how they lived, which if they could not prove to be by ſome honeſt Calling, they were to be puniſhed with Death; and this, Solon is ſaid to have tranſlated to Athens. He being the firſt of all others that took Cyprus, reigned 54 or 55 years. It ſeemeth probable enough that he revolted from Cyrus, being before tributary to the Babylonian Empire (though the Prieſts hid this amongſt other things from Herodotus and others;) and that this was the chief Cauſe, whatever is pretended, why Cambyſes came down and conquered his Kingdom. This was not accompliſhed in his time, he dying in Preparation for the War. But his Son Pſammenitus ſucceeding him loſt all, and ſo Ægypt became a Province of the Perſian Empire; which things involving much of the Affairs of Perſia, and nearly relating to the Tragedy of Cambyſes, are to be referred to a more proper Place.

A. M. 3480.
V. C. 229.
Cambyſis. 5.

The Kingdom of Ægypt very ancient.

29. The Ægyptians, accounting themſelves the moſt ancient of all Nations, were not wanting indeed of many Reaſons to witneſs their Antiquity, although their Pride tranſported them beyond the true Epoche of their Original. The Scripture it ſelf witneſſeth Ægypt to have been a mighty Kingdom, every way better repleniſhed than any other Country that we can read of, in ſo ancient times: in the days of Abraham it was a flouriſhing Kingdom, and the Iſraelites were not a People till ſuch time as the Ægyptians were one of the moſt flouriſhing Nations upon Earth. The Ethiopians concluded themſelves more ancient, becauſe Ægypt, as they thought, was of old a Sea or Lake, ancient Writers being of Opinion, that it was the Gift of the River Nile, which having once contained within it ſelf all the Compaſs of the Land, at length warped it up out of it's Bowels; ſo that from it's Mud, or Dirt, the firm ground proceeded, and became a Continent. They urge, that in the yearly Inundations of the Nile much Mud is left and ſticks Immoveable; that in the Mountains of Ægypt the Shells of Fiſhes are found; that the Springs and Wells there digged, afford Water of a brackiſh Taſte, as if the Reliques of Sea-water yet remained in the Earth. Laſtly, they ſay, that the Iſland Pharus at this day, is ſcarce a Mile diſtant from Alexandria; whereas in the time of (a) Homer it was a Day and Nights Sail off from Ægypt. But Experience ſheweth, that for ſome thouſands of years there hath been no Acceſſion by any ſuch Mud, but that thoſe Towns which anciently ſtood upon the Shore of the Sea, and River, ſtill continue there. The Shells might come from the general Deluge, being found alſo in other Places as well as Ægypt. Many deſcribe the Fountain of the Sun at Heliopolis, and yet none obſerve any brackiſh Taſt in the Water. And as for Pharus, in the Trojan times it was diſtant from Canobus, where Menelaus is thought to have arrived, but 120 Furlongs; and therefore could not be a Day and Nights Sail from Ægypt, as Homer wrote by Virtue of his Poetick Liberty, or rather his Ignorance in Geography.

Ephorus apud Diodorum l. 1. p. 25. Herod. lib. 2. c. 5. Ariſt. Meteor. l. 1. c. 14. Strabo. l. 12. p. 536. D. Plut. in Iſide. Plin. l. 2. c. 85. Ammian. l. 22. (a) Odyſſ. l. 4. ver. 356.

Ægypt not the Gift of the Nile, as was generally imagined.

Vide Brodæi Miſcell. l. 3. c. 5. & Bocharti Phaleg. l. 4. c. 24.

30. Certainly they had Cauſe enough to charge the Greeks with Novelty, and to jeer (as they did) at their pedantick Pretence to Antiquity; the Luſtre of any one of their Commonwealths being to that of theirs but as yeſterday; their Laws and Policy, their Religion and Rites but new Upſtarts, and (as the Ægyptians would go about to demonſtrate) but Copies of their Original. There was Ripeneſs of Literature, civil Diſcipline, and Inventions of ſeveral ſorts amongſt them, before the like did as much as bud forth in Greece, Italy, or other Weſtern Countries. They ſtick not to inſtance wherein the Greeks have borrowed of them. All, or moſt of the Names of theirs Gods, with the Superſtition belonging to them, were, they ſay, ſtollen out of their Country, the Rites being ſomething altered and new Stories invented, to blind the World, as to their Original. Oſiris they avow to have been the true Bacchus or Dionyſus, in whoſe Myſteries Orpheus the Poet being initiated whilſt he ſojourned in Ægypt, when he was afterwards kindly entertained at Thebes in Bœotia, to gratifie them of that Place, raiſed a Fable of his being born there, and begotten by Jupiter on Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, a certain Baſtard having at that time been born of her, and fathered upon Jupiter. Iſis the Siſter and Wife of Oſiris, they affirm to be the true Ceres. Hercules was an Ægyptian, not born immediately before the Trojan War, but in the moſt ancient time, even at the Beginning of Mankind, to which Seaſon the Wearing of a Club and Lion's skin was moſt congruous, when Clothes were not as yet found out; as alſo his cleanſing the Country of Monſters and wild Beaſts, at that time, the Earth being but inhabited in a ſcattered manner. Apollo in like ſort was no other than Orus, who was taught the Arts of Propheſying and Healing, by his Mother Iſis. As to this Controverſie, is obſervable the Incertainty of the names of thoſe heatheniſh Vanities, the ſame being to ſome Iſis, to others Ceres, and to others Themophoris, (or, the Inventor of Laws) to others Juno, to others the Moon, and to ſome all thoſe Names are one. Oſiris in like manner, is now taken for Serapis, then for Dionyſus, otherwhiles for Pluto; ſometimes for Ammon and Jupiter, and not ſeldome thought to be Pan, as Diodorus hath obſerved.

The Antiquity of the Greeks, Novelty in Compariſon of that of the Ægyptians.

Herod. l. 2. c. 49.

Diodorus l. 1. p. 14, &c.

The Incertainty of the Heatheniſh Deities.

31. Several Colonies they glory to have ſent forth. The firſt by Belus the Son of Libya and Neptune, into Babylon; where, upon Euphrates, he conſtituted Flamins after the Cuſtom of Ægypt, free from all Taxes and Impoſitions. Theſe by the Babylonians were called Chaldæans, who in Imitation of the Ægyptian Prieſts, and Philoſophers, obſerved the Stars. Danaus out of Ægypt peopled Argos the (almoſt) ancienteſt City of Greece. The Nation of the Colchi and the Jews they prove theirs by Original, from the Rite of Circumciſion. Cadmus and Phœnix his Brother they report to have been Natives of their Ægyptian Thebes, whence the former tranſlated the name of that City into Greece: but Agenor his Father, as is believed, (being the Brother of Belus, and uncle to Ægyptus and Danaus) came thence into Phœnicia, then have they further Occaſion to boaſt of a Colony led by him into that maritime Tract. The Athenians they prove to have been a Colony, led by Cecrops from Sais in Ægypt, for that they alone called their City Aſtu, from a Place ſo named in their Colonies pretended to, by the Ægyptians.

their Country, and becauſe the Members of their Common-wealth were diſtinguiſhed into three Ranks; of Noblemen, who only were capable of Honours as the Ægyptian Prieſts; Country-men who bare Arms agreeable to that ſort of People in Ægypt, who being called Husbandmen, afforded Souldiers for the Wars; laſtly, Artificers, exerciſing manual and common Arts, which fitly anſwereth to the Cuſtom of that place. Beſides Cecrops, Petes the Father of Mneſtheus and *Ericthe*us were of the Ægyptian Extraction; of whom the latter carrying great Store of Corn out of Ægypt to Athens, thereby obtained the Kingdom, and gave Occaſion to the Story that Ceres at that time came into Greece.

The Ægyptian Hieroglyphicks.

Ammianus Marcell. l. 17. De Hieroglyph. vide Joh. Pierium Valerianum Bellunenſem.

32. Although it may not paſs for currant, that the whole World is beholding to them for the Uſe of Letters, the Knowledge of the Stars, Geometrical Speculations, the beſt Laws, and moſt of the Liberal Arts, as they have bragged; yet moſt ancient have ſeveral of theſe things been amongſt them. Beſides the common and uſual way of writing, they had certain Notes, called * Hieroglyphicks, wherein each Letter ſerved for a Word, and ſingle Words expreſſed whole Sentences. As by the Image of a Vulture they expreſſed the Word Nature, becauſe in that kind of Bird no Male can be found. By the Picture of a Bee making Honey they underſtood a King; hinting, that in a Governour, a ſting or ſharpeneſs ought to be mixed with Sweetneſs. They alſo uſed ænigmatical Compoſitions or Mixtures of Images; as, by a Scepter with an Eye, and an Ear at the Top thereof, they ſignified the Sovereign and all-knowing Majeſty of God. As for Aſtronomy, though the Babylonians, for the Antiquity of their Knowledge therein, had no Need to give them place, yet were the Ægyptians furthered in the due Obſervation of the Stars, by the Plainneſs and Evenneſs of their Ground, and the Serenity of the Air; it never raining in Ægypt in ordinary Courſe of Nature, which Defect is ſupplyed by the yearly overflowing of the River. If the World be bounden to them for Geometry, it's to be aſcribed alſo to their River, as another Fruit of its Inundation, whereby waſhing away the Marks, and removing the Fences of their particular Lands, they were forced every year to meaſure them over again, and thence, through Neceſſity, driven to Mathematical Speculations. Now that the beſt Laws, and moſt ingenious Arts were from them conveyed into Greece, they evidence by a Particular of the Bearers.

Diodorus l. 1. p. 60, 61, 62.

Greek Poets and Philoſophers that borrowed their Knowledge of the Ægyptians.

33. The Prieſts, pretending in their Sacred Records to find the Regiſter of their Names, and to demonſtrate the Truth thereof by other Tokens, have made mention of Orpheus, who out of Ægypt fetched the Myſteries of Ceres, with the Fable of the Inferi, or thoſe in Hell; the ſeveral Places whereof, with the Ferry-man Charon, are taken out of the Fens of Acheruſia, and the paſſing over this Lake by Boat to bury their Dead there. Beſides him, they make mention of Muſæus, Melampus, Dædalus, and Homer, who travelled into Ægypt to get Knowledge. To theſe they add, of Law-givers, Lycurgus the Spartan, and Solon the Athenian, who borrowed many of their Laws, and Plato the choiceſt of his Notions. Pythagoras of Samus from them received his Sacred Speech, as it's called; his Principles of Geometry, Arithmetick, and The Doctrine of the Tranſmigration of Souls. Democritus of Abdera they take for granted, to have lived amongſt them five years, in which time he proved an excellent Aſtrologer. Oenopis of Chius, by his Converſation with their Prieſts and Aſtrologers, amongſt other things, learnt the particular Oblique Courſe of the Sun. And, to add no more, Eudoxus the Mathematician is beholding to Ægypt (where he ſtudied) for thoſe Inſtructions which much profited Greece, and thereby procured him no ſmall Honour.

Laemtius Jamblicus.

Hermes or Mercurius Triſmegiſtus.

34. The Invention of Philoſophy and Laws, with all the reſt of the Ægyptian Wiſdom, wherein Moſes was learned, is aſcribed by divers unto Hermes, or Mercurius Triſmegiſtus; of whom yet, either as to his Perſon or time, nothing certainly can be affirmed. Cotta in Cicero, reckoneth up five, who have born the name of Mercury. The firſt, begotten by the Heaven, or the Day; the ſecond, Son to Valens and Pheron, who liveth under the Earth, called alſo Triphonius; the third, begotten by Jupiter, on Maia; the fourth, Son to the Nile, whom the Ægyptians feared to name for Reverence ſake; the fifth and laſt, whom the Phæneatans worſhip, who ſlew Argus, and flying thereupon, was ſet over Ægypt; to the Inhabitants whereof he gave Laws and Literature, and was by them named Theul. But others attribute the Finding out of Letters, not to the laſt, but the firſt Mercury truly called Theut, Thoyoth, Thot, and Tautus; it being utterly againſt all Antiquity, that any ſhould out of Greece tranſport Learning into Ægypt. Others account two of this name natural Ægyptians, of whom the latter was Nephew, or Grand-ſon, to the former. Some think Joſeph, ſome think Moſes the true Mercury. Whatever he was, his Works loſt and * thoſe yet extant, ſhew him to have been a man very well well skilled in true Divinity, and have gained him the Credit to be numbred amongſt the Prophets, and Sibylls, for that he wrote many things of God, worthy of Admiration; nay alſo, it's believed, of the coming of Chriſt, of the Trinity, and the laſt Judgment. Of the Learning of the Ægyptians he is ſaid to have written 36525 Books, if Pages be not rather meant hereby: And one telleth us, that in his time were extant 36 of his Books, viz. of the Wiſdom of the Ægyptians ſixteen, of Phyſick ſix, of the Orders of Prieſts ten, and four of Aſtrology.

* Tranſlated by Ficinus & Apuleius.

Iamblicus.
Clemens Stromat. l. 6.

The ancient Government of Ægypt.

35. The moſt ancient Government of Ægypt, though Monarchical, yet left not Princes to the Liberty of their own Wills, which were reſtrained by the Laws and Cuſtoms that had ſuch Authority over their private and domeſtick Actions, that they could not exceed the Bounds of Temperance and Moderation preſcribed to them thereby. For no Slaves were they ſuffered to entertain, which might prove Inſtruments for Debauchery, but were attended by the Sons of the moſt noble Prieſts, excellently educated. Their Hours, both Night and Day, were deſtined and ſet over to particular Buſineſſes. In the Morning when firſt awake, Letters were brought in to them; that, having perfect Intelligence, they might be better able to provide for the publick Safety. When waſhed and royally apparelled they ſacrificed; during which Devotion the chief Prieſts prayed for them, and their Subjects extolled their Virtues, curſing at laſt their Sins of Ignorance, committed without their Faults, and reflecting upon their Adviſors and Councellors. Then did the Prieſts read out of the Records, famous Preſidents of Council, or Action performed by their moſt illuſtrious Predeceſſors, which were to them propoſed as Copies to take out. Their time was preſcribed, not only of ſpeaking to the People, and diſtributing Juſtice, but alſo of walking, waſhing, and other more ſecret Imployments. Their Diet was very moderate: uſually Veal and Gooſe, with a moderate Quantity of Wine, as if ordered by an exact Phyſician. No Liberty was there of puniſhing any man in Paſſion, or choler, either of acting any otherwiſe unjuſtly; every Caſe being determined by the Laws. Yet neither did they hereby account themſelves ſtraitned of true Liberty, but rather happy in that they indulged not their Appetites like other men. Hereby obtained they the Love of their Subjects, who held them more dear, alive, or dead, than their own Relations, and the Government continued for many Generations, as long as they ſubmitted to thoſe Rules and Orders.

The Diviſions of the Land, and its Inhabitants.

36. Seſooſis, or Seſoſtris, divided Ægypt into 36 Nomi, which word, whether Greek or Ægyptian, ſignified ſeveral Cities with certain Villages and Grounds thereto belonging. Of theſe, 10 belonged to the Province of Thebes, or to Thebais, other ten to Delta, and the reſt to the Midland Countries lying betwixt them; all which had their ſeveral Nomarchæ, or Governours, who ruled them, and took Care of the Kings Tributes. The Lands were divided into three Portions, whereof the firſt belonged to the Prieſts, who were in great Authority, and high Eſteem with the People. Of their Revenues they maintained Sacrifices throughout the Land, and their own Families; being exempted from all Burthens and Impoſitions. They were chief Councellors to the Kings, always aſſiſting with their Advice, judging of things out of their deep Skill in Aſtrology, and ſuggeſting uſeful matter out of the Records; their Function hereditarily deſcended upon their Children. The ſecond Portion of Land belonged to the Kings, by which they maintained their State, waged War, rewarded deſerving Perſons, and which affording them ſufficient Treaſure, they burthened not their Subjects by any Taxes. The third Portion belonged to the Souldiers, who were at all Occaſions ready for the War; it ſeeming reaſonable that ſuch as ventured their Lives for the Safety of their Country ſhould be well rewarded; and good Policy not to commit the Safeguard thereof to any that had nothing dear, or precious in it: and hereby they were encouraged to be careful in Behoof of their Poſterity, which ſucceeded them in their Poſſeſſions. As for the reſt of the People, they were divided into three Ranks, or Orders, viz. Shepheards, Husbandmen, (that farmed the Grounds,) and Artificers; who all attending their Buſineſs, and not medling with State-Affairs, neither having any Right to Offices, thereby the more improved their Arts, and ſaved the Commonwealth harmleſs from ſuch Diſtempers, as are bred by the Violence of an heady, and ignorant Multitude.

Diodorus lib. 1. p. 35, &c.
Strabo l. 17.

Ariſtot. Oeconom lib. 2.

Diodorus.

The Courts of Juſtice.

37. Their Courts of Juſtice were furniſhed with the moſt upright, and able men that could be procured. Thirty Judges were choſen from Heliopolis (or On,) Thebes and Memphis, each of them 10. Which Aſſembly would not give place, either to that of the Areopagites at Athens, or the Senate at Lacedæmon. One of theſe thirty being choſen Preſident, the City for which he ſerved made choice of another to ſit in his Place. All had Maintenance from the King; but the Preſident in larger Proportion;

portion: who alſo wore about his neck, in a Chain of Gold, an image of Truth made of precious ſtones, as a badge of his Office. When they were ſate, and the Codes, wherein the Laws were contained, laid before them; then the Plaintiff exhibited his Bill of the Crime, the Manner of it, and the Eſtimate of the dammage. The Defendant having a Copy of the Bill, anſwered particularly to it, either that he did not the thing, committed no Crime in doing it, or elſe had not deſerved ſo great a Puniſhment. The Plaintiff had liberty to reply, and the other to rejoyn his Anſwer; but after this, the 30 proceeded to Judgment, and the Preſident ſet the Image of Truth towards one of the Parties. No Lawyers were ſuffered to plead, as being thought rather to caſt a miſt upon the Cauſe, and darken the Evidence.

Particular Laws.

38. As for particular Laws; Perjury was puniſhed with Death, as a great Offence, both againſt God and man. If one man ſuffered another to be murdered in the High-way, or undergo any other Violence, without giving his Aſſiſtance, he was to dye for it; and if he could give him no help, he was bound to diſcover the Robber, and follow the Law againſt him, under pain of enduring a certain number of ſtrokes, and being deprived of all ſuſtenance for three dayes. Falſe Accuſers underwent the Puniſhment due to that Fault they accuſed of. Every one was bound to give in an account to the Magiſtrate how he lived, under pain of Death; which Law was made by Amaſis. Wilful Murder, either of Bond or Free, was Death; onely this Law took no hold on Parents; but ſuch were conſtrained to continue three dayes embracing the Carkaſſes. Againſt Children who killed their Parents, moſt exquiſite Puniſhment was deviſed: For, having firſt their Fleſh all cut and ſlaſhed, and then being laid upon Thorns, they were burnt quick. Women condemned were not executed before their Delivery. For other Laws not-Capital, it was enacted that Souldiers running away from their Colours, or diſobeying their Officers, ſhould not dye, but be branded with Infamy, as a means to excite them to regain their former credit. If any held Intelligence with the Enemy, his Tongue was to be cut out of his head. They that imbaſed the Coin, uſed new weights, counterfeited Seals; Clerks that falſified and forged Records, were to loſe their hands. Raviſhment of a Free-woman was puniſhed with the loſs of the Members. Adultery of the man, with a thouſand ſtrokes with a Rod; of the Woman, with the loſs of her Noſe.

39. Bocchoris enacted, that he who denied the borrowing of any money, ſhould be abſolved upon his Oath; which was accounted as a ſufficient Purgation; a mans Credit being ſo much therein concerned. Uſury upon Bond was not to exceed the double of the Principal; for which it was lawful to diſtrain the Goods, but in no wiſe to meddle with the Perſon of the Debtor, that was owing to his Countrey, and not due to his Creditor; eſpecially if a Souldier, the common Safety ſuffering in him. Upon this account, they were wont to ſcoff at the Law-givers of Greece, who forbad the ſeizing upon Plows, Weapons, and other things, but ſuffered thoſe that ſhould uſe them to be carried away, and impriſoned. For ſtealing, they had a peculiar Law: Every Thief entred his name with the Chief of that Myſtery; and when he had ſtoln any thing, carried it ſtreight to him, where, if any one could tell the time and place, and prove it by certain tokens to be his, he was to pay the fourth part of the value, and receive it again; the Law-giver thinking this the beſt remedy againſt what otherwiſe could not be prevented.

The Law-givers of Ægypt.

40. The firſt man that gave Laws to the Ægyptians, was Mnevis, perſwading the People to receive them, becauſe they were communicated to him by Mercury. The ſecond was Saſyches, who, amongſt other Laws, inſtituted thoſe concerning Religion; and, being a man of great Learning, taught Geometry and Aſtronomy. 3. Seſoſtris, who, as he excelled all others in Military glory, ſo he made Laws for the Diſcipline of War. 4. Bocchoris, a wiſe and prudent man, ſeveral of whoſe Apothegms were a long time preſerved in the memories of men. 5. Amaſis, who much amended the whole Policy of Ægypt, his rare Wiſdom having preferred him to that high Dignity, for which alſo being admired abroad as well as at home, he was reſorted to by ſome out of Greece, as an Oracle. Laſtly, Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, King of Perſia.

Particular Cuſtoms of the Ægyptians.

41. As for particular Cuſtoms. The Ægyptians married as many Wives as they pleaſed (Poſterity being with them a thing of greateſt conſequence) except the Prieſts, who were allowed but one apiece. Children born of Bond-women, and Free, were alike reſpected, and equally legitimate, the Father by them being only accounted the Author of Generation, the Mother affording but Place and Nouriſhment to the Child; in which reſpect alſo, contrary to the Cuſtom of other Nations, thoſe Trees that bare Fruit they accounted Males, and the barren ones Females. Their Children they educated exceeding hardly, the Expence of bringing one up not exceeding twenty Drachms. Each Child ſucceeded his Father in his Trade, or Courſe of Life. All ſorts had ſome kind of Learning, eſpecially ſuch as conduced to their Callings. Muſick was neglected by them, as rendring men effeminate. Once a Moneth they uſed to purge, or uſe ſome medicinal Courſe for their Health. With them no Phyſician was found (as Herodotus writeth) who profeſſed the Art of curing the whole Body; but one was for the Head alone, another for the Eyes, and ſo for the other Parts: all which yet, as Diodorus hath it, were maintained of the publick, and bound to obſerve Methods, and Medicines preſcribed them in Books; which if they altered or changed, upon the Miſcarriage of the Patient they forfeited their Lives, together with their Credit.

42. Such was the Conſtituton of the Ægyptian Commonwealth, as they themſelves related, which from ſome gaineth little Credit, this Conſtitution of Policy hardly agreeing with the manners of thoſe Kings that built the Pyramids; ſo that to them this excellent Model of Government ſeemeth to be of the ſame Nature, and Credit with the * Cyropædia of Xenophon. This is obſervable, that according to this Conſtitution the Propriety in Land was varied from that Form wherein it was left by Joſeph, who purchaſed all the Land (except that of the Prieſts) for Pharoh, and made the King abſolute Lord thereof. The fond and ridiculous Superſtition, which poſſeſſed this People above others taketh off much from its Reputation. The ſordid and degenerate Humour of conſecrating, with ſuch blind Earneſtneſs, Bulls, Sheep, Dogs, Cats, Ichneumons, Ibis, Goſſehawks, Eagles, Goats, Wolves, Crocodiles, * Plants that grew in their Gardens, and other things, is ſo abominable at the firſt Sight, as none of their Pretences can give thereto the leaſt Shew of Reaſon, in the Opinion of a man but ordinarily qualified with the Light of Nature.

Their ridiculous Superſtition.

* Vide Juditium Jacob. Cappelli in Hiſt. ſacra & Exotica ad A. M. 1931.

* Porrum aut cæpe nefas violare aut frangere morſu. O Sanctas gentes quibus hæc naſcuntur in hortis Numina! Juvenal. Satyr. 15. 2. 9.

CHAP. V.

The moſt ancient State, and Condition of Greece, during the Babylonian Empire, with a Deſcription of its Kingdoms and Commonwealth.

SECT. I.

The State of Greece in General.

1. THE moſt ancient common name of the Inhabitants of this Country is more agreeable to the Roman Appellations of Graii, Græci, and Grajugenæ, than that whereby they have rather choſen to call themſelves, viz. Hellenes. For, till * ſuch time as Hellen, the Son of Deucalion reigned in Theſſaly, which hapned ſome years after the Deucalionean Deluge, no ſuch name as the latter was known. From him his Subjects, who inhabited that part of Theſſaly, lying betwixt the two Rivers * Peneus and Aſopus, were firſt called Hellenes, being formerly known by the name of Græci; and the Country it ſelf Hellas, afterwards named Pthiotis. Homer owneth none by the name of Hellenes, but thoſe, who with the Myrmidonæ, amongſt others, followed Achilles to the Siege of Troy, neither any Place calleth he Hellas, but only one in Theſſaly, mentioned by Strabo, who knoweth not whether it be a Town or Country, though he would gladly prove, that, by Hellas, Homer underſtood the whole Nation. Strabo is in no wiſe to be heard againſt Thucydides, and Apollodorus, whereof the former witneſſeth, that the Poet no where mentioneth the Barbarians, becauſe all the Hellenes were not yet known by one common Name, whom he might oppoſe againſt them; and the latter expreſly ſaith, that he only called thoſe in Theſſaly by the name of Helle-

Whence the Greeks were called Hellenes.

Vide Apollod. lib. 1. c. 21. Thucyd. l. 1. in præfat. Ariſtot. de Meteoris l. 1.

* Strabo l. 8. p. 383. A. Γραικοί.

Vide Strab. lib. 8. p. 370. A.

Hellenes. But though in Homer's time the whole Nation might begin to be called Hellenes, and the Country Hellas; yet clear it is from many Witneſſes, that theſe names came out of Theſſalie, and were thence transferred to ſignifie the whole Nation, and their Colonies placed elſewhere; inſomuch, that priding themſelves, as it were, in it, they wholly rejected the other of Græci (which, ſignifying ancient, as ſeemeth, they had alſo out of Theſſalie from the ſame People) who were afterwards called Hellenes; though the Poets deſpiſe it not, as Callimachus, Sophocles, and others; and the Latins ſtill retain it, taking no notice of the other in their Language, whence theſe words Greece and Græcians are derived.

Thucyd.

The moſt ancient Greeks lived in an unſetled Condition, preying one upon another.

2. Greece was not anciently inhabited in any ſetled or eſtabliſhed way, though in after Ages it became ſo famous in it's flouriſhing Commonwealths. Seats and Habitations were often changed, according to the Power and Strength of ſuch as were not ſatisfied with their own Fortune. No Commerce was there amongſt them, being in continual Fear one of another: they lived only from Hand to Mouth, not regarding Money, or the Improvement of their Grounds, knowing not how long they ſhould enjoy any thing in preſent Poſſeſſions; ſo that no conſiderable City was there, or any Fortifications of Value. Attica indeed was ſomething privileged by its Barrenneſs, and ſecured from ſuch violent Attempts as other parts were obnoxious to; whence ſuch as were diſturbed elſewhere, flocked thither, and it grew ſo populous, that not able to maintain the great Numbers, under which it groaned, it poured out Colonies into Aſia the leſs, which made up the Body of Ionians. Before the Trojan War, nothing conſiderable was done abroad by the Græcians; but at that time having got ſome Power at Sea, they were rendered capable of that Expedition. For Minos King of Crete, (whom Thucydides would make to have had the firſt and moſt ancient Fleet of all others) had not long before obtained the Dominion of the greateſt part of the Greek Sea, and making himſelf Maſter of the Iſlands Cyclades, caſt thence the Carians, and placed Colonies of his own therein, over which he made his Sons Princes. And to increaſe his Cuſtoms, he ſcoured the Seas of Pyrats; it being then the Trade of thoſe that lived upon the Coaſts, to paſs over and make Prey one of another; which to the laſt could not be left by ſome, as the Ætolians and Acarnanians amongſt others.

Nothing conſiderable done by them abroad till the Trojan War.

A. M. 2773.

Cities begin to be built upon the Sea-Coaſts.

3. The Sea being cleared, Cities began to be built upon the Coaſt both for Trade and Security, whereas the moſt ancient Towns ſtood at a good Diſtance from the Sea, both in the Continent and Iſlands. Then came it to paſs, that the weaker ſubmitting themſelves to the more powerful for matter of Profit, or the ſtrong hand procuring it from them, ſome new and conſiderable Principalities were erected, which rendred them fit for the Expedition againſt Troy; wherein Agamemnon præſided, as the moſt powerful Prince then reigning, eſpecially at Sea. Yet was there ſtill ſuch Scarcity of Money and of Proviſions, that only ſo many Forces did they carry over, as they hoped the War might maintain, and uſed thoſe not all together, and at the ſame time, but employed them in tilling the Cherroneſus, and in Depredations; whereby being thus diſperſed, the Trojans were the longer able to reſiſt them; which they could not have done, had they been ſufficiently furniſhed with Neceſſaries, and incontinently with all their Strength, fallen upon the City. Ten years being conſumed in this War, great Alterations were thereby produced in Greece. For through their Abſence ſo long abroad, Seditions and Tumults aroſe at Home; whence many at their Return, or afterwards, were forced to ſeek out new Habitations. A long time it was, e're the Country returned to Quietneſs and Settlement; but at Length, it was enabled to ſend out Colonies, as the Athenians into Ionia and the Iſlands of the Greek Sea, the Peloponneſians, and ſome other Cities into Italy, and Sicily. The Nation now growing ſtronger and wealthier daily, Tyrannies or petty Kingdoms were erected in every place, there being now a Poſſibility of raiſing Revenues; and as any exceeded others in Power and Cunning, they invaded the Governments of others, which they made arbitrary; whereas before Kingdoms were hereditary, with a conſtant limited Power, that they ſeldome exceeded.

The Græcians maintained themſelves by Tillage, and Plunder at the Wars of Troy.

A. M. 2821.

Great Changes cauſed at home by their ſo long Abſence.

The Corinthians firſt eminent at Sea.

A. M. 3353. D. C, 102. Manaſſis. 50.

4. The Corinthians firſt began to be famous at Sea, being the firſt that uſed that ſort of Gallies named Triremes, and fought a Battel with the Corcyræans, 220 years before the beginning of the Peloponneſian War. For being ſeated in the Iſthmus, they enjoyed thereby a conſtant Mart, which filled them with Wealth, eſpecially after the Sea was cleared of Pyrats, and Traffick increaſed. Long after, the Ionians got the Start of the reſt in Naval Glory, making good Progreſs therein, and had gone ſtill further, but that Cyrus having broken in pieces the Power of Crœſus, and ſubdued all as far as the River Halys, forced them alſo, after ſome ſtrugling, to ſubmit themſelves unto the Yoak: After them, Polycrates the Tyrant of Samus, the

The Ionians.

A. M. 3462.

Polycrates and others.

A. 3473.

Moſſilians and Corcyræans obtained the greateſt Power at Sea; the Æginetans and Athenians, with the reſt, being inconſiderable therein, till theſe two States falling out, Themiſtocles procured the Athenians to apply themſelves more to Sea-matters, when they now alſo expected the Coming of the Perſian King. Great Commodity all theſe obtained by the Power of their Navies, either in getting Money, or new Poſſeſſions; for they ſubdued the Iſlands, ſuch eſpecially labouring herein, whoſe native Soils afforded leaſt Advantage. By Land no War aroſe that gave any ſufficient Advantage of inlarging their Dominions further, than to the Diſturbance of their next Neighbours; they ſtirred not abroad nor gave their Minds to any new Conqueſts. Thoſe that were Subjects, were patient under the Yoak, and Equalls in Power made no conſiderable Quarrels, till all Greece come to be divided in the old War, betwixt the Inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria. Then, to hinder them from growing great, the Affairs of the Perſians were advanced; till having caſt out their Tyrants, (who all this while contenting themſelves with the private Power they had over particular Places, ſtirred not) they got Ground by little and little of the Eaſtern Empire. Almoſt during this whole Period had they no written Laws, Homer being witneſs, who never uſeth the word Law throughout his Writings. They were not generally governed but by indefinite Sentences and Precepts of their Kings, remaining a long time without any written Precepts, and referring all to the Event, according to which Judgment inſued. Such was the moſt ancient Condition of Greece in General. Now a particular Account is to be given of the ſeveral Kingdoms and States, that were moſt conſiderable and contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

No War by Land.

No written Laws.

Joſeph. contra Apion. l. 2.

SECT. II.

The Sicyonian Kingdom.

The Sicyonian Kingdom moſt ancient.

Ægialeus the firſt King.

A. M. 1915.

Europs.
Telchines
Apis.

Thelxion.

Ægyrus.

Thurimachus.
Leucippus.
Peratus.
Plemnæus.
Orthopolis.

Euſeb. in Chronic. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. l. 18. Pauſan. in Corinthiacis. p. 49. Edit. Grec. Francofurti. 1583.

1. THE Affairs of the Sicyonian have the firſt place allotted to them in Antiquity, who inhabited a City ſituated upon the Bay of Corinth, and the Confines of Achaia. Here Ægialeus began a Kingdom about 270 years after the univerſal Deluge, 232 before the beginning of Inachus, 1313 before the firſt Olympiad, the year of the World 1915, according to the Vulgar way of Computation, without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the Hiſtory of the Judges, and 859 year of Noah) whilſt Ninus reigned in Aſſyria. From him the City was firſt called Ægialia, and part of the Peninſula it ſelf, according to ſome; which afterwards was from Pelops named Peloponneſus. He left his Kingdom to Europs his Son, after he had reigned 52 years, and Europs having reigned 45, was ſucceeded by Telchines. He governed 20, and was followed by Apis, who was ſo great, that all within the Iſthmus was from him called Apios. When he had continued 25 years, his Son Thelxion ſucceeded him, during whoſe Reign, all things were ſo proſperous and happy, that being dead, they worſhipped him for a God by Sacrifices, and ſolemnizing Games, which (as they ſay) were firſt invented for his Sake. Him followed Ægyrus, after he had reigned 52 years. Ægyrus or Ægydrus, reigned 33; Thurimachus 54; Leucippus 43; who had only a Daughter named Calchinia, on which Neptune (or rather Meſapus) begat Peratus, who was Heir to his Grand-father, and governed forty ſeven years. After Peratus followed Plemnæus, whoſe Children all died as ſoon as they were born, till Ceres came in the Likeneſs of a Woman, and brought up Orthopolis, who ſucceeded his Father, having reigned 48 years.

Coronus.
Corax.
Epopeus.

2. Orthopolis the twelfth King of Ægialea, had a Daughter named Chryſorthe, on which Apollo is ſuppoſed to have begot Coronus his Succeſſor. Coronus left two Sons Corax and Lamedon. Corax after he had reigned 30 years, died without Iſſue, and Epopeus a Theſſalian ſeiſed on his Kingdom, Epopeus ſtole Antiope the Daughter of Nycteus King of Thebes, for which Injury he was proſecuted with War by the Thebans. A Battel being fought, he had the better, but both the Kings were mortally wounded. Nycteus preſently died after he was carried Home, but left the Tuition of Lamdacus the Son of Polydorus and Nephew to Cadmus, (whoſe Guardian he had been) to his Brother Lycus, requeſting of him to lead down another Army into Ægialea, to revenge him upon Epopeus, and to puniſh Antiope, if he could take her; but in the mean time Epopeus died alſo of his Lamedon.

Wounds, being neglected, and Lamedon the Son of Coronus obtained his Fathers Kingdom, gave up Antiope to Lycus, as Pauſanias writeth, though Apollodorus ſaith, that Lycus took Ægialea and ſlew Epopeus. Antiope in the way to Thebes fell in Travel, and brought forth Amphion and Zethus, who being found and nouriſhed by an Herdſman, the former gave himſelf to Muſick, and the latter to nouriſhing of Cattel, and both afterwards revenged their Mother upon Lycus and his Wiſe Dirce, from whoſe hard Uſage ſhe had eſcaped, and came to them. A. M. 2616.

Sicyon, from whom the City was named. Polybus. Adraſtus. Janiſcus. Phæſtus.

3. Lamedon married Phenon the Daughter of Clytius an Athenian, and undertaking War againſt Archander and Architeles the Achæans, ſent for Sicyon the Son of Metion and Nephew of Erechtheus, out of Attica to aſſiſt him, to whom giving his Daughter Zeuxippe in Marriage, he left him alſo his Succeſſor. A. M. 2656. From Sicyon the City was named Sicyon, and the Country Sicyonia. He had a Daughter named Chthonophyle, on which Mercury begat Polybus; after whoſe Birth ſhe was married to Phlias the Son of Dionyſus, and to him bore Androdamas. Polybus ſucceeding his Grand-father, left alſo his Grand-Son Adraſtus (by his Daughter, married to Talaus King of Argos) his Heir, who being expelled his own City, had fled to him. But he making his Peace at home returned, and after his Departure Janiſcus or Inachus the Nephew of that Clytis whoſe Daughter married with Lamedon, came out of Attica and obtained the Kingdom. After Janiſcus had reigned 42 years, he gave way by Death to Phæſtus, one vulgarly accounted the Son of Hercules, who after eight years, by the Direction of an Oracle, went over into Crete, where he built a City of his own Name.

Zeuxippus. Hippolytus. Polyphides. Pelaſgus. The Prieſts of Apollo Carinus. Laceſtades. Phalces ſeizeth upon Sicyon.

4. After his Departure Zeuxippus the Son of Apollo by the Nymph Syllis, was King of Sicyon; but reigned not long. A. M. 2846. Hippolytus Nephew to Phæſtus by his Son Rhopalus, obtained his Grand-fathers Seat. Againſt him Agamemnon King of Mycenæ made War, till he forced him to ſubmit. After four years ſucceeded Polyphides, and continued 31, then Pelaſgus 20, and after this * Euſebius would have Zeuxippus to have begun his Reign, which after 32 years ended with the Kingdom. It having now continued the ſpace of 962 years, the Prieſts of Apollo Carnius obtained the Sovereighty, and held it 33. But Pauſanias writeth, that when Laceſtades, the Son of Hippolytus reigned at Sicyon, Phalces the Son of Temenus (who had been King of Argos) ſeized upon it with the Dores in the Night time; but, for that both of them were deſcended of Hercules, dealt not roughly with him, but admitted him to Partnerſhip in the Kingdom. A. M. 2908. So, from thenceforth the Sicyonians became Dores, and were reckoned amongſt the Argives. This fell out 87 years after the Deſtruction of Troy, 120 before the firſt Olympiad, A. M. 2908.

* Ex Caſtore Rhodio Chronographo.

SECT. III.

The Kingdom of Argos.

The Kingdom of Argos hath the ſecond place, if not the firſt.

1. THE (a) ſecond Place in Antiquity belongeth to this Kingdom, for which (b) ſome have not been wanting to challenge the firſt, affirming that many years after the Eſtabliſhment of this, Ægialeus began that of the Sicyonians; and certainly though Argos miſſed ſomething of Sicyon in years; yet in Fame, Dignity, Power, and Riches, it exceeded it. Inachus firſt here began a Kingdom, about 244 years after the Beginning of the Sicyonian, the 142 of the Life of Abraham, 676 before the Deſtruction of Troy, and 1082 before the Beginning of the Olympiads. A. M. 2149. From the Antiquity of Inachus came that Proverb of Inacho antiquior, concerning which Eraſmus is to be conſulted in his Adages. On his Siſter Meliſſa he begat Phoroneus and a Daughter named Io, which muſt not be confounded with the Daughter of Jaſus of a later Date, as ſhe is wont to be by Mythologiſts. After fifty years Reign, he left his Kingdom to his Son Phoroneus, who by ſome was thought the firſt man, as the Son of a River in that Place, called Inachus, and conſequently the Father of Mortals, and Author of Mankind. He is ſaid to have built the firſt Altar unto Juno. Againſt him and the Parrhaſians, the Telchines and Caryatæ made War, but being overcome betook themſelves to the Mercy of Wind and Sea, and at length arrived in Crete, as ſome, or Rhodes, as others ſay. He obtained the Dominion of the whole Peninſula, and of the Nymph Laodice, begot a Son called Apis, and a Daughter named Niobe, which Jupiter loved the firſt of all Women Inachus. Phoroneus.

(a) Euſeb. in Chronico.

(b) Vide Ludov. Vivem in Auguſtin. de Civitat. Dei lib. 18. cap. 3.

Pauſan. in Argolicis p. 58. Clemens Stromat. l. 1. Nonius.

Oroſius l. 1. cap. 7.

Sect. 3.

women, and on her begat Argus; Phoroneus, after he had reigned ſixty years, died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Apis.

A. M. 2260.

Apis.

2. Apis turning Tyrant, commanded the Peninſula to be called after himſelf, Apios, and being circumvented by the wiles of Thelxion, and Telchin, died without Iſſue, after he had reigned 34 years. Apollodorus ſaith, he was killed for his Tyranny in Greece, though ſome make him to have gone into Ægypt, and there dying, to have been taken for a God, and called Serapis; but there being two Kings of this name beſides him, viz. one of Sicyon, and another of Ægypt, moſt Mythologiſts confound them, and attribute what was done by all unto one; which thing is uſual with the Greeks.

Argus.

Apis dying after he had reigned 34 years, left for his Succeſſor Argus, his Siſters Son by Jupiter the King of Crete, who lived about this time. In that Iſland firſt reigned Cres, who gave name to it, and was one of thoſe Curetes that were ſaid to have hid Jupiter from his Father Saturn, who would have devoured his youngeſt Son after the other, and nouriſhed him; as alſo to have built the City Cnoſſos, and the Temple of Cybele. With this man, many others are confounded, according to the cuſtom of Poets, who have obſerved no diſtinction in aſcribing to one what many did, and fathering things of their own Invention upon the common name of Jupiter.

Several particular men known to have had the name Jupiter.

3. The firſt man known to have had this name, was Ham, the youngeſt Son of Noah, who was worſhipped for a God, under the title of Jupiter Hammon. His Nephew Nimrod, the firſt King of Babylon and Aſſyria, was ſirnamed Belus, and often called Jupiter Belus. In Crete lived (a) one very ancient, that hath gone under this name; although as many places have challenged him for their Native, as (b) contended for the Birth of Homer. Some think, that he who is reported to have been preſerved, and nouriſhed by the Curetes, or the Idæi Dactyli, was more ancient than Niobe, and therefore make a ſecond Jupiter to have lived in Crete about 150 years after; who becauſe he was the firſt of this name known to have been extravagant towards Women; thence aroſe that ſaying, That Niobe was the firſt Woman beloved by Jupiter. Æolus the Son of Hellen, and Nephew of Deucalion, who lived about Theſſaly, and gave name to the Æoles, became ſo famous with Poſterity, that they gave him the name of (c) Jupiter and Neptune. Picus, King of the Aborigines in Italy, Father to Faunus, and ſuppoſed to be begotten by Saturn, after he had fled into Latium from his Son Jupiter, is alſo called Jupiter by (d) one, and Æneas Jupiter Indiges by the Romans. Theſe are ſuch particular men as are known to have had this name, which hath been ſo far advanced as to ſignifie the beſt, and chiefeſt Being, whil'ſt ſuch as at firſt were reverenced for their Vertue or Power, at length were forgotten to have been Mortals.

(a) Euſeb.
(b) Vide Pauſan. in Meſſeniis, p. 143.7.
(c) Idem ibid. p. 154.31.
(d) Apud Suidam.

Whence ſo many.

4. Each Nation of old had its Native Jupiter, who was either the Founder thereof, or, living in remote times, was by that Veneration, which attributeth immoderate things to Antiquity, elevated into a Deity. Here is to be conſidered what Annius his Xenophon wrote in his Treatiſe of Æquivocals, as he calleth them. The moſt ancient King of any Great and Illuſtrious Family, was wont to be called Saturn, the eldeſt Son Jupiter, and the moſt Valiant amongſt the Nephews, or Grand-ſons, Hercules. Jupiter the ancient King of Crete, or ſome other, by his great Exploits, and well-deſerving of that Age, might gain this credit to his Name; or the word Zeus in the Greek Tongue ſignifying what Ham doth import in the other Language, the Original of this name may better agree with the Name, Place, and Condition of the Son of Noah. As for Jupiter the younger, who is ſuppoſed to have begotten Hercules on Alcmena, the Wife of Amphitrio, appeareth a meer Fiction; ſo Valiant a Perſon as that Child proved, inhancing the repute of his Generation: or if this Hercules was not the Son of Amphitrion, but begotten by ſome other man, then was the name of Jupiter given to his Father, to take away the Odium of Baſtardy; it being an ordinary thing for ſuch as were Baſe-begotten to be fathered upon Jupiter, Mars, or Apollo.

From Argus the City took its name.

5. From Argus the City was named (e) Argos, before called Phoronicum, from Phoroneus, who firſt gathered the People into it, being before that diſperſed; and then made them Laws for Government. From him alſo his Subjects took the name of Argi and Argivi, and the whole * Peninſula, named Apia before; he would have called after himſelf, Argos. In (f) his time Greece began to be full of Corn, which being aſcribed to his Care and Induſtry, he was honoured after his death with a Temple and Sacrifice, which Worſhip was before given to one Homogyrus, killed by a Thunder-bolt, for that he had firſt yoaked Oxen in the Plow. His Brother was (g) Pelaſgus, (ſaid alſo to have been begotten by Jupiter on Niobe) the Father of Lycaon, and who gave name to the Pelaſgi, a People that firſt inhabited

(e) Heſychius.
* Lege Strab. lib. 3. p. 365.
(f) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 6.
(g) Apollodorus, lib. 2. initio.

inhabited Arcadia, (hence called Pelaſgis and Pelaſgia) afterwards ſpread themſelves throughout Greece, and ſent Colonies into Latium. Argus, on his Wife Evadne, the Daughter of Strymon begat Jaſus, Peiranthus, Epidaurus, and Criaſus. Jaſus begat Agenor, the Father of that Argus whom the Poets make all Eyes, though ſome report him the Son of Areſtor. Criaſus ſucceeded his Father, after he had reigned ſeventy years, and governed the Argives 54. Two of his Brothers are added by Pauſanias, viz. Piraſus the ſame with Peiranthus, and Phorbas. Peiranthus firſt built a Temple to Juno at Argos, wherein he placed her Image made of a wild Pear-Tree, and made his Daughter Callithya called alſo Callirhoe and Io,) Prieſt thereof: which Superſtition being continued for many Ages, all Inſtruments publick and private were dated from ſuch or ſuch a year of her Succeſſors, as the Cuſtom hath been from thoſe of the Kings, or Magiſtrates in other Places.

Criaſus.

Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſ. lib. 1.

Argol. p. 58. 17. Euſeb. præp. l. 3. Evangel. lib. 3.

6. That this Peiranthus reigned, appeareth no where but in Pauſanias, who ſeemeth to make him the immediate Succeſſor of Argus, by the name of Piraſus. But Phorbas ſucceeded Criaſus, and reigned 35 years; after him Triopas 46. whoſe Son Xanthus being Prince of ſome of the Pelaſgi, who went out from Argos, ſeized firſt upon part of Lycia, and there ſeated himſelf: afterwards he paſſed over into the Iſland Iſa, then void of Inhabitants, which dividing amongſt his Followers he named Pelaſgia, in Proceſs of time called Lesbos. Pauſanias maketh Jaſus and Agenor the Sons of Triopas, and Jaſus to have reigned at Argos, though by Euſebius he be not reckoned amongſt the Kings. His Daughter was the famous Io, which being got with Child by Jupiter, and thereupon, through the Diſpleaſure of Juno turned out of her Wits, or into a Cow, as the Poets ſing, paſſed over the Straits of Thrace, to which, upon this Occaſion of her Metamorphoſis, was given the name of Boſphorus. Then went ſhe down into Ægypt, where, reſtored to humane Shape, ſhe brought forth her Son Epaphus, the Builder of Memphis, and was afterwards taken for a Goddeſs, and called Iſis. Herodotus leading us out of the Labyrinth of Fables, relateth that the Phœnicians, after their Removal from the Red-Sea (where he thinketh them once to have inhabited) to the Mediterranean, applied themſelves unto Sailing, and Traffick from Aſſyria and Ægypt unto other places. On a time coming to Argos (which then excelled all Greek Cities,) on the fifth or ſixth day after they had expoſed their Merchandize to Sale, many Women came to their Ships to buy what liked them, and amongſt the reſt this Io, the Kings Daughter. The Phœnicians encouraging one another laid hands on thoſe they could catch, and taking her with ſome others, carried them into Ægypt. This by Herodotus is made one of the firſt Grounds of Envy, betwixt the Aſiaticks and Greeks; though he confoundeth her with the Daughter of Inachus, (which is uſual;) and the Greeks, as Pauſanias hinteth, gave another Account of her Deportation.

Piraſus.
Phorbas.
Triopas.

Jaſus.

Diodorus Siculus lib. 5. pag. 239. in margine notata. A.

Lib. 1. ad initium.

7. As Pauſanias reckoneth Jaſus amongſt the Kings of Argos (which after him was, without Doubt, called Jaſos and the Citizens Jaſii;) ſo he nameth Crotopus, his Brother Agenor's Son, for his Succeſſor, whom Euſebius will have to have ſucceeded his Grand-father Triopas. His Daughter Pſamathe being with Child by Apollo, after her Delivery expoſed the Infant, which ſhe named Linus. It chanced to be devoured by wild Beaſts; whereat ſhe was ſo troubled, that her Father perceiving it, got out the matter, and put her to Death, for which Apollo brought a Plague upon the Argives, who, to pacifie him, made great and ſolemn Lamentation for the Child, which is not to be confounded with the Poet Linus, as ſome ſo order the matter. Crotopus having reigned 21 years was followed by Sthenelas his Son, who held the Kingdom for 11. and then left it to his Son Galenor. In his time, Danaus, the Brother of Ægyptus, King of that Country, having 50 Daughters, refuſed to marry them to his Brother's 50 Sons, becauſe he was bidden by an Oracle to beware of a Son in Law, and therefore taking them away with him, ſailed to Rhodes, wherein he built a Temple to Minerva Lindia; and thence came to Argos, where he moved a Conteſt with Galenor for the Kingdom, as deſcended of Epaphus, the Son of Io. Both pleading hard before the People, the Cauſe, as doubtful, was put off till the day following; at what time there came a Wolf and killed an Ox, which was feeding by the Walls. The People took the Wolf to ſignifie Danaus, becauſe a Stranger; and, making this Conteſt of the Beaſts a leading Caſe, decreed the Kingdom to the Ægyptian.

Crotopus.

Sthenelas.
Galenor.

Danaus.

Stephanus.

Apollodorus lib. 2.

Diodorus l. 5. p. 227. D.

A. M. 2531.

Apollod. ibid. & Pauſan. in Argolicis pag. 61.

8. Danaus having obtained the Kingdom, his Brother Ægyptus feared leſt by the Marriage of his Daughters he might get too great Alliance and Strength, and therefore ſent down his 50 Sons to Argos with an Army, and command, either to marry them, or deſtroy him. They perſwaded their Uncle by fair Means to receive them as Sons in Law; but he commanded his Daughters that each of them ſhould the firſt Night kill her Bridegroom, and gave them Poniards for that Purpoſe. They all obeyed him, except Hypemneſtra, (and ſome add Bebrice;) which diſmiſſing Lyncæus, with advice to ſhift for himſelf, was by her Father accuſed, and brought to Judgment; but acquitted by the Argives, and afterwards had Leave from him, to receive again Lynceus, now reconciled to him. As for the reſt of the Siſters, they were beſtowed upon ſuch, as in tryal of Maſteries got the better; and became ſo Infamous, that it was believed they were condemned in Hell, to fill with Water a Barrel, which having an hole in it, let out as much as it received in.

9. From Danaus, thoſe who had formerly had the name of Pelaſgiotæ, were called Danai. He built the Caſtle, and his Daughters are ſaid to have ſupplied the City with Water, by digging of Wells; although (a) Strabo proveth, that by reaſon of its Situation, it could never want the commodity of that Element. Having reigned (b) 50 years, he died, and was ſucceeded by Lynceus, who governed 41, and on Hypermneſtra begat Abas his Succeſſor. Abas ruled 23 years, and begat on his Wife Ocalea, the Daughter of Mantineus, Acriſius and Prætus, Twins. They are ſaid to have ſtrugled in the Womb, and did it to purpoſe afterwards for the Kingdom. Prætus firſt obtained, and held it ſeventeen years, but then was driven from Argos by Acriſius, and forced to fly into Lycia, to Iobas his Father-in-law, King of that Countrey. From him he returned with armed hand, ſeized upon Tyrinthe, and afterwards joyned Battel with his Brother, wherein they two are reported, firſt of all others, to have uſed Targets. The Battel ending with equal ſucceſs, they came to an accommodation, and divided the Kingdom. Acriſius was to ſtay at Argos, and Prætus to enjoy Heræus, Midæa, Tirynthe, and the Maritime Parts. Prætus had by his Wife Sthenobæa, a Son named Megapenthes, and three Daughters, which being taken with the Fury of Bacchus, Melampus the Poet is ſaid to have cured. Acriſius on Euridice begat a Daughter named Danae, and conſulting the Oracle about Iſſue Male, was anſwered, that he ſhould have no Son, but a Nephew, by his Daughter, that ſhould procure his Death. Hereupon, he ſhut up Danae with her Nurſe in the Ground; but Jupiter turning himſelf into a Golden ſhower, thereby got to her, and begat Perſeus. Both Mother and Son were put into an Ark, and caſt into the Sea, which drave them aſhore on the Iſland Seriphus, where Dictys, Brother to Polydectes the King, educated the Boy. Being grown up, he made an Expedition into Africk, where he ſlew the Gorgon Meduſa, being ſent, as the Fable goeth, by Polydectes, who ſought to be revenged on him, for hindering him from the Marriage of his Mother; but Pauſanias, not at all regarding the Fable, writeth, that this Meduſa was the Daughter of Phorchus, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, which lay upon the Lake Tritonis; that ſhe was wont to go out and fight with the Africans, over which ſhe reigned; but Perſeus coming againſt her with choice Forces out of Peloponneſus (ſo that this Voyage muſt have been after his Return thither, and his Grand-Father's death) ſhe was entrapped by him, and ſlain in the Night. He admiring her Beauty, cut off her Head, and carried it into Greece for a Spectacle.

Acriſius and Prætus.

Danae.

Mother to Perſeus.

(a) Vide lib. 8. p. 376, 377.

(b) Euſeb. Apollod.

Pauſan. in Argolicis.

10. Perſeus, after this, married Andromeda, (Daughter to Cepheus, by Caſſiopeia, who reigned at Joppe, a Maritime Town of Phœnicia) having firſt ſaved her from being devoured by a Whale. This by one is thus interpreted; That Phœnix, by her Father's conſent, took her away by Force, and carrying her in a Ship called the Whale, Perſeus ſailing that way, and hearing her Lamentations, boarded the Ship, and delivering her out of his hands, married her. After this, he returned to Siſyphus, where he revenged upon Polydectes, the Violence offered to his Mother; and then, with her and his Wife, went to Argos to ſee his Grand-Father, who being afraid becauſe of the Oracle, departed into Pelaſgia (or Theſſaly) ſo called from the Pelaſgi, who were now removed thither out of Peloponneſus, being a vagabond People, and ſtaying in no place:) where, when Teutamias, King of the Lariſſæans, made Games in honour of his deceaſed Father, thither alſo came Perſeus, amongſt other luſty and active young Men, and ſlew his Grand-Father at unawares in the Game, by a ſtroke of a Quoit upon his Foot, after he had reigned thirty years.

Conon. apud Photium in Bibliotheca.

Apollod. lib. 2

Perſeus killeth Acriſius.

11. Some (c) think, that rather to Acriſius, than to Amphyction the Son of Deucalion (who 182 years before, began his Reign at Athens) the Founding of the Famous Council of the Amphyctiones is to be aſcribed. It ſeemeth probable, that Amphyction firſt of all aſſembled it in Theſſaly, near the Streights of Thermopylæ, (Pauſanias writeth to have been the common opinion) and that Acriſius thence transferred it to Delphos in Phocis, where it for the moſt part aſſembled; this Place being the middle of Greece, and, as the Greeks thought, of the World it ſelf, where was alſo the famed Oracle of Apollo Pythius. For, theſe Cities, which at firſt had only Right to ſend their Deputies to the Council, were ſuch as either were ſeated in Theſſaly,

The General Council of the Amphyctiones.

Lege Strabon. lib. 9. p. 419, 420.

Lege Pauſan. in Phocicis.

or

Sect. 3.

or near unto it. This was the chief Tribunal of all Greece, for deciding of Publick and moſt weighty Cauſes, betwixt the ſeveral Cities, and Common-wealths. The authority thereof was very great; inſomuch as its Decrees have ſometimes been executed by the Sword, with the great Motions of ſeveral States, ſome or other ſcarce ever being wanting to undertake the work. It uſed to meet twice a year, (and oftener if neceſſity required) in the beginning of Spring and Autumn; the Cities ſending their Deputies, three, two, or one, according to their bigneſs. Theſe were called Pylagoræ, becauſe they met at Pylæ, a place near to the Temple, of which they alſo had the overſight, and præſided over the Games made in honour of Apollo Pythius every other year. This Court continued for many Ages without change, until the time of Philip King of Macedon, and Father of Alexander the Great, who overthrowing the Phocians in the Sacred War, for their Sacrilege outed them, and the Lacedæmonians their Aſſiſtants, of their Privileges of Voting therein, and transferred the Right to his own Kingdom. Long after, Auguſtus Cæſar innovated again, by removing the Magneſians Maleans, and others, from their Intereſt herein, and making Nicopolis (a City built by him in memory of his Victory at Actium) free of that Society, as Pauſanias telleth us, who hath alſo recorded, that in his time, (which fell in with the Reign of Antonnins Pius the Roman Emperour) this Council was ſtill maintained and kept up, conſiſting of thirty Perſons.

A. M. 2693.

The Kingdom of Argos divided.

12. Perſeus, after that Diſaſter, which happened to his Grand-father, was aſhamed to return to Argos, his Inheritance, and therefore went to Tirynthe, and changed Kingdoms with his Couſin Megapenthes. He built Mycenæ (ſo called from his Sword's * Scabbard, that fell from him in this place, which thing he took as a ſign, that here he ſhould build a City) and making it his Seat, therein reigned fifty eight years. About this time this Kingdom of Argos, that had now continued about 544 years, came to be divided into three parts. For Anaxagoras the Son of Megapenthes contenting himſelf with a third of his half, gave the other two to Melampus the Son of Amythaon, and his Brother Bias; either for that he (who is ſaid to have found out the way of Purging) had cured the Daughters of Prætus (Aunts to Anaxogoras) of their madneſs, as was told before, or (a) invented a Remedy for that Diſtemper, which had ſeized epidemically upon the Women of thoſe Parts. But Perſeus begat of Andromeda five Sons, Perſes, Alcæus, Sthenelus, Electryon, and Meſtor. Hereof Perſes the firſt, as the Greeks believed, gave Original to the Perſians, Alcæus was Father to Amphytrion, Sthenelus ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdom of Mycenæ, and Electryon begat Alcmena, Wife to Amphytrion. Sthenelus, on a Daughter of Pelops, begat Euryſtheus, his Succeſſor, ſeven Months after whoſe Birth, Hercules the Son of Amphytrion and Alcmena was born. Iphicles their other Son coming into the World after Hercules (for they were Twins) Amphytrion was accounted the Father of him, and Jupiter of Hercules, whereupon, Juno is ſaid to have ever hated him, and by the help of Ilythia, (Lucina or the Moon) to have hindred his Birth, and kept his Mother in Travel for ſeven dayes. The Boy was firſt named Alcæus, after his Grand-father; but afterwards, for his great Atchievements called Hercules, and aſcribed to no leſs a Father than Jupiter, who made the Night wherein he begat him as long as three, that his Strength might be the greater. That this Perſon was eminent in his time, is eaſie to be granted; but incredible things contained in twelve Labours, being reported to be done by him, are either meant of the paſſing of the Sun through the twelve Signs of the Zodiack; or what things were performed by ſeveral others that lived elſewhere, have been by his Countrey-men attributed to him, whoſe Epithete of Hercules (ſignifying Fame and Glory ſpread abroad in the Air) came alſo to be given to them, if the Word be of no other than Greekiſh Original.

* μύκη.

(a) Apollod. lib. 2.

(b) Pauſan. ut ſuprà. Diodor. lib. 4. p. 188.

Hercules.

A. M. 2724.

How many of that name.

13. Cicero reckoneth up ſix who had the name of Hercules. The firſt and moſt ancient, he maketh begotten by the ancienteſt Jupiter, on Lipitus, and to have ſtriven with Apollo about the Tripos. The ſecond was an Ægyptian, Son to Nile, who deſpiſed the Phrygian Letters. The third, a Native of Crete, and one of the Idæi Dactyli, who firſt found out the making of Iron, by taking notice of the melting of that Metal in the Hill Ida when it burned, and being five in number, had the name of Dactyli from the Fingers, in number ſo many on each hand. The fourth was Son to Aſteria, the Siſter of Latona, and Father to Carthage, being worſhipped by the Tyrians. Belus in India is reckoned for the fifth; and then in the ſixth place cometh this Son of Alcmena. The Ægyptian Hercules is ſaid to have aided the Gods in their War againſt the Gyants, which being the off-ſpring of the Earth, Diodorus acknowledgeth that this cannot agree with the time of the Græcian Hercules, who lived but one Age before the Trojan War; but rather happened at the Original of Mankind.

14. Hercules the Tyrian is believed to have been the Captain of that Expedition which the Phœnicians made into Spain and Gades, which, though the Græcians attribute to theirs, yet this convinceth their aſſertion of Falſhood, That in the Iſland Gades, was a moſt ancient Temple, wherein Hercules was worſhipped, not after the Græcian manner, but according to the Rites of Phœnicia. This was he, who erected his Pillars at the Bound or utmoſt Limit of the World, and that over-ran Spain, Italy, and Gaul. Sanchoniathon a Phœnician Author of great Antiquity, wrote, that he was the Son of Damacuns, and that his Proper Name was Melcarthus (which ſignified the King of the City) by the Greeks called Melicertes and Palæmon. He was alſo called Diodas * by Euſebius (for which Deſanaus is thought to be corruptly written in Hierom's Tranſlation) which Phœnician name he ſeemeth to have had, becauſe he was invocated by Lovers; their happy Succeſs being ſuppoſed to depend on him. Some think this Tyrian Hercules was the ſame with the Ægyptian or Libian, by Pauſanias named Maceris, who undertook a Journey to Delphos, and whoſe Son Sardus leading a Colony into the Iſland Ichnuſa, changed its name into Sardinia. Tacitus * writeth, that the Libyans would have the moſt ancient Hercules a Native of their Countrey, and that ſuch as came near him in Valour and Renown were named after him. Diodorus Siculus, and Euſebius mention three of this name, (though the former attributeth all their Actions to the youngeſt, or the Son of Alcmena) Servius 4, and Varro 44. And here muſt be remembred what was before noted; that it was the Cuſtom of old, to call the moſt antient Kings by the name of Saturn, their Sons by that of Jupiter, and their moſt Valiant and active Nephews, by this of Hercules.

* Conſule Bocharti Canaan lib. 1. cap. 24.

* Annal. lib. 2.

The Story of Hercules the Son of Alcmena.

Apollodorus & Diodor.

15. This Heroe being ſo much written and talked of, it concerneth Beginners to have ſome account of his Actions, and the rather, becauſe they include the Labours of many. Amphytrion, his Father, as it ſeemeth, was Prince of Tyrinthos, but thence was forced to fly to Thebes, having at unawares killed Electryon his Uncle and Father-in-Law, where Hercules being educated, ſlew Linus his Muſick-Maſter with an Harp as he taught him. His Father ſeeing his Diſpoſition, and fearing ſome ſuch like Accident might fall out again, ſent him amongſt the Herdſmen, where, not yet eighteen years old, he ſlew a Lyon. For his extraordinary Strength and Courage he was taken notice of by Theſpis, (or Theſpius) Prince of the Theſpienſes, who made him lye with his fifty Daughters, of which begetting ſo many Sons, theſe afterwards paſſed over into the Iſland Sardinia, with the name of Theſpiades. A little after this, he delivered Thebes from the Tyranny of Erginus, King of the Minyans, who exacted an Annual Tribute of 100 Oxen. He deſtroyed Orchomenus, with his Palace therein, and for this was rewarded with Megara, Daughter to Creon Prince of Thebes. When he was about twenty years old, he ſailed with Jaſon, amongſt others to Colchos, to fetch thence the Golden Fleece, ſo much celebrated by Poets, and variouſly interpreted by Expoſitors of Mythology.

The Argonautæ.

16. This Jaſon was the Son of Æſon, and the fourth in Deſcent from Æolus, being born at Ioleus, which Place, Pelias, King thereof, unjuſtly detained from his Father. He conſidering with himſelf what glory Perſeus and others of late had gotten, ſought how he might accompliſh ſome notable Enterprize for the eternizing of his Name; and having at length reſolved on this Deſign, publiſhed his intentions throughout Greece, by a Crier. The young and active Spirits of that time were much taken therewith, and fifty three of the Flower of Greece gave their Names to the Expedition, of whom the moſt Eminent, beſides Hercules, were Orpheus, (Scholar to Linus) Oileus, Telamon, and Peleus, the Sons of Æacus, Pollux and Caſtor, Sons to Tindareus King of Sparta, Meleager and Argus, who built the Ship, named after Argo, wherein they ſailed, and thence were afterwards called Argonautæ. Having all things in readineſs, (Pelias ſupplying Jaſon with all Neceſſaries, to be rid of him, fearing he ſhould call him to account for the Kingdom) they ſet ſail from Ioleus, and came to Lemnus, an Iſland in the Ægæan Sea, whence they ſailed to the Countrey of the Doliones, by whoſe King Cyzicus they were honourably received; but thence lanching out by Night, were driven back by Tempeſt, and being taken by him for the Pelaſgi, with whom he was at feud, he fell upon them, and loſt his Life in the Fight, with many of his Followers; but, his Errour once underſtood, was magnificently buried by them. From Cyzicus they came into Myſia, where Hercules, for want of skill in rowing, brake his Oar, and going into the Woods to provide another, whil'ſt his Companions reſted themſelves on the Shoar, it happened that Hylas his Boy drinking at a Fountain, was intercepted by the Nymphs, as the Story goeth. Crying Apollonius Rhodius l. 1.

Lege Simſonium in Chronico ad A.M. 2743.

out, Polyphemus, the Son of Elatus, who had married Laonome, the Siſter of Hercules, ran out to reſcue him, and meeting with Hercules, went up and down ſeeking him in great perplexity; ſo that they were left behind by their Companions, whom Hercules followed on foot to Colchos.

Theocritus in Hyla.

17. Jaſon with the reſt ſailed to Colchos, and by the treachery of Medea, Daughter to Æetes the King, that fell in love with him, became Maſter of the Golden Fleece, and returned home with her, having finiſhed his Journey in four Moneths. They lived happily at Corinth for ten years, till Creon, King of that City, betrothing his Daughter Glauce to him, Medea was commanded to quit the Place; whereupon, mad with anger, ſhe ſet the Palace on fire, and ſlew her own three Sons which ſhe had by Jaſon, as Euripides relateth the Story; who, as it's probable, too much indulgeth his Poetick liberty, the Corinthians having corrupted him with five Talents, as an ancient (a) Hiſtorian hath diſcovered. (b) Herodotus writeth, that a Meſſenger was ſent from Colchos to demand Medea, but he was put off with this Anſwer, that they of Aſia had formerly ſtoln away Io from Argos. As the Argonautæ ſailed by Athos and Samothracia, they were driven by Tempeſt upon Sigæum, a Promontory of Troas, (c) where they found Heſione, Daughter to Laomedon King of Troy, bound upon the Shoar, that ſhe might become a Prey to a Whale. This Whale had been ſent by Neptune to devour Paſſengers upon the Coaſt, becauſe (d) Laomedon, with Money taken out of the Temple of Neptune, and Apollo, had built the Walls of the City, and made no Reſtitution. Apollo had anſwered, that no way could they be quit of the Whale, but by the devouring of ſome one choſen out by lot, which fell upon the King's own Daughter. But Hercules moved with pity, upon promiſe to have the Maid, and certain Horſes that never were handled, undertook to kill the Whale, which readily performing, he truſted Laomedon with his Wages, till his return from Colchos. Then he demanded them (e) by Iphicles, his Brother, and Telamon, whom he ſent into the City, but the King, inſtead of reſtoring what he formerly detained, impriſoned the Meſſengers, and plotted the deſtruction of the whole Company. Priamus, of all his Sons, was onely againſt this Treachery, and when he could not otherwiſe prevail, ſent in two Swords to the Priſoners, wherewith they diſpatching their Keepers, got out to their Companions. In revenge for this afterward, Hercules took the City, ſlew Laomedon, and preferred Priamus for his Integrity to the Kingdom.

(a) Vide Parmeniſcum, ſcholiis ad Euripidem.

(b) *Lib.*1.*c.*2.

(c) Diodorus l. 1. *p.*171.

(d) Vide Pindari interpret. ad Nem. 3.

(e) Diodorus ibid. p. 175.

18. The Argonautæ being returned into Greece, Hercules (f) took an Oath of them mutually to aid one another, as alſo to chuſe out ſome certain place, wherein to meet and celebrate Games in honour of Jupiter Olympius. This matter being left to his Care and Management, he pitched on the Plains of the Eleans, lying upon the River Alpheus, where he ordained Exerciſes, both to be performed on Foot, and Horſe-back, appointed Rewards to the Victors, and ſent abroad to give notice thereof to the ſeveral Cities, which were all hereby wonderfully affectionated towards him. But after Euryſtheus had ſucceeded Sthenelus his Father, in the Kingdom of Mycenæ, he began to grow jealous of the Strength and Proſperity of Hercules, and ceaſed not to preſs him forwards into dangerous, though glorious Attempts. He at firſt refuſing, went and conſulted the Oracle at Delphos, which is ſaid to have acquainted him with the Pleaſure of the Gods, that at the appointment of Euryſtheus, he ſhould finiſh twelve Labours, and ſo attain to Immortality. Hereat he grew exceeding melancholy, taking it in great Diſdain to be commanded by him, which Diſcontent aroſe to a Phrenſie, and in this Diſtemper he killed the Children that he had by Megara, and put her away; but afterwards coming to his right mind, reſolved to venture himſelf, and returned to Euryſtheus for his Orders.

(f) Idem pag. 178.

Olympick Games inſtituted by Hercules.

His twelve Labours.

The * firſt Task impoſed on him, was to kill a Lyon in Nemea, a Wood of Achaia, whom no Sword nor any other Weapon could pierce; being only to be maſtered by the Hand, he caught and ſtrangled him, then taking off his Skin, thenceforth wore it as a Garment. The ſecond thing enjoyned him, was to kill an Hydra with an hundred Heads, like Snakes, whereof when one was cut off, two others ſprung up in its room. The third was, to bring home alive the Erymanthian Boar, at the ſight of which Beaſt upon his ſhoulders, Euryſtheus was ſo frighted, that he ran for fear into a braſen Hogſhead; and in this Expedition he alſo overcame the Centaures. The next thing commanded him, was to catch an Hart of marvellous ſwiftneſs, with Golden Horns, which he effected, but in what manner is not agreed on. After this, he drave away innumerable companies of Birds from the Stymphalian Fens, which there, and in other places devoured the Corn. Then cleanſed he Augeas his Stable; not by carrying the Dung out upon his ſhoulders, (which Indignity was intended him by Euryſtheus) but by the Current of the River Peneus, which he brought down thither for that purpoſe. The ſeventh thing commanded him, was, to fetch a wild Bull out of the Iſland Crete, with which Paſiphaes is ſaid to have faln in love: and betwixt this and the next Labour, he helped the Gods againſt the Gyants, and pacifying Jupiter towards Prometheus, looſed this man from the place, where an Eagle continually fed upon his Liver, for his communicating to men the knowledge of Fire. The eighth Task was to fetch the Mares of Diomedes out of Thrace, which had brazen Mangers, were tyed with Iron chains, and fed not on any other Fodder but the fleſh of Strangers coming that way: But Hercules firſt gave them their Maſter's Fleſh, and then brought them to Euryſtheus, who dedicated them to Juno, and their Breed is ſaid to have continued to the time of Alexander the Great.

* Diodorus l. 4. p. 219. B.

20. After this it is, that Diodorus maketh him to have ſailed amongſt the Argonautæ to Colchos. Then, at the Command of Euryſtheus he warred againſt the Amazons in Africk, and brought to him the Girdle of Hippolyta their Queen. The tenth Labour was to fetch the Oxen of Geryon out of Iberia, or Spain, as the Fable goeth; whereas Geryon reigned not there, but in that part of Epirus which lieth about Ambracia and Amphilochus, as (a) Arrianus witneſſeth, from the Pen of Hecatæus, a moſt ancient Hiſtorian, (b) and others do teſtifie. There were afterwards in Epirus a very large ſort of Oxen, called Larini, thought to be of that Kind which Hercules drove away, and to have had this name from Larinus his Herdſman. Seeing then that this occaſion of invading Spain, Italy, and Gaul, is taken away from this Hercules, that Expedition is to be left to the Phœnician, to whom formerly we aſcribed it. But Hercules is farther ſaid in this Journey to have ſlain Antæus, to have gone down into Ægypt, and made an end there of Buſiris that cruel Tyrant, and erected his Pillars in the utmoſt Bounds of the World. Within eight years and one month he finiſhed theſe his ten Labours. After his return, he was enjoyned to fetch Cerberus out of Hell; which having accompliſhed, the twelfth was the fetching of the golden Heſperian Apples; which, whether they were ſuch, and were kept by a terrible Dragon, or by them were to be underſtood Herds of Cattel, defended by ſome ſtrong and valiant man, he alſo brought out of Africk to Euryſtheus. Theſe are his twelve Labours, as Diodorus deſcribeth, and ranketh them.

(a) L. 2. Anab.

(b) Euſtathius in Dionyſium Periegetem. Athenæus lib. 9. Scholiaſtes in Ariſtoph. Aves. Suidas.

His other Acts.

21. Having ſerved Euryſtheus twelve years, he returned to Thebes, and there gave Megara, whom he had put away, to Iolaus, the Son of his Brother Iphicles. He had now no Legitimate Iſſue, and therefore married Dejaneira, Daughter to Oeneus, King of the Calydonians, to pleaſure whom, he derived the River Achelous into another Chanel, and thereby rendred the Countrey more fertile; whence the Fable aroſe, that he fought with Achelous, turned into a Bull, and cutting off one of his Horns, gave it to the Ætolians, (part of whom the Calydonians were) called the Horn of Amalthea, wherein was plenty of all Fruits. Before this, he had won Iole, the Daughter of Eurytus, Prince of Occhalia, by ſhooting, which Exerciſe her Father had propoſed to all Comers, againſt himſelf and his Son. Yet was he denied her; whereupon, to be revenged on Eurytus, he drove away his Horſes, and carrying his Son Iphitus, who was ſent to ſeek them, up into a Tower, to ſee if he could make any diſcovery of them, when he could not eſpy them, as if he had wrongfully accuſed them of Theft, he threw him down headlong. For this, he was ſtruck with a Diſeaſe, and had anſwer from the Oracle at Delphos, that if he would be freed from it, he muſt be ſold, and the price given to the Children of Iphitus. He then paſſing over into Aſia, willingly permitted one of his Friends to ſell him, and was bought by Omphale, Queen of the Mæonians, to whom her Husband Tmolus had left the Kingdom. Being freed from his Diſeaſe, he did his Miſtreſs great Service, killing many of the famous Robbers, called Cercopes, and bringing ſome of them alive unto her. Omphale admiring his Acts, after ſhe knew who he was, gave him his liberty, and took him to her Bed. Of her he begat Lamus, having already a Son by his fellow ſlave, named Cleolaus: he ſerved her three years, and then returning into Peloponneſus, went againſt Laomedon King of Ilium, as ſome rank the Series of his Actions.

Diodorus & Apollodorus.

22. Some years after, having ſubdued ſeveral Perſons, and Cities in Greece, he joyned the Arcadians and others to him, and went with an Army againſt Eurytus, whom he ſlew, with his three Sons, and taking away Iole, came to Cenæum, a Promontory of Eubœa. Here, being about to ſacrifice, he ſent Lichas his Servant to Trachine for his Shirt and Coat, wherein he was wont to perform that Religious Work. From Lichas Dejaneira learning how Iole was taken, and fearing to be robbed by her of her Husband's Affections, anointed his Shirt with a Poyſon given her by Neſſus the Centaure, as he was dying (who would have raviſhed her, and for that was killed by Hercules) perſwading her, that it was an Ointment Efficacious to procure Love. As ſoon as the Shirt touched his Body, the Venom alſo ſeized on it, wherewith being grievouſly tormented, he diſmiſſed his Army, and returned to Trachines, where the Diſeaſe increaſing, he ſent to enquire of Apollo about a Remedy. It was anſwered, he ſhould be carried up to the Mountain Oeta, where a great pile of Wood being reared, Jupiter would take care for the reſt. This done, and all hope of Recovery paſt, Hercules, in his Warlike Habit, caſt himſelf upon the pile, and deſired the Standers by to put Fire to it; which, when all his Relations refuſed to do, Pœas, who ſeeking his Cattel came that way, as Apollodorus writeth, or his Son Philoctetos, as moſt deliver, (to whom Hercules gave for a reward his Bow and Arrows) ſet fire to it, which alſo being kindled with Lightning, was preſently reduced together with the Body, into Aſhes. Iolaus finding one of his Bones, a perſwaſion aroſe, that he paſſed from amongſt Mortals to the Gods, as the Oracle had formerly ſhewed. He commanded, that Hyllus his Son, when he came at Age, ſhould marry Iole. As for Dejaneira, ſhe, ſeeing what was brought upon her Husband, out of vexation hanged her ſelf. Thus periſhed Alcæus, Sirnamed Hercules, the Son of Amphytrion and Alcmena, at the Age of 52 years, having in a fit of Phrenſie, as it's thought, burnt himſelf. And theſe are the moſt remarkable things that are written of him, who lived (according to the Chronology, which taketh not in the hundred years formerly mentioned) in the dayes of Tholah the Judge of Iſrael.

Diodorus ut prius, p. 169. &c. Apollodorus.

His end.

A. M. 2776.

What happened to his Children.

23. Hercules being dead, his Children for ſome time ſtayed at Trachine, with Ceyces the King, till Hyllus and others of them were grown up. Then Euryſtheus began to fear them, and therefore reſolving to baniſh them all out of (a) Greece (or rather Peloponneſus) ſent to Ceyces, commanding him, upon pain of his Diſpleaſure, to remove them together with Iolaus, and the reſt of their Friends. They being unable to make reſiſtance, voluntarily quitted the Place, and ſent about to the Principal Cities to beg harbour, which none would afford them except the Athenians, who placed them in Tricorinth, one of the four Parts of their City. After ſome time, when they were come to ripeneſs of Age, and now bare themſelves high upon the glory of their Father, Euryſtheus much more ſuſpecting their growth, led down a great Army againſt them; but, aſſiſted by the Athenians, under Conduct of their Couſin Iolaus and Theſeus, they overthrew and ſlew (b) him with all his Sons, and then invaded Peloponneſus. Now a Plague ſeized on the Countrey, and the Oracle anſwered, that it was, becauſe they returned thither before their time; whereupon Hyllus returned, as ſome ſay, and went to Æpalius, King of the Dorienſes about Oeta, by whom he was (c) adopted, becauſe, by Hercules his means, Ægymius had formerly recovered his Kingdom; and thenceforth the Heraclidæ became embodied with the Dorienſes. Diodorus writeth, that Hyllus, provoking ſome one of his Enemies to a ſingle Combat, upon this condition, that if he overcame, then were the Heraclidæ to be Maſters of Mycenæ, if not, they ſhould depart for fifty years, was ſlain; and ſo they accordingly returned, and kept themſelves quiet for that time.

(a) Diodor. l. 4. p. 181.

(b) Strabo l. 8. p. 377.

(c) Idem lib. 9. p. 427. C.

Atreus the Son of Pelops.

24. Euryſtheus being ſlain, after he had reigned at Mycenæ forty three years, (d) Atreus the Son of Pelops ſucceeded him, who alſo at this time had the Sovereignty of Argos. This Pelops, above an hundred years before (for ſo famous a Man muſt not be omitted) being the Son of Tantalus Prince of Phryſia, had made War upon Ilium, where, after he was put to the worſt by Ilus the King, he was forced to fly into Greece, and coming to Piſa, fell in love with (e) Hippodamia, Daughter of Oenomaus, Prince of that City, who, being warned by the Oracle to take heed to himſelf when ſhe ſhould take an Husband, had condemned her in his Reſolutions, to perpetual Virginity. Therefore he admitted no Suiter, but on this condition, to run a Race with him in the Chariot, and if he won her not, to ſuffer Death, to which he brought many, through the ſwiftneſs of his Horſes, till Pelops (or Hippodamia for him) corrupting the Chariot-driver, obtained the Prize, for grief of which, the old man thinking now the Oracle to be fulfilled, hanged himſelf. Pelops then obtained Hippodamia, and Piſa with her, after which, by little and little, he got moſt of the Peninſula into his poſſeſſion, called after him Peloponneſus, wherein he reigned fifty eight years. Of Hippodamia he begot many children, by which he promoted his Affairs more than Power; for by the marriage of them, he inſinuated into the Principalities of moſt of the Cities. Amongſt his Sons the moſt eminent were, Atreus, Thyeſtes, and Pleſthenes. The two former he left his Succeſſors, and Pleſthenes dying young, left two Boyes to Atreus, to be brought up, called Agamemnon and Menelaus. Atreus married their Mother, by name Aërope, the Daughter of Minos King of Crete, with whom his Brother Thyeſtes commit-

(d) Euſeb.

(e) Diodorus lib. 4. p. 191.

Pelops obtained Piſa, with moſt of the Peninſula.

mitting Adultery, he firſt baniſhed, and after recalling him, feaſted him with the Fleſh of his own Sons.

Agamemnon and Menelaus.

The Trojan War.

25. Some will have Atreus to have out-lived Thyeſtes; others ſay, he died before him, and, being reconciled, left him the Kingdom at his Death, on this condition, to reſtore it to Agamemnon when he ſhould come to Age. After Euryſtheus his death, it ſeemeth, that he became Maſter of all Peloponneſus, and oppoſed Hyllus, who challenging any in his Army, as was ſaid, to a ſingle Combat, Eckemus King of the Tegoatæ in Arcadia, accepted the Challenge, and ſlew him. He was very ſkilful in Aſtrology, being by ſome reputed the firſt that diſcovered the Motion of the Sun to be contrary to that of the Starry Heaven, (a) and that obſerved the Eclypſe of that Luminary. He adopted his two Nephews Agamemnon and Menelaus, who ſucceeded him (b) ſeventeen years before the beginning of the Trojan War. Agamemnon, a Man of Prudence and Courage, obtained not only Mycenæ, but Argos alſo, with all as far as (c) Sicyon and Corinth, and that Countrey then called Ionia and Ægialea, afterwards Achaia. Menelaus got Laconia, and there reigned at Lacedæmon. For Caſtor and Pollux, the Sons of Tyndareus the King, (d) dying before their Father, he ſent for him to Sparta, and delivered up his Kingdom to him, having firſt given him his Daughter Helena, whom Paris the ſecond Son of Priamus King of Troy (by his Wife Hecuba) ſtealing away, gave occaſion to the famous ten years War, and the ruine of that City; concerning which ſomething is to be ſpoken.

(a) Servius.
(b) Clemens in Stromat.
(c) Strabo ex Homero. lib. 8. p. 377.
(d) Apollod.

The Original of the Trojans.

Dardanus.

Erichthonius.

Tros.

Ilus.

Laomedon.

26. The firſt (e) Man reported to have reigned in Arcadia, was Atlas, who inhabited about the Mountain of Caucaſus, and had ſeven Daughters, which made up the Pleiades, whereof, on Electra, Jupiter her Husband begat Jaſus and Dardanus. Jaſus lived unmarried, but Dardanus had by his Wife Chryſe, the Daughter of Palaus, two Sons, Idæus and Dimas, who ſucceeded Atlas in his Kingdom. Afterwards great Inundations happening in this Countrey, they were forced to divide the People into two parts, whereof, leaving one with Dimas in Arcadia, with the other Jaſus, Dardanus and Idæus left Peloponneſus, and coaſting by Eupope, at length came into the Bay of Melane, and arrived at a certain Iſland of Thrace, called Samo-thracia, from the Countrey, and a Man's Name who inhabited it; one Samon the Son of Mercury, by the Nymph Rhene. Here finding no convenient Habitation, the greater part under the Conduct of Dardanus (for Jaſus died in the Iſland, being ſtruck with a Thunder-bolt, becauſe he attempted the Chaſtity of Ceres) paſſed into Aſia, and landing in the Helleſpont, ſeated themſelves in Phrygia. Idæus with part of the Army, ſetled upon the Mountains, which bore his Name, and Dardanus in that part of the Countrey ſince named Troas, built a City of his own Name, having ſome Grounds given him by Teucer the King of the place, the Son of Scamander, from whom the Countrey was called Teucris, and whoſe Daughter Batea he married. He ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, and changed the name of his Subjects from Teucri to Dardani, and built the City upon the Sea-ſide, about the 2530th year of the World, in the dayes of Sthenelaus King of Argos. On Batea he begat his Son and Succeſſor, called Erichthonius, reported by (f) Homer and others, to have been exceeding Rich and Fortunate, who on Callirhoë the Daughter of Scamander, begat Tros, from whom the Countrey was named. Tros ſucceeding him, begat Ilus, Aſſarachus, and Ganymedes. Ilus ſucceeded him. From Aſſaracus deſcended Æneas. Ganymedes for his Beauty was ſtollen by Tantalus King of Phrygia, and Father to Pelops, whence aroſe a War, in which many loſt their Lives, and Tantalus (though the Son of Jupiter by the Nymph Plota) was beaten out of Paphlagonia. Ilus built the chief City on the Plain, which, though the Latins called it Troja, and we Troy (which Names moſt properly belong to the Countrey) yet the Greeks conſtantly Ilium from him. Againſt him and it Pelops made an Expedition, and miſcarried in the Succeſs, as was ſaid before. Laomedon his Son ſucceeded him, who ſeeking to defraud Hercules of his wages for killing the Whale, which ſhould have devoured his Daughter Heſione, was outed of his Kingdom and Life; and Priamus his Son, for his love to Juſtice, was placed in his Throne.

(e) Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus, lib. 1. Diodorus l. 4. p. 192. & l. 5.
(f) Iliad. l. 20.
Diod. ut ſuprà. Vide Strabon. l. 13. p. 587. C.

Priamus.

27. Podarces (Sirnamed Priamus, as Apollodorus writeth) was exceeding rich, and had a large Dominion, extending from Lesbus and Tenedos to the upper Phrygia, containing (g) nine Diviſions, and many Towns beſides. He had fifty Sons, (h) whereof ſeventeen were lawfully begotten. His firſt Wife was Ariſba the Daughter of Merops, on which he begat Æſachus. Diſmiſſing her, he married Hecuba, the Daughter of Dymas, Ciſſeus, or Sangarius (all which are mentioned) and by her he had Hector, Paris, Helenus, Deiphobus, and others. Before ſhe was brought to bed of Paris, ſhe dreamed that ſhe was delivered of a Fire-brand, which ſhould conſume to aſhes the whole City. (a) Priamus hereupon cauſed the Child to be expoſed on the Mountain Ida, but by the procurement of his Mother, he was educated amongſt the Shepherds, whom, becauſe he aſſiſted againſt the Robbers, and ſhewed himſelf very couragious, he obtained the name of Alexander. He (whether out of Deſign or no, is uncertain) came to Sparta, to the Houſe of Menelaus the King, and thence ſtole his Wife Helena, which ſome (b) report he took away by force, and that after the taking of the City; but (c) others affirm of her, as of all others thus taken away, that it was not without her own liking. Fearing he might be purſued, he carried her firſt to Sidon in Phœnicia, where he married her, and thence to Troy; at which City they were ſcarce arrived, before all Greece was in an uproar, as if the whole Countrey had been over-run. Agamemnon, who was much concerned for his Brother, poſſeſſing almoſt all Peloponneſus, by his Authority eaſily perſwaded other Princes to engage in the Quarrel. He firſt aſſembled them at (d) Ægium, a City of Achaia, to conſult about the management of the War, where being choſen General, they afterwards met at Aulis, a Sea-Town of Bœotia, with their Ships, and there ſware never to return home, till Troy ſhould be taken.

(g) Conſulas omnino Strabon. l. 13. p. 184.
(h) Cicero Tuſcul. quæſt. l. 1.

The Rape of Helena.

(a) Apollod.

(b) Herod. l. 1. c. 3.

(c) Servius in Virgil. l. 10.

(d) Pauſan. in Achaicis.

A. M. 2812.

28. The chiefeſt of theſe renowned Warriours were Neſtor, who reigned in Meſſenia, Ajax the Son of Telamon Prince of the Iſland Salamine, Ajax the younger, or the Son of Oileus King of Locri, over againſt Eubœa, Achilles the Son of Peleus by the Goddeſs Thetis, whoſe Principality was Phthiotis, part of that Country afterwards called Theſſaly, Ulyſſes the Son of Laertes King of Cephalenia, Thoas the Ætolian, Podalirius and Machaon, Sons of the third Æſculapius, and Tlepolemus the Son of Hercules, who now inhabited the Iſland Rhodes. They made up amongſt them a Navy of about 1000 Ships, and therein tranſported an Army of 120000 men. From Aulis they ſailed to Lemnos, and thence, miſſing of Troy, into Myſia, which miſtaking for their Enemies Country, they began to make Incurſions into it, and were beaten back by Telephes Prince thereof; all but Achilles and Patroclus, the former whereof ſore wounded him: and Therſander General of the Bœotians here loſt his Life, into whoſe Room, becauſe his Son Tiſamenus was but young, they elected Penelaus. A Conflict preſently enſued their Arrival at Troy, wherein Proteſilaus was ſlain by a Dardanian, as Homer calleth him, (either Hector or Æneas) and then the Greeks ſent Menelaus and Ulyſſes Ambaſſadours, to demand Helena. Priamus calling a Council to deliberate about the Matter, Antenor was for delivering her up, and ſo were the reſt of the grave and ancient Men, though they attributed much to the Beauty of the Woman; but Antimachus being corrupted by the Gold of Paris, urged the contrary, and not only moved to have the Meſſage rejected, but the Meſſengers killed.

The Names of the chief amongſt the Greek Warriours.

Vide Simſonium in Chron. Cathol. ad A. M. 2812. &c.

Pauſanias in Bœoticis.

29. Priamus, though otherwiſe prudent enough, rejected the Counſel of the old men, and out of Indulgence to his Son, ſent away the Ambaſſadours without any Satisfaction. Then both Parties prepared for the War, and another Engagement followed, wherein the Greeks had the better, who then dividing their Forces, left part to continue the Seige, and with the other, Achilles (who took with him Palamedes) was ſent to haraſſe the Country, and cut off Proviſions from the City. This he ſo well performed, as he took 23 Towns, and therein got much Booty, which was divided. Whil'ſt Palamedes was with him carrying on the War in the Iſland Lesbos, Ulyſſes envying him for his great Wiſdom, wherein he ſeemed to overtop him, circumvented him by Treachery, and by falſe Suggeſtions procured him to be ſent for to the Camp, and ſtoned as a Traitor, though he had exceedingly well deſerved of the Army, being a Perſon of great Courage (which he alſo expreſſed at his Death) and yet ſo moderate and wiſe, that he thereby allayed the too much Heat of Achilles. To him ſome attribute the Invention of 16 Letters in the Greek Alphabet, others only 4. but withal, the ordering and ranking of an Army, the watch word, Guards, and Dice to divert the Souldiers. His Death was grievouſly taken by Ajax, the Son of Telamon, who for ſome time abſented himſelf, but eſpecially by Achilles, who took it ſo heinouſly, that for a great while he would not be reconciled, nor brought to Fight, having much more Cauſe to be offended for this thing, than the detaining of a Woman from him by Agamemnon, as the Poet ſings, who induſtriouſly omitteth whatſoever reflecteth upon Ulyſſes.

Servius.

Tacitus lib. 11. Plin. l. 7. c. 56.

30. Achilles determined not to fight till the Trojans ſhould pierce as far as his own Ships, which at length happening, he firſt ſent out Patroclus in his Armour, who had deſired it. Patroclus with the Myrmidones (Achilles his Subjects) put the Trojans to flight, who now had begun to caſt Fire into the Ships, ſlew Pyrachmes with his own hand, purſued Hector, and ſmote Sarpedon King of Lycia about the Lege Simſonium in Chronic. Cathol. ad A. M. 2120. &c.

Heart ſo that he died; but being wounded by Euphorbus, who came behind him, he was ſlain by Hector, Euphorbus endeavoured to get his Body, but was killed by Menelaus; and the Soul of this Euphorbus Pythagoras affirmed (according to his Principle of Commigration) to have paſſed into his own Body. After this, Achilles (whoſe Preſence formerly had kept the Trojans within their Walls) went out to fight, and taking twelve young men alive, ſlew them at the Funeral of Patroclus. By the River Scamander (or Xanthus) he killed Aſteropæus, Captain of the Pæones, from whom, though he received a Wound in the Arm, yet went he to fight with Hector, who expected him without the Walls, and would not be perſwaded to decline his Fury, though it proved his Ruine, being ſlain in this ſingle Combat about the 30*th* year of his Age. His Body tied to a Chariot, the Conquerour drew in Triumph about the Walls, but afterwards it was ranſomed by Priamus. After this he ſlew Memnon the Nephew of Priamus by his Brother Tithonus, who was ſent out of Perſia by the Aſſyrian King Teutamus to his Aid; then Troilus his Son by Hecuba, and laſtly Pentheſilea one of the Amazons, who for Murder had fled her Country, and coming to Troas after Hector's Death, did good Service againſt the Greeks. When dead, Achilles is ſaid to have been enamoured of her Body, and with her alſo the Valour of this ſort of Women is believed to have been extinct.

Patroclus ſlain.

Hector ſlain.

Diodorus l. 2. p. 91.

Servius.

31. Achilles, whom no Art nor Valour of the Trojans could overcome, was taken by the Love of a Woman, and ſlain by Treachery. For having a View of Polyxena, the Daughter of Priamus, from the Wall, he became ſo inſlaved to her in his Affections, that he proceeded to a Treaty of Marriage, wherein he was ſhot with a Dart by Paris, who hid himſelf behind the Image of Apollo, which Idol is therefore feigned an Aſſiſtant in the Work. Afterwards the Greeks had it revealed to them, that except they could take the Palladium, or Image of Pallas out of the City, till they ſhould get Hercules his Arrows, and provide a wooden Horſe, Troy could never be taken. Ulyſſes therefore, and Diomedes, as Virgil ſingeth, ſtole away the Image; Philoctetes, who had the Arrows, was ſent for from the Iſland Lemnos, and with them ſlew Paris the Incendiary, after whoſe Death Deiphobus the Son of Priamus obtained Helena, as being of beſt Account for Valour, next to his Brother Hector. Then was a wooden Horſe prepared by the hands of Epeus, which pretending to dedicate to Minerva, they left before the City, having induſtriouſly made it higher than the Gates, hoping the Trojans would pull down part of the Wall to take it in. They left alſo ſome of their choiceſt men in the Horſes Belly, and Sinon with his hands bound behind him, who under Notion of a Fugitive that had been ill uſed, ſhould perſwade them to receive it into the City; and then giving out that they would raiſe the Siege for ſome time, they withdrew into the Iſland Tenedos. The Trojans with great Reſolution break down the Wall, and taking in the Horſe placed him in the Caſtle; but in the Night Sinon giving Warning by Fire, the Greeks came from Tenedos, and being eaſily let in by their Campanions, by reaſon the Trojans had drunk themſelves faſt aſleep, the City was taken, ſacked and burnt. Menelaus killing Deiphobus in his Bed, took away Helena, and Priamus was ſlain in his own Houſe by Pyrrhus (or Neoptolemus) the Son of Achilles. Of the Trojans which eſcaped, Antenor, being ſpared by the Greeks, came with the Heneti into the Adriatick Sea, where he built Padua, and Æneas the Son of Anchiſes at length reached Italy. This Deſtruction of Troy hapned in the 10*th* year of the Siege, 408 before the firſt Olympiad, 1182 before the Æra of Chriſt, of the World 2821. in the days of Jepthah, who judged Iſrael.

Idem ad Virgil. Æneiad. l. 3.

Achilles treacherouſly killed by Paris.

Æneiad. 2.

Troy taken.

A. M. 2821.

32. Of the Greek Captains which eſcaped, Ajax the Son of Telamon ſtriving with Ulyſſes for the Armour of Achilles, and overcome by the Judgment of the Army, killed himſelf, or elſe was circumvented by his Adverſary. Ajax the younger, the Son of Oileus, having taken Priſoner Caſſandra, the Daughter of Priamus, unwilling to part with her, was driven by the Plots of Agamemnon to ſhift for himſelf, and putting out to Sea in an unſeaſonable time, miſcarried by Shipwrack. Of thoſe that returned home, moſt encountred with many Difficulties; Ulyſſes eſpecially, who for many years wandred about, as it is poetically deſcribed by Homer. Menelaus after the Work was done, preſently commanded the Greeks to prepare for their Return; but Agamemnon being unwilling to depart before he had ſacrificed to Minerva, the Fleet was divided, and a Contention aroſe betwixt the Followers of Menelaus when they came to Tenedos, becauſe ſome would have ſtayed for Agamemnon there; inſomuch as Ulyſſes then returned back to him. Neſtor ſet Sail thence before Menelaus, but was overtaken by him about the Iſland Lesbos, whence they ſailed together as far as Attica, where Menelaus ſtaying to bury Phrontes, the other left him, and came ſafe Home to Pylus. Menelaus his Ships were moſt of them over-

The Greeks return home.

In Odyſſ.

Sect. 3.

whelmed in a Tempeſt about the Promontory of Malea, and the reſt with him and Helena driven into Ægypt, where and in other places he continued till the eighth year. Agamemnon, after he had ſacrificed, and erected an Altar to the twelve Gods in the Promontory of Troas, came home, and was preſently murdered by Ægiſthus, the Son of his Uncle Thyeſtes, with whom Clytemneſtra his Wife (the Daughter alſo of Tyndareus had lived in Adultery, and now conſpired to make him away.

Conſule Strab. l. 1. p. 37, &c. Homer Odyſſ. 4.

Oreſtes.

33. He left a Son named Oreſtes, and three Daughters begotten on this Woman. The Boy (for he was but young) was by his Siſter Electra, and his Nurſe, when they perceived his Life was laid at by Ægiſthus before his Fathers Return, conveyed into Phocis, unto Stophius, who had married his Father's Siſter, whence returning the eighth year after his Death, he killed Ægiſthus together with his Mother, and recovered the Kingdom. Becauſe of his Mothers Death he was vexed by the Furies, and found ſome Difficulty in maſtering the Argives, who now oppoſed him; but by the Help of the Phocians he recovered his Fathers Dominions, though Menelaus his Uncle, either for that he diſapproved the Death of his Mother, or for private Reſpects, bare him no good Will, and neglected him, which he ſhewed further in taking from him his Daughter Hermione (who had brought him a Son) and giving her to Pyrrhus, the Son of Achilles. Tormented with the Furies he went into Arcadia, and thence to Athens, where he was acquitted in the Court of Areopagus about his Mother, the Suffrages, for, and againſt him being equal, in which Caſe Judgment always paſſed on the Defendants ſide. A little after this he is thought to have killed Pyrrhus as he was ſacrificing to his Father at the Temple of Delphos, and then reſumed his Wife. When Menelaus was dead he obtained the Kingdom of Sparta, the Lacedæmonians being more willing to receive him as the Grand-ſon of Tyndareus by Clytemneſtra, than the baſe Sons of Menelaus Nicoſtratus and Megapenthos begotten on a Slave. It it probable that he, as his Father before him, was Supream Lord of Argos, and that the Succeſſor of Melampus and Bias, ever ſince the Diviſion of the Kingdom, or for a good Space, held their Principalities of his Predeceſſors and himſelf. But now being King of Lacedæmon, and the greateſt part of Arcadia lying near to Argos, after the Death of Cylababes, the Son of Sthenelus (who left no Children) and that Amphilochus was departed thence to the Amphilochians (to whom he gave name) having the Phocians conſtant Friends to him, he eaſily made himſelf ſole Maſter of Argos, and ſo this Kingdom was re-united about 140 years after the threefold Diviſion of it. Divers years after, he placed a Colony of the Æolians in Aſia (four Ages before that of the Ionians) and ſhortly after died in Arcadia, when he had reigned 70 years.

Lege Simſonium in Chronico. A. M. 2829.

Paterculus l. 1.

Pauſan. in Corinthiacis.

Strabo l. 13. p. 582.

34. He left two Sons: One Legitimate, and named Tiſamenus (from his revenging his Fathers Death) begotten on Hermonie; and another born of Frigone the Daughter of Ægiſthus. Tiſamenus ſucceeded him according to Pauſanias, though Paterculus writeth that both of them reigned after their Fathers Death. Scarce was Tiſamenus warm in his Seat, when he was diſplaced by the Heraclidæ, or Poſterity of Hercules. They had ſeveral times attempted their Return into Peloponneſus, but were ever fruſtrated till now; Hyllus the Son of Hercules once or twice, Cleodæus his Son after him, and Ariſtomachus left three Sons, Temenus, Creſphontes, and Ariſtodemus, which being grown up conſulted the Oracle of Apollo, concerning their Return, and had the ſame Anſwer their Father formerly had, that they ſhould attain their Deſire, if they went by the way Stenygrus, which Word in the Greek being of an ambiguous Signification, Ariſtomachus thinking by it to be meant the Iſthmus, as a narrow way, led down his Forces through it, and miſcarried. Temenus objecting this, the Pythia, or woman that delivered the Oracles, anſwered, that their Anceſtors by their Miſunderſtanding had been Authors of their own Infelicity; for whereas Hyllus was told that the third Fruit was to be expected, the third Generation was meant, and not the third Crop or Summer, as he expounded it, and accordingly periſhed: And as for Stenygrus, by it they were to underſtand the Deep Sea on the right hand as one entreth Peloponneſus, and not the narrow Iſthmus. Having received this Anſwer, and conceiving all things now to be fulfilled and ripe for their effectual Return, they built Ships in Ætolia upon that Sea, the Place wherein they were made thenceforth keeping the name of Naupactus from that Occaſion. Whilſt they were about this Work, a certain Prophet appeared to them, and foretold them ſeveral things; but Hippotes taking him for a Magician ſent on Purpoſe to delude the Army, killed him. For this a Peſtilence was ſent amongſt them, about which conſulting the Oracle they were bidden to baniſh Hippotes for ten years, and uſe the Conduct of a Captain with three Eyes, for two years ſpace.

Vide Pauſan. ut prius p. 60. Apollodorum l. 2. pag. 123.

Tiſamenus.

35. Seek-

Sect. 3.

The Return of the Heraclidæ.

35. Seeking out ſuch a man, they met one Oxylus, an Ætolian, Son to Thoas that went to the Siege of Troy; who being on Horſe-back had but one Eye, now returning into his own Country from Elea in Peloponneſus, whither he had been baniſhed for killing a man. Him they made Captain of the Expedition, bargaining to procure him the Poſſeſſion of Elis as Pauſanias witneſſeth, who reporteth him to have ridden on a Mule that had but one Eye, and therefore to have been taken for the man meant by the Oracle, through the Perſwaſion of Creſphontes. Being ready, they gave out they would march again through the Iſthmus, and by that Means the Peloponneſians attending their Motions there, eaſily paſſed over the Sea, and landed at Molycrium. Three parts of Peloponneſus eſpecially they challenged as their Due: Argos, becauſe deſcended of Perſeus, whereas Tiſamenus the preſent King was of the Poſterity of Pelops, who had no Right to that Kingdom. Lacedæmon, for that Hercules killed Hypocoon, who had expelled Tyndareus thence, and reſtored the latter to the Kingdom on this Codition, to keep it for his Children. Meſſenia, becauſe having alſo conquered it, when he deſtroyed the City Pilus, and ſlew all the Brothers of Neſtor, he gave it to him of meer Goodneſs and Compaſſion, but on the ſame Condition, as Lacedæmon to Tyndareus. The Dominion of Argos without much adoe they got into their hands; after that, taking a certain Village in the Confines thereof, Temenus fortified it, and uſed it for a Place of Retreat for carrying on the War. One Philonomus betrayed Sparta into their Hands, which they entred with ſound of Pipes inſtead of Trumpets, as moſt effectual by the Tune, to make the Souldier attentive, and keep his Ranks, which Uſe was conſtantly obſerved by the Lacedæmonians, together with that of the Harp.

Apollodorus.
Eliac. 1. p. 150.
Polyænus Stratag. l. 21.
A. M. 2901.
Lege Pauſan. in Argolicis & Strabon. l. 18. p. 352, &c.
Strabo. lib. 18. p. 365.
Polyænus.

36. Tiſamenus and the Achæans thus expelled theſe parts, and out of Meſſenia by the Heraclidæ and Dorienſes their Aſſociates, ſent to the Ionians then inhabiting Peloponneſus, their Neighbours, deſiring Leave to live amongſt them. But they being jealous of him, leſt for his high Birth and Valour, he ſhould be choſen King of the Country, denied their Requeſt. The Achæans then, driven by Neceſſity and Deſperation, attempted to get by Force, what they could not by Intreaty, and though they loſt Tiſamenus in the Fight, drave the Iones out of their Seats, and conſtrained them to paſs into Attica, where they were received by the Athenians, through the Perſwaſion of Melanthus the King. As for the Heraclidæ, when they came to divide what they had won, Argos fell to Temenus; Creſphontes, by Fraud uſed in the Lot, obtained Meſſene; and Lacedæmon became the Portion of Procles, and Euryſtheus, the Sons of Ariſtodemus, who was ſlain by the Sons of Pylas, Kinſmen to Tiſamenus, before they entered Peloponneſus: they alſo, according to their Ingagement poſſeſſed Oxylus of Elis.

Pauſan. in Achaicis, Meſſenicis & Lacinicis.

Temenus obtained Argos.

37. Temenus being ſetled in Argos, after ſome years incurred the Diſpleaſure of his Sons; for marrying his Daughter Hyrnetho to Deiphontes his Kinſman; he ſo affected them two above his other Children, that he made him his only Counſellor in all Affairs; inſomuch that his Sons fearing he would transfer the Kingdom from themſelves to him, made their Father away by one Means or other. And Creſphontes his Brother, who had uſed too much Cunning in getting Meſſene, not long after, ſeeming to be too Gracious with the People, incurred the Diſpleaſure of the Nobility, and was murdered together with two of his Sons; only Epitus, then but young, eſcaped, and killing Polyphontes the Uſurper, revenged his Father's Death. Recovering thus the Kingdom, he had Succeſſors, Glaucus, Iſthmias, Dotadas, Sybotas, Phintas, Antiochus, and Euphaes, who dying of a Wound, received in a Battel fought with the Lacedæmonians, without Iſſue, Ariſtodemus was elected in his Room, and continued as long as the Kingdom it ſelf laſted, being overturned by Means of the Spartans, as will be ſeen in their Story. Ciſus the eldeſt Son of Temenus ſucceeded him, though the People generally inclined to Deiphontes, by whoſe party they were ſo ſtirred up and animated, that Ciſus being dead, they took away from his Succeſſors all Regal Power and Authority, left them nothing but a meer empty Title, and ſo in Reality, this Kingdom fell, being in Effect turned into a Free-State. Which Change happened about forty years after the Return of the Heraclidæ, 690 after the Beginning of Inachus. A. M. 2940.

Idem in Argolicis.
In Meſſenicis.
Ciſus.
All Regal Power taken from his Succeſſors.
A. M. 2940.

38. One (and he a great one) there is, who would gather out of an old Tragedian, that the ancient Government of this Kingdom of the Inachidæ was meerly abſolute, the King being by the Poet called both People and City, not ſubject to any Laws, but ſuſtained by the Power of his Throne, and acting all things according to his meer Will and Pleaſure. But if Credit may be given to the expreſs words of Pauſanias, rather than the Liberty of a Poet, Emmius thence concludeth, their Power was but moderate; for the Argives ſaith Pauſanias, from the moſt ancient times were exceeding ſtudious of Liberty. Out of this Principle (being ſtirred up as it ſeemeth by the Party of Deiphontes) they abated the Power of Ciſus his Succeſſors, leaving them nothing but an empty Name. And this they further ſhewed, when Meltas the Son of Lacidaus, one of theſe Kings, not enduring this Abatement, grew as they thought, Diſſolute and Imperious in the Government. For, impatient hereof, they deprived him of all Power,took upon them to condemn him to Death, and pluck'd up all Supremacy by the roots,not ſuffering any afterwards to reign amongſt them.For,though we meet with one afterwards,called King of Argos,in Herodotus; yet that Name ſignified no more than it did in the Common-wealths of Athens, Carthage, and Rome, where this Title was wont to be given to ſome ſorts of Officers, as this work will ſhew. The Government was now Democratical, the chief Power lying in the People, divided into three Tribes, to which the Senate was ſubordinate, choſen every year for the preparing of matters for the whole Body, and the management of the Executive Power, with Authority to Enact things of leſſer conſequence. There was alſo a Council of State, conſiſting of 80 Perſons, beſides Inferiour Magiſtrates of the City, and Judges for determining of Cauſes, all which are mentioned in the League, made betwixt the Argives, Athenians, and others, deſcribed by Thucydides in his fifth Book of the Peloponneſian War. No further Intelligence have we concerning the conſtitution of this Common-wealth, which yet flouriſhed downwards for many Ages, and had great Conteſts with the Lacedæmonians, eſpecially about the Territories of Thyrea, to which both laid claim. Sometimes they fell out about their Confederates, being moved with much emulation and diſtaſte at each others Government (the one being a Democracie, and the other an Oligarchy) which once eſpecially brought the State of Argos into great danger. But theſe things belong to another place.

Grotius ex Æſchylo in ſupplicibus, de jure Belli & Pacis. lib. 1. cap. 3.
The Kingdom of the Inachidæ moderate.
In Corinthiacis. pag. 61.

The Government made Democratical.

SECT. IV.

The moſt ancient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Athens.

Cecrops.

1. THE Founding of the Athenian Kingdom is aſcribed to (a) Cecrops, who firſt reigned in Attica (then Acte) in the dayes of Triopas King of Argos, 373 years before the deſtruction of Troy, 780 before the firſt Olympiad, A.M. 2449. The (b) Ægyptians ſaid he was their Countreyman, and brought hither a Colony of the Saitæ, who inhabited upon one of the Mouths of Nile. He was feigned to be double-natured, conſiſting both of a Serpentine and Humane ſhape, becauſe, coming into Greece, he ſhook off Barbariſm, and turned Civil. Beſides this Colony, he gathered the People of theſe Parts into twelve Towns, whereas before that, they lived diſperſedly, according to the moſt ancient cuſtom of Greece, and called them Athenæ, after the name of Minerva in the Greek Language. The Story is (c) told, that when the name came to be given, on a ſudden an Olive-tree, and a Fountain of Water appeared, whereat Cecrops moved with wonder, ſent to enquire of the Oracle what they ſhould mean. It was anſwered, that the Olive ſignified Minerva, the Water Neptune, and that they might name that City from which of theſe two they pleaſed. Hereupon, all the Men and Women were gathered together to make the choice: the Men were for Neptune, but the Women,being the greater number, carried the name for Minerva. Neptune angry hereat, drowned their Territories, whom to pacifie, they puniſhed the Women ſeveral wayes. They decreed, that thenceforth they ſhould not have a Voice in any Publick matter; that no Child ſhould bear the Mother's name, and that they ſhould not be called Athenææ, but Atticæ. Some Women, known by the name of Minerva, there have been, though impure Spirits, ambitious to blind men with Superſtition and Idolatry, might well act in this matter, as Auguſtine telleth us, under the name of Neptune.

(a) Euſebius in Chron. ex Caſtore. A.M. 2449.

(b) Diodorus, l. 1. p. 17.

(c) Auguſtin. ex Varrone. de Civitat. Dei, l. 18. c. 9.

Several Minerva's,

2. Cicero (d) mentioneth five ſeveral Women that have had the name of Minerva. The firſt was the Mother of Apollo by Vulcan. The ſecond born of the River Nile, and worſhipped by the Saitæ. The third Daughter to Jupiter Cœlius. The fourth begotten by Jupiter on Ceriphe, Daughter to the Ocean, called Coria by the Arcadians; which invented the Chariot drawn by four Horſes. The fifth was the Daughter of Pallas, ſaid to have killed her Father, becauſe he attempted to violate her Vir-

3 De natura Deorum.

Virginity. Of theſe the ſecond muſt be ſhe that was thus honoured by Cecrops, having founded the City Sais, near to Delta, being by the Ægyptians called Neuth. To her he had formerly erected a Statue in Ægypt, and he, as they ſay, firſt gave the name of Zeus to him whom the Latins called Jupiter. As there were ſeveral Minervaes, ſo alſo more (a) than one City known by the name of Athenæ. From this in Attica, the Citizens were by the Romans called Athenienſes; but another there was in Eubœa, built by Cecrops the Son of Erechtheus, the Inhabitants of which went by the name of Athenæi: and a City in Narbone, a Province of Gaul, near to Marſeils, called Atheneopolis, and the Citizens Atheneopolitæ. There was alſo in Laconia a Town called by the name of Athenæ.

and Athenæ.

(a) Varro de Analogia. Vide Ludovic. Vivem in Auguſtin. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 18. cap. 9.

Deucalion his Story.

3. In the dayes of (b) Cecrops, Deucalion the Son of Prometheus reigned in Theſſalie, whoſe Hiſtory being remarkable, muſt be briefly touched. Iapetus had three Sons, Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. For (c) the firſt, One telleth us, there were three that bore the name of Atlas. One a Moor, and the greateſt of all; another an Italian, Father to Electra; the third an Arcadian, Father of Maia, the Mother of Mercury; all which the Antients confound according to their Cuſtom. The firſt (d) lived near to Mount Atlas; to which, for his great Skill in Aſtrology, is attributed the bearing up of the Heavens; and he is alſo counted the Father of Electra. Prometheus found out the inſtrument to ſtrike fire, and thereupon is ſaid to have ſtollen fire from the Gods. Deucalion his Son married Pyrrha the Daughter of his Uncle Epimetheus, and in his time (e) happened that great Deluge in part of Greece, which is known by the addition of his name; that Countrey called moſt antiently and truly Hellas, his Seat near to the Mountain Parnaſſus being chiefly afflicted with it, on which Hill he is thought to have ſaved many men by Boats, and thence the Fable to have riſen of his re-peopling the Earth. But (that we may note it altogether) there are three particular Floods which we read to have happened to this Countrey of Greece. The firſt, under Ogyges (called the Ogygean Deluge) concerning whom we ſhall ſpeak in the Hiſtory of Thebes. This fell 248 years before either of the other, and overwhelmed Attica, eſpecially ſo, that as Pererius will have it, it remained waſte 200 years after. The next was this of Deucalion, which happened 737 years before the firſt Olympiad: and the (f) third fell 86 years after it, in the dayes of Dardanus and Cadmus.

(b) Euſeb.

(c) Servius ad 8 Æneiad.

(d) Diodorus l. 5.

(e) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, l. 18. c. 8. Oroſius l. 1.

(f) Diod. l. 5. p. 223.

His Iſſue, which is eſpecially to be noted, for a diſtinct knowledge of the ſeveral ſorts of Greeks.

4. Deucalion of Pyrrha his Wife begat Hellen and Amphiction. Hellen gave the name of Hellenes to his Subjects before called Græci, and of Hellas to the Countrey formerly named Pelaſgia, from the Pelaſgi (who there inhabited) as Hæmonia from Hæmon, the Son of Pelaſgus, and Pyrrhea from Pyrhar. He had three Sons, Xuthus, Æolus, and Dorus. To Æolus he left his Kingdom, and ſent the other two abroad to ſeek out Seats elſewhere. Æolus grew ſo famous, that the name of Jupiter and Neptune came to be given him. Dorus inhabited the Countrey Hiſtiæotis, about the Mountains Oſſa and Olympus. Xuthus after his Father's death, was baniſhed Theſſaly by his other Brothers, for ſtealing away a great part of his Fathers Treaſure, and came to Athens, where he married the Daughter of Erechtheus, on which he begat Achæus and Ion. Achæus getting aid from Athens and Ægialus, went into Theſſaly, and recovered his Grand-father's Kingdom; but afterwards killing a man by chance, he fled into Laconia, where his Poſterity continued till expelled by the Heraclidæ and Dorienſes, as we ſhewed in the Hiſtory of Tiſamenus. Ion being exceeding famous at Athens, had a numerous Progeny, which, for that Attica was now grown too full, was ſent out as a Colony into Peloponneſus, whence they were thruſt out by their Brethren the Achæans, after they had denied them harbour (as is formerly ſaid) and returned to Athens, from which City they were afterwards led out into Aſia, by the Sons of Codrus. But theſe things happened in after-times.

Strabo. l. 8.

Herod. l. 1. Pauſan. in Achaicis.

Strabo ut ſuprà.

The Council of Areopagus.

5. In Cecrops his time (g) one maketh the Council, or Senate of Areopagus to have had its Original, though no clear light can we diſcover concerning the true beginning of it. (h) Some write that it began under Solon, but (i) another of a more ancient date ſignifieth, that it was a Court of Judicature before. (k) One deriveth the word from Mars, (in Greek Ares) making him to have been firſt tried there for killing Halirrhodius, the Son of Neptune, who offered Violence to his Daughter Alcippe. Others would fetch a reaſon from the erecting his Spear there, or from this, that the Court of Areopagus took Cogniſance of Slaughters, which are uſually committed with Swords or other Weapons of Mars. Laſtly, ſome think it thence to have been named, for that the Amazons, when they fought againſt Theſeus, made Mars his Hill their Fortreſs, and there offered Sacrifice to him. * Cecrops died after he had reigned fifty years, and becauſe Eryſicthon his Son died before him, Cranæus the moſt powerful man then at Athens, ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. He, after

(g) Euſeb.

(h) Cicero Offic. l. 1. & Plutarch.

(i) Ariſtot.

(k) Pauſan. in Atticis.

Suidas.

Cranaus.

* Euſeb. Pauſan. ut ſuprà. A.M. 3507.

Amphyction.

ter he had reigned ſome ſeven years, was thruſt out by Amphyction, the Son of Deucalion, and his Son-in-law, the Founder, as ſome have thought, of the National Council of the Amphyctiones, of which we have already ſpoken. He is reported to have given entertainment to Dionyſus, or Bacchus, who, at this time, as they ſay, came into Attica, and when he had reigned ten years, was alſo expelled by Erichthonius.

Erichthonius. Pandion. Erechtheus. Apollodorus, l. 3. Pauſan. in Atticis.

6. The Father of Erichthonius was ſaid to be Vulcan, and his Mother, the Earth; becauſe he was found in Vulcan's Temple upon the Earth, with a Snake wound about his feet, whence alſo they feigned that he had feet like Snakes, and invented a Chariot wherein he might ride and hide them. He inſtituted Games to Apollo and Minerva, and having reigned fifty years, left his Kingdom to his Son Pandion, who alſo, after forty, gave way to his Son Erechtheus. He became a man of great account; and whereas the Subjects of Athens were before his time called Cecropidæ, thenceforth they were named after the Place it ſelf. He made War upon the Inhabitants of Eleaſine, Ion the Son of Xuthus, and his own Grand-ſon, by his Daughter, being his chief Commander, wherein, after he had ſlain Immardus, the Son of Eumolpus their General, he alſo loſt his Life, when he had reigned fifty years. He left three Sons, Cecrops, Metion, and Pandorus, who falling into contention about the Succeſſion, put it to the Arbitration of Xuthus. He adjudged it to the eldeſt, but yet would they not reſt ſatisfied, which made him leave Athens, and go into Ægialea, where he died. This Cecrops the ſecond, ſome think to have gathered the People into twelve Towns, for that living diſperſedly abroad, the Carians by Sea, and the Bœotians (called Æonæ) by Land, haraſſed the Countrey, as * Strabo writeth. At the end of forty years, his Son, named Pandion, ſucceeded him, who was expelled the Kingdom by the Sons of Metion his Uncle, and fled to Pyla, the King of Megara, his Father-in-law, who left him his Succeſſor. Whil'ſt he here reigned, he begat four Sons, Ægeus, Lycus, Pallas, and Niſus, who after his death went againſt the Metiontidæ, and expelled them Athens, the Dominions whereof they divided into four parts, according to their Father's injunctions, Megara falling to Niſus, who reigned there a long time.

Cecrops 2d. Pandion. * L. 9. p. 397. C. Pauſan. ut prius.

Ægeus. A.M. 2723. Plutarch. in Theſeo. Begetteth Theſeus. Apollod. A.M. 2725.

7. Though this diviſion was made, yet was Ægeus Sovereign in effect, for fear of whom, Lycus fled to Athens. Pallas the other Brother had fifty Sons, which growing up, gave cauſe enough to Ægeus to be jealous of them, having him in contempt becauſe he was childleſs. For though he married two Wives, yet had he Iſſue by neither of them, which made him go to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle about Poſterity. The anſwer being obſcure, in his return he was entertained by Pittheus, the Son of Pelops, a man famous for Learning, at Træzene, who, either underſtanding the Oracle, or otherwiſe induced, made his Daughter Æthra to lye with him, after he had cauſed him to drink good ſtore of Wine. At his departure he put a Sword, and a Knife under a great Stone, bidding her, if ſhe brought forth a Boy, as ſoon as he could remove the ſtone, and take thoſe things from under it, to ſend him with them as Tokens, unto Athens, and he would own him for his Son. She accordingly brought forth a Son (called Theſeus, from putting the marks under the ſtone) whom Pittheus brought up; and for that he proved exceeding Prudent and Couragious, his Mother at ſixteen years of Age brought him to the Stone, acquainting him with his Original, and his Father's Injunctions. He eaſily removing it, and taking away the Tokens, prepared for his Journey; but they were unwilling to let him go by Land, becauſe all the wayes were full of Robbers, ſince Hercules (who went up and down deſtroying them) after his killing of Iphitus, had quitted theſe Parts, and was gone into Lycia, where for ſome years he ſerved Omphale the Queen. But Theſeus, burning with emulation upon hearing continually the Praiſe of Hercules his Kinſman (for their Mothers were next Couſins) reſolved to take that way to obtain ſome Renown in killing thoſe Robbers; and effected his Deſign upon ſeveral of them.

Plutarch.

8. Being arrived at Athens, he was in danger to be poyſoned by his Father, through the perſwaſion of Medea, (who now was fled to him from Corinth, and filled his jealous Head with ſuſpitions of this Stranger) till thinking it wiſdom to make himſelf known, rather than let another do it, he ſhewed him the Tokens, which he preſently acknowledged, and owning him for his Son, made his Subjects, as ſuch, to take notice of him. But the Sons of Pallas, who before had been Seditious, now ſeeing all hopes of the Kingdom taken from them by him, and diſdaining that Ægeus ſhould firſt reign himſelf, being not of the Bloud Royal, but adopted onely by Pandion (as Plutarch writeth) and then leave for his Succeſſor a Stranger, and a Baſtard, they took Arms; and the better to accompliſh their Deſign, divided themſelves into two Parties, whereof the one came openly with their Father againſt Athens, and the other lay in ambuſh. Theſeus having notice of the latter ſort, ſurprized, and cut them all off, which ſo diſcouraged the other, as they ſeparated themſelves and fled.

The acts of Theſeus.

Theſeus after this, to employ himſelf, and gain the Favour of the People, went, and took the Marathonian Bull, fetch'd out of Crete by Hercules, and brought him quick into the City, after he had infeſted the Countrey very much. Then ſailed he to Crete, where, as the Fable goeth, he ſlew the Minotaure, a Monſter kept by Minos, King of that Iſland.

[illegible]nos.

9. Minos, (a) Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon were the children of Jupiter by Europa, and all adopted by Aſterius (the Grand-ſon of Hellen, by his Son Teutamus) King of that Iſland, who married their Mother, and was childleſs. Minos was the Law-giver of the Cretians; this honour being aſcribed to him by the moſt Authentick of ancient (b) Authors. Yet (c) Ephorus in his Book of Europæan Commonwealths, wrote, that he was but an Imitator of one Rhadamanthus (of the ſame name with his Brother, who by others is alſo ſaid to have been employed by Minos in this work, but more ancient) who firſt cultivated the Iſland by Laws, Cities, and Commonwealths, feigning that he had from Jupiter all the Ordinances which he publiſhed. In (d) imitation of him, Minos having continued in the Cave of Jupiter nine years, produced Laws in Writing, and aſcribed them to the ſame Author, as Homer alſo hinteth; which (e) word of Homer, though Strabo taketh to ſignifie a continuance for ten years, yet Plato, and from him (f) Valerius Maximus, interpret it not of nine years continuance, but every ninth year, wherein, as it ſeemeth, he amended his Laws. Although Minos was a King, yet he directed (according to * Ephorus) the whole Model of his Laws to the Freedom of his Subjects. This Liberty he thought to be preſerved beſt by Concord, which would be moſt eſtabliſhed by the prevention of Avarice and Luxury, the great cauſes of Diſagreement. He would therefore have them all live ſoberly and frugally, to which purpoſe he ordained, that Boyes ſhould live together in Companies, called Agelæ, when they were grown up, and men, in others, called Syſſitia, from eating together, (which they alſo named Andria from their Manhood) that taking their Meat all in publick, the Poor might live in equal condition with the Rich.

(a) Diodorus l. 4. p. 183.
(b) Plato in legibus. Ariſtot. Polit. l. 2. cap. 8.
(c) Apud Strabon. lib. 10. p. 476.
(d) Ἐννέωρος.
(e) Odyſſ.
(f) Lib. 1. c. 2. Exter. Exempl.
* Apud Strab. ut priùs. pag. 480. B.

The Form of the Cretian Common-wealth.

10. After the abdication of Regal Power, the chief Magiſtracy was exerciſed by ten Coſmi, in Power, though not in Number, like to the Spartan Ephori, being choſen out of the loweſt ſort of People as thoſe; yet not out of the whole Body, but particular Families, which Cuſtom Ariſtotle accounteth worſe than the other of Lacedæmon. Thoſe Coſmi at home Governed the Common-wealth; in War commanded the Army with abſolute Authority. There was alſo a Senate choſen out of thoſe who in this Office had well demeaned themſelves, being for life, and not liable to be called to account. There was an Order of Horſe-men, who were bound to keep Horſes for the ſervice of the State, whereas they at Lacedæmon had no ſuch tie upon them. In the Concio, or great Aſſembly, all Members of the Common-wealth had equal Votes, but its Power was not great, confirming onely what was propounded by the Senate and Coſmi. They had publick Slaves, called Periæci, from their inhabiting up and down the Countrey, who tilled the Grounds, and paid in a conſtant Revenue. All, when ripe of Age, were commanded to marry, for the propagation of legitimate iſſue: Yet did they not lead their Wives to their Houſes, when newly married, but let them ſtay till they were fit to govern a Family. The Boyes took their meat altogether on the ground, ſerving themſelves and the elder ſort. They were cloathed meanly, and alike both Winter and Summer; they uſed bickerings with one another, both with ſingle Hand and Weapon, on certain dayes, and had thoſe who exerciſed them alſo in Shooting, and a warlike kind of leaping, invented by Cures; moreover, in certain Rythms, called properly * Rythmi Cretici. The Cretians had ſeveral commendable Laws, as that which ſeverely reſtrained Drunkenneſs; another, commended by Plato, that required an account how publick Corn was diſtributed and ſpent. The younger ſort were utterly forbidden to make any enquiry into the Equity of the Laws, and if the elder were unſatisfied, without their knowledge, they were to have recourſe to the Magiſtrates, and their own Equals. But, that the Laws might be ingraven in their memories, the Boyes were wont when they were taught to read, to get ſome of them by heart, being put into Verſe, together with ſome Muſical Notes.

Vide Ariſtot. quo priùs & Strabon.
* Ρύθμοι Κρητικοί.

11. Lycurgus, the Spartan Law-giver, made this Model the Pattern of his new Common-wealth, having travelled into the Iſland, where he had converſe with Thales, a man ennobled for his Laws, and Lyrick Poems; for we muſt not ſuppoſe Minos the ſole Author of the Cretian Cuſtoms. As the Cretians had their Coſmi, ſo the Strab. lib. 10. pag. 482.

the Spartans their Ephori, though moſt probable it is, that theſe were brought in after the death of Lycurgus. As they a Senate, ſo theſe alſo endowed with the like Immunities. The Concio, or Aſſembly of the People in Crete, reſolved nothing but what was propounded by the Coſmi and Senate, which was followed by the firſt Conſtitution of Lycurgus, the Senate propounding at Sparta. The Periœci, and Heloti fitly agreed, though the Cretians received leſs dammage from the former, becauſe, being in an Iſland, there were no Neighbours to hold correſpondence with the Slaves. The Syſſitia of the Lacedæmonians were fetched, as Ariſtotle proveth, from Crete, and their Phiditia taken from the Andria of that Place, as alſo their Education of Children was agreeable to the Cretian. Plato commendeth much the Commonwealth of Crete, and the Legiſlator for his Wiſdom and Prudence, though he abominateth the immodeſt love of Boyes, and rejecteth his reaſon for it, which yet Lycurgus ſo approved, as to put it in his Model. Ariſtotle condemneth it, as alſo, amongſt ſome other things, the Election of the Coſmi, and their too great advantage they had of raiſing Seditions in the State, when they came to be puniſhed. But Polybius affirmeth, the two Commonwealths of Crete and Sparta to have vaſtly differed, not fearing to blame Ephorus, Xenophon, Caliſthenes, and Plato, for ſaying they were very like; becauſe with the Cretians it was uſual to ingroſs Land and Money, whence they were avaricious, contentious, ſeditious, and what not? Moreover, they had annual Magiſtrates, whereas the other had two Kings for life. They were, he ſaith, fraudulent and crafty in their private Demeanour, and moſt unjuſt in their publick Councils. Though ſome publick Abuſes taxed by Polybius, might have crept in in after times, ; yet it appeareth from the teſtimony of that Verſe of Epimenides a Cretian, which St. Paul citeth and confirmeth, Ariſt. Politic. lib. 2. cap. 8.

De legibus, lib. 8.

Lib. 4. & 6.

Proverb. cum Cretenſe Cretiſſare, lib. 8.

Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί,

That the Diſpoſition even of the old Cretians (for Epimenides is found contemporary with Solon) was very naught.

12. Minos ſucceeding his Step-father, begat Lycaſtes, and left him his Succeſſor, who, on Ida the Daughter of Corybas, begat Minos the ſecond, fathered alſo on Jupiter. He had Iſſue by Paſiphae, (Daughter to Sol and Crete) Deucalion Aſtrea, Androgeos, Ariadne, and other Children. Androgeos going to the Solemn Feaſt of the Panathenæa, inſtituted by Theſeus, at Athens, excelled all men in the Exerciſes then performed, whereby he became familiarly acquainted with the Sons of Pallas. This, when Ægeus perceived, fearing they might by his means receive ſome aid and aſſiſtance, he procured him to be made away, at which Minos ſore aggrieved, came to Athens to demand ſatisfaction, but obtaining none, is ſaid to have procured from Jupiter a Famine to fall upon all Greece, and eſpecially Attica, which could not be abated, till he received ſatisfaction. A yearly Tribute then he impoſed on the Athenians, of ſeven Boyes, and as many Girls, which being unwillingly willing to ſubmit to, they were ſore diſpleaſed when they came to part with their Children, and repining at Ægeus, as the Author of their Calamity, at the third time of ſending, Theſeus offered himſelf to go amongſt the reſt. The Fable is, that they were to be devoured of the Minotaure, a Monſter, whoſe upper Parts were like to thoſe of a Man, but reſembled a Bull in the other. Some thought there might be ſuch a Monſter indeed, but moſt account it fabulous, and it is interpreted to be meant of one Taurus, the Captain of Minos, who might have cuſtody of theſe Children, whom Ariſtotle will not have killed, but made Slaves till their death. Theſeus promiſing to kill this Minotaure, Ægeus with much adoe yielded he ſhould go, and commanded the Maſter of the Ship, that, whereas for the ſadneſs of the occaſion they uſed black Sails, if his Son came back alive, he ſhould change them for white ones, as ſoon as they came within kenning of Attica.

Plutarch. ut ſuprà.

He killeth the Minotaure.

13. Theſeus coming into Crete, by the help of Ariadne the Daughter of Minos, (which fell in love with him) got into the Labyrinth where the Minotaure was kept (and which was made by Dædalus, who having killed his Siſters Son at Athens, fled into this Iſland) and ſlew him. It is thought, that when he landed, he offered the Combat to whomſoever would accept of it, and that this Taurus, who bore himſelf high upon his Valour, and was hated by all for his ill manners, was forced by Minos to accept of it. Theſeus having killed him, was ſo admired by the King, that he gave him back the Children, and remitted the Tribute. Ariadne fell in love with him, whom, ſome ſay, he carried away with him, but others, that he left her behind, and ſhe hanged her ſelf; ſeveral things, one contrary to another, being reported of her. Peace now being made, and Theſeus returning homewards, they were ſo tranſported with Joy, that they forgot to ſet up the white Sails; whereupon Ægeus, deſpairing of his Son's ſafety, threw himſelf headlong from a Rock and Philochorus apud Plutarchum, ut ſuprà.

The Death of Ægeus.

and periſhed. From this Ægeus ſome would fetch the name of the Ægean Sea. But others think it was ſo called from Ægæ, the Iſland near Eubœa; others from Ægæ a Town of Eubœa; ſome from Æga, a Promontory of Æolis, and others from the Rock Æge, lying betwixt Tenedus and Chius; Again ſome from Ægeus, the Name of Neptune in Pherecydes; and others from Ægeon, the ſame with Briareus, and others from a Goat, becauſe by it's Turbulency it leapeth like that Creature. Feſtus, who deriveth the Name alſo from Ægæus, mentioneth other two Originals as probable, viz. the many Iſlands, which to one looking at them afar off, appear as Goats, in the Greek Language called Ægæ; and the periſhing of Ægæ the Queen of the Amazons in it. Concerning Ægeus, Suidas telleth a long Story out of Nicocrates, which is refuted by the Scholiaſt of Apollonius, who concerning this, is to be conſulted, together with Strabo and Pliny.

Theſeus gathereth the Athenians into one City. A.M. 2775.

14. Theſeus ſucceeding his Father, ſet himſelf all manner of ways to deſerve well of his Subjects; Whereas before they were diſperſed in twelve Towns or more, he gathered them into one City, as being more convenient for Strength, Concord, and Diſpatch of publick Buſineſs. This being hard to effect, by reaſon that the People were unwilling to quit their preſent Poſſeſſions for new Hopes, he went from Place to Place, ſhewing them the Convenience of the thing; and that he might effectually perſwade, he promiſed them Liberty, offering to lay down all Power except that of the Generalſhip, and of keeping the Laws; in all other things to be like them, and the Power to reſt in the People. The Multitude being allured by this Promiſe, he made the chief City, called Cecropia, his Regal Seat, and built another about it for the People, which he divided into three Ranks, of Nobility, Husbandmen, and Artificers, all under the ſame equality of Liberty and Law. But the former ſort he appointed to be the Fountain of Magiſtracy; yet ſo, as elective by the Suffrages of the other two. He aboliſhed the ſeveral Courts of Judicature belonging to the twelve Towns, and conſtituted one general Prytaneum in the City, Thus did he diveſt himſelf of all Royalty in a manner, and brought Popular-government into the State.

His Exploits. Plutarch.

15. As Hercules had inſtituted the Olympick Games in Honour of Jupiter, ſo he ordained the Iſthmian, and dedicated them to Neptune. He ſailed with Hercules into the Euxine Sea (ſome ſay, by himſelf) againſt the Amazons, from amongſt whom he got Antiope his Wife, which gave Occaſion to that ſort of Women to come againſt Athens. They ſore diſtreſſed it by a Siege, till Peace was made by Antiope or Hippolyta, as others called her. Some have affirmed, that he was not Partaker in any Exploit with any of the Heroes of his time, except in that he helped the Lapithæ againſt the Centaurs. Others again contend, that he ſailed to Colchos with Jaſon, and aſſiſted Meleager in killing the Boar; whence came the Proverb, Non ſine Theſeo: he alſo performed many brave things by himſelf, without the Aſſiſtance of any, hence he came to be counted Alter Hercules. Having contracted near Friendſhip and Alliance with Perithous the Son of Ixion, being now 50 years old, he joyned with him in ſtealing away Helena the Daughter of Tyndareus from Sparta, and when they caſt Lots who ſhould have her, ſhe fell to him. He carried her to his Mother living at Aphidna, there to be kept till ſhe were ripe for Marriage: But having agreed that he who obtained her, ſhould help the other to procure him a Wife elſewhere, they both travelled into Epirus, to ſteal thence the Daughter of Aidoneus King of the Moloſſians, whoſe Wife was called Proſerpina, and his Dog Cerberus, he himſelf by the Fable being named Pluto. When he underſtood their Errand, that they came not to woe but to ſteal, he laid hands on them both, and cauſed his Dog to devour Perithous, kept Theſeus in Priſon, till Hercules deſired he ſhould be ſet at Liberty.

16. Whilſt Theſeus was abſent, one Meneſtheus the Son of Peleus, (who was Grand-Son to Erectheus by his Son Orneus) incenſed the People againſt him, and that upon the Account of that Change he had made in the State, which he would have them believe was intended to enſlave them under Pretence of Liberty: and at this time came down the Tyndaridæ, Caſtor and Pollux, (ſome think by his Procurement) againſt Athens in Behalf of their Siſter. Finding that ſhe was not there, and diſcovering the place of her Reſtraint, they went to Aphidna, and taking it by Force recovered her, and took Æthra the Mother of Theſeus, which afterwards accompanied her as her Servant to Troy, and at the taking of that Town was ſet at Liberty by her Grand-ſon Demophon. By Means of Meneſtheus, the Tyndaridæ were received into Athens, and great Honour was done unto them, which thing contributed to his Deſign. For when Theſeus returned, the Citizens were ſo wrought upon, that in no wiſe would they be reconciled, and ſo was he forced to baniſh

Idem.

His Exile.

Diod. l. 4. p. 184. Pauſanias in Atticis. A. M. 2802.

himſelf into the Iſland Scyrus, having ſent away his Children privately to Elpenor the Son of Chalcedon into Eubœa. One writeth, that ſailing towards Crete to Deucalion the Son of Minos (whoſe Siſter Phædra he had married after the Death of Antiope) he was driven by Tempeſt upon Scyrus, the Inhabitants whereof receiving him with great Honour for Reverence of his Name, Lycomedes their King, out of Jealouſie, made him away, having led him up to a Rock, as though to ſhew him the Country, and thence tumbled him down headlong.

And Death.

Meneſtheus.

17. Meneſtheus then began his Reign at Athens, in the days of Atreus King of Argos and Mycenæ, and ſome years after accompanied Agamemnon and Menelaus to the Siege of Troy, with fifty Ships. During the War, we hear little or nothing of him, but after the City was taken, he honoured the Funerals of Ajax the Son of Telamon with a Funeral Oration, which work belonged to the Athenians to perform for thoſe that died in the Wars; but within a while he himſelf afforded Matter for that Office, dying in the Iſle Melos at his Return Homewards. After his Death Demophon the Son of Theſeus, (who together with his Brother Achames, (both begotten on Phædra) followed Elphenor to Troy) went to Athens and obtained the Kingdom. As he returned, Phyllis Daughter to Sichon and Queen of Thrace, fell in Love with him, and woo'd him for Marriage. He told her he would firſt go to ſettle his Affairs at Athens, and then come and marry her; but ſtaying ſomewhat long, ſhe had no Patience to wait, and thinking ſhe was ſlighted, hanged her ſelf. He ſtole the Palladium or Image of Pallas, from the Argives, who brought it from Troy, and in their Return with Diomedes made Encurſions unwittingly into Attica, being driven by Night upon Phalerus, and not knowing where they were. He reigned about thirty four years, and then left his Kingdom to his Son Oxyntes, who after twelve was ſucceeded by Aphidas his Son, who reigned but one year. Then followed Thymœtes the fifteenth King, who being a Baſtard, is reported to have murdered Aphidas his Brother, and after eight years loſt the Kingdom. He was the laſt of the Erechthidæ that reigned at Athens.

Philoſtratus in Heroicis.

Demophon.

Servius in Ecloг. 5. Virgil.

Oxyntes.
Aphidas.
Thymœtes.

Athenæus.

18. It hapned that the State of Athens had War with the Bœotians about Celœnæ, a Place ſeated in the Confines of both Countries, and it pleaſed the Parties that their Kings ſhould decide the Quarrel in their own Perſons. Thymœtes declined the Combat, and for that was depoſed. Melanthius a Meſſenian, who was then driven from Home by the Heraclidæ, accepted it, and overcame Xanthus the Bœotian King by a Stratagem; for when they came to fight he cried out: Thou doſt not juſtly Xanthus, but contrary to our Agreement, who accompanied with another Perſon, comeſt to fight againſt me a ſingle man, at which he wondering, and looking back to ſee who ſhould follow him, Melanthius ran him through with his Lance. He then reigned in the room of Thymœtes, and at his Death left Codrus his Son his Succeſſor; who willingly offered himſelf to Death for the Safety of his Athenians. There were now Diſtaſts ariſen betwixt the Heraclidæ, who held Peloponneſus, and them, for that they harboured the Iones, and other Fugitives out of that Country; and at length the Heraclidæ intending to make War upon them, conſulted the Oracle beforehand concerning their Succeſs, which anſwered, that they ſhould have the better, if they kept off their Hands from the Athenian King, and not otherwiſe. They gave Order to their Men to beware of hurting him; but he getting Knowledge of the Matter, diſguiſed himſelf, and going into their Army, by Blows provoked them to kill him. This being known, they raiſed the Siege, though ſome of them had already got into the City, on whom then the Athenians had Mercy, and diſmiſſed them without any Harm. This happened 486 years after Cecrops, 114 after the Deſtruction of Troy, 35 after the Return of the Heraclidæ, 293 before the firſt Olympiad, A. M. 2935.

Pauſan. in Atticis.

Frontinus Stratagem l. 2. c. 5. Exemp. 41.

Melanthius.
Codrus the laſt King.

Juſtin. lib. 2.
Strabo lib. 9.

A. M. 2935.

The Archons for Life.

Pauſan in Meſſeniciis.

19. After Codrus his Death, the People took away the Title of King, and gave the Name of Archon with a diminiſhed Power to his Succeſſor, who might be called to an Account for what he did, though he kept the Principality during Life. This was Medon the Son of Codrus, whom the reſt of his Brothers deſpiſing, as weak, and lame, led out Colonies of the Ionians, and ſome others (Attica being now full) into Aſia, and there founded the 12 Famous Cities of the Ionians, viz. Epheſus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedus, Claromenæ, Erythræ, Phocæa, Chius in the Iſland Chios, and Samus in an Iſle of the ſame Name over againſt Epheſus, which at firſt being ſubjected to ſeveral petty Princes, at length joyned in one Body politick, and became very famous in After-Ages. Twelve other Archons ſucceeded Medon, named from him Medontidæ, and in this Condition the State remained unaltered for 315 years, during which time there is little remarkable, either concerning Princes, or Commonwealth; only the time of Ariphron the 19th Archon fell in with that of Sardanapalus, and Alcmæon the Son of Æſchylus was the laſt, who dying when he had ſcarce reigned two years, the People took another Occaſion to alter the Government; for being weary of this perpetual Power of their Princes, they confined it to the Space of ten years. This Change being made about the Beginning of the firſt Olympiad, Charops was the firſt that underwent it, in whoſe time Dionyſius of Halycarnaſſus will have Rome built. Six others ſucceeded him in the Power thus qualified, whereof Hippomenes the fourth in Order was the laſt of the Poſterity of Codrus, being depoſed for his Cruelty to his Daughter, whom being defloured, he ſhut up with an Horſe that had no Meat given him, and ſo cauſed to be devoured quick. The laſt of all the ſix was Eryxias, who after he had governed ſix years, either died, or being depoſed for ſome Crime, opened the Door to a new and greater Innovation, after 70 years Continuance of the Decennal Government.

The twelve Cities of Ionia.

Idem in Achaicis & Strabo l. 14.

Archons for ten years.

A. M. 3248.

Suidas.

Euſeb.

Annual Archons, nine in number.

A. M. 3318.

Lege Sigonium de Repub. Athen. & uttonem Emmium.

20. The People ſtill burning with a Deſire of greater Liberty, aboliſhed quite the Power of a ſingle Perſon, and inſtead of him made nine Archons, to be but annual, a new Election being to be made every year out of thoſe who for Birth, Wealth or Favour were moſt conſiderable in this City. The firſt in Order was properly called Archon, as Principal of the Colledge, and Eponymus, becauſe he ſigned the Calendar, and all things that fell out in that year, were ſaid to be done he being Archon. He had the Care of their Superſtition; to him it belonged to take Cogniſance of Differences ariſing about Inheritances, as alſo betwixt Huſband and Wife, Parents and their Children, and Kinsfolks one amongſt another: Moreover, he took Care of Orphans, and aſſigned them Guardians. The ſecond in Order had the name of King, who taking Care alſo of another part of their Superſtition, determined Cauſes both Civil and Criminal, or referred them to the greater Courts of Judicature. The third was called Polemarchus, who beſides the Charge of ſome religious Cuſtoms, had that of War committed to him (whence he had his name) was General of the Armies abroad, and at home the Judge of Strangers. The other ſix were termed Theſmothetæ, being keepers of the Laws or Cuſtoms, Judges in ſeveral Caſes, and had Power to commit to Priſon all ſuſpicious Perſons. Theſe were their diſtinct Offices. Altogether they had Authority to aſſemble the People as the Kings, and other Archons in former times, and to reſolve with them about publick Buſineſs.

Draco.

A. M. 3381.

Plutarch in Solone.

21. Such were the Improvements of that Liberty, which Theſeus beſtowed on the People: but though they ſeemed great, yet were they not arrived at that height as to ſatisfie the heady Multitude offended with the too great Power of the Nobler and Richer ſort; and which finding it ſelf aggrieved with the many Inconveniences that aroſe for want of Laws (the Sentence of the Magiſtrate, or Judge, being the only Law) many Grudges and Diſcords thence aroſe, which ſo far prevailed, as that after 50 years, Power was given to one Draco, a man honeſt and wiſe, but of auſtere Severity, to make Laws. Many he framed, reformed the Court of the Ephetæ, which he made to conſiſt of 51 perſons, not under 50 years of Age, who were to judge of Murders, and ſuch like Crimes. But ſo ſevere were his Conſtitutions concerning Manners (judging no leſs than Death to the leaſt Offence) that as they were by Demas ſaid to be written in Blood, ſo in Proceſs of time they grew intolerable, and little or no Relief had the poorer ſort againſt the Power of the great ones, with the Uſury of whom they were even exhauſted: Hence grew great Diſturbances in the Commonwealth, the Commons hated the Nobility, and the Nobility feared the Commons; nothing but Deſolation ſeemed to attend the State, ſome being earneſt for a Popular Government, others for an Oligarchy, and others for a middle way. Theſe tempered, and poiſed the other two parties; but nothing at length ſeemed to avail, except all the whole Power ſhould be put into the hands of one, and a plain Tyranny erected as the only ſufficient Remedy for theſe deſperate Diſtempers. The common ſort were hot for an equal Diviſion of the publick Grounds now in the hands of the rich, and fit to make themſelves an head, and do it by Force; but the moſt prudent ſort taking notice of Solon, now very eminent, a man of unblameable Life, and unbyaſſed by the Intereſt of either Party; him they beſought, having ſufficient Wiſdom, to compoſe theſe Differences of the diſtracted Commonwealth; offering him the Power and Command of all.

Solon.

How he became eminent.

Plutarch. & Diogenes Laertius in vita Solonis, Polyænus Stratagem l. 1.

22. A year or two before thoſe great Diſturbances, hapned that which gave a Riſe to the Eminency of Solon, and as well out of Reſpect to the Commonwealth, as in Relation to him, muſt be recited briefly. The Iſland Salamine lying not far from Athens, had of late time revolted to the Inhabitants of Megara, and for the Recovery of it ſeveral Attempts had been made with ſuch bad Succeſs, that a Law was preferred, whereby it was ordained Capital for any man thenceforth to move about it. Solon conſidering the Conſequence hereof, counterfeited himſelf mad; and going into the Place of publick Meeting, began, as the People came about him, to ſay a Company of odd conceited Verſes, whereby he ſo moved them, that they repealed the Law, and decreed another Expedition againſt the Megarians, ordaining him their Captain therein. Solon ſailing towards Colias, where the Athenian Women were keeping the Feaſt of Ceres, ſent one to the Megarians, who counterfeiting himſelf a Fugitive ſhould tell them, that now at this Place they might eaſily ſurprize the Women. This being done, he ſends them away, and in their Rooms and Cloaths, left there a Company of beardleſs young men, who being provided of Daggars, ſtabbed the Megarians when they came to ſeize on their Prey, and ſo by this Plot (which ſeveral Authors ſay was executed by Piſiſtratus, though deviſed by Solon) the Athenians again recovered the Iſland. Solon proved it to belong to Athens, for that Phileus the Son of Euryſaces, and Grand-ſon to Ajax Telamonius, being made free of the City, gave it unto the Athenians; and becauſe that ſuch as were buried there, lay with their Faces to the Weſt, according to the Athenian Cuſtom, whereas the Megarians buried their Dead in a careleſs manner, not regarding any ſuch Poſition.

Frontinus Strat. l. 4. c. 7. Juſtin. 212. Æneas Poliorcet. l. 4.

23. Solon having got much Credit by the Succeſs of this Enterprize, procured ſuch to be called to an Account, as had been guilty of the Death of Cylon. This man being famous for his Victory at the Olympick Games affected the Tyranny of Athens, and endeavouring to ſeize on the Caſtle, failed therein, and fled for Refuge to the Image of Minerva, whence the Magiſtrates giving him Hopes of Life, took him and his Companions, and notwithſtanding put them to Death. This now was accounted a great Injury offer'd to the Goddeſs, and ſuch, as both the Actors thereof, their Poſterity and Country were eſteemed as contaminate, and lyable to heavy Puniſhment. Solon perſwaded them to ſubmit to Tryal, and 300 Judges were appointed out of the chiefeſt Perſons, who condemned them to Baniſhment. Whil'ſt this was a doing the Megarians fell upon the Athenians, took Niſæa, and recovered Salamis: ſtrange Sights alſo appeared, whereat the City was afrighted, and their Prophets told them that certain Crimes were committed, which muſt be expiated. For this Cauſe Epimenides a famous Philoſopher (whom ſome reckon amongſt the Number of the ſeven wiſe-men in the Room of Periander) was ſent for out of Crete to cleanſe the City; a Plague having alſo faln upon it at this time, as Diogenes Laertius writeth in his Life. Several Altars upon this Occaſion he cauſed to be made, as amongſt the reſt one to Contumelie (or Reproach) and another to Impudence. At this time alſo it is thought that the Altar was erected to the unknown God, they having received no Benefit by making Addreſſes to their known ones, but preſent Eaſe as ſoon as this Altar and a Temple of the ſame Dedication were made and uſed. One ſaith this was the Inſcription: To the Gods of Aſia, Europe, and Africk, to Gods unknown and ſtrange; another that it ran after this Manner: To the Gods of Aſia, Europe, and Africk, to the unknown and ſtrange God, in the ſingular Number. But theſe Calamities increaſing publick Diſcontents, made the Aſſiſtance of Solon the more deſirable.

Herod. l. 5.

Cicero de Legibus lib. 2. Iſiodorus lib. 4. Epiſt. 69.

Hieron. in Comment. ad Titum.

Beza.

24. He feared much to undertake ſo difficult a Task as a Settlement; and as for the Tyranny (ſo then it was termed) he refuſed it abſolutely; though his Friends perſwaded him that by his Moderation and good Demeanour he might eaſily change this odious name into that of a Kingdom. But being elected Archon after Philombrotus, in the third year of the 46 Olympiad, ſome 93 years after the laſt Change of Government, and in the days of Nebuchadneſar, King of Babylon, he ſet himſelf about the Work of Reformation, and firſt of all eaſed the People of the great Burthen of their Debts, whereby they redeemed their Bodies and Eſtates; which Act was in Greek called Siſachthea. Some have thought that it was only of the Intereſt, but others of the Principal too, alledging him to have forgiven 5 (ſome have ſaid 15) Talents that were owing to himſelf. However, he made them more able to ſatisfie their Creditors by raiſing the Value of Money, as of the Attick Mina from 75 Drachms to 100. Then for the ſettling of the Commonwealth; in way thereto, and in the firſt place he abrogated all Draco's Laws, except that againſt Murther, as too ſevere. The four Tribes of the People he left as they were ordered by Erechtheus, diſtinguiſhed into Souldiers, Crafts-men, Husbandmen, and Keepers of Goats; but for that here was no Diſtinction made according to Eſtates, and it concerned thoſe that had moſt therein to take Care of the Commonwealth, he alſo divided the People into four Ranks, or Claſſes, according to their Subſtance, and out of the three firſt ordered all Magiſtrates to be choſen, the fourth and laſt having equal Votes in the great Council, or Aſſembly of the whole Body of the State, in which lay Lege Plutarch. in Solone. Ariſtot. lib. 2. Politic. Julius Pollux lib. 8. A. M. 3411.

He reformeth the Common-wealth.

lay the Supream Power. The firſt was called Pentacoſio Medimni, the ſecond was the Ordo Equeſtris, the third called Zeugitæ, and the fourth Thetæ. Hereby he gave a Right to the common ſort to elect, and call to account the Magiſtrates, to have an hand in making, and repealing Laws, and in the higheſt Court of Judicature, by which equal Temper, he ſuppreſſed all theſe Factions that had lately riſen. And yet, leſt the Multitude ſhould be too much elevated, beſides the Court of Areopagus he inſtituted a Senate of four hundred, (a hundred to be choſen out of each Tribe) through which all things ſhould paſs into the great Aſſembly, wherein nothing was to be debated, but what was offered from this Council, elected anew every year.

A Senate of 400.

Vide Ubbonem Emmium in deſcript. Reip. Athen.

Of Areopagus.

25. The College of the nine Archons he left Elective as he found it; but ordained that they ſhould not be admitted to take their Oath, till they had firſt in the Senate made Proof of their Deſcent, and the Unblameableneſs of their Life (eſpecially of their Duty to their Parents) and then been approved in the great Aſſembly, after which they were to take their Oath in the Kings Gate, to keep the Laws, and accept of no Bribes; or if they ſhould be thereof detected, then to erect at Delphos a Statue of Gold of their own Bigneſs: and the ſame Oath they were again to take as they went up to the Caſtle, crowned with Myrtle. Unto them ſeverally he aſſigned their Offices; for the moſt part as they were before, only more certain; for a Reward of their good Service, if after much and through Examination they were found Upright and Faithful, they were to be choſen unto the Senate of Areopagus, the Colledge of the Archons being hereby conſtituted the Seminary of it. To this Council, conſiſting of moſt grave, experienced, and upright men, an Inſpection was given into all Concernments of State, a Power of preſerving the Laws and Cuſtoms, and alſo of reforming Manners, in which Particular they were ſo ſevere, that once they condemned a Boy, for a Cuſtom of pulling out the Eyes of Quails, as hereby betraying a bad Diſpoſition. They met ordinarily thrice a Moneth on Mars his Hill (whence the Council had its name) but extraordinarily as Occaſion required, and then in the Place called the Kings Gallery. As for the Council of State conſiſting of 400, it had Power alſo to determine great Matters and Controverſies of it ſelf, and if it ſaw it convenient, to report them to the People. If the Aſſent of the People was had, then paſſed it's Acts and Conſtitutions into firm Laws; if not, they continued in Force one year, and no longer. To this Council moreover it belonged, to provide for ſuch as were grown poor, and were to be maintained by the Publick; to call all indebted to the State to an Account, and provide for the making of Gallies.

The Aſſembly of the People.

26. To the great Aſſembly of the People alone belonged the Power of making and nulling Laws, of Peace and War, ſending Ambaſſadors, and giving the Freedom of the City. When they met together they took an Oath, with a bitter Execration, to conſult the beſt they could for the Good of the Commonwealth. Thoſe that were above fifty years of Age ſpake firſt, and after the Buſineſs was throughly debated, they ſignified their Pleaſure by holding up their Hands. Solon ordained that all the Laws ſhould be reviewed once a Year, being cited by the Theſmothetæ. But when any were to be abrogated, or new ones made, the whole Aſſembly took not that matter of Debate upon it ſelf; but committed it to the Care of the moſt grave and prudent amongſt them, choſen for that Purpoſe and called Nomothetæ, amongſt which none were admitted, but ſuch as had dealt in the moſt important Affairs. Before them five Orators (called Syndici) pleaded concerning any Law that was to be aboliſhed, which ſhould not be done without mature Advice, leſt thereby an Occaſion might be given to Sedition and Innovation; and what was concluded by the Nomothetæ, the Body of the People always approved. The Aſſembly was had ordinarily thrice in 35 days, at the Pleaſure of the Council of State or 400; but extraordinarily upon Occaſion called together, either by the ſame Authority of the ſame Strategi or Generals for War, and ſometimes of the nine Archons.

Courts of Judicature.

27. For Courts of Judicature, beſides the Areopagites formerly mentioned, there was that of the Ephetæ, founded, as it's thought, by Demophon the Son of Theſeus, conſiſting at firſt of 50 Judges choſen out of Attica, and as many from Argos; but Draco excluding the Strangers, made the Number only 51 Citizens, and after him Solon tempering the Rigor thereof, transferred thence the more weighty matters to Areopagus, leaving the Judgment of caſual homicide, and lying in Wait for Life, in ſome Caſes to it. The Cauſes brought in thither were reported by the King or ſecond Archon. There was another Court moſt large and common, conſiſting of 500, 1000, or ſometimes 1500 Perſons, according to the Occaſion, choſen by Lot out of all the Citizens of thirty years old and upwards. They judged of many, and often of the greateſt Cauſes; and this was called the Heliaſtick Council, becauſe they ſate in an open place where the Sun ſhone. A fourth Court there was of Arbitrators, conſiſting of two hundred and twenty, choſen out of the Tribes, and being equally divided according to the Number of them, heard and determined their Cauſes. A fifth and leaſt Conſiderable there was yet, made up of thirty Perſons at the firſt, afterwards increaſed to forty, going in Circuit to the ſeveral ſorts of People gathered by Theſeus into one City, heard and judged leſſer Matters. As for the Officers belonging to the ſeveral Courts, the twelve men for Impriſonment and Execution, with the Officers of the ſeveral Tribes, they are ſcarce to be mentioned by this Work.

reported

Particular Laws.

Plutarch in Solon.

28. For particular Laws. Solon knowing what a Multitude of People inhabited Athens, took ſuch Care for the Prevention of Idleneſs, that he abſolved any Son from the Duty of maintaining his Father fallen into Poverty, that had not procured him to be inſtructed in ſome Trade: and the ſame Liberty he gave unto ſuch as were born of Strumpets. He made a Law whereby he gave Leave to the People to make Teſtaments, which they never could do before; all the Eſtates of deceaſed Perſons going to the next Heir. He forbad Women to have any Portions, leſt Marriages ſhould be made for Gain; yet ſucceeded they in the Inheritances of their Fathers, in Default of Iſſue Male. Some things about Marriages and Adultery he decreed, which have been noted, and not unworthily, as abſurd. He commanded the Court of Areopagus, to take an Account of all Perſons how they lived, and puniſh thoſe that could render none. He forbad all native Fruits, except that of the Olive, to be tranſported out of Attica. And nothing is more memorable than this, that he deprived of all Honour, and rendred infamous thoſe, that, in a time of Faction and Sedition in the City, joyned themſelves to neither Party, concluding, that ſuch as were concerned for the Good of the Commonwealth, would according to their beſt Apprehenſions, ſide with ſuch as contended for it. His Laws he expoſed to publick View, that none ſhould pretend Ignorance in them. He ſware the People, Magiſtrates, and Senate, to obſerve them for an hundred years, and the Archons, if they brake them, to ſet up a Statue at Delphos, of their own Bigneſs. Then to conclude his Work, he reformed the Calendar, much amiſs at that time, and reduced the Year into ſuch a Form as was agreeable to the Motion of the Sun.

Solon travelleth.

Idem ibid. & Herodotus l. 1.

29. The Work being over, there wanted not thoſe who would both Praiſe and Diſcommend it. Some would be amending it by Addition, others by Subſtraction or Change, ſo that plainly ſeeing what Stir would be about it, he got Leave to travel for ten years; in which time he went into Ægypt, where he converſed with Ameſis, and into Lydia, where he had that notable Conference with Crœſus before mentioned. But while he was abroad, the City anew brake into Factions. There were the Pediæans headed by Lycurgus, the Paralians by Megacles, and the Diacrians by Piſiſtratus, one who was deſcended from Codrus the laſt King. To the latter, a Company of the poorer ſort joyned themſelves, ſuch as were moſt inveterate againſt the Rich, and although they had not much to ſay againſt Solon's Laws, yet were they deſirous of Innovation, hoping to be Gainers therein. Things were in this Poſture when Solon returned home, who being received with much Honour, laboured by his Authority to take off the Ring-leaders of the ſeveral Factions, and reconcile them. Piſiſtratus ſeemed to give Ear to him, being a man of deep Diſſimulation, and ſo much apter to deceive, in that no man appeared ſo great a Friend to Equality as he, and therefore a greater Enemy to the Change of the preſent Government. But Solon quickly found him out; yet proſecuted him not with any open Malice, but ſought to draw him from his Deſigns by fair Means, often profeſſing, that no man was more inclined to Virtue, or to make a good Commonwealths-man, if the Deſire of Rule and Sovereignty were but taken from him.

Plutarch ut ſupra.

30. For all this, Piſiſtratus proceeded, and by his ſeeming Readineſs to patronize the poorer Sort againſt the rich, invaded the Tyranny. He wounded himſelf and his Chariot-Horſes, and drove into the Forum, making Shew of an

Eſcape

A. M. 3425.

Eſcape from great Danger, and deſired of the People that he might have a Guard aſſigned him to defend his Perſon. He ſo far prevailed, as to have fifty Perſons allowed him, though Solon ſtepping to him, told him he did not well to act Ulyſſes in Homer, (who, as he counterfeited himſelf wounded to circumvent his Enemies, ſo did he the ſame, that he might cheat his Fellow Citizens) and oppoſed the thing as much as poſſible. Having obtained the Liberty of ſo many Followers, he took Leave to increaſe their Number, and thereby got the Caſtle into his Hands, at which the City was much ſtartled. Solon went into the Aſſembly of the People, where upbraiding them with their former Stupidity, he earneſtly exhorted them yet now to pluck up that Tyranny by the Roots, which before they might have ſo eaſily prevented; but not at all prevailing, ſuch Conſternation had ſeized upon men's Spirits, he got him to his Houſe, and laying his Weapons before his Court-gate, ſaid, he had diſcharged his Duty towards his Country, and thenceforth kept himſelf quiet, continuing in the City, though his Friends moved him to flie for his Life. But ſuch a Reverence bore Piſiſtratus not only to his Perſon, but alſo to his Laws, that he retained ſtill the moſt of them in their former Vigour. A few he made himſelf, as one for Maintenance of Maimed Souldiers (though ſome attribute this alſo to Solon, and ſay, the Occaſion was given by one Theſippus) and another againſt Idleneſs, whereby he cauſed the Ground to be more diligently tilled, and the City more quiet than uſual. By theſe two he effectually provided for his own Intereſt, obliging the Souldiers by the one, and by diſperſing the People into the Country through the other (under Pretence of preventing Idleneſs, and keeping up Tillage) cutting off from them all Occaſion of plotting any thing prejudicial to him. For he knew well, that as Theſeus his gathering them all up into one Town, conduced to the Perſwaſion of that Liberty he meant to beſtow on them, ſo this contrary way tended as much to the keeping of his arbitrary Power.

Piſiſtratus invadeth the Tyranny.

Expelled.

Herodot. l. 1. cap. 59.

31. Being ſeized of the Sovereignty, he carried it exceeding well to People, Magiſtrates, and Laws, and much adorned the City, of which he held Poſſeſſion about three years. Then Megacles and Lycurgus, with their Parties, ſo prevailed, as they baniſhed both him and his Tyranny, and being condemned, his Goods were ſet to Sale, of which none but Callias the Son of Phænippus would adventure to buy any. But not long it was, before thoſe that caſt him out, became the Means of his Reſtitution; for falling out amongſt themſelves, Megacles, upon Promiſe that he would marry his Daughter, covenanted to bring it about, and effected it by a ſtrange and ridiculous Wile. There was a Woman in the City named Phya, almoſt four Cubits tall, but otherwiſe of tolerable Beauty: her being armed, curiouſly dreſſed and ſeated in a Chariot, they drove into the City, ſending ſome before to proclaim, that the Athenians were to receive Piſiſtratus, whom their Goddeſs Minerva eſteeming above all Mortals, now in her own Perſon reduced into her Caſtle. This being acted with wonderful Confidence, the Citizens were ſo far beſotted, as to adore this Woman for Minerva, and received Piſiſtratns as brought by her; whereby he recovered the Tyranny about five years after his Expulſion.

Val. Max. l. 1. c. 2. Ext. exemp. 2.

Reſtored.

Forced out again.

Herodot. l. 1.

And again recovereth the Tyranny.

32. He married the Daughter of Megacles, according to Agreement; but having ſeveral Sons already in the Flower of their Age; and Megacles being ſuppoſed guilty of that heinous Crime about the Death of Cylon, not yet expiated, leſt he ſhould put them beſide their juſt Expectations, and his Family be attainted, he neglected to uſe her as his Wife. She concealing this for ſome time, at length revealed it to her Mother, who told it to Megacles. He took it in great Diſdain, and reconciled himſelf to his Enemies, conſulting again how he might out him; which Piſiſtratus underſtanding, departed of his own Accord out of Attica, and went to Eretria a City of Eubœa in the third year of the 54*th Olympiad*, about ten years after his Reſtitution. Ten other years he continued in Exile, at the end whereof, by the Advice of his eldeſt Son Hippias, he laboured again for a Recovery of his Principality. Scraping together all the Money he could make, he drew the Thebans and Argives into Confederacy with him, and got Marathon a Town of Attica into his hands, whither flocked to him from Athens, and the Country round about, thoſe of his Faction. He marched then againſt the City, and put ſuch to flight as came out againſt him, but fearing they might rally again, he gave Order to his Sons to ride after, and bid them fear nothing, ſo they would but get them to their own Homes, and be quiet. Thus recovered he the Tyranny once more, which he laboured to eſtabliſh, not by the ſhedding of Blood (from which he wholly abſtained, and therefore hath the beſt Report of any of his Condition) but by ſeeking Confederates, making himſelf a conſiderable Revenew, and taking the Sons of thoſe his Enemies, that remained in the City, for Hoſtages, ſending them into the Iſle Naxus to be kept. Not long after his Reſtitution he died (for his whole Reign including the Exile, amounted but to thirty three years) about the time that Crœſus King of Lydia was overthrown by Cyrus, in the ſecond Year of the fifty ſeventh Olympiad, and the 3460*th* Year of the World.

A. M. 3460.

33. This only could be reprehended in Piſiſtratus, that he had caſt the Yoak upon his Country. For ſuch an one it was as had no great Weight in it, more than what lay in the Minds of the Athenians, not accuſtomed ſince the days of Theſeus, to ſtoop to Sovereignty. Though he commanded them to apply themſelves to Huſbandry (contrary to what Theſeus had done, who gathered them out of the Country into the City) that he might take them off from plotting againſt him, yet required he no other Tribute than the Tenths of their Profit, which had wont to be payed to the former Kings. He killed no man, neither baniſhed any; he made Spoil of no mans Fortune or Eſtate, injured none by any contumelious Demeanour, abuſed neither the one Sex nor the other through any libidinous Carriage. The Laws of Solon with the Order of Magiſtrates he left as he found; and though he had moſt Cauſe to be averſe to him, yet detained he him in Town when he would have been gone, deſiring his Counſel and Advice for the better Government of the Commonwealth, contenting himſelf only in having a Power greater than the Laws, in which Reſpect Cicero was wont to call Julius Cæſar, who trode in his Steps, by the Name of Piſiſtratus. He was as Learned as any in his Time, and deſerved very well of Learning, being the firſt that erected a publick Library. Whereas Homer's Verſes before this were ſcattered abroad and confuſed, he purchaſed with Gold whatſoever of his Works he could come by, and ſetting on Work the ableſt Grammarians, put them into that Order of Iliads and Odyſſes, in which they are now found; to which work Solon is ſaid to have contributed his Diligence. He had two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, to whom he left the Principality of Athens. They for many Years reigned, as lovingly betwixt themſelves, ſo with Moderation towards their Subjects, till the younger being ſlain by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, upon Occaſion of ſome Injury ſuppoſed to be offered by him to the Siſter of Harmodius, the other exaſperated hereat grew ſevere towards the Athenians, and for that was expelled by them four years after his Brothers Death, and his Tyranny was utterly ſubverted. But theſe things falling in with the Reign of Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, belong properly to another Place.

Plutarch & Diogenes Laertius.

Gellius l. 6. c. ult. Cicero 3. de Oratore. Ælian lib. 13. c. 14.

SECT.

SECT. V.

The moſt antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Lacedæmon.

The firſt inhabitants of Lacedæmon.

(a) Pauſanias in initio Laconicorum & Meſſenicorum.

1. THis Country was moſt antiently inhabited by a people called (a) Leleges, ſo named from Lelex their King, ſaid to be an Indigena, or a natural of the place, becauſe it was uncertain from what Countrey he and his people came. From him this Region was called Lelegia, and Lelegis. He left two ſons, Myles and Polycaon, whereof the former ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, and the latter marrying Meſſene, the daughter of Triopas King of Argos, went and ſubdued that Countrey, which from her he named Meſſenia. Myles was ſucceeded by his ſon Eurotas, who perceiving the water to ſtand in the grounds,drew a Ditch from it to the Sea,which draining the earth, continued to be a River, bearing his name. He, dying without iſſue-Male, left his Kingdom to Lacedæmon, the ſon of Jupiter and Taygeta, from which woman the Mount Taygetus took its name. For Lacedæmon married Sparte, the daughter of Eurotas, and when he came firſt to the Kingdom, named the Countrey from himſelf, and to the City which he built gave his wive's name; it being ever after moſt properly called Sparta, when any diſtinction was made betwixt Country and City; although it be alſo ſometimes read Lacedæmon, as in (b) Thucydides, and Latine (c) Authors. As for the Inhabitants of both places, thoſe of the City are by Herodotus, Xenophon and Diodorus called Spartiati, in oppoſition to thoſe that lived up and down in the Countrey, comprehended under the name of Lacedæmonians. The City was built in the days of Crotopus, King of Argos, and Amphitryon of Athens, 303 years before the deſtruction of Troy, 711 before the firſt Olympiad, A. M. 2518.

A. M. 2598.

Sparta, whence ſo called.

(b) Lib. 1. Πόλις Λακεδαίμων.

(c) Livius l. 38.

(d) Pauſan. ut ſuprà.

2. Amyclas the ſon and ſucceſſor of Lacedæmon (d) begat three ſons, which are recorded, Argalus, Cynortas, and Hyacinthus: of which the latter, as Apollodorus writeth, being for his beauty the delight of Apollo, was killed by him at unawares, when they were at play. Argalus ſucceeded his Father, and left his Kingdom to his brother Cynortas,whoſe ſon and Succeſſor was Oebalus,from whom the Countrey was alſo called * Oebalia, and thence Caſtor and Pollux,by Statius, Oebalidæ fratres. On his firſt Wife he begat Hippocoon, and Icarion, and on his ſecond Gorgophone (the Daughter of Perſeus by Andromeda, and Widow of Perieres) his Son Tyndareus. The former and latter, after his death, contended about the ſucceſſion, and Tyndareus having the worſt of it, was conſtrained to baniſh himſelf for many years, till at length he was reſtored by Hercules,(who ſlew Hippocoon and his ten Sons, with a great number of the Spartans;) but on this condition delivered was the Kingdom to him, to keep it for Hercules his own Children, and reſtore it when it ſhould be demanded. Tyndareus of Leda, the Daughter of Theſtius an Ætolian, begat Caſtor and Pollux, (called Dioſcuri, as the ſuppoſed off-ſpring of Jupiter) and on her, or ſome other, a Daughter named Helena. The two Sons being famous in their lives, grew more renowned after their death, having the eſteem of Gods, and from them was named the Conſtellation of Gemini. Helena was ſhe that made ſuch a broil in the World, being firſt ſtoln by Theſeus, afterwards married to Menelaus, and from him ſtoln again by Paris, who kept her till the deſtruction of Troy, as hath been ſhown. Her two Brothers dying before their Father, Menelaus with her obtained the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, through the ſpecial favour of Tyndareus, who, from amongſt 29 Suitors,(all Princes of Greece) made choice of him. Leſt thoſe great ones ſhould fall out amongſt themſelves, he bound them all with an Oath to be Defendants to whomſoever he would give her; which he did by the advice of Ulyſſes, upon promiſe to aſſiſt him in his ſute, being one of the number. This we do not find that he did; but in way of requital procured for him Penelope, the Daughter of Icarius.

* Servius ad Georg. 4.

Tyndareus.

Apollod. l. 3. Pauſan. A. M. 2646. Diodorus Siculus.

Caſtor and Pollux. Helena.

Menelaus.

A. M. 2809.

3. Menelaus on a ſlave begot two baſe Sons: but by Helena had onely a Daughter named Hermione, which he married firſt to Oreſtes, the Son of his Brother Agamemnon, and again taking her from him, gave her to Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles. It's thought that Oreſtes killed Pyrrhus; for after his death he preſently reſumed his Wife, and Menelaus once dead, he added the Kingdom of Lacedæmon to his other two of Mycenæ and Argos; for the Lacedæmonians were more willing to receive him as their Prince, than Nicoſtratus and Megapenthes the baſtard Sons of Menelaus. Tiſamenus his Son ſucceeded him in his Kingdoms, out of all which he was outed by the Heraclidæ, or poſterity of Hercules, as before was ſhewed, by the help of the Dores; with him the Achæans being alſo baniſhed, who were Originally of Phthiotis in Theſſaly; for Achæus their Progenitor was the Son of Xuthus, Grand-ſon to Deucalion by his Son Hellen. Argos fell to Temenus by lot; Creſphontes got Meſſene; and Lacedæmon became the portion of Procles and Euryſthenes the Sons of Ariſtodemus, who was ſlain at Delphos (for Pauſanias judgeth this the moſt probable opinion) by the fraud of Pylas, when they were preparing for the Expedition. Thenceforth the Lacedæmonians were accounted Dores; who if formerly they were part of the Achæans, and going to Troy, at their return were expelled by thoſe that remained at home, and ſo forced to ſeek out new ſeats, and received the name of Dores from their Captain, as Plato writeth; then had they full as much right to the Countrey as the Heraclidæ themſelves, the title of whom we have formerly ſhewn. This change happened 80 years after the deſtruction of Troy, as Thucydides gathereth; 327 before the firſt Olympiad, in the days of Melanthus, Father to Codrus the laſt King of Athens, in the year of the World 2901.

A.M. 2901.

The deſcent of the Heraclidæ. Procles and Euryſthenes obtain Sparta.

4. The two Brothers Euryſthenes and Procles were Twins, and that ſo like, as their Mother, not knowing them aſunder, was ignorant which was the eldeſt, and therefore the Lacedæmonians made them both Kings with equal power: onely becauſe Euryſthenes was firſt waſhed and fed, he was vulgarly accounted the elder; and though their Families were of the ſame dignity, yet was his accounted ſomething the more honourable. In their minority Theras their Uncle by the Mother's ſide managed the Kingdom for them, in obeying whom they ever agreed; but in nothing elſe, though Twins, and ſo like one another. This difference was in a manner propagated to their poſterity, which continued on both ſides for many Generations downwards by the names of Euryſthenidæ and Proclidæ; and being partakers in what is commonly accounted to bear no corrivals, no wonder it is that Emulation ſhould be continued, but much that for ſo long it kept within the bounds of civil concord. After theſe two followed their two Sons: Agis for Euryſthenes, (from whom the Kings of this family were alſo called Agidæ) and Soüs for Procles. In their time it happened that the Inhabitants of Helos (a Town built by Helius the youngeſt Son of Perſeus) were made Slaves (both they and their poſterity) to the Lacedæmonian State: for whereas they as well as others had formerly the freedom of the City, and were Members of the Commonwealth, Agis took away that privilege, and ordered them to pay Tribute to Sparta, which refuſing to doe, and ſtanding out, they were thus puniſhed; all other Slaves to that State, though of what Original ſoever, being called after them Helotæ. Agis dying, was ſucceeded by Echeſtratus his Son; and Soüs ſome years after left for his Succeſſor his Son Eurytion, (called otherwiſe Eurypon, and Euryphon) from whom the Kings of that family were alſo named Eurytionidæ. Echeſtratus was followed by Labotas his Son, and Eurytion by Prytanis, in whoſe reign the firſt quarrel aroſe betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives. Labotas being dead, Doryſſus his Son ſucceeded him in the Kingdom; and in like manner after the death of Prytanis, Eunomus his Son continued the ſucceſſion of that family.

Both Kings with equal power.

Lege Herodot. lib. 6. cap. 52.

Plutarch. in Lycurgo.

Helotæ made Slaves.

Strabo lib. 8. pag 363. & 365.

Euſeb.

5. After Doryſſus followed Ageſilaus, Eunomus of the family of Procles ſtill continuing, who of a former Wife begat Polydectes, and of a later Lycurgus, born 150 years before the firſt Olympiad. Archelaus the Son of Ageſilaus ſucceeded his Father, and was accompanied in the Government by Polydectes, who dying without iſſue left his inheritance to Lycurgus his Brother. Lycurgus then governed as King, but not long after his Brother's Wife proved to be with Child. She ſent to acquaint him therewith, and to tell him, that if he would marry her ſhe would make away the Infant. He deteſting from his heart ſuch Villany, yet returned her no denial, but deſired her not to practiſe any thing upon her ſelf whereby ſhe might come in danger, for when the Child was once born he would take care for the deſtruction of it: and by this deceit he drew her on till the time of her Travel. When that came he ſent ſome to obſerve her, with command, if it were a Girl, to deliver it to the Women, but if a Boy, to bring it ſtraight unto him. As he was ſupping with the Magiſtrates, a Boy was born and brought to him, who taking him in his Arms, told the Spartans that there was their King, and preſently put him in the Royal ſeat. And becauſe all men wonderfully rejoyced at ſo ſtrange a thing, admiring his Magnanimity and Juſtice, he gave to the Child the name of Charilaus.

A.M. 3019. Euſeb. in Chronico.

Plutarch. ut ſuprá.

Lycurgus.

A. M. 3107.

6. Then as Tutor to this his young Nephew, he managed publick affairs for ſome eight moneths; but there wanted not thoſe of the Queen's kindred (eſpecially her Brother) who reproached him to his face, as intending no good to the Child, which ſhe alſo now ſtuck not to ſay, incenſed by his repulſe in the matter of Marriage. He took this in very ill part, and fearing that ſome inconvenience might follow theſe ſuſpicions that were begotten by his Adverſaries in the breaſts of ſeveral perſons, reſolved to cut them off by Travel, wherein he purpoſed to continue ſo long, till his Brother's Son ſhould come to maturity, and had begotten an Heir for his Kingdom. He went firſt into Crete, where he made Obſervations of the Laws and Cuſtomes of that Commonwealth inſtituted by Minos, (which afterwards he made his Pattern) and whence he ſent Thaletas, an eminent Lyrick Poet of thoſe times, by his charming Verſes to ſtir up the Lacedæmonians to Love and Unity. From Crete he paſſed over into Aſia, (that he might compare the Luxury thereof with the Cretian Severity, and as good Phyſick make up a temper out of both) where he found Homer's Verſes, kept as it ſeemeth by the Sons of Creophylus, (the Poet being dead not above thirty years before) which he then copied out, and bringing them home, firſt made them publick in Greece, though in great diſorder; in which they continued till the days of Piſiſtratus. The Egyptians reported that he came down into their Countrey, and there learnt the diſtinction of Military men from Artificers, and thoſe of other Callings. But whilſt he thus improved himſelf abroad, he was much wanted at home, and often earneſtly ſolicited to return by all parties.

Tutor to Charilaus.

Lege Plutarchum & Strab. lib. 10. pag. 482.

Travelleth.

Plutarch.

7. For great need there was of his Preſence to heal the Diſtempers into which the State was now fallen, the heady Multitude having by its deſire of looſe liberty brought all things into confuſion. The firſt Government, till the coming in of the Heraclidæ, for any thing that can be known, was meerly abſolute; and afterwards we do not find that the Regal power was diminiſhed till Eurypon, or Eurytion, moſt imprudently let looſe the reins of Government. This gave occaſion to the Rabble to fly high in diſobedience, and conteſt with his Succeſſours when they endeavoured the recovery of their old Authority. Many great tumults and ſeditions were hence raiſed, inſomuch that Eunomus, the Grand-ſon of Eurypon, Father of Lycurgus, and fifth from Procles, was murthered in one of them with a Butcher's knife. Theſe Diſtempers increaſing, and the Kings not being ſtrong enough to rule the diſſolute Rabble, nothing but abſolute ruin and deſtruction was expected, when Lycurgus returning home (of whoſe prudence and integrity they had had formerly large demonſtrations) alone ſeemed able to give any hope of better things.

At his return he a-new modelleth the State.

A.M. 3122.

8. He thought this opportunity was not to be neglected, now that all were in ſo good a mind, and reſolved to uſe his utmoſt endeavour for an alteration. This was the ſcope he aimed at, to make proviſion for Equality, which he thought to be the beſt Nurſe of Concord, and the Bulwark of all Societies; to accuſtom the People from their tender years to obey the Laws and Magiſtrates, and hereby to render them more inclinable to live juſtly and frugally, to bridle all corrupt affections, endure labour and hardſhip, refuſe no danger for the publick good, nor Death it ſelf if the caſe required. Having therefore a deſign to make a full evacuation of all bad humours, as he accounted them, and knowing how full of difficulty and danger this might prove to the Body politick, the minds of men much loathing ſo violent a Purgation, he conſidered that they were apt to be led by a ſhew of Religion; and having learn'd how Minos pretended to have received his Laws from Jupiter, with whom he converſed in a Cave, he reſolved to go to Delphos, and make uſe of that Oracle to the ſame advantage. There was he received with incouraging words, ſaluted, Beloved of the gods, a God rather then a Man, and received in an Oracle the frame of a Commonwealth, which bringing home, he called Rhetra, to gain the more Authority to it. At his return he firſt conſulted with his intimate Friends, and drew others on by degrees, till having made a Party, he ordered thirty principal perſons to go armed into the Market-place betimes in the morning, that they might thereby ſtrike a terrour into their Adverſaries. Charilaus at this much affrighted, as thinking it ſome Plot againſt himſelf, fled to Chalciæcum, (the Temple of Minerva much ſpoken of) where he took Sanctuary; but underſtanding how things were, came forth and joyned himſelf to his Uncle, being of a moſt ſweet and mild diſpoſition.

9. The Rhetra according to which he framed his Model was of this tenour. Let him build a Temple of Jupiter Syllanius and Minerva Syllania: Let him divide the People into Phylæ and Obæ, ordain thirty Senatours, with the Archegetæ: then let him call together the People betwixt Babyces and Cnacion, ſo let let him propoſe concerning matters, or null them. Gamodan, Gorian, &c. In theſe words of the Oracle, ſaith Plutarch, Obæ, and Phylæ (that is, Tribes) ſignifie certain parts, into which the People was to be divided: the Kings are called Archagetæ, as Captains: and to aſſemble the People, is in Greek expreſſed by apollazein, for that he attributed the beginning and cauſe of the Commonwealth to Apollo Pythius. Babycas and Cnacion is at this day called OEnuns. Ariſtotle writeth, that Cnacion is the name of the River, and Babycas of the Bridge. In the middle betwixt theſe the Concio was aſſembled, though there was neither Gallery nor any other accommodation; becauſe he thought that thoſe things conduced nothing to Council, but rather hindred; for that Statues, Pictures, the Attiring-rooms of Theatres, and Withdrawing-rooms of the Court, being too curiouſly adorned, made thoſe that met light and vain, diverting them with toys and idle thoughts. The Multitude being aſſembled into one place, power was not granted to any of the People to propoſe: they could onely enact what the Senatours and Kings had propounded. But in after-times, the common People perverting and wreſting their Suffrages, Polydorus and Theopompus, then Kings, added this to the Rhetra: But if the People reſolve upon any bad thing, let it be lawfull for the Senatours and Kings to diſſent; that is, ſaith Plutarch, let them not ratifie it, but forthwith diſmiſs the Aſſembly; ſeeing the People depraveth the Decree, and altereth what is beſt. As for Gamodan and Gorian, Plutarch doth not interpret them, and it cannot be underſtood what they mean. Another Rhetra was this; That they ſhould uſe no written Laws. Another, concerning Expences, commanded, That the roof of every houſe ſhould be made with an Axe onely, and the doors with a Saw. And a Third ordained, That War ſhould not be often made upon the ſame Enemies; leſt, learning to defend themſelves, they ſhould thereby be made warlike: which afterwards was laid to the charge of Ageſilaus in behalf of the Thebans.

The Kings.

10. Having prepared all things for his purpoſe, he diſſolved the Government of his Forefathers. For though he left two Kings as he found, with the ſame Right of Succeſſion, yet took he away almoſt their whole Power, inſtituting a Senate to reſtrain them, and be an equal poize betwixt them and the People, to reduce both Parties into order. Without the Authority of this Senate the Kings could not decree nor undertake any thing of conſequence. He ordered they ſhould ſit in the chiefeſt places as Members of the Senate, firſt ſpeak their minds and give their Suffrages; but conclude nothing without conſent of the major part. All Magiſtrates, till the impudent Ephori took ſo much upon themſelves, roſe up to, and did them reverence. Their employment was to take care of Sacrifices, to command the Pythii, whereof two conſtantly attended them, to be ſent to conſult the Oracle of Apollo Pythius at Delphos: they took care of Embaſſadours and other Strangers, of the cauſes of Women that were Heirs; Adoptions alſo they had charge of, ſo as none could be made without them. They gave anſwer to Embaſſadours, and looked to the Repairing of High-ways. This was their condition at home, which amounting to no more then titulary Royalty, after that the preſent Kings had either given away their juſt Right, (as Plutarch telleth us, that Charilaus joyned with his Uncle) or were deprived of it by the Treaſon and Violence of Lycurgus and his Party; the attempt of ſome men is as ridiculous as ſeditious, who taking it for granted that the popular Villains, the Ephori, were 130 years after this ſet up by the People to reſtrain the Kings, (which yet cannot be granted, though moſt have ſo thought) thence would draw a Precedent to the diſadvantage of true Royal Majeſty. For theſe Kings were not real Kings as to Prerogatives of Majeſty, being ſcarcely ſo much as a Duke of Venice.

Lege Plutarchum in Lycurgo, Nic. Cragium, Ubbonem Emmium, & Doctiſs Dr. Heylin, lib. cui titulus, The Stumbling-block of Diſobedience diſcovered, &c.

11. Abroad they were the Generals of Armies, which were left to their ordering or diſpoſal; ſo as no Council of War, or any in Commiſſion could thwart their Commands; they onely receiving Orders from the State for their expeditions and returns. They had Judges to accompany them, a General of the Horſe, four Polemarchi, beſides Colonels, and other inferiour Officers, whoſe advice, as well as help, in the War they might uſe, but were at their own diſpoſal, and obnoxious to none of them. And what is here ſpoken of a King, is to be extended to his Protectour, Guardian, or Tutour in his minority, by the Lacedæmonians called Prodicus. Such were choſen to this truſt and charge as were neareſt of kin by the Father's ſide to the Orphans, and conſequently the next Heirs, that whoſe was the hope, his alſo might be the burthen. This appeareth by ſeveral examples of Ly- of Lycurgus himſelf, Ariſtodemus, and Pauſanias, to be related in their due places. Which though it be not admitted in other Commonwealths, and perhaps with good reaſon, yet theſe Prodici having all in their power, ſcarcely ever any of them was found to have plaid falſe, or, by treachery towards their Pupills, gone about to make way for their own preferment.

The Senate.

12. The Senate conſiſted of 28 perſons, beſides the Kings, not under 60 years of age. The firſt were ſuch as had aſſiſted Lycurgus, and been helpfull to him in the Settlement, whom he ordered to continue for Life, except they committed any Offence worthy of ſecluſion; conceiving it not ſafe for this his Commonwealth, to have a frequent change of Senatours, which the Kings might improve to their own intereſt. Into this ſecond rank of dignity were none to be admitted, but ſuch as had well deſerved of the State by good ſervice or eminent vertue; that ſo it might be a reward to old men, and an incouragement to the younger ſort, to be conformable to the Laws. They had in effect the whole executive power in their hands. They had the ſupreme power of Judicature, wherein they proceeded not raſhly, but with great advice and delay, deferring Judgement moſt commonly for ſome days, till they had heard both parties, and received the teſtimonies of witneſſes: yet it was lawfull afterwards to appeal from them to the People. They were not liable to be called to an account for whatſoever they did: which immunity, as exceeding the moderation of a Commonwealth, (together with their ſuing to the People for their Places, whereas able and honeſt men ſhould be ſought for,) amongſt other things is taxed by Ariſtotle.

Lege Plutarch. in Lycurgo, Platon. de legib. lib. 3. Xenoph. ut ſuprà, Ariſtot. Polit. Demoſth. adverſus Leptinem.

Politic. lib. 2. c 8.

13. A Reverend and Learned man obſerveth, that whatever the Kings loſt, the People got little by the alteration, being left out of all imployment in affairs of State, and forced to yield obedience unto Thirty Maſters, whereas before they had but Two. For the Kings and Senate aſſembled, and diſmiſſed them when they pleaſed, and propounded to them what they thought convenient. For the People ſo aſſembled it was not lawfull to propound any thing to be debated or determined, nor to deliver their opinion in the Point propounded: there being nothing left to them, but to teſtifie their aſſent to the Propoſitions made either by the Kings or Senate. But the cunning flattery of the Ephori in after-times much enlarged the power of the People. By the appointment of Lycurgus it met at the River Cnacion (afterwards called OEnuns) by the Bridge Babycas. Sometimes onely the Spartans, or Inhabitants of the City, met together, and then it was called the Leſſer Aſſembly: but otherwhiles the whole Body of the Lacedæmonians gathered together out of all Laconia, that was free of the Commonwealth, which went by the name of the Greater Meeting or Aſſembly, called then ſimply * Eccleſia.

Dr. Heylin.

Plutarch. in Lycurgo. Xenoph. Hellenic. lib. 3. & 6.

* Ἐκκλησία.

An Equality of Poſſeſſions.

14. Having reduced the Government to this Antimonarchical paſs, he rightly judged it could not ſubſiſt without levelling. He therefore attempted a thing moſt difficult, and even beyond all hope of attaining. Many that had got much wealth in the late turbulent times, he perſuaded to part with moſt of it, and to an equal diviſion of the grounds, urging, that no Inequality was to be amongſt them, but what Vice and Vertue made; and what by arguments drawn from convenience, as others from neceſſity that lay upon them from the indigent and diſpleaſed Multitude, he brought his Deſign to perfection. Then divided he the grounds into 30000 Lots, or equal Portions, whereof 9000 he laid to the City of Sparta it ſelf, (the number of Citizens amounting to ſo many,) and diſtributed the reſt to the other Lacedæmonians inhabiting the Countrey. Each Portion contained ſo much as to maintain a family in a frugal way, and no more. To the Kings a larger quantity was aſſigned for the maintenance of their Degree, ſo much as might ſerve with moderation, and not make them abound in Riches.

Plutarch in vita Lycurgi; & in Compar. Lycurgi & Numæ; & in Agide, & alibi.

Iron money.

15. That he might take away Covetouſneſs, and the deſire of hoarding up wealth, he forbade the uſe of Silver and Gold Coin, putting in the room thereof Iron money, of which a great quantity amounting but to a little value, no conſiderable payment could be made without the help of an Horſe or Waggon. Hereby it came to paſs that they were unfit to Traffick with other people, no Merchandize being imported, which he herein aimed at, as well as by another Law made expreſly againſt the continuance of Strangers in the City; fearing more the Contagion of the mind in his People then that of the body. And otherways to prevent Luxury, he forbade that any man ſhould eat at home by himſelf, or with his family, or to make any private Feaſts, without ſome ſpecial occaſion; but ordered them to ſup together in common, without any diſtinction of Dignity or Fortune, by fifteen together. Each one ſent in his Proviſion monthly; as Meal, Wine, Cheeſe, and Figs, with a little money to buy other Victuals. If any had killed Veniſon, or offered

Plutarch.

Sacrifice, whereby any Fleſh was gotten, the ancient men left that to the younger ſort, and contented themſelves with Broaths, of which a black ſort was moſt uſed, of no pleaſant taſte to ſuch as were not accuſtomed to eat it. As for Fiſh, and all kind of delicate Cates, they were utterly forbidden. None were to eat or drink beyond ſuch a proportion as ſufficed Nature: the Kings indeed were allowed a double Meſs, but this was, that they might have opportunity to pleaſure and countenance others with part of it. All came to theſe publick Meetings (which firſt were called Andria, after the name of thoſe of the Cretians, from whom Lycurgus borrowed this Conſtitution, afterwards Phyditia and Syſſitia) with their Arms, and after Supper were to go home without Torch or Candle, though never ſo dark, that they might learn, if need ſhould be, to make the ſame ſhift when they lay abroad in the field. All ſtately Buildings he forbad, and all Trades that tended any way to the maintenance of Luxury or Exceſs.

The Phyditia and Syſſitia.

16. But to have theſe Cuſtomes durable, it being highly neceſſary to breed up the youth in ſuitable Diſcipline, he alſo provided for that in ample manner. The firſt thing previous to education was very unnatural and cruel; for the Infant, as ſoon as born, was carried to the moſt ancient of that Tribe to be viewed; and if it was found any way deformed, weak, or ſickly, whereby might be judged that it would rather prove burthenſom then beneficial to the Commonwealth, then was it to be expoſed upon the craggy places of the Hill Taygetus, there to take ſuch quarter as wild beaſts, fowls, hunger and cold would afford it. But if it ſeemed ſtrong, luſty, and worthy to live, then was it reſtored to its Parents to be nurſed. And nurſed it was very harſhly, not uſed to any delicate or coſtly feeding, and ſo uſed to darkneſs and ſolitarineſs as not to be affrighted at them. When the Children were ſeven years old, they were not committed to any mercenary School-maſters, after the cuſtom of other people, but to the care of the Publick, being diſtributed into ſeveral Companies, over which ſome that were moſt fierce, hardy and prudent amongſt them were ſet as Captains, who governed them in their ſports and exerciſes, and to whoſe correction they ſubmitted. There were alſo moſt commonly ſome men preſent at their exerciſes, who would rebuke and chaſtiſe them, obſerving which had the moſt notable ſpirits; Lycurgus leaving it in charge to the Lacedæmonians, to take care of other mens Children as of their own. All manner of ways were they inured to labour and pains. Their Hair was cut cloſe to their heads, they went bare-footed from their Infancy, fought with one another naked with as much earneſtneſs as might be, and after a certain barbarous and cruel manner were once a year whipped at the Altar of Diana Taurica, (to which goddeſs ſacrifice could not be offered without man's bloud) till the bloud ran down in great abundance, their Parents beholding the ſight. They would bear it with admirable patience and emulation, chearfully (nay, many times, with great delight, which they took in excelling one another in patience) enduring the ſtroaks unto Death it ſelf.

The Education of Boys.

Plutarch. in Lycurgo.

17. When they were paſt their Childhood, at twelve years of age, their labours and exerciſes were both increaſed, leſt vice together with years ſhould grow upon them. They were to be content with one Coat both Winter and Summer, and ſlept by Companies together upon courſe and uneaſie Beds. The ancient men alſo overſaw them upon occaſion, but the Charge was committed to one of the principal, called thence Pædonomus, who had power to gather them together and correct them. Over ſeveral Companies certain young men of twenty years of age, called Irens, were ſet, who, if no man was preſent, had command over them, exerciſed them in watches, lying in ambuſh, and other crafts of War, wherein if any were caught, they were ſeverely puniſhed, to make them the more wary for the future; as alſo if they were taken in Theft, Stealing with them being lawfull, and incouraged as an exerciſe for War, but to be ſurprized therein was puniſhable. The ſame Irens ſupping with them would make ſome ſing, and others propoſe queſtions, in anſwering which they exerciſed their wits, accuſtoming them to make a ſhort, clear and witty anſwer, in the dexterity whereof the Lacedæmonians excelled all others: Oratours with their long-winded ſpeeches being utterly forbidden. When the Iren corrected them, there were men ſtanding by to take notice of it; and if it was not rightly done, nor upon good grounds, he had the ſame puniſhment inflicted on him. Thoſe Boys performed ſeveral ſorts of exerciſes; but amongſt the reſt, thoſe called Plataniſta (from the place thick ſet with Plane-trees) were moſt eminent, in which with hands and feet, teeth and nails, they fought in good earneſt, to the putting out of eyes, and ſometimes to the danger of Life it ſelf, none giving over, or ſhrinking one jot, than which no diſgrace was eſteemed more hainous.

Pædonomus.

Iren.

Plutarch. in Apophthegmat. Laconicis.

Such ſtrict and conſtant diſcipline under-went they all their minority, till they arrived at 30 years of age, (before which time they married not, went not out to War, neither exerciſed any Office) ſo that the greateſt trouble in the Field afterwards ſeemed much more eaſy to be undergone.

The education of Virgins.

18. The Education alſo of young Women was agreeable to this of the other Sex, that by Vigilancy, Induſtry, and enduring Labour, they might be furniſhed with Courage and Reſolution againſt all evils, being married with more eaſe undergo the pains of Travel, and bring forth Children of the ſame conſtitution. According to their age they had Exerciſes of ſundry ſorts; moſt of which they performed in publick, naked, and that not onely in the ſight of Kings and Senate, but the young men alſo; which yet becauſe of the Laconick modeſty and temperance, with the cuſtom of it, was not judged at all to contribute to Vice, but rather to an innocent and harmleſs emulation, and honeſt love. Their diet was ſuch as might nouriſh them, and not any ill diſpoſition in them. Such were their Cloaths, and all things elſe about them, as long as Lycurgus his Conſtitutions were in force; and therefore the too great power of the Women, their Luxury, and the many great inconveniences that thence aroſe to the State, objected ſo much by Ariſtotle, is to be aſcribed to the married ſort; and probable it is that this corruption crept in in after-times, it being well nigh as eaſie for him to reform the Women as to make this great alteration in the Commonwealth, though the contrary be aſſerted by the Philoſopher, who as it ſeemeth was much ſatisfied in the wilfulneſs of that Sex. The ſet time for Marriage of Men was at 30, for Women at 20 years, before which it was unlawfull; but if a man within ſome reaſonable time after betook him not to that eſtate, he was publickly diſgraced by command of the Law-giver. Women had no Portions; yet the Heirs carried with them their Father's Inheritance. No plurality of Wives did he allow; and yet as for Adultery it was not heard of in that City, againſt which neither did he make any Law, having already provided ſufficiently againſt it by ſuch ſtrict Conſtitutions.

Politic. lib. 2. cap. 7.

Travel forbidden.

19. As he provided againſt the flocking of Strangers to Sparta, ſo forbad he any Citizen or Member of the Commonwealth to Travel, (except in any expedition of War) leſt he ſhould bring home with him the diſſolute and effeminate Cuſtoms of other places. Merchandizing was eſteemed a baſe imployment, as meerly practiſed for getting of Wealth. Drunkenneſs they rendred more abominable to Children by making their Slaves drunk, that then they might behold them in that beaſtly condition. He that had been ſo unthrifty as not to be able to bear the charge of the Phiditia was excluded from all truſt in the Commonwealth. To keep them vigilant, he commanded that the City ſhould not be walled, they having ſufficient leiſure to look carefully to it; this being even their whole calling, with their heads and hands to attend publick affairs; the drudgery of Tilling their Grounds, and gathering their Fruits, being impoſed upon the Helotæ, or publick Slaves, with other ſervile and mechanick affairs. Thoſe Slaves it was not lawfull for any one privately to manumit, or ſell out of Laconia; whereby increaſing to ſo great a number, that they equallized, or exceeded that of their Maſters, they ſometimes afforded occaſion of great danger; upon which account this Conſtitution is taxed by the Philoſopher. For the leſſening of their numbers a courſe was taken not altogether clear from a note of cruelty, Certain young men being ſent about into the Countrey, who lying hid in the day-time, (whence this practice was called Cryptia) by night killed as many of them as they could light on.

Sparta unwalled.

The Cryptia.

20. Such was the form of the Commonwealth inſtituted by Lycurgus, which ſaved him the labour of erecting any other Courts of Juſtice then what have been already mentioned. For Gold and Silver being taken away, and the uſe thereof forbidden upon pain of death, Controverſies and Suits moſt commonly thence ariſing naturally fell of themſelves. He forbad his Laws to be written in Tables, becauſe he would have them rooted in the Minds of the people, to which he thought the ſtrict Diſcipline he erected might ſufficiently conduce. After the thing was done, as it hath happened uſually in this kind, he was but ill rewarded; for ſuch as had parted with their Silver, Gold, or Luxury, were ſo enraged as to throw ſtones at him, which to ſhun he was glad to betake himſelf to his heels, and looking back had an Eye ſtruck out by one Arcander, who yet afterwards repented him of the deed, and was very obſervant of him. One telleth us he was caſt out by publick rage; but * he who hath handled the ſubject of his Life with greateſt induſtry, hath recorded, that when things began to be ſettled, and he ſaw the Commonwealth thus conſtituted able to ſupport it ſelf, he calling the People together, told them, that indeed all things were ſo already ſettled as to provide for Plutarch. ut ſuprà.

* Valerius Max. lib. 5. cap. 3. Ext. Exemp. 2.

Kings, Senate, and People ſworn to obſerve the Laws and Conſtitutions of Lycurgus.

His Death.

for vertue and happineſs, but one thing, and that of greateſt conſequence, was yet behind, which was not to be enacted before firſt he had conſulted the Oracle at Delphos. Therefore he deſired them to keep the Laws already made, and change nothing in them till his return with ſuch Anſwer as the Oracle would give him. All conſenting, he took an Oath of the Kings, Senate, and People, and began his Journey. At Delphos he enquired whether the Laws already made, and eſtabliſhed, were not ſufficient for the vertue and ſafety of the State. It was anſwered they were, and that it ſhould continue moſt glorious ſo long as it would ſtand to them. This Anſwer then he ſent to Sparta; but, reſolving never to looſe them from their Oath, he there made an end of himſelf by abſtaining from all ſuſtenance. Some have ſaid that he died in Crete, and that he ordered his Body to be burnt, and his aſhes thrown into the Sea, leſt his Reliques being brought back to Sparta, they ſhould account themſelves freed from the Oath. But * Tertullian writeth, that he famiſhed himſelf, becauſe the Lacedæmonians went about to alter his Laws.

* In Apologet.

The War with the Argives.

Pauſan. in Arcadicis. Herod. lib. I.

Pauſan. in Meſſenicis.

* Clemens Strom. lib. I.

The firſt Olympiad.

21. Lycurgus being dead, and the State ſettled, after this great change, it renewed the War formerly begun with the Argives; and afterwards deluded by the ambiguity of the Oracle, commenced another againſt the Tegeatæ, a people of Arcadia, by whom they were worſted, and Charilaus the King was taken Priſoner, through the eſpecial valour of the Women: yet was he preſently ſet at liberty, upon his Oath never to fight more againſt them, which he but ill performed. After this they overthrew divers Cities, on which the Achæans had ſeized, ſome whereof made their peace, as Pauſanias telleth us, and departed out of Peloponneſus. The Colleague of Charilaus (or Charillus) for ſome time was Teleclus, whoſe death gave one occaſion to the famous Meſſenian War. Charilaus was ſucceeded by Nicander his Son, and Teleclus by Alcamenes. In * the 34th year of Nicander, was celebrated the firſt Olympiad, after the Reſtitution of thoſe Games by Iphitus, in which Corœbus a Cook of Elis got the Prize in the Courſe. Theſe Solemnities being of ſo great conſequence to the knowledge of times, muſt not be paſſed over without ſome obſervation.

The renewing of the Olympick Games.

Pauſan. in Eliacis.

A. M. 3229. Oſiæ 34.

22. Theſe Exerciſes had in former times been held by divers others, as Hercules, (both the Idæan and the Son of Amphitryon, as ſome think) Pelops, Endymion, Neleus, Pelias, Lycurgus, and others. After the deſcent of the Heraclidæ into Peponneſus, Oxylus the Ætolian alſo (who, as we ſaid, was choſen their Guide, and according to agreement had the Countrey of Elis given to him) renewed the Games: but they were interrupted as formerly, or ſeldom obſerved, for about 300 years, till Iphitus the Son of Praxonidas, and Nephew of Hæmon, deſcended from him, and one of his Succeſſors, again reſtored them; after which they never intermitted, but were kept up for many generations. But the occaſion of the laſt reſtitution was this. Greece being almoſt ruined by Seditions and Peſtilence, Iphitus inquired of the Oracle at Delphos, how thoſe evils might be redreſſed: and it was anſwered, that it was expedient for him and the Eleans to reſtore the Olympick Games; whereupon he proclaimed them, and for the better celebration of them, procured a Truce to be made. The place whence they had their name was Olympia, a City ſituated in the territories of the Piſæans, upon the River Alpheus, upon which account the Piſæans contended a long time with the Eleans about their intereſt in them. There was a Temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and a place for Races and all ſorts of Exerciſes, filled with many goodly buildings, which reſembled another City. Near to the Town was alſo a place where the Eleans ſate and judged of the Controverſies ariſing about Victories, to which Crowns or Garlands were given. As long as the Eleans continued under a Monarchical Government, their Prince, of the poſterity of Oxylus, was ſole Judge; but afterwards there were Two, choſen by the Votes of the People, which where after increaſed to the number of Nine, then to Ten, and laſt of all to Twelve. This ſolemnity was held once every fifth year beginning, ſo that from the commencing of one to the beginning of another, paſſed four entire years, by ſome miſtaken for five, becauſe of the commencement of the Games. The time was at the full of the Moon, the change whereof immediately preceded the Summer Solſtice, in the Moneth by them called Hecatombæon.

23. Upon this occaſion meetings and conſultations were had concerning the affairs of all Greece, beſides the Inhabitants of which, many flocked from other Countries. Care was here taken concerning the form of the year, for the intercalation of a day at the end of every fourth. Charge was given to the Prieſts of the Temple, to take notice of every new Moon, eſpecially of that wherewith the Moneth Hecatombæon began, and to proclaim it: they were alſo not onely to regiſter the names of the Victors in the ſeveral ſorts of Games, with other things that concerned them, but alſo whatſoever memorable thing occurred in the intervalls. The account of years henceforth never failed, and the affairs of Greece, and other Countries, were known in a moſt certain order. And here the ſecond intervall of time, amongſt three reckoned by * Varro, received its period. The firſt began with the beginning of things, and ended at the Deluge, called by him Unknown: the ſecond began where the firſt ended, and concluded with this reſtitution of the Olympiads; which he termed Fabulous, becauſe the Story thereof is mixed with Fables: and the third, commencing with the firſt Olympiad, reached to his own time, which he named Hiſtoricall, for that things done therein were truly and clearly related. This happened 408 years after the deſtruction of Troy, 774 before the Æra of Chriſt, A.M. 3229.

* Vide Cenſorinum de Die Natali, cap. 21.

The bringing in of the Ephori into Sparta.

A. M. 3256.
V.C. 5.
Jothami 10.

24. Towards the latter end of the ſeventh Olympiad, a great change was made in the Government of Lacedæmon, by the bringing in of the Ephori, who, according to Plutarch, had their beginning 130 years after Lycurgus. It ſeemeth that for all the means uſed by him to gain an Equality, and clip the power of the Great ones, yet it again grew extravagant within this time, ſo that the People, to provide againſt that of the Kings and Senate for the future, got theſe Officers created. Five they were in number, (whereof one Elatus was the firſt) choſen every year by and out of the People, without any diſtinction of birth or wealth; inſomuch, that ſometimes the meaneſt ſort of men were elected: which cuſtom is noted as bad by Ariſtotle. But their uſe and end being onely to protect the Liberty of the people, ſuch, what ever they were, muſt be preferred, as made the greateſt ſhow of love to Freedom, of a ſharp and bold wit, and averſeneſs towards the power of the great ones. Theopompus the Son of Nicander, and Grandſon to Charilaus, was King at this time, who bringing in, or giving way to this Office, his Wife rebuked him for ſo doing, ſaying, that he would leave the Kingdom to his Son of leſs value than he had it of his Father. To which he anſwered, that on the contrary, he ſhould leave it ſo much the greater, by how much more durable. Indeed hereby it came to paſs, as Plutarch obſerveth, that the Kingly power, being leſs, was not ſubject to that envy which ruined the affairs of the Kings of Meſſene and Argos, who would not moderate their power, nor at all ſtoop to any Popularity; and the Government here being poized, continued longer, as freed from the inteſtine diſtempers of the neighbour Commonwealth. Yet it is alſo obſerved by * one, that the reaſon of the proſperity and long duration of the Spartan State, above that of the Athenian and others, is to be fetched from its ſo much partaking of Ariſtocracy, and the want of that influence which the heady Multitude had into the greateſt affairs elſewhere.

*Ariſt.Polit.lib.*5. cap. 11.

*Val. Max. lib.*4.

Plutarch.in vita Lycurgi.

Plato de Legibus lib. 3.

Cicero de Legib. lib. 3.

* Machiavelli ſopra la prima Decad. di Tito Livio.

25. The general and moſt probable opinion is, that the Ephori were brought in in the time of Theopompus. So writeth Ariſtotle, Plutarch, and Valerius Maximus: Yet (a) Herodotus, having reckoned up ſeveral things performed by Lycurgus in the framing of his Commonwealth, at length addeth, Farther, Lycurgus ordained the Ephori and Elders: of which opinion Xenophon ſeemeth alſo to have been in his Treatiſe of the Lacedæmonian Commonwealth. But though they were brought in during the reign of Theopompus, yet it is not agreed who was the principal Author of their creation, becauſe the end or deſign thereof is uncertain, though that ere now ſpoken of be generally received. (b) Plato, and Plutarch (as he confeſſeth) from him, will have them created to be as a bridle to the power of the Kings, for theirs it muſt needs be, which he calleth Hereditary. Cicero alſo in his third Book of Laws teſtifieth, that the Ephori at Sparta were oppoſed againſt the Kings, as the Roman Tribunes againſt the Conſuls, who as well as the Senate were, even at the firſt inſtitution, feared by the Commons, for that they were the chief Patritian Magiſtrates at that time, and the Animoſities in that State were cauſed by the diſtinction of the two Orders. Valerius Maximus maketh the ſame compariſon betwixt the Ephori and Tribunes, and will have them inſtituted by Theopompus for this very end, whom Plato alſo ſeemeth upon the ſame account to call the third Saviour of the Lacedæmonians; ſo that he muſt have been at the leaſt inſtrumental in their inſtitution. Ariſtotle (c) accounteth this Magiſtracy as the Nerves of the Commonwealth joyning the parts thereof together; becauſe the People by virtue of it being partaker of Empire, was quiet: ſo that the People ſeemeth eſpecially conſidered in this Office, by which in another place the Philoſopher expreſly ſaith Theopompus moderated the power of the Kings. But for all this Cleomenes King of Sparta, as (d) Plutarch himſelf relateth the Story, affirmed in a ſpeech to the people,

(a) Πρὸς τε τούτοισι, τοὺς ἐφόρους καὶ γέροντας ἔστησε Λυκοῦργος. *li.*1. cap. 65.

(b) Ὁ τρίτος σωτὴρ ὑμῖν ἔτι σπαργῶσαν καὶ θυμουμένην τὴν ἀρχὴν ὁρῶν, οἷον ψάλιον ἐνέβαλεν αὐτῇ τὴν τῶν ἐφόρων δύναμιν, ἐγγὺς τῆς κληρωτῆς ἀγαγὼν δυνάμεως. De Legibus lib. 3.

(c) Συνέχει μὲν τὴν πολιτείαν τὸ ἀρχεῖον τοῦτο. ἡσυχάζει γὰρ ὁ δῆμος, διὰ τὸ μετέχειν μεγίστης ἀρχῆς. Politic. lib. 2.

(d) In Cleomene.

people, that Lycurgus having added the Senate to the Kings, the Commonwealth was for a long time governed without any other Magiſtracy. Afterwards, when the Meſſenian War was drawn out in length, the Kings, becauſe they were employed abroad, choſe ſome of their friends to adminiſter Juſtice, whom they left as their Deputies over the people: and thoſe were called Ephori, from their inſpection. Being at firſt no other than Aſſiſtants to the Kings, by little and little they aſſumed power to themſelves, and no body aware of it, conſtituted a peculiar Office. Hereof, he ſaid, a ſign remained at that day, for that the King being called by the Ephori, refuſed to come once, and again; but at the third call came to them: beſides, Aſteropus, who firſt inlarged the bounds of this Office, was Ephorus many Ages after.

Their power.

26. The power of thoſe Magiſtrates, for what end ſoever conſtituted, (as of others in other places) was moderate at the firſt; but in proceſs of time, as the ambition of them, and the confidence of the People thereupon increaſed, it exceeded the due and juſt bounds, and made the Government almoſt degenerate into a Democracy. They not onely conſulted with the Kings and Senate, reſolved about the affairs of State, and judged of Controverſies amongſt the people; but afterwards grappled even the whole Power into their hands, doing all things themſelves that were of moment. They govened the Aſſemblies of the people, propoſing and gathering Suffrages, they made and diſannulled Leagues, ordered what Forces were to be ſent out, for which they alſo made proviſion, they rewarded or puniſhed, according to their pleaſure, other Magiſtrates, calling the very * Kings to account for their Lives; inſomuch that, as the Philoſopher obſerveth, they obtained a kind of Tyranny: the onely remedy was, that their Office was but annuall, and being five in number, the deſigns and endeavours of one or two were croſſed and overthrown by the contrary party, nothing being done without the conſent of the whole College. They roſe not up, as other Magiſtrates, in preſence of the Kings, with whom they mutually ſware every moneth; the Kings, that they would rule according to the Laws, and they in the name of the people, to preſerve their Rule thus ordered, ſafe and entire to them. With their entring into their Office the year began, (conſtantly in Winter, as we learn from Thucydides;) and from one of them, as principal, the year was named, (who thence was called Eponymus,) as from the Archon at Athens. At their firſt entrance they were wont to publiſh an Edict, that the men ſhould take off all the Hair from their upper Lips, and obſerve ſtrictly all the Laws, leſt they ſhould be conſtrained to puniſh them, requiring obedience in a little, thereby to inure the people to it. In the Wars two of them uſed to go out with the Kings, to aſſiſt them in their Councils. They were wont to proclaim open war againſt the publick Slaves or Helots, giving liberty to kill them; and thence is to be derived that cruel cuſtom of the Cryptia, rather than from any Conſtitution of Lycurgus, as Ariſtotle thinketh. The cauſe thereof, as Plutarch judgeth, was the conſpiring of theſe Slaves againſt their Maſters, during the Meſſenian War.

* Agis.

Pauſanias.

Vide Plutarch. & Corn. Nepotem.

Lib. 5.

Plutarch. in Cleomene ex Ariſtotele.

The Meſſenian War.

27. In the ſecond year of the ninth Olympiad this War began: though the ground of the quarrel had been partly laid ſeveral years before the bringing in of the Ephori. In the days of Teleclus Father to Alcamenes now King, there being a Temple of Diana in the borders, to which both the Lacedæmonians and Meſſenians conſtantly reſorted, it happened that ſome Spartan Virgins going thither, according to the cuſtom, were abuſed by the Meſſenians, and Teleclus, endeavouring to prevent the injury, was there ſlain: morover, the Virgins for very ſhame and grief deſtroyed themſelves, as the Lacedæmonians told the Story. On the contrary, the Meſſenians pleaded, that at this Temple Teleclus lay in wait for the principal of their City, by ſending thither young men, diſguiſed in the habit of Virgins, with Poniards under their cloaths; that hereupon the Meſſenians coming in to help their friends, ſlew Teleclus, and the counterfeits, for which at that time the Lacedæmonians found not themſelves ſo much concerned as to ſtir. However it was, grudges hence aroſe, or were rather heightned betwixt them; for the Lacedæmonians often complained, that in the diviſion of the Territories obtained by the Heraclidæ, Euryſthenes and Procles, their Kings, were cheated by their Uncle Creſphontes of the far better grounds, for which now they envied the Meſſenians, thinking themſelves far worthier of them, as being much the more conſiderable people.

Pauſanias in Meſſenicis.

Strabo lib. 6. & 8.

Juſt. in lib. 3.

28. Animoſities being raiſed upon theſe accounts, another thing happened which increaſed them to that height as they brake out into open War. There was one Polychares, a Meſſenian, who had got the victory in the Courſe at the celebration of the fourth Olympiad. He let out ſome Cows to one Euæphnus a Lacedæmonian, on this condition, condition, to have part of the profit. Euæphnus ſold the Cows, and then coming to Polychares, told him that they and their Keepers were ſtoln from him. But while he was labouring to gain credit to his tale, ſome of the Herdſ-men (who, as it ſeemeth, with the conſent of Euæphnus, were taken away by force) eſcaped from the Merchants, and acquainted Polychares with the Fraud; which now the other not able to deny, asked him pardon, told him for how much the Cattel were ſold, and promiſed to ſend the money, if he would let his Son accompany him to Sparta. He ſent his Son accordingly; but when they were come together into Laconia, Euæphnus moſt perfidiouſly murthered the young man: with the horridneſs of which fact Polychares grievouſly moved, came ſeveral times to Sparta, complaining bitterly, and with many tears, to the Kings and Ephori, but found no Juſtice; inſomuch that growing into a great rage againſt all Lacedæmonians in common, he killed them as enemies whereſoever he could meet them.

Pauſan. ut ſuprà.

29. The Lacedæmonians, finding themſelves concerned herein, ſent to the Meſſenians, demanding Polychares. At that time Androcles and Antiochus, the Sons of Phintas, reigning at Meſſene, promiſed they would report the matter to the People, and know their minds therein. The Multitude being called together, Androcles was much for the giving up of Polychares; but, on the contrary, Antiochus urged how unjuſt and lamentable a thing it would be for him to be tormented before Euæphnus: and the contention grew ſo hot betwixt the Brothers, that it came to blows. Antiochus his faction prevailing, Androcles with the chief of his party loſt their lives. Antiochus then reigning alone wrote to the Spartans, offering to refer the buſineſs to the Argives, who were of the ſame ſtock with them both; or to the publick Council of the Amphyctiones; or elſe, if neither of theſe liked them, to the Senate of Areopagus. They returned no anſwer by the Meſſenger, and within a few months Antiochus died, and his Son Euphaes ſucceeded him. Neither then did they ſend any meſſage, nor yet renounced amity with the Meſſenians, but entring into ſecret conſultations provided for the War, and bound themſelves with an Oath never to return home till they had ſubdued Meſſenia.

Pauſ. Polybius lib. 6.

30. Being bound with this Oath, and having all things in a readineſs, under the conduct of Alcamenes, the Son of Teleclus, they went out by night and fell upon Aruphea, a Town upon the Borders; which by the ſuddenneſs of the onſet, no Watch being kept, but the Gates ſtanding open, they eaſily took; and finding it a place for ſituation, and convenience of water, fit for their purpoſe, put all to the Sword, intending to uſe it as a Receptacle, and chief Fortreſs in the War. After this they made Excurſions, and rather practiſed Robberies than carried on a War, the Meſſenians declining the Fight through the perſuaſion of Euphaes. But after four years, when they were now well exerciſed, and exceedingly incenſed againſt the Lacedæmonians, he gave them leave to make inroads into Laconia, where they waſted all about Taygetus. He then led down his Army into the Borders to fight: which opportunity the Lacedæmonians imbraced, and ingaged with the Horſe, and thoſe Foot that bare the light Armour. But Euphaes having provided matter for making a Trench, cauſed the place where his other Souldiers lay to be fortified, (in them conſiſting his chief ſtrength;) ſo that, ſeeing they could not fight with them, and being unprovided to beſiege the Camp, they returned home, where they had but cold welcom, becauſe of this Retreat made contrary to their ſolemn Oath.

Idem ibid.
A. M. 3262.
Olymp. 9. an. 2.
V. C. 11.
Jothami 16.

31. The year after, for that the elder ſort exceedingly upbraided them, they returned into Meſſenia under conduct of both the Kings, Theopompus, the Son of Nicander, and Polydorus of Alcamenes now dead. There they were received by the enemy, and entertained in a great and bloudy Battel, wherein both Parties with much earneſtneſs and contention demeaned themſelves. The Spartans as they ſurpaſſed the other in skill, being trained up in Exerciſes from their Childhood, ſo exceeded them alſo in numbers: but deſperation and neceſſity made the Meſſenians valiant, as they abundantly ſhewed it, many breaking their Ranks on purpoſe to come to hand-ſtroaks with the enemy. In the main Battel the Victory continued doubtfull a long time; in the right wing Euphaes put Theopompus to flight, and in the left Polydorus did as much by the Meſſenians, and neither Party would give the chace: Euphaes, for that he thought he had already done enough; and Polydorus, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were deterred from it through their ignorance of the place, being in an enemie's Countrey: ſo that fighting on even terms they were parted by the night. The day following neither ſide would fight, nor had the confidence to erect a Trophee; but made truce ſo long as to bury their dead.

32. After this Battel none other ſucceeded for ſeveral years. The Meſſenians, for that their Countrey was the ſeat of War, were preſſed with many difficulties.

Their Garriſons had coſt them ſo much money, that now they were rendred unable to pay their Army: their Slaves fled daily to the Lacedæmonians, and a certain Diſeaſe, not much better than the Plague, ſeized upon them; which though not exceeding deadly, yet, jointly with the other difficulties, cauſed great trouble and perturbation. After a ſerious debate concerning the main of their Affairs, it was reſolved, that moſt of the Towns lying upon the Sea ſhould be diſmantled as far remote, and Ithome, a Mountain as large as any within the Iſthmus, (whereupon ſtood a Town more ancient than great) was to be fortified, becauſe of the natural ſtrength thereof. When they had here ſettled themſelves, they ſent to Delphos to enquire concerning the event of the War. The Oracle (agreeable to the diſpoſition of the Enemy of mankind) required a Virgin of the ſtock of Æpytus to be ſacrificed; whereupon all that belonged to that Family were ſubjected to the lot, and the Daughter of one Lyciſcus was taken. She being to be offered, the Sooth-ſayer forbade it, alleging that ſhe was not the Daughter of Lyciſcus, but brought in under-hand by his Wiſe that was barren: and whilſt he was thus perſuading the people, Lyciſcus fled away with her to Sparta. All hereat exceedingly ſtartled, Ariſtodemus, another of that Family, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young man there preſent that was in love with her, and ſhortly intended marriage, ſtifly impugned it, and contended ſhe was not in her Father's power, becauſe betrothed to himſelf. Not herewith prevailing, he affirmed he had lien with her, and that ſhe was with Child. Whereat Ariſtodemus was ſo inraged, that he killed her with his own hand, and, ripping up her belly, ſhewed plainly to all that there was no ſuch matter. Yet the Sooth-ſayer avouched her Death could not at all profit the State, and commanded ſome other to be offered: but Euphaes perſuaded the People that the Oracle was already ſatisfied, and required not the Life of any other.

Ariſtodemus killeth his Daughter.

A. M. 3269.
Olymp. 11. an. 1.
V. C. 18.
Achazi 8.

The Lacedæmonians make War upon the Argives.

Pauſan. in Laconicis & Argolicis; Plutarc. in Parallelis; & Herod. lib. 1. Suidas in voce Othryades.

33. The reſt which the Lacedæmonians had in this intervall was preſently turned into action with the Argives about Thyrea, a Town ſituate in the borders of both Commonwealths.. This fell out in the reign of Theopompus, whereat yet he was not preſent, partly by reaſon of his old age, and alſo for grief taken at the death of his ſon Archidamus. The controverſie was brought before the Amphyctiones, who ordered that 300 on each ſide ſhould decide it. Of the Argives two perſons ſurvived the Combat; but of the Spartan party onely one, by name Othryades, as good as many, who lived no longer than to make uſe of broken Spears in ſtead of Crutches to ſuſtain his body, then to gather together the Targets of the ſlain, and to erect a Trophee therewith, whereon he made an inſcription with his own bloud. Becauſe of this Trophee the Amphyctiones decreed the Town to the Lacedæmonians; but the Argives, for that two of their party ſurvived, afterwards renewed the War to their own dammage.

That with the Meſſenians renewed.

Pauſanias in Meſſenicis.

34. The offering up of Ariſtodemus his Daughter ſeemed to the Meſſenians to have done ſome good, the affairs of Lacedæmon appearing to be in a declining poſture, and that State ſlower in its Enterpriſes than formerly. But in the ſixth year after the departure of Lyciſcus, and the eighth from their removal to Ithome, the War was again renewed againſt them. Another Battel was fought, but with the ſame ſucceſs as formerly. In the midſt of the Fight was the hotteſt conteſt, the moſt valiant on both ſides betaking themſelves thither; where Euphaes alſo, venturing farther than either ſtood with his dignity or ſafety, againſt Theopompus, received many and deadly wounds. Herewith being ſo weakned that he fell, the Lacedæmonians ſtrove to take him, and a great conflict enſued; but one Amander ſo far reſiſting as to loſe his own Life in the quarrel, Euphaes was brought off, and died a few days after, having reigned thirteen years, all which time he ſpent in the War againſt the Lacedæmonians. He dying Childleſs, a great controverſie aroſe about the Succeſſion, for that ſeveral of the Family of Æpytus ſtood for the Kingdom, amongſt whom was Ariſtodemus, who, though it was objected that, having polluted his hands in the Bloud of his Daughter, he was not capable, was preferred before all others through the favour of the People. After his Election he ſent Preſents to the chief of the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, whom he engaged to his Party. Aſſiſted by ſome Arcadians he made incurſions, and the Lacedæmonians did the ſame, proceeding to no greater extremity: but at length, in his fifth year, another Battel was fought near to Ithome, wherein the Meſſenians were aſſiſted by the three States ere now mentioned, and the Spartans by no other Peloponneſians than thoſe of Corinth. The diſpute was very ſharp, and the event doubtfull, till the Meſſenians, having the upper ground, at laſt put their enemies to flight, of whom it is credible, as Pauſanias onely writeth, that many miſcarried.

A. M. 3274.
Olymp. 12. an. 2.
V. C. 23.
Achazi 13.

35. The Lacedæmonians, after this, almoſt deſpairing of ſucceſs, both Parties ſent to enquire at Delphos concerning the iſſue of the War. The Meſſenians received an anſwer ſo ambiguous as could not be interpreted: that to the Spartans plainly ſignified, that as Creſphontes had obtained Meſſene by a wile in ordering the Lots, ſo by wiles it was to be recovered. Several then they invented, but all were diſcovered, by the vigilancy and cunning of Ariſtodemus. But the twentieth year of the War approaching, the Affairs of the Meſſenians began exceedingly to relapſe, and the Oracle, again conſulted, anſwered, that whoſoever could firſt dedicate a hundred Treſtles (or Three-footed ſtools) to Jupiter of Ithome ſhould obtain Meſſene. The Meſſenians, having the Temple within themſelves, doubted not but to be able to doe this firſt: yet the Anſwer being brought to Lacedæmon, one OEbalus, a crafty man there, made a hundred of Clay, and while the Meſſenians were buſie about others of Wood, (for their purſes were not able to reach to Braſs) diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a Fowler, and carried them into the Temple. This ſtruck the Meſſenians with great conſternation, who were ſtreightly beſieged by this time, and hindred from getting in any Proviſions. Ariſtodemus was alſo tormented with ſad Dreams about his Daughter, whereat ſorely moved, and exceedingly afflicted with conſideration that he ſhould kill his Child for his Countrey's good, which notwithſtanding was deſperate, he ſlew himſelf at her Monument.

36. With this ſad Accident the Meſſenians were more grievouſly ſtruck, and ſo deſpaired as to have thoughts of making their applications to the Lacedæmonians; but as yet not able to ſtoop, they made no Overtures, though almoſt oppreſſed with Famine: they choſe them Captains in the room of Ariſtodemus, preparing to ſally out, and fight it out to the laſt man for their lives and fortunes. Yet at length diſtruſting their ability to doe any thing that way, and conſidering themſelves urged hard with the want of all neceſſaries, they left Ithome, and yielded in the fifth month after the death of Ariſtodemus, the twenty eighth year of the War being almoſt finiſhed, in the firſt of the fourteenth Olympiad, the Medontidæ at Athens yet enjoying the Power for ten years, in the days of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the time of the deportation of the ten Tribes. The Conquerors utterly demoliſhed Ithome, and, having gotten eaſily the other Towns of Meſſenia into their power, impoſed what Laws they pleaſed upon the Inhabitants, who were commanded to till their grounds, and ſend one half of the profits unto Sparta; to bind themſelves by Oath, to remain in perpetual Fealty to the Lacedæmonians, and both men and women, when the Kings and Nobles of Sparta died, to attend upon their Funerals in mourning weeds: which things were injoyned them upon pain of Death. As many as would not endure thoſe hard Conditions, and had hope of entertainment with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, went thither, and ſuch as were Prieſts, to Eleuſine: all the reſt of the Multitude departed every one to his own ſeat: and ſo the firſt Meſſenian War ended.

The end of the firſt Meſſenian War.

A. M. 3282.
Olymp. 14. an 2.
V. C. 31.
Ezech. 8.

37. Whilſt the Lacedæmonians were abroad, and lay under the obligation of their Oath, never to return till the War ſhould be finiſhed, fearing, either through the ſuggeſtion of their Wives, or their own recollection, that their Poſterity might fail, they choſe out of their luſtieſt young men fifty in number, who, coming out under age, were not liable to the Oath, and ſent them to Sparta, to lie with their Wives and Virgins (or the Virgins onely) in a promiſcuous manner, whence aroſe a generation called Partheniæ, as the Sons of Virgins. But after that the War was finiſhed, and the Spartans returned home, they looked upon them as a ſpurious brood, and as ſuch contemned them; which theſe Youths apprehending, and how they could not inherit any thing in the Commonwealth, entred into conſpiracy with the Helots, and made one Philanthus their Captain, whoſe Father Aracus had given the advice to ſend the yong men to the Virgins. This Plot being revealed by ſome of the Slaves, they were expelled, and forced to ſeek out new ſeats; ſo that departing into Italy, they drove out the Barbarians and Cretians, who inhabited about Tarentum, and ſeizing upon that Place, therein planted themſelves.

Juſtin. ex Trogo, lib. 3.

The Partheniæ.

Lege Strabon l. 6. p. 278, 279, 280, 281.

The ſecond Meſſenian War.

38. The Meſſenians thus brought under the yoak, endured it, though with much repining, for 39 years; but then, beſides their moſt hard and ſervile condition, wearied with the inſolency of the Spartans, in the fourth year of the 23. Olympiad, a little after the nine Annual Archons were conſtituted at Athens, in the fortieth after the taking of Ithome, they revolted, at the inſtigation of Ariſtomenes eſpecially, a young man of a moſt active and courageous ſpirit, who had before-hand ſolicited for aſſiſtance the Arcadians and Argives, now being jealous of the power of the Lacedæmonians, and at open enmity with them. At this time Anaxander, the Nephew of Polydorus by his Son Eurycrates, and Anaxidamus the ~~Son of Zeuxi-~~

Pauſan. in Meſſenicis.
A. M. 3310.
V. C. 69
Manaſſis 17.

~~damus~~ Grand=

Grand-ſon to Theopompus, by his Son Archidamus, who died ere he came to reign, were Kings at Sparta.

39. Ariſtomenes managed the whole buſineſs for the Meſſenians, being of extraordinary abilities both of body and mind. He firſt ingaged with the Spartans at Deræ, a Village of Meſſenia, where he is ſaid to have behaved himſelf above the capacity of a man, and ſeeing he was of the Family of Æpytus, was choſen King by the People. Refuſing this Title, he was created General, with abſolute Authority; and afterwards, at the Monument of the Boar, (a place in Meſſenia, where Hercules made a League with the Sons of Nileus) by the aſſiſtance of the Arcadians, Argives, Sicyonians and Eleans, overthrew the Lacedæmonians, terrifying all whereever he came. In the purſuit he loſt his Target, which whilſt he was ſeeking, they had opportunity to eſcape. After this, he took and plundred a Town of Laconia, named Pharæ, whence retreating with much Booty, he alſo overthrew Anaxander the King, who purſued him; and having in his intentions to march againſt Sparta it ſelf, is ſaid to have been deterred from it by the Apparitions of Helena and her two Brothers, Caſtor and Pollux.

40. The Lacedæmonians, much ſtartled at this Loſs, thought to have put a period to the War, but were again incouraged by the Verſes of Tyrtæus, who perſuaded them to fill up their Army with the Helots. A year or two before this, ſending to conſult the Oracle about the War, they had anſwer, That they muſt ſend to Athens for a Counſellor. The Athenians were unwilling in the leaſt to promote their Affairs, being jealous of their growing Power: yet fearing alſo to doe any thing croſs to the Oracle, they ſent to them this Tyrtæus, a School-maſter, lame on his feet, and not very ſound in his brain. In the third year of the War, another Battel was fought, at a place called the Great Ditch, wherein the Meſſenians having no other Aſſociates than their Friends of Arcadia, theſe alſo failed them at this time, through the Treachery of their Captain; ſo that, left to themſelves, and compaſſed in by their Enemies, moſt of them were ſlain, though Ariſtomenes omitted nothing worthy of a General, or common Souldier. Having gathered up the reliques of his Army, he perſuaded the people to quit all in-land Towns, and, fortifying onely Pylus and Methone upon the Sea, to ſecure themſelves in the Hill Ira. Here they were preſently beſieged, and iſſuing out for Booty, made Depredations both in Laconia and their own Countrey; which drew out an Edict from the Lacedæmonian State, that the Borders of both Countries ſhould, during the War, be left deſolate: whereupon a Dearth enſued at Sparta, and thence a Sedition, which Tyrtæus with his Poetry had work enough to ſuppreſs.

Pauſanias in Meſſenicis.

41. Ariſtomenes in the mean time, like ſome fierce and greedy Lion, with 300 choice men at his heels, to the great fear of all men, ranged up and down, and made continual Excurſions into the Enemie's Countrey. At length he was taken and carried to Sparta, where condemned to death, he was thrown into a deep Dungeon, the ordinary way of puniſhing capital Offenders. Coming ſafe to the bottom, though others were killed by the fall, he perceived a Fox feeding upon ſome dead Carkaſes; whereat conſidering that this creature muſt have ſome hole to creep in at, he caught it by the tail, and defending himſelf from its teeth by the other hand, it led him to the hole, which being but little, he ſo inlarged with his hands, as, contrary to the belief and expectation of all men, he returned ſafe to his Companions. Preſently after his return, he fell upon the Camp of the Corinthians, who aſſiſted the Spartans in the Siege, and lay careleſly, without any watch, and killing the Captains, plundered their Tents. Not long after a Truce was made for forty days, during which, he wandring abroad too careleſly, was entrapped by ſome Cretians, who aſſiſted alſo in the Siege, and being bound with the thongs of their Quivers, was carried into a Village, to the houſe of a certain Widow. This Woman, underſtanding who he was, caſt in her head how to deliver him: which ſhe effected, by giving his Keepers ſo much drink, that they falling aſleep, with one of their daggers he cut the thongs. Being looſed, he ſtabbed the Cretians, and eſcaped: and afterwards, to requite the Woman's kindneſs, married her to his Son Gorgus.

42. Ten years the Siege of Ira continued, the Meſſenians enjoying the grounds at the foot of the Mountain, as far as the River Neda, and thereby being better provided for to hold out. But in the eleventh, when Ariſtomenes was rendred by a wound incapable of taking ſuch care about the Watch as he had been wont, in a rainy and dark night the Sentinels, ſecure of him, betook themſelves to their own homes. Amongſt thoſe there was one, whoſe Wife in his abſence entertained a certain Herdſ-man as a Lover, who belonged to Emperamus, a Lacedæmonian, now at the Siege. He being hid by his Paramour upon her Husband's coming, heard the man tell the Story, how he and his fellows had forſaken their charge, and ſlipping away, therewith acquainted his Maſter. Both the Spartan Kings were abſent at this time; but Emperamus, unwilling to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity, led the Army thither, and got into the Fortreſs before he was diſcovered. When the matter was perceived, a great conteſt there was betwixt the parties; but Ariſtomenes ſeeing there was no hope of doing any good,and willing to ſave what was left of the afflicted Meſſenians, obtained liberty to depart: and ſo Ira being taken, the War ended, after it had laſted ſixteen years, in the firſt of the 28. Olympiad, when Autoſthenes was Archon at Athens, A.M. 3337.

The end of the ſecond War.

A. M. 3337.
Ol. 28. an. 1.
V. C. 86.
Manaſſis 34.

43. When the Arcadians underſtood of the taking of Ira, they deſired of Ariſtocrates their King to be led out, either to reſtore their friends, or die with them. But he having formerly betraied them at the great Ditch, was now alſo corrupted with money, and refuſed to doe it, alleging there was none left to whom they could give aſſiſtance. Yet when it was clearly known that they were alive,they ſent ſome before to comfort them, then met them with Cloaths and Meat, as far as the Hill Lycæus, and kindly invited them to live amongſt them. Ariſtomenes boyling with hatred and revenge againſt the Lacedæmonians, choſe out of the Company 500 men, whom he knew to be no whit deſirous to outlive the fortune of their Countrey, and asked them in the hearing of Ariſtocrates (not knowing any thing of his treachery) and the Arcadians, whether they would venture their lives with him. Upon their anſwer that they would, he acquainted them with his deſign, to march ſtraight for Sparta, which if he could ſurprize, now that all its ſtrength was employed in the plunder of Meſſenia, then ſhould he make an even exchange with the Lacedæmonians; but if not, death would be the worſt that could happen. Beſides the Meſſenians, 300 Arcadians gave their names to this Expedition; but being ſtayed by reaſon that the entralls of the Beaſt were not propitious, Ariſtocrates had time to give notice of the deſign to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Treachery was diſcovered after the return of the Meſſenger by ſome that ſuſpected it, and the Letter ſent back from Anaxander was read in the Aſſembly of the Arcadians, wherein thanks was given to Ariſtocrates, as well for the help he afforded the Lacedæmonians at the great Ditch, as for this timely notice. Hereat the multitude was ſo inraged, as they ſtoned him out of hand, caſt him out unburied, and erected a Monument to his infamy, with this note, that Perjury cannot eſcape God. They exhorted alſo the Meſſenians to throw Stones at him,who looked upon Ariſtomenes, as expecting directions from him; but he onely fixed his eyes on the ground and wept.

Ariſtocrates puniſhed for his treachery.

44. The Meſſenians deſired of Ariſtomenes to lead them out to ſeek ſome new place to inhabit; but he denied it, reſolving to ſpend his days in doing as much miſchief as he could to the Lacedæmonians: onely his Sons Gorgus and Manticlus he offered to them. Thoſe that had kept Pylus and Methone, with others which lived on the Sea-coaſts, went by Ship to Cyllene, the Haven of the Eleans, to ſeek out the reſt. The following Spring ſeveral places being propoſed to go to, Anaxilus, who then reigned at Rhegium, and was deſcended of one Alcidamidas a Meſſenian, (that, after the taking of Ithome in the former War, betook himſelf thither) ſent ſome to convoy them into Italy. After their arrival, he told them he had continual War with the Zanclæans, a people of Sicilie, that inhabited a fruitfull and pleaſant Soil, which if they would help him to conquer, he would put it into their hands. He then beſieged them by Sea, and the Meſſenians by Land; whereby being diſtreſſed, and the greater part of the Wall now caſt down, they fled to the Altars of their Gods. Anaxilus would have had them ſlain, and their Wives and Children ſold; but the others, unwilling to commit ſuch cruelty againſt any Greeks, (for ſuch they were, the Town being firſt inhabited by Rovers, and afterwards by others from ſeveral parts of Greece) gave them liberty to continue, and incorporating themſelves into their body, changed the name of the place from Zancle into Meſſene. Ariſtomenes for ſome time continuing in Greece, married his Daughters very honourably, whereof Demagetus, Prince of Rhodes at that time, took the youngeſt to Wife, having been adviſed by the Oracle to make choice of that man's Daughter who was the beſt in all Greece. He carried his Daughter to Rhodes, whence he intended to go to Ardys the Son of Gyges, then reigning in Lydia, and thence to Ecbatane, to Phraortes King of the Medes; but death prevented him, and he finiſhed his days in that Iſland, being found in the number of thoſe few that lived and died in great glory.

The Meſſenians paſs into Sicily.

A. M. 3339.
Ol. 28. an. 3.
V. C. 88
Manaſſis 36.

45. Meſſenia thus ſubdued by the Lacedæmonians was tilled by the common

Such as continued in Meſſenia made Slaves.

Slaves, amongſt whom ſuch of the Inhabitants as there ſtill remained were inrolled, and became a Proverb for their hard Bondage; being worſe uſed than any, becauſe, as ſome think, the War was carried on with them, not for glory and Empire, but for life and ſafety; not with a contention which People ſhould rule, but whether ſhould be preſerved. The acceſſion of this Countrey to their Demeſnes very much increaſed the power of Lacedæmon, and ſo they held it for two hundred years, till an opportunity was offered for the old Inhabitants, in deſpite of them, to return. This thing being brought to paſs long after, muſt be referred to another place: as alſo (becauſe what farther happened betwixt the Arcadians, Argives, and this Commonwealth, is not very material) whatſoever we have farther to obſerve concerning the Lacedæmonians.

SECT. VI.

The moſt antient Kingdom of Corinth.

Corinth firſt called Ephyra, and built by Siſyphus.

Pauſan. in Corinthiacis.

Euſeb. in Chron. A. M. 2486.

1. THis City, ſeated in the Iſthmus of Peloponneſus, had firſt the name of Ephyra, and was built by Siſyphus (whoſe poſterity reigned here ſome 428 years) in the days of Cecrops, the firſt King of Athens, and a little before Deucalion's Floud, about the 2486. year of the World. He married Merope, the Daughter of Atlas, by which he had four Sons, Glaucus, Ornytion, Therſander, and Almus; was accounted a very wiſe and prudent man, feigned alſo to have returned to life again, that he might chaſtiſe his Wife for not having performed what was due to his memory. After he was once got up, he would not return of a long time to Hell; where he is alſo ſaid by the Poets to rowl a great Stone up an Hill, which continually tumbling down again keepeth him in conſtant toil; having this puniſhment inflicted on him for diſcovering to Aſopus his Daughter ſtoln away by Jupiter. Glaucus his eldeſt Son was the Father of Bellerophon, and firſt celebrated Games in the Iſthmus. Ornytion begat Phocus, who led a Colony into, and gave name to the Countrey called Phocis after him: and Thoas, a younger Son, who continued at Corinth. Therſander had two Sons, Coronus and Haliartus, who being adopted by Athamas their Uncle on the Father's ſide, then reigning in Bœotia, (after he had loſt his own two Sons Phryxus and Helles, and his Daughter Ino with her two Sons) gave name to two places in that Countrey. Almus, (called otherwiſe Halmus and Olmus) the youngeſt Son of Siſyphus, had part of the Countrey of the Orchomenians beſtowed on him by Eteocles the King: and from him Almon, or Olmon, a place in Bœotia, was ſo named.

Bellerophontes.

Apollodorus. A. M. 2660.

2. Bellerophontes, having committed man-ſlaughter at Corinth, was forced to fly thence, and went to Prætus King of the Argives, whoſe Wife Sthenobæa enamoured of his beauty tempted him to lie with her; but he had the modeſty to deny her, wherewith ſhe was ſo incenſed as to accuſe him to her Husband of an intended Rape. Prætus taking it in great diſdain to be ſo uſed by his Gueſt, yet would not kill him, but ſent him to Iolas, King of Lycia, his Wive's Father, with Letters, wherein he deſired him to make the bearer away. To fulfill his requeſt, Iolas firſt cauſed him to fight with the Chimæra, a Monſter that vomited fire, not doubting of his deſtruction thereby; but he mounting the Horſe Pegaſus, ſlew the Monſter. After this he ſent him againſt the Solymi and Amazons, whom he conquered: then cauſed ſome of the ſtrongeſt young men he could procure to ly in ambuſh, and fall on him; whom alſo he having ſlain, Iolas, admiring his valour, gave him his Daughter Philonoe to Wife, and when he died, left him his Succeſſor in the Kingdom of Lycia. Concerning this Chimæra, what ſhould be meant thereby is ſcarcely diſcernable. (a) Some have underſtood by it a Mountain in Lycia, the top whereof vomited forth fire, the middle part had paſtures full of Goats, and the foot or bottom abounded with Serpents. 'Tis conceived he might make this Mountain habitable, and thence be ſaid to have ſlain the Chimæra, which had a mouth like a Lion, middle parts as a Goat, and the hinder parts like a Dragon. (b) Others again ſay that Bellerophontes gave occaſion to this Fable by killing one Chimærus a Sea-Captain, who infeſted the Lycians with Piracy: the ſtory being thence raiſed, for that Chimærus his Ship had a Lion painted on the Prow, and a Dragon on the

The Chimæra.

(a) Servius in Virgil. Æneid. lib. 6.

(b) Plutarch. de Virtutibus mulierum.

Deck,

(c) Homer. Il. 3. Euſt. & Iſac. in Lycoph. p. 6.

(d) Lege Bocharti Canaan, lib. 1. c. 6.

Deck; and Bellerophon's Veſſel, called Pegaſus, might have a winged Horſe for its ſign. A third (c) ſort think three kinds of Enemies to be ſignified by this Monſter; the Solymi, Amazons, and Lycians; the former being for their valour compared to a Lion, the next for their nimbleneſs in climbing of Rocks to a Goat, and the laſt to a Dragon for their craftineſs in Ambuſhes. Laſtly, a (d) modern and moſt learned Writer judgeth the three Gods of the Solymi, whom Bellerophon overthrew, to have been painted in their Enſigns; reſembling a Lion, Goat, and Dragon, like the three Heads of the Monſter, as 'tis deſcribed by Heſiod.

Aletes.

Pauſan. ut prius.

Vide Simſonium ad A. M. 2914.

Διὸς Κόρινθος.

Euſeb. in Chronico, & Exerpta Diodori per Georgium Monach. inter l. 5. & 10.

* A. M. 3048.

The Bacchiadæ.

3. Bellerophontes being driven from Corinth, Thoas the Son of Ornytion obtained the Kingdom, whom ſucceeded Demophon his Son, then followed Propodas; whoſe two Sons Doridas and Hyanthidas reigning both together, Aletes the Son of Hippotes (Son to Antiochus, and Nephew to Hercules) came down and ſubdued the Kingdom. The Heraclidæ having, before this, obtained Peloponneſus, reſerved this part for him, who conſulting the Oracle of Jupiter at Dodona, was anſwered, that he ſhould then obtain it, when a Clod of earth ſhould be given him. At his return this was fulfilled; for begging ſome meat of an Herdſman, he, having nothing to give him, offered him a Clod, which he gladly accepted, ſaying, Aletes accepteth of a Clod: which became a Proverb. Who gave the name of Corinth to the City is uncertain; but however, Aletes, out of gratitude to the Oracle, named it Corinth of Jupiter: which gave occaſion to the multitude to believe that Corinth, the King that built it, was the Son of Jupiter; wherein they ſo gloried, and ſo often vaunted of it, that nothing became more ridiculous, and they were laughed at for it throughout Greece. After Aletes, the eldeſt of the Family ſucceeded for ſeveral generations. The firſt was Ixion, who reigned 37 years; the next Agilaus, who ruled as many; Prumnis 35, and * Bacchis full ſo many, who was ſo famous, that whereas he and all his Anceſtors were called Heraclidæ, his Succeſſors from him had the name of Bacchiadæ. The firſt after him was Agelas, who governed thirty years; the next Eudemus, who reigned 25: then came Ariſtomedes, who having ruled 35, left a Child behind him, which his Brother Algemon, whom he had appointed Guardian, depoſed, and held the Kingdom himſelf ſixteen years. After him followed Alexander for 25, whom Teleſtes the Son of Ariſtomedes ſlew, and obtained his Father's Kingdom, which he held twelve years. He was alſo ſlain by Arieus and Perantas his Kinſmen, and then Automenes reigned one year, which being expired, the Bacchiadæ, more than 200 in number, ſeized on the Kingdom, and governed in common; onely every year they created a Prytanis out of their own Body to be in the room of a King, and ſo they continued 90 years in the way of an Ariſtocracy.

Colonies of the Corinthians.

A. M. 3272. Olymp. 11. an. 4. V. C. 21. Achan. 11.

4. During this term, in the fourth year of the eleventh Olympiad, the Corinthians, being powerfull at Sea, ſent out a Colony into the Iſland of Sicily under conduct of Archias, one of the Heraclidæ, which, expelling the Siculi out of that quarter, founded the City Syracuſæ. More people flocking thither out of Peloponneſus, this City grew and increaſed exceedingly; ſo that it became not onely the principal of all in Sicily, but the greateſt and moſt beautifull of all Greece, as Cicero witneſſeth, and in its due place will be farther diſcovered. Much about the ſame time was there another Colony ſent into the Iſland Phæacus, lying nigh to Epirus, at a little diſtance from the Continent, conducted thither by Cherſicrates another of the poſterity of Hercules. Homer in his Odyſſ. maketh this Iſland inhabited in the Trojan times, by the Phæacians a moſt noble People, over whom reigned Alcinoüs the Son of Nauſithoüs, who received Ulyſſes after his long Wandrings, and helped him in his journey home to Ithaca. He mentioneth his Royal ſeat, called Scheria, (which Pliny from him affirmeth alſo to have been the name of the Iſland, as well as Phæacia) and ſaith, the Inhabitants were much given to Navigation, and moſt ſkilfull therein. In the ſoil of this Scheria, the old Inhabitants being expelled, this new Colony planted it ſelf, which taking the name of Corcyra, the whole Iſland came thence to be ſo called. The City, much befriended by the commodiouſneſs of the Haven, and the conveniency of the place for Sea-matters, grew in a ſhort time to be very conſiderable; ſo that it founded of it ſelf two Cities, viz. that of Epidamnus, as we have it from Thucydides, (by the Romans called Dyrrachium) and Apollonia, as Strabo writeth; both of them ſeated in that part of Illyricum inhabited by the Taulantians. The form of this Commonwealth was (agreeable to the conſtitution of all Colonies) like to that of Corinth the Metropolis, which then was governed by the Bacchiadæ in an Oligarchicall way. When Corinth was afflicted by Tyrants, Corcyra felt alſo their influence upon its infancy; but at length it grew to that height, as to renounce ſuch obedience as the other challenged, whence great and tedious Commotions were produced in Greece.

5. The Bacchiadæ neither communicated the Government nor Marriage to any other perſon than of their own family, till one of their Women being lame, and upon that account deſpiſed by them all of her own ſtock, had thereby an occaſion given to break the cuſtom. She (named Labda) married Eetion, (the Son of Echecrates, and Nephew to Antaſſus of the Petrean Tribe) who, having no Children by her, or any other, went to Delphos, and enquired of the Oracle concerning iſſue. He received an anſwer to this effect, That he ſhould have a Son, who like a Stone would fall upon the Oligarchy, and breaking it in pieces, amend the State of Corinth. This coming to the ears of the Bacchiadæ, who had an Oracle before much to the ſame purpoſe, though under general terms, they reſolved to hold their peace, and kill Eetion's Child as ſoon as it ſhould be born. And as ſoon as his Wiſe was delivered, they ſent ten of their Company to deſtroy it, whom the Mother preſented with a ſight of the Babe, thinking they had come to congratulate her Husband about its birth. They had agreed amongſt themſelves, that whoſoever firſt came at the Infant ſhould knock out his Brains: but the Child ſmiling in his face who firſt took it in his Arms, he was ſo moved with compaſſion, that he would not kill it, but delivered it to one of his fellows, who touched with the ſame compaſſion gave it to another, till it paſſed through all their hands unhurt. Being gone out, and ſtanding at the door, they blamed one another exceedingly, eſpecially the firſt, whoſe part it was to kill it, and in they returned now to doe the deed. But the Mother, hearing their diſcourſe, hid the Infant under a Buſhell, or ſuch a like inſtrument of meaſuring Corn, ſo that not finding it they returned, giving out they had done their errand: and ſo the Child thus preſerved was named Cypſelus, from the meaſure under which he was hid, in the Greek tongue called Cypſele.

Herod. lib. 5. cap. 90. &c.

Cypſelus.

Κυψέλη.

6. When he was come to man's eſtate, relying upon another Oracle (whereby he was plainly bidden to be King of Corinth, and his Children after him, but not his Nephews) he invaded the Tyranny, which to eſtabliſh, many he deprived of their eſtates, but many more of their lives. He firſt lulled the people aſleep with good language, and thereby getting all into his hands, made himſelf Lord of the City. His power he preſerved by removing thoſe out of the way whom it moſt concerned him; but once eſtabliſhed he grew exceeding mild and fair, with good words, and no ill deeds, drawing the people into ſuch a reſpect of him, that all his time he ſtood not in need of any Guard: a rare thing in men of his condition, which Gelo at Syracuſe onely imitated. This change happened at Corinth in the ſecond year of the 31. Olympiad, in the days of Phraortes, King of the Medes, and Ardys Grandfather to Crœſus, King of Lydia, 20 years after the ſecond Meſſenian War, and 30 after the nine Annual Archons were eſtabliſhed at Athens, A. M. 3350. Upon his ſeizing the power, Demaratus, a man eminent amongſt the Bacchiadæ, and very rich, fled into Italy, and ſeated himſelf in Hetruria, where, of a Woman of that Countrey, he begat two Sons, Aruns and Lucumon, the latter whereof became King of Rome, by the name of Tarquinius.

A. M. 3350.

Conſule Ariſt. Polit. l. 2. c. 12.

A. M. 3350. Dionyſ. Halicarn. & Livius l. 1.

7. Cypſelus having enjoyed the Principality of Corinth and Corcyra the ſpace of thirty years, then died, and left it to his Son Periander. He was much unlike his Father, of a cruel diſpoſition, (if we believe Ariſtotle rather than Soſicles in Herodotus) inſomuch as not truſting the good will of his People, he got a Guard of 300 men about him, and would rather be feared than loved of his Subjects; yet being hardy and warlike, he held the power longer than he. Herodotus out of Soſicles relateth, that at firſt he was very mild and courteous, till, by acquaintance with Thraſybulus the Tyrant of Miletus, he altered his humour: for ſending to him for his advice how he might beſt order his affairs in Government, he returned no anſwer to the Meſſenger, but carrying him out into a plot of Corn, fell a-plucking off the talleſt and moſt eminent Ears, till he had well-nigh marred the whole plot. The Meſſenger returning, told Periander what he had ſeen; who eaſily gueſſed, that the moſt eminent and powerfull Citizens were to be removed out of the way. But * Ariſtotle maketh him the Author of this Counſel to Thraſybulus. Laërtius ſaith, he grew more cruel after it was known that he lay with his Mother Cratea.

Periander.

Herodotus & Ariſtot.

* Polit. l. 3 c. 9. & l. 5. c. 10.

8. He married Meliſſa the Daughter of Procles (or Patrocles) Tyrant of Epidaurus, on whom he begat Cypſelus and Lycophron, whereof the elder was very blockiſh and ſtupid. At the inſtigation of his Whores he afterwards killed his Wiſe, kicking her when ſhe was great with child, then lay with her when ſhe was dead; dead; and calling together the Corinthian women, as well adorned as poſſible, to celebrate the Feaſt of Juno, cauſed his Guard to ſtrip them all naked, and made a parentation to Meliſſa of all their cloaths and ornaments. Lycophron, his youngeſt Son, who onely was capable of the Government, moved by Procles his Grand-father, grew exceeding froward and refractory becauſe of his Mother's death; inſomuch that, differences and diſtaſts increaſing, Periander baniſhed him firſt his houſe, then forbad all his Subjects to ſpeak to or comfort him, and at length forced him into Corcyra. But after ſome years growing old, infirm, and unfit for buſineſs, he ſent for him home, offering to paſs over all to him: but by no arguments or intreaties could he move him to return, till he offered to change places, and deveſt himſelf of all Power. Now when this was agreed on, the Corcyræans, fearing above all things to have Periander come amongſt them, to prevent it, killed the young man. Periander, to be revenged, took away from them 300 of their choiceſt Boys, which he ſent to Halyattes, King of Lydia, his Friend and Ally, to be gelded: but they being driven upon the Iſland Samus, the Inhabitants took ſuch pity both on them and their relations, as to ſend them home ſafe, and diſappointed the Tyrant. This ſo vexed him, now almoſt eighty years old, that he died of grief, though by ſome he be reckoned amongſt the ſeven Wiſe men of Greece. Suidas out of moſt ancient Authors delivereth this Character of him; That he was an harſh and cruel Tyrant, very martial, ſcarcely being ever out of War, and very powerfull at Sea, having ſo convenient Havens both upon the Ionian and Ægæan Gulfs. He reigned nigh forty years, and died in the fourth of the forty eighth Olympiad, ſeven after the eſtabliſhment of Solon's Laws, A. M. 3420. A. M. 3420. Olymp. 48. an. 4. V. C. 169. Nabuch. 24.

Laërtius in vita Periandri, & Herod. ut ſuprà.

Pſammetichus. 9. Periander being dead, his Tyranny as it were tottered for three years and ſome ſix months, during which time Pſammetichus the Son of Gordias, Brother to Periander, or rather ſomething a-kin to him, held it; as appeareth by (e) Ariſtotle, who onely hath preſerved his name to us from utter oblivion. After his removal the power of One man was laid aſide, and the People put themſelves into a Free State, which continued as long as the Liberty of Greece it ſelf. The form thereof is not deſcribed to us by any ancient Author; onely this we know from (f) Plutarch, that it was inclining more to Oligarchy than that of Syracuſe, the power of the Multitude being more bounded. Yet, for certain, the Government was Popular, things of greateſt conſequence never being reſolved on without the conſent and decree of the People, (which kept thoſe of higheſt concernment in its own power;) and, if any other in the World, was a friend to Antimonarchical liberty, and an utter enemy to Monarchy, whereever it was found in Greece. For this City undertook many times great Wars for this very cauſe, and not out of any ambitious deſign, as is clear in the caſe of the Syracuſians, and others; ſo that a Captain out of it was moſt deſirable upon ſuch an occaſion; as may hereafter be diſcovered.

(e) Politic. l. 5. c. 12.

(f) In Timoleonte & Dione.

SECT. VII.

The ancient Kingdom of Thebes.

Calydnus. Ogyges. 1. BOEotia had on the Weſt Phocis, on the Eaſt the Eubœan Sea, on the North the Eaſtern Locri, and on the South Attica and Megaris. The chief Seat and Metropolis of this Countrey was Thebes, the Builder of which is not certainly known. Calydnus is reported firſt to have reigned here; whence by a Poet of Chalcis it is called the Tower of Calydnus; and in Heſychius, Calydnæan is the ſame with Ancient. After him was Ogyges, or Ogygus, from whom Thebes by the Poets is called Ogygian, and that great Ogygian Deluge is named; which is ſaid to have happened in his time, 1020 years before the firſt Olympiad, in the days of Phoroneus King of Argos, (as Africanus gathereth) and ſo overwhelmed all the region of Attica, that it made it unhabitable for 200 years, as Pererius noteth. Pauſanias writeth, that he was King of the Ectenæ, the firſt Inhabitants of Thebaïs, and that from his Son, Eleuſine, a famous Town in Attica, took both Original and name, as ſome were of opinion. Theſe Ectenæ are reported to have been conſumed by Peſtilence, whom ſucceeded the Hyantes and Aonæ, who continued in A. M. 2244. In Bœoticis & Atticis.

in thoſe parts, together with the Temmices, (who came from Sanium) and the Leleges, till Cadmus, coming to Greece, made himſelf Maſter of this place, in the days of Corax King of Sicyon, and Danaus of Argos, 347 years after the beginning of Ogyges.

Cadmus.

Apollod. lib. 2.

*Diod. l.*4. *p.*183.

Lib. 1. cap. 2.

2. This Cadmus, according to the tradition of the Greeks, was Son to Agenor the Brother of Belus, Uncle to Danaus and Ægyptus, who, coming out of Ægypt into Phœnice ſome 36 years before, on his Wiſe Telphaſſa begat three Sons, Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and a Daughter named Europa. This Europa Jupiter ſtole, and carried over Sea into Crete, in the likeneſs of a Bull, where he begat on her Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpedon. Aſterius King of the Iſland afterwards married her, and, having no Children of his own, adopted her Sons. Herodotus telleth us that ſome Greeks, (Aſterius perhaps, or ſome for him) in revenge for what the Nation had formerly ſuffered from the Aſiaticks in ſtealing away Ino, went to Tyre, and thence ſtole Europa the King's Daughter, bringing her away in a Ship whoſe Enſign was a Bull; whence occaſion was given to feign, that ſhe was carried over upon a Bull's back.

*Diod. l.*4 *p.*147.

Pauſan. lib. 5.
A.M. 2555.

*Strabo l.*9 *p.*401.

*Diod. l.*3. *p.*140.
Lib. 5. pag. 227, 228. Multi alii.

3. Agenor ſent out his three Sons to ſeek their Siſter, charging them never to return without her into Phœnicia. Cadmus ſailed firſt into the Iſland Calliſthe, (lying near Crete) where he left a Colony, and thence into Thaſus, (ſo named from Thaſus one of his Companions, and head of another Colony left here) and at length into Greece, where, in Bœotia, being paſt all hope of finding his Siſter, and conſequently of returning into Phœnicia, by the command of an Oracle he founded Thebes; or re-edifying what was formerly built by Ogyges, a-new laid the foundation of the Caſtle, which, ever after, from him retained the name of Cadméa. The Hyantæ, beaten by his Forces, fled the night following into Phocis; but the Æonæ, upon their ſubmiſſion, were ſuffered to continue and imbodie themſelves amongſt the Phœnicians. Here he married Harmonia the Daughter of Mars and Venus, agreeable to which alliance, the Gods are ſaid to have come down unto Cadméa to the Wedding. Out of Phœnicia he firſt brought Letters into Greece, giving them their peculiar names and characters, fitted for the language of the place, and thence they were called Phœnician; though afterwards Pelaſgian, becauſe the uſe of them was, after they were brought over, firſt made known to the Pelaſgi.

*Idem l.*3. *p.*147.

Apollod.

Polydorus.

4. Of Harmonia Cadmus begot Polydorus his Son, and four Daughters, Semele, Ino, Autonoe, and Agave. On Semele Jupiter enamoured begot Dionyſus, or Bacchus, who found out Wine and Ale, and travelled throughout the then known World, to reduce men to civility. This he did with an Army both of men and women, and after an Expedition of three years returned out of India, firſt triumphing upon an Elephant. Ino was married to Athamas the Son of Æolus, and Grandſon of Hellen, to whom ſhe bore Actæon, that was devoured by his own Dogs. Agave became the Wife of Eetion, to whom ſhe bore Pentheus. After Cadmus had reigned ſome time at Thebes, he was called by the Encheleæ, who had Wars at that time with the Illyrians, and were bidden by the Oracle to ſend for him and Harmonia to be their Captains. He left then the Kingdom of Thebes to his Son Polydorus, and, having ſubdued the Illyrians, reigned over them, and begot another Son called Illyrius, who either gave or took name from that People. The Poets feigned Cadmus and his Wife to have been turned here into Snakes, becauſe they ſeem to have forgot their former civility, and learnt barbariſm.

What the Sidonians ſaid of Cadmus.

5. This is the ſum of what the Greeks have delivered concerning Cadmus. But though they, for their own credit, made him the Son of a King, yet the Sidonians, whoſe Countrey-man he was, denie this, alleging that, being their King's Cook, he fled away with Harmonia, a certain Minſtrel. His time, as it is computed, falleth in with that of Joſhua, ſo that he ſeemeth to have led into Greece a Colony of thoſe Canaanites, or Phœnicians, who were outed of their habitations by the Iſraelites. His Family may be gathered to have been that of the Kadmonites, mentioned by Moſes, who were the ſame with the Hivites, and called Cadmonim, or Orientals, becauſe they poſſeſſed Mount Hermon, the moſt Eaſtern part of Canaan, taken for the Eaſt, as Thabor for the Weſt. Hence came it to paſs that Cadmus his Wife was called Harmonia, or Hermione; and it is apparent why they were feigned to be turned into Snakes, becauſe an Hivite in the Syrian language ſignifieth a Serpent. That he firſt brought Letters into Greece is moſt probable, 1. Becauſe the ancienteſt Greek letters, in moſt things, are like to the old Phœnician, which the Samaritans at this day uſe. 2. Their names are plainly Phœnician, or Hebrew, as may be inſtanced in Alpha, Beta, &c. of which the Greeks were not ignorant, as appeareth out of Varro. For Crates the Philoſopher, diſputing in Greece about ſome points of Grammar, demanded why they ſaid not Alpha Alphatos as well as Gramma Grammatos; to which the Grecians anſwered, that the names were not theirs, but barbarous: and Plutarch rendred this reaſon why Alpha is ſet before the reſt by the Phœnicians, becauſe they called an Oxe by that name. 3. The Greeks kept the ſame order of letters as the Phœnicians did, being moſt ancient, as appeareth by ſome acroſtick Verſes of David and Jeremiah. Cadmus brought over the Rites of Bacchus into Greece, and thereupon is feigned to be Grand-father to him, who lived many Ages before, and indeed was Nimrod. To this City, built or re-edified by him, he gave the name of Thebes, of which name there was a place in Canaan mentioned by the Book of (a) Judges, and by (b) Joſephus alſo written Thebæ, in the plural number; ſo that an end may be put to that controverſie about the original of the word, which betokeneth mud or dirt. But concerning all this Bochartus is to be conſulted, in the firſt Book of that admirable Work intituled Canaan.

(a) Cap. 9. 50.
(b) Antiq. l. 5. cap. 9.

Labdacus.

* A. M. 2601.

Pauſan. in Bœoticis & Corinth.

Laius.

Diod. l. 4. p. 19

6. Polydorus, ſucceeding his Father, married Nyctëis the Daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a Son named Labdacus, whom, dying before he came at age, he * left to the tuition of his Father-in-law. Nycteus had another Daughter, Antiope by name, which Epopeus King of Sicyonia ſtole away, whence a War inſued, wherein both of them received mortal wounds, and Nycteus dying, left the tuition of the young King to his Brother Lycus. After Labdacus came at age, Lycus reſtored faithfully the Kingdom to him: wherefore the King dying alſo not long after, and leaving his Son Laius a Child but of one year old, having experience of his faithfulneſs, committed him to his protection. Afterwards Amphion and Zethus, the Sons of Antiope, invaded Thebaïs in revenge for their Mother's hard uſage and Captivity, ſhe having been taken by Lycus in Sicyon, or delivered up to him by Lamedon King of that City, when he led down thither an Army, at the deſire of his dying Brother, to revenge him upon her and Epopeus, as we before ſhewed. Lycus meeting them in the field was ſlain in battel, Thebes loſt, and the Child Laius had miſcarried, but that ſome well-wiſhers to his Family withdrew him out of the danger, leſt the poſterity of Cadmus ſhould be utterly extinct. Amphion then and Zethus obtained the Kingdom; ſaid by Homer to have built Thebes, which muſt be meant of the lower City diſtinct from Cadméa. Amphion was ſo excellent a Muſician, that he is ſaid to have made Stones to follow him, wherewith he built Towers about the City. He married Niobe, the Daughter of Tantalus, and Siſter to Pelops, who brought him many Children, but boaſting her ſelf more fruitfull then Latona her ſelf, procured the deſtruction of them all. For Apollo was commanded to kill the Boys, and Diana the Girls; whereat ſhe was ſtruck with ſuch ſtupidity, that ſhe is feigned to be turned into a Stone; and Amphion with all his Family at length died of the Peſtilence. Zethus, having his young Son killed at unawares by the Mother, pined away for grief; ſo that both Brothers being dead, and their Families ruined, the Thebans reſtored the Kingdom to Laius the Son of Labdacus.

Apollod.

Diod. l. 4. p. 185.
A. M. 2695.

A. M. 2722.

7. Laius married Jocaſte, the Daughter of Menœceus, but was admoniſhed by the Oracle to beget no Children, becauſe elſe he ſhould be killed by his Son; which puniſhment Pelops had prayed might fall on him for ſtealing his Son Chryſippus, begotten on a Concubine. Notwithſtanding this he had a Son, but as ſoon as he was born he thruſt his Feet in Iron fetters, and expoſed him as a prey to wild Beaſts. Yet, either by thoſe that had this charge, or others that found him, he was carried to Polybus, King of Corinth, who cauſed his Feet to be healed, (from the Swelling of which he had the name of OEdipus) and brought him up. Many years after, when he was grown, Laius, either hearing ſome rumour concerning him, or carried by natural affection, went to enquire of the Oracle what had happened to his Son; and at the ſame time it chanced that OEdipus, having heard of ſome deſign againſt himſelf, went thither alſo to enquire who were his true Parents. They met in Phocis, where Laius bidding the other ſomewhat imperiouſly to give way, OEdipus moved with choler killed him, being utterly ignorant who he was.

Creon.

OEdipus.

Apollodorus.

Plutarch. in lib. quòd bruta ratione utuntur.

8. Laius being dead, Creon the Brother of Jocaſte (called alſo Epicaſte) ſeized upon his Kingdom, and kept it for ſome time, till OEdipus explained the Riddle of Sphinx. This Monſter, which the Bœotians alſo called Phix, is feigned to have had an Head and Face like a Woman, the hinder parts like a Lion, and Wings as a Bird; and keeping upon the Hill Phicion, or Phiceon, (ſo named from her) ſhe propoſed Riddles which whoſoever could unriddle ſhould have Jocaſte in marriage with the Kingdom; but if not, ſhe preſently devoured them. Her Riddle to OEdipus was this; What is that which goeth both on two Legs, three, and four? Many having Unriddleth the Riddle of Sphinx.

* A. M. 2758.

* Clemens Strom. l. 5.

loſt their lives for a miſ-interpretation, he expounded it to be meant of a Man, who when an Infant creepeth on hands and feet, when arrived at ripeneſs of age goeth upright on legs, and when he cometh to be old uſeth a ſtaff. Some think her a deformed and ſavage kind of woman, that living on prey uſed to lie in wait for Paſſengers. But Pauſanias writing that ſhe was the Baſtard-daughter of Laius, others judge her to have been for her wiſedom preferred to determin the Pretences of ſuch as claimed the Kingdom, and that thoſe who were caſt in the Trial ſhe puniſhed with Death: which Cruelty the Poets deteſting raiſed the Fable. Becauſe of her Abilities, this kind of Monſter was made by * the Ægyptians an Hieroglyphick of Wiſedom and Strength, in both which Plutarch maketh her to have excelled.

Pauſan.

Diodorus.

Apollod.

Eteocles and Polynices.

9. OEdipus then married Jocaſta his own Mother, not knowing that ſhe was ſuch, and obtained the Kingdom of Thebes. Diodorus telleth us that he had two Sons by her, Eteocles and Polynices, with as many Daughters: but others ſay he had them by Euryganea, the Daughter of Hyperphas. At length all came to light; both that he had killed his Father, and married his own Mother: whereupon ſhe preſently hanged her ſelf, and his Sons kept him up cloſe for the filthineſs of the thing, as ſome ſay; though others will have him driven from Thebes, and that, going to Theſeus King of Athens, he there died a little after. Polynices, while his Father was yet living, went to Argos, where he married Argia, the Daughter of Adraſtus; but after his death returned to Thebes to ſucceed him in the Kingdom. The two Brothers then agreed to reign by turns; but Eteocles, having the firſt courſe, refuſed to yield up his Power at the time prefixed, ſo that Polynices was glad to return to Argos. At the ſame time there happened to be with Adraſtus one Tydeus, the Son of OEneus, who, having killed a man in Ætolia, fled alſo to him: both theſe he kindly received, and, by direction of the Oracle making them his Sons-in-law, promiſed to reſtore them to their Countreys and Eſtates. Beginning firſt with Polynices, he ſent Tydeus in Embaſſage to Eteocles, who cauſed fifty men to lie in wait for him by the way, but he killed them all, and returned ſafe to Argos. Adraſtus, to revenge the injury, made all poſſible preparation for a War, and invited all the beſt Souldiers from all quarters to the Expedition. Seven eminent Captains gave their names, whereof Amphiaraüs, who had married Eriphile, the Siſter of Adraſtus, was Chief; though of ſo ancient a thing as this Theban War there can be little certainty.

The Theban War.

A. M. 2785.

Diod. l. 4. p. 177.

10. Having each of them his ſeveral Army, (or Company rather) they marched to Thebes, which they beſieged, and divided themſelves according to the Gates of the City. Eteocles made all preparations for defence, aſſigning to every Gate its Officer, and conſulted Tireſias a Prophet, then blind, concerning the event of the War. He anſwered, that the Thebans ſhould overcome, if Menœceus, the Son of Creon, would devote himſelf as a Sacrifice to Mars: which he preſently did, killing himſelf before the Gates. The Thebans then made a Sally, but were beaten back to the Walls, which when the Argives approached, Capaneus, one of the ſeven Captains, firſt of all others ſet to Ladders, and mounted; but he being killed, the other retreated, and many of them were ſlain in the purſuit. After this, it was agreed that the two Brothers, in a ſingle Combat, ſhould decide the Quarrel; and ſo doing, they mutually fell by the hands of each other: then followed a very ſharp Fight, wherein all the Captains that followed Adraſtus were ſlain, and he onely eſcaped by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe Arion. Yet this Victory coſt the Thebans ſo dear, that being themſelves almoſt ruined, hence Cadméa victoria became a Proverb. This War fell out twenty eight years before that of Troy.

Laodamus.

The Expedition of the Epigoni.

A. M. 2799.

Pauſan.

11. Eteocles leaving behind him a young Son, named Laodamus, Creon, the Brother of Jocaſta, aſſumed the Guardianſhip of him, and would not ſuffer the Argives to be buried, till Theſeus and the Athenians procured it. Ten years after the War, when Laodamus was now grown up, the Sons of thoſe Captains that had been ſlain, called Epigoni, made an Expedition againſt Thebes, to revenge the Death of their Fathers. Conſulting before-hand the Oracle of Delphos about the ſucceſs, they were bidden to chuſe Alcmæon, the Son of Amphiaraus, for their General: which having done, and marching into Thebaïs, they waſted all the Countrey round about the City. Hereupon the Thebans made a Sally, and a ſharp conflict inſued, wherein Laodamus ſlew Ægialeus, the Son of Adraſtus, and was himſelf killed by Alcmæon; though Pauſanias ſaith he eſcaped out of the Fight, and fled to the Illyrians. After this the City was taken, and, with other plunder, Tireſias the Prophet was ſent as a Preſent towards Delphos; but drinking by the way preſently died. This is he who is ſaid to have experienced both Sexes, and lived ſeven Therſander. Peneleus.

Generations; even from the days of Cadmus to this time. The Epigoni having taken the City, and either ſlain or driven away Laodamus, placed Therſander, the Son of Polynices in the Kingdom, who ſailed with Agamemnon towards Troy as Generall of the Bœotians, and was killed in Myſia by Telephus, as was before ſhewed. The Bœotians choſe Peneleus for their Captain, becauſe his Son Tiſamenus was then but young: and he was alſo ſlain in the War by Euryphylus, the Son of Telephus, who after the death of Achilles brought Auxiliary ſorces out of Myſia unto Priamus.

Tiſamenus. Auteſion. Damaſichthon. Ptolemæus. Xanthus.

Pauſanias ut ſuprà. * Chap. 5. Sect. 4. Parag. 15. A. M. 2877.

12. Peneleus being dead, Tiſamenus, the Son of Therſander, reigned at Thebes. His Son Auteſion left this place,and went to the Dorienſes; wherefore Damaſichthon, the Nephew of Peneleus, and Son of Opheltas, was choſen in his room. After him followed Ptolemæus, and then Xanthus the laſt King of all, who was ſlain by Melanthus the Meſſenian in a ſingle Combate, in behalf of the Athenians, about Celænæ, a place ſituate upon the Borders, as we have * already ſhown. This happened 56 years after the deſtruction of Troy, 24 before the deſcent of the Heraclidæ, 57 before the death of Codrus the laſt Athenian King, 252 before the firſt Olympiad, A.M. 2877. After his death, together with the poſſeſſion of Celænæ, the Thebans quitted the Government of Kings, it ſeeming good to them no longer to be governed by a ſingle perſon, but by many, as Pauſanias writeth, from whom yet it appeareth not what kind of Rule was erected; whether an Oligarchy at firſt, or the whole power was aſſumed by the People, which we know aſſuredly exerciſed it in after-times, in a Democraticall way. Such was the Government when the Perſians had obtained the Empire of the Eaſt, and Greece it ſelf moſt flouriſhed; at which time, in the entire Hiſtory of this Countrey we ſhall hear farther of the Thebans.

CHAP. VI.

The Original and Kingdom of Rome Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

SECT. I.

The Originall of the City of Rome.

The ancient inhabitants of Latium.

Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſ. l. 1.

1. THE City of Rome was ſeated in Latium, the Weſtern Tract of Italy, upon the River Tiber. The ſoyl, for as much as can be known, (ſaith Dionyſius) was firſt inhabited by the Siculi, who held many other places of that Countrey. Theſe were expelled by the Aborigines, who being the Poſterity of the OEnotrians, (who ſeized upon that Tract lying near Tarentum) were conſecrated firſt to the Gods, and, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey, then ſent out to ſeek them new ſeats, and fortunes. The OEnotrians came out of Lycaonia (afterwards called Arcadia) to ſeek a more commodious habitation under conduct of OEnotrus, the Son of Lycaon, from whom they received their name. Theſe Aborigines here ſettled, were forced to admit of ſome Pelaſgians to live amongſt them that fled from Hæmonia, (ſince called Theſſaly) where for ſome time they had continued; and afterwards certain Arcadians who followed Euander, Son to Mercury, and the Nymph Themis, from a Town of that Countrey called Palantium, which name they gave to an Hill on which they fixed, afterwards reckoned amongſt the Seven belonging to the City. Not long after, the Greeks will have Hercules come into theſe parts, as he was returning home from his Expedition into Spain, and the Weſtern Regions, and here to have left ſome Peloponneſians, who ſettled themſelves upon the Hill called then Saturnius, and afterwards Capitolinus, at what time Faunus reigned over the Aborigines.

2. The Picus.

Auguſtin. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 18. cap. 15.

2. The Father of Faunus is ſaid to be Picus the Son of Saturn, who, flying out of Crete from his Son Jupiter, came into this Country, and here hiding himſelf, gave occaſion for the Region to be called Latium. Some ſay the Father of Picus was rightly called Sterces, and ſurnamed Saturn, from whom the Laurentine Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Laurus or Laurel. Picus had this name from the Bird Picus (a Wood-pecker) which he uſed, by its flying to foretell things to come, as Feſtus noteth out of Verrius. Plutarch ſaith, that he was by the Sorceries of his Wife changed into this Bird, in the likeneſs of which he gave forth Oracles, and anſwered Queſtions. And agreeable hereto, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus compareth this Bird with the Dove of Dodona, as performing that to the Aborigines, which it did to the Theſprotes. But Servius thinketh all this feigned, becauſe Picus was a Soothſayer, and obſerved the flying of this kind of Bird: and Bochartus telleth us, that Piccea in the Phœnician dialect ſignifieth a Seer or Prophet; whence, as Phix amongſt the Bœotians was taken for a cunning woman, ſo he, for his skill in ſuch matters, might, according to the termination of Latin words, have the name of Picus. This man, who in Suidas hath the name of Jupiter, (except Jupiter of Crete, that ſtole Io, was called Picus) begat Faunus or Fatuus, and a Daughter named Fauna and Fatua, which being in a fury would alſo foretell things to come; whence ſuch as were thus taken were ſaid Fatuari. Being killed by Faunus her Brother and Husband, as it ſeemeth, ſhe was worſhipped as a Goddeſs, and called Bona Dea, becauſe ſhe was ſo modeſt, that never any man ſaw her except her Husband. Dionyſius maketh this Faunus the Son of Mars. He is feigned to have ſerved under Bacchus in his Expedition into the Eaſt; and this is the reaſon, becauſe indeed he was the ſame with Pan, the conſtant companion of Bacchus. (a) One writeth that he was called alſo Sylvanus Invius, and Pan by ſome. (b) Another ſaith, his name in Latin was Invius, and in Greek Pan. So that his reigning in Latium was a meer Fable, invented by ſome who knew not that he was the ſame with Pan the Arcadian, whoſe worſhip was brought into Italy by Euander.

Faunus.

(a) Aurel. Victor de Orig. gentis Rom.

(b) Servius in Æn. lib. 6.

Latinus.

Æneas with the Trojans arrive in Italy.

A.M. 2821.

3. After him reigned Latinus, as the Story goeth, whom Feſtus maketh his Son; but others, as we have it from Dionyſius, fathered on Hercules, who begat him on a certain Hyperborean Virgin, whom having received as an Hoſtage from her Father, he kept untouched till he came into Latium, and afterwards gave her in marriage unto Faunus, therefore accounted the Father of Latinus. Fifty five years after the departure of Hercules, and in the 35. of the reign of Latinus, Æneas with his wandring Trojans arrived at Laurentum, not far from the Mouth of Tiber. Livie ſaith, it is moſt certain, that, Troy being taken, the Græcians raged againſt the other Inhabitants, but abſtained from Antenor and Æneas, (the Son of Anchiſes, who was Son to Capys, and Grand-ſon to Aſſaracus, the Brother of Ilus King of Troy) both for the friendſhip which had paſt betwixt them and their families, and becauſe they were ever for peace and the reſtitution of Helena. But Dionyſius relateth out of Hellanicus, that the lower part of the City being taken, Æneas with his aſſociates, that came from Ophrynium and Dardanus to the aid of Ilium, timely perceiving it, retired into the Caſtle, where were the Idols and much treaſure, protected by the moſt valiant Souldiers. Hither alſo betook themſelves ſuch as eſcaped the fury of fire and ſword; and they eaſily repelled the force of the Enemy. But Æneas conſidering that the City could no way be preſerved, reſolved to quit the Caſtle ſo as might ſtand with the ſafety of the Company. He therefore ſent out with a guard the aged and infirm, in the mean time diverting the Enemy, and then marched out in order of battel, when Neoptolemus and the Achæans had now taken part of the Fortifications. Whilſt the Greeks were buſied in plunder, they all eſcaped to the Mount Ida, where fortifying themſelves, the ſame night others flocked to them out of Dardanus, Ophrynium, and the reſt of the Trojan Towns, expecting till the Enemy, ſatisfied with the deſtruction of Ilium, would draw off, and return into his own Countrey.

4. But the Achæans having waſted the City, and leſſer Towns, provided alſo to ſtorm the Hills; when a Treaty was deſired by the Trojans. It was there agreed, that Æneas and his Companions, with ſuch things as they had, ſhould depart out of the Country under ſafe conduct. Whereupon he firſt ſent away his eldeſt Son Aſcanius, with part of his Aſſociates, (whereof the greater number was Phrygians) to the Lake Aſcanius, for that he was deſired by the Inhabitants of that Country to be their King. He continued not long with them, for the Scamandridæ, with others of the Family of Hector, now diſmiſſed out of Greece by Neoptolemus, the Son of Achilles, coming to him, he returned with them to Troy, and reſtored them to their Father's Principality. Æneas with the reſt of his Children, Anchiſes his Father, and his Houſhold, paſſed over the Helleſpont into a Peninſula called Pallene, whence he ſailed to the Iſland Delus, and thence to another named Cythera, over againſt Peloponneſus. Touching at the promontory Cinæthium, (ſo called for that Cinæthus a Trojan was here buried) they renewed their friendſhip with the Arcadians their kinſfolk, and paſſed on to the Iſland Zacynthus, which was ſo named from Zacynthus one of the Sons of Dardanus. Thence they came to Actium, and ſo to Ambracia; from which Bay Anchiſes directed his courſe towards Buthrotum an Haven of Epirus, and Æneas by Land went two days journey to the Oracle of Dodona, which having conſulted about new Seats, in four days he came to the Navy at Buthrotum. From this Haven ſailing towards Italy, they touched upon ſome parts thereof, but paſſing into the Streights of Sicilie, they fell alſo upon that Iſland; where leaving part of their Company, they went over and landed at Laurentum, the place appointed to put an end to theſe Wandrings. This account Dionyſius giveth us, as moſt probable, amongſt others which he briefly toucheth. Alexander the Epheſian, as he is cited by Aurelius Victor, wrote that Ilium being betrayed by Antenor, Æneas took his Father upon his back, with his Gods, and his little Son in his hand, and thus loaded made towards Ida; whither being ſuffered to come by the Greeks, (who were much moved at his Piety) he there built Ships, and by the advice of an Oracle came into Italy. The Piety of Æneas is much ſpoken of, and commended by many; and, amongſt others, by the pen of Xenophon, that Attick Muſe: but ſome wrote that he joyned with Antenor in betraying the City.

SECT. 1

Dionyſ. l. 1.
Livius l. 1.

5. The Trojans landing at Laurentum, there pitched their Tents in the place called Troy from this occaſion, diſtant from the Sea about half a mile. Taking their dinner on the ground, ſome laid their meat on Parſley, that there grew, or, as ſome ſaid, on cruſts of Bread, which afterwards they did alſo eat up; and then underſtood that they had fulfilled the Oracle, which bade them go ſo far Weſtward, as till they ſhould eat up their Tables, and then take the conduct of a Sow, which they ſhould follow till ſhe lay down, and in that very place build a City. Now was Latinus buſie in War againſt the Rutuli his neighbours. As ſome wrote, he was firſt overcome by Æneas, and then made peace with him: but others ſay, he firſt ſent to expoſtulate the injury offered him by theſe Strangers in the invaſion of his Kingdom; and then, underſtanding who they were, agreed to give them all the ground five miles about the Hill where the Sow lay down, upon their ingagement to aſſiſt him in his War againſt the Rutuli. This Accord made, and Hoſtages delivered on both ſides, they ſoon utterly ſubdued the Rutuli, and then built up the Trojan City, which was called Lavinium, as the Romans ſaid, from the Daughter of Latinus. Virgil, too much indulging his Poetick fancie in imitation of Homer, bringeth Æneas into Italy not till the eighth year after the deſtruction of Troy. But Dionyſius and Solinus (out of the Annals of Caſſius Hæmina) write, that he arrived at Laurentum in the ſecond year, and the latter ſaith, with no more than 600 followers.

—— Nam te jam ſeptima portat Omnibus errantem terris & fluctibus æſtas. Æn 1.

Æneas ſucceedeth Latinus.

A. M. 3824.

6. Æneas in the third year after his departure from Troy, and the ſecond of his abode in Italy, reigned onely over the Trojans: but the next brought him alſo the Kingdom of the Aborigines, by the right of his Wife Lavinia, Daughter to Latinus now deceaſed, and the favour he had purchaſed of this People, by his conduct againſt the Rutuli. For they had again revolted, through the procurement of a certain Fugitive named Turnus, who being the Nephew of Amata, Latinus his Wife, out of indignation that a Stranger ſhould be preferred to the Marriage of Lavinia before him, at the inſtigation of Amata and others, revolted to the Rutuli with a party of men which he commanded. Livie maketh him King of the Rutuli, and to have made War upon Latinus, becauſe he had firſt made him a promiſe of his Daughter. The Aborigines had the Victory, but loſt Latinus in the Battel. Dionyſius ſaith, that Turnus was now alſo ſlain with many others: but Livie will have him again to renew the War, and to call in Mezentius King of the Hetruſcans, who was already jealous of the growing power of the Greeks. Æneas, to oblige his new Subjects, cauſed both them and his own Country-men to be called by the common name of Latini; but ingaging in another great and bloudy Battel with Mezentius, which night onely interrupted, he was never ſeen more, by ſome thought to be taken up to Heaven, and by others drowned in the River Numicius. This happened to him in the fourth year of his reign over the Latines, and the ſeventh after the deſtruction of Troy. He was honoured by a Chappel dedicated to him under the title of Jupiter Indiges.

Aſcanius.

Alba Longa built.

A. M. 2852. ante Rom. 400.

Aſcanius his Succeſſors in Alba.

A. M. 3081.

7. Aſcanius his Son ſucceeded him, who before was called Euryleon, till his name came to be changed in their flight from Troy, as Dionyſius writeth. Some thought him the ſame with the eldeſt Son of Æneas by Creüſa, and called Iülus, from whom the Family of the Julii took its name; but others accounted him younger. Mezentius grew very high upon the death of Æneas, and beſieging Lavinium, forced the Latines to ſubmit themſelves; but requiring all their Wine to be yearly ſent as a tribute into Hetruria, they would not endure ſo harſh terms, and encouraging themſelves, fell upon their Enemies at unawares, and, killing Lauſus the King's Son amongſt many others, forced him to ſubmit to equal conditions. Thirty years after the founding of Lavinium, Aſcanius led out a new Colony, and built another City called Alba Longa, whither he betook himſelf, leaving the old to his Mother Lavinia, who, if his own Parent, managed the Kingdom for him in his Nonage. He died in the 28. year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by Sylvius, whom ſome make his Son, others his Brother, ſaying, that Lavinia being left with child by Æneas, for fear of Aſcanius fled into the Woods, and there was delivered of this Child, who from the place of his birth had the name of Sylvius. Iülus, the eldeſt Son of Aſcanius, contended with him for the Kingdom: but the people conceiving it to belong to him of right, as the Nephew of Latinus, gave the Prieſthood to the other, in whoſe family it thenceforth continued. From Sylvius all his Succeſſors were ſurnamed Sylvii; whereof the firſt (after he had reigned 29 years) was Æneas Sylvius, his Son. Æneas having reigned ſo many, left Latinus his Succeſſor, whom after 51 followed Alba for 39. After Alba, Capetus reigned 26 years, Capys 28, Calpetus, or Carpentus, 13, and then Tiberinus 8, who being drowned in the River Albula, beſtowed on it the name of Tiber. After him Agrippa reigned 24 years, then Alladius (called alſo Aremulus and Romulus Sylvius) 19; who was very wicked and tyrannical, inſomuch that he would counterfeit Thunder, deſirous to be accounted a God by his Subjects, and juſtly periſhed by Thunder and Inundation through exceſſive Rains. Aventinus ſucceeded him, who gave name to one of the ſeven Hills, and after 37 years left Procas Sylvius his Succeſſor.

A. M. 3209. Oziæ 14.

Rhea the Daughter of Numitor bringeth forth Twins.

A. M. 3235. Olymp. 2. an. 4. Oziæ 40.

8. Procas, the thirteenth King of Alba, left two Sons, Numitor and Amulius: whereof the latter and younger violently thruſt his Brother from the Kingdom; and that he might have no Poſterity to revenge the injury, cauſed his Son to be made away in a pretended Hunting, and his Daughter Rhea to be devoted to the ſervice of Veſta, and a ſingle life. In the fourth year of her Prieſthood, as ſhe was going to fetch water for the ſervice of the Goddeſs, ſhe was light upon by ſome one, and raviſhed: ſome ſaid by one of her Lovers, others by Amulius himſelf, who came diſguiſed upon her, rather out of deſire to take an occaſion againſt her, than for any affection; but for credit of the cauſe the fact is laid upon Mars, in whoſe Grove it was committed, and who came to her, as 'tis ſaid, in a terrible manner with Thunder and Lightning. Rhea (called alſo Sylvia and Ilia) conceived with two Boys; and when they were born, ſhe was either put to death, or condemned to perpetual priſon, and they were thrown into the River. At the fall of the water they were left upon the dry ground, and a Wolf moved with their cries came and ſuckled them, till they were taken notice of by Fauſtulus the King's Herdſman, who brought them home to his Wife Acca Laurentia, that had been newly brought to bed of a ſtill-born Child. Some thought that Numitor, aware of his Brother's intention to make them away, cauſed other two to be brought in their rooms, and gave his two Nephews to be nouriſhed by this Fauſtulus. Others write that this Acca Laurentia was but the Paramour of the Herdſman, and for the naughtineſs of her life called Lupa, (Lupanaria amongſt the Romans ſignifying Brothel-houſes, and Lupa a Strumpet) whence the Fable aroſe that the Children were nouriſhed by a Wolf. Their names were Romulus and Remus.

Romulus and Remus.

Dionyſ.

9. The Boys grown up proved active and couragious, ſuitably to their birth: but being educated as was agreeable with the fortune and employment of their Foſter-father, they had occaſion to fall out with the Herdſmen of Numitor, and Remus being taken priſoner was carried before the King. Now did Fauſtulus reveal the whole matter to Romulus concerning their Original, who got together a company of Herdſmen, and therewith falling upon the Palace ſlew Amulius, and reſtored their Grand-father to the Kingdom. After things were ſettled at Alba, the young men had a deſire to build a City in the place where they had been brought up; which their Grand-father well approving gave them the ground, with ſuch of his Subjects as he knew to be of his Brother's Faction, and all others that of their own accord would willingly go out in this new Colony.

Lead out a Colony.

Moſt of the Trojans gave their names, (whereof continued to the time of Dionyſius almoſt fifty Families:) the Inhabitants of the place alſo, as many as were left about Palantium and Saturnia, were taken in, and the Multitude divided into two parts, that by emulation the work might proceed with greater expedition. But what was intended for a laudable contention grew to a greater inconvenience; for hereby were two Factions made, which preferring the Brothers each before the other, raiſed in them ambitious deſire of Preeminence. This ſoon appeared in that they could not agree about the place; Romulus would have the Palatine Hill (or Palantium) to be taken in, and Remus contended for Remuria, though on the other they were educated. The matter was brought before their Grand-father, who adviſed them to go apart, and obſerve the flying of Birds; and to whom happened the moſt lucky Flight, he ſhould be accounted the Author of the Colony. Romulus went to the Palatine Hill, and Remus to the Aventine near adjoyning. Remus firſt had ſix Vultures come flying by him; but Romulus his flock doubled the number: ſo that both of them were ſaluted King, and neither would give place to the other.

Remus killed.

10. The contention grew ſo ſharp as to proceed to a Fight, wherein Remus had the worſt of it, and was ſlain; which Dionyſius thinketh the moſt probable opinion. Others write, that he ſcoffed at the lowneſs of the Wall which his Brother had made, ſaying, it would eaſily be paſſed over by Enemies, and therewith leaped over it himſelf; for which he was preſently killed by one Celer, who overſaw the work. Romulus compaſſed in the Palatine Hill, and made that the Rudiments of the City, with an Heifer and a young Bullock joyned together plowing up a furrow where the Wall ſhould be reared: which uſe was afterwards obſerved by the Romans, both in the building and razing of Cities. This is the moſt common and received opinion about the Original of Rome, which ſome make built at another time, and by other Founders. Cephalon Gergithius, a moſt antient Hiſtorian, wrote that it was built in the ſecond Age after the Trojan War, by Romus, one of the four Sons of Æneas; with whom many other Authors agreed. Others made the Founder of it to be Æneas himſelf, whom they will have come in company with Ulyſſes into Italy. Ariſtotle the Philoſopher wrote, that part of the Achæans themſelves, in their return from Troy, were by Tempeſts driven upon Italy, and forced to plant themſelves in Latium. Callias the Hiſtorian, who recorded the Acts of Agathocles, mentioned a Trojan Woman, called Roma, that being married to Latinus, King of the Aborigines, bare to him two Sons, Remus and Romulus, who building the City, named it Rome after their Mother. Xenagoras reckoned up three Sons of Ulyſſes by Circe, Romus, Antias, and Ardea, all which built Cities of their own name. Dionyſius of Chalcis, with others, would have this Romus to be the Son of Aſcanius; ſome of Emethion, and ſome of Italus by Electra the Daughter of Latinus. Beſides theſe, many other Greek Authors diſſented about the Founders of the City.

Several opinions concerning the Builder of Rome.

11. Neither have Roman Writers agreed amongſt themſelves. Some of them would have the Sons of Æneas to be Founders of the City, viz. Romulus and Remus; others, his Nephews by his Daughter, which he gave up as Hoſtages to Latinus, King of the Aborigines. Some write how Aſcanius, being left Heir by his Father, divided his Inheritance with Romulus and Remus his Brethren. He himſelf built Alba and other Towns: Romulus Capua, ſo called from Capys his Great-grand-father; Anchiſa, from Anchiſes his Grand-father; and that place afterwards called Janiculum, which he named after his Father Æneas; then laſtly, Rome after his own name, which being afterwards deſolate, the Albans re-peopled by a Colony led thither by Romulus and Remus. According to this Hiſtory, this City ſhould have been twice founded; firſt, not long after the Trojan times, and then again in the fifteenth Age after. But more than this, Antiochus of Syracuſe mentioned a third Rome that muſt have been before the War of Troy, writing, that from Rome came a certain Sicilian fugitive to Morges, the Son of Italus, King of Italy. By reaſon of this uncertainty of the Founders, ſome, whoſe prejudice againſt the Empire of the City moved them with envy, accounted it no other than a receptacle and fortreſs of Barbarians, Fugitives, and Vagabonds; and were ready to call into queſtion the Hiſtory of Romulus, as a meer invention made to hide the deſpicable Original of ſo great a Commonwealth.

12. Whether it was a new Plantation, or reparation of an old Town, there is great variety of opinions concerning the Time thereof. Timæus the Sicilian made its Foundation contemporary with that of Carthage, and the 38. year before the firſt Olympiad. But of thoſe which ſeem to approach nearer to truth, ſome place the

SECT. 2.

Several opinions concerning the time of the building.

foundation of it in the ſixth Olympiad; whereof Velleius Paterculus aſſigneth the firſt year, others the third, and Varro (from the opinion of Tarcutius, a moſt excellent Mathematician) the fourth: which opinion is followed by many Authors of great note, (beſides Auguſtus, Claudius, Severus, and Philip, Emperours, in their Secular Games) as Plutarch, Tacitus, Dio, Gellius, Cenſorinus, Onuphrius, Cæſar Baronius, Torniellus, Joſeph Scaliger, and Jacobus Cappellus. Solinus will have Pomponius Atticus and Cicero to reckon from the third year of this Olympiad; but as Pliny, Paterculus and Livy, ſo Cicero varieth, ſometimes counting from the Calends of January of the foregoing, one while of this, and another of the following year. M. Portius Cato, knowing that Rome was built ſomething before the ſeventh Olympiad, not ſtanding upon minute and ſcrupulous deductions, began the Æra of the City from the firſt of January that fell in the firſt year of that Olympiad; and ſo the year of his own Conſulſhip he ſaid to be the 758. year of the City. This Æra is followed by the Faſti Capitolini, Solinus, Euſebius, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, (who taketh pains to prove the account good) Polybius, Sigonius, Pighius, Occo, Goltzius, Iſaacus Caſaubonus upon Polybius, and others. Fabius Pictor wrote that Rome was built in the eighth Olympiad; the reaſon whereof, as Cappellus thinketh, is, becauſe Romulus might then have finiſhed the Wall and Ditch; ſome deriving the Æra of a Building from laying of the Foundation, and others from the finiſhing of the Structure. Laſtly, L. Cincius, as Dionyſius informeth us, held that the City was built in the ſecond year of the twelfth Olympiad. In this great variety of opinions we have moſt reaſon to approve that of Varro, the moſt learned of all Romans, who placeth the beginning of Rome in the fourth year of the ſixth Olympiad, the ſixth of Jotham King of Judah, and the ſeventh of Pekah King of Iſrael, about the time that the Ephori were made at Sparta, in the days of Charops the firſt Archon at Athens for ten years, A.M. 3252.

A. M. 3252.
Ol. 6. an. 4.
Jothami 6.
Pekachi 7.

SECT. II.

From the Building of the City to the Deſtruction of the Kingdom. The ſpace of Two hundred forty five years.

The founding of Rome.

1. Romulus, being 18 years old, laid the foundation of the Walls on the (a) eleventh day before the Calends of May, (which anſwereth to the fourth of October, after the Julian account) betwixt the hours of two and three, the Sun being in Libra, and the Moon in Taurus, Jupiter in Piſces, Saturn, Venus, Mars and Mercury in Scorpio, according to the Computation of Tarrutius, the moſt noble of Mathematicians. (b) Varro, (c) Ovid, and ſeveral others write that Rome was founded on the Parilia, or Palilia. Feſtus telleth us the Parilia were ſo called à Pariendo, from bringing forth; thoſe Stars in the head of Taurus, (or which make up the head of themſelves, as Gellius criticizeth againſt Tiro) named Hyades, and under which Rome was founded, being alſo called Parilicium, and Palilicium Sidus. Servius noteth that Pales was the Roman Goddeſs of Fodder, to whom a Solemnity being obſerved on the eleventh of the Calends of May, it had the name of Palilia. Cappellus thinketh that, according to the mind of Tarrutius, the firſt year of the City commenced from the firſt of January, and Capricorn, in the new Moon, three moneths after the foundation was laid.

(a) Solinus c. 2. Cicero de divin. lib. 2. Plutarch. in Romulo.
(b) de re Ruſtica l. 2. c. 1.
(c) Lib. 4. Faſt. Vid. Joſ Scalig. de Emend. temp. lib. 5. pag. 362.

The number of the Colony.

2. The number of the Colony amounted ſcarcely to 300 horſe, and 3000 foot, wherewith Romulus (which ſome make but the diminutive of Romus his true name) planted this new City, called Rome after himſelf. To increaſe the number of his Citizens, he opened a Sanctuary to all malefactors and diſcontented perſons, who then reſorted to him in great numbers from the Countries adjoyning. Setting about the frame of the Commonwealth, by his Grandfather's advice, he remitted it to the choice of the People what kind of Government they would have; whereby, obtaining the Kingdom in way of gift, his Power became the more plauſible. He divided the people into three Tribes, every Tribe into ten Curiæ, and every Curia into ten parts or Decuriæ, over all which he appointed Officers. According to the number of the Curiæ he divided the Grounds into thirty parts, excep-

Dionyſ. lib. 2. Livius lib. 1.

The diviſion and diſtinction of Citizens.

excepting one portion for publick uſe, and another for ſuperſtitious Ceremonies. He made a diſtinction of his People according to honour and dignity, giving to the better ſort the name of Patres, either for that they were elder, had Children, for the Nobility of their ſtock; or, if Detractors may be heard, he therefore named theſe Patritii, becauſe they alone could ſhew their Fathers, the other multitude being a rabble of Fugitives that had no free and ingenuous parentage. Wherefore when an Aſſembly of the People was called by the King, the Patritians were by the Crier cited by their own and Fathers name; but the inferiour ſort, or Plebeians, were gathered together by the ſound of Ox-horns. Having diſtinguiſhed his Subjects into theſe two Ranks, he ordered what each ſhould doe. The Patritii were to take care of Superſtition, bear Offices of Magiſtracy, adminiſter Juſtice, and govern the Commonwealth together with the King: The Plebeians to till the Fields,feed Cattel, and exerciſe Trades; leſt by their meddling in the Government, and by mutual Contention of the poorer and richer ſort, ſuch Seditions might ariſe as were too viſible in other Commonwealths.

Patrons and Clients.

Dionyſius.

3. To bind each to the other, he commended to the Patritians certain of the Plebeians, whom they ſhould protect and countenance; liberty being given to the common ſort to make choice of whom they would for their Patrons. This cuſtome of Patron and Client was very ancient in Greece, eſpecially amongſt the Theſſalians and Athenians; where yet the Clients were very imperiouſly uſed, their Patrons impoſing on them ſervices ill beſeeming Free-men, and beating them like Slaves, if they diſobeyed their commands. The Athenians called them Thetæ for their ſervice, and the Theſſalians Peneſtæ, upbraiding them with their Fortune. But Romulus refined the uſe of Patronage, rendring it profitable unto both. Patrons by him were ordered to adviſe their Clients concerning Law,of which they were ignorant, and take care of them as well abſent as preſent, as their own Children,in what concerned money and contracts,undertaking Suits for them when oppreſſed, and procuring them quiet both as to publick and private buſineſs. On the other hand it was the duty of Clients,to help their Patrons with money in the marriage of their Daughters, if need ſhould be, or redeem them and their Sons if taken captive; to bear the charges of private Sutes or publick Fines, and that at their own coſt,in way of gratitude; to aſſiſt them with their purſes in defraying the charge of Magiſtracy,or honourable employments. This was common to both,that neither ought to accuſe the other, nor give any teſtimony or ſuffrage againſt each other,or to be reckoned amongſt his Enemies;which if any one did, or was, he was held guilty of Treaſon by Romulus his Law,and it was lawfull for any one to kill him. Hereby, for many Ages, this Patronage continued in force,and was as effectual for love and mutual help as Conſanguinity or Alliance: it was the glory of the Nobility to have many Clients devolved upon them from their Anceſtors, and obtained by their own vertue. But not onely the Plebeians in the City found themſelves ſecured by this Patronage, but in proceſs of time all Colonies, aſſociate Cities, and ſuch as were ſubdued by war, had their Patrons, to whom many times the Senate would remit ſuch Controverſies as were brought before it from the ſaid Cities or Commonwealths, and ratifie their Judgement. Laſtly,ſuch firm Concord followed this Conſtitution of Romulus, that, for 730 years, as Dionyſius reckoneth, though many and great Conteſts aroſe betwixt the Nobility and Commons about the Commonwealth, (as is uſual in all both great and little States) yet it never came to bloud or ſlaughter, but, mutually yielding and granting, all Controverſies were compoſed by civil Expoſtulations; till Caius Gracchus,Tribune of the people,overthrew the peace of the City: after which, they neither ſpared to kill and baniſh one another, nor to commit any other wickedneſs, whereby they might compaſs Victory and their own devices.

Idem.

The Senate.

4. After this,Romulus reſolved to chuſe a Senate, which ſhould aſſiſt him in the Government, and from amongſt the Patritians ſelected 100 after this manner. Out of them all he firſt made choice of one particular man, to whom, when he was conſtrained to be abſent in the Wars, he committed the Government of the City: Then he commanded every Tribe to chuſe three men, ſuch as were eminent for birth and wiſedom; and every Curia to elect three out of the Patritians. This number he called a Senate, either for their age, or vertue; or becauſe, as Feſtus will have it, nothing was done without their permiſſion, the Senate being named à Sinendo. Perceiving after this, that he ſtood in need of a Guard for his own perſon,he cauſed the Curiæ by their Suffrages to chuſe him out 300 young men, (ten out of each) whom he called Celeres, from their readineſs to execute his commands, as moſt have written; or, according to Valerius Antias, from their Captain, whoſe name was Celer. Under him were three Centurions, and other inferiour Officers. This Company with their Spears defended the King in the City, and received his Orders: in Battels were the firſt Leaders, and the Keepers of his body, beginning the fight firſt, and retreating laſt of all; which cuſtome Dionyſius thinketh Romulus to have taken from the Lacedæmonians. Things being thus appointed, he limited unto all their work and honours.

The Office of King.

The King's duty was to take care of their Superſtition; to look to the preſervation of the Laws and Cuſtoms, either natural or written; to decide the moſt weighty Cauſes betwixt man and man, and refer thoſe of leſſer conſequence to the Senate, into which he was alſo to have an inſpection. He was to call together the Senate, aſſemble the people, firſt to ſpeak his opinion, and ratifie what was approved by the major part. This was the King's work at home, who in the Wars had abſolute authority.

Senate.

To the Senate this honour and power was given, to debate and reſolve about ſuch things as the King propounded, which were decreed by the greater number of voices, agreeable to the conſtitution of Lacedæmon, as our Author obſerveth.

People.

To the People he committed three things; to create Magiſtrates, make Laws, and reſolve about War what was propounded by the King: yet ſo, as that the authority of the Senate interpoſed. All the whole Multitude together gave not their votes, but the Curiæ apart; and whatſoever ſeemed good to moſt, was referred to the Senate: which cuſtom was afterwards changed, when the Senate did not confirm the Decrees of the People, but the People the Reſolves of the Senate.

Priſoners to be preſerved.

5. For the increaſe of the City, beſides the opening of a Sanctuary, (which Dionyſius ranketh after this ſettlement of the Civil Policy) he forbad, when any Town was taken, that Priſoners of ripe age ſhould be ſlain or ſold, or their grounds left untilled; but commanded a Colony to be ſent from Rome, to which part of them ſhould be aſſigned, and ſome of the Strangers to be admitted to the Freedom of the City: which device our Author eſteemeth of great weight and conſequence. He made many good and profitable Laws, whereof moſt were unwritten.

Laws in reference to marriage.

He ordained in reference to Marriage, that the Wife ſhould be partaker of all that was her Husband's, when chaſt and modeſt. If he died inteſtate, ſhe was his abſolute Heir; and if he left Children, equally with them. When ſhe offended, ſhe was left to his diſpoſal for puniſhment, who admitted her Kindred to judge with him concerning the fault, if ſhe either violated Chaſtity, or drank Wine, which Romulus utterly condemned, as an incentive to wantonneſs.

Conſule Val. Max. l. 2. c. 1.

So effectual became this Conſtitution to the preſervation of the conjugal knot, that for 520 years there happened not any Divorce in Rome, till, in the 137. Olympiad, when Marcus Pomponius and Caius Papirius were Conſuls, Sp. Carvilius, an eminent man, put away his Wife; and then, though he ſware to the Cenſors, that he did it onely to provide for poſterity, yet was he ever hated by the people.

Parents and their Children, &c.

He gave to Fathers abſolute power over their Sons, and that for all their lives, either to impriſon, beat, carry away bound to ruſtick labours, or kill; although the Son bore the greateſt Office in the Commonwealth, or were publickly commended and honoured. By virtue of this Law, ſome eminent Perſons, making Orations to the People in oppoſition to the Senate, in the midſt of popular applauſe, have by their Parents been pulled down from their ſeats, and led away to be puniſhed according to their pleaſure: and as they paſſed along the Forum, none could deliver or reſcue them; not the Conſul, Tribune, nor Multitude it ſelf, which they had flattered. And becauſe of this abſolute paternal dominion, ſeveral valiant men have been put to death for their valour ſhewed in ſome way againſt the Enemy, contrary to the direction or command of their Fathers.

6. He compelled Parents to educate all their Male-children and their eldeſt Daughters: he permitted a Child younger than three years to be made away, if it was born defective in ſome member, or monſtrous; and yet then was it not to be expoſed without approbation of the five next neighbours. If any one broke this Law, he, beſides other puniſhment, forfeited half of his goods. The Father was permitted by the Law-giver to ſell his Son, and that three times over, if it happened that he recovered his liberty: a greater power than was had over Slaves, who, if once made free, thenceforth ſo continued. All ſordid Arts, and ſuch as were ſubſervient to Luxury, he forbad, which being left to Slaves and Strangers, for a long time the Romans ſcorned to meddle with. Two courſes of life onely he enjoyned them, Warfare and Husbandry, allowing a Market once in nine days. He divided equally to them the Grounds, Slaves, and Money, taken from the Enemy. Concerning Injuries, he preſently decided all Controverſies, or referred them unto others, inflicting puniſhment according to the crime: and ſeeing the people to be by fear beſt retained in order, he ſet up his Judgement-ſeat in the moſt conſpicuous place of the Forum, where his guard of 300 Celeres, and twelve Sergeants, or Lictors, carrying Rods and Axes, and in the view of all men either beating or putting to death Malefactors, made a terrible ſhow. This is the form of the Commonwealth, as Romulus firſt eſtabliſhed it, much admired by Dionyſius above all the Conſtitutions of his own Country-men the Græcians: whoſe Religion alſo (as giving occaſion to the vulgar ſort to contemn their Gods involved in ſuch misfortunes, or to abſtain from no iniquity and filthineſs to which they heard that their Deities were alſo obnoxious) he eſteemeth vain, frivolous, and dangerous, in compariſon of that which was inſtituted by the Roman Lawgiver.

The Rape of the Sabine Virgins.

7. Romulus, conſidering that there were ſeveral powerfull Nations round about him, which with evil eyes beheld the growth of his City, bethought with himſelf how he might contract Amity with them. Concluding, that Affinity was the onely means, by the advice and conſent of the Senate, he reſolved upon a courſe to provide Wives for his Subjects. He cauſed, at the ſuggeſtion of his Grandfather Numitor, a ſolemn Feaſt, and Exerciſes in honour of Neptune, to be proclaimed throughout the Countrey: to which many flocking with their Wives and Children, upon ſign given, his men laid hold on ſuch Virgins as were come to ſee, and violently carried them to their houſes. The number of them amounted to 683; for whom Romulus choſe out ſo many Husbands, and married them after their own Country Rites, making them covenant a Society or Communion of Fire and Water: which Cuſtom continued for many Ages. Some write that this happened in the firſt year of Romulus; but others aſſign the fourth of his reign for it, which ſcarcely could be done till matters were ſomething ſettled. Some delivered, that ſcarcity of Women was the cauſe of this Rape: others thought, that by it an occaſion was onely ſought for War: but a third party will have, that by this violent act an Affinity with the neighbouring Cities was endeavoured.

Romulus his defenſive wars.

8. Some were grievouſly moved, and others put a good conſtruction upon the buſineſs: but at length the matter broke out into a manifold War, of which that with the Sabines was moſt grievous. The Cities Cænina, Antemna and Cruſtumium firſt began, after they could not perſwade the Sabines to joyn with them. The two former, inhabited by the Aborigines, Romulus preſently ſubdued, and afterwards the latter alſo, which was a Colony of Alba. The Grounds were divided betwixt ſome Romans, ſent thither to plant, and the old Inhabitants; of whom ſuch as would were made free of the City, and, without loſs of their former eſtates, reckoned amongſt the Tribes and Curiæ, to the number of 3000: ſo that now the Roman Footmen were increaſed to 6000 men. Upon the Victory over Cænina and Antemna, he firſt triumphed, and deſigned a plot for a Temple to Jupiter Feretrius, (ſo called from Romulus his bringing home in triumph the Spoils of Acron the King of Cænina, whom he ſlew. The Spoils were named by the Romans Opima Spolia.) The plot of ground was about fifteen foot long, and this was the original of the Capitol. Having obtained a great name for his valour and clemency, many eminent men went over to him with their families, amongſt whom was Cælius, who gave name to an Hill in the City: and ſome whole People committed themſelves to his protection, (having taken example from the Medullini) and received Colonies from Rome. This ſucceſs the Sabines ſore repined at, layning now the blame one upon another, that they had not withſtood the beginnings of the Roman Greatneſs: wherefore they reſolved to correct their former careleſsneſs by double diligence, and aſſembling together at Cures, their Metropolis, decreed War againſt Rome for the Spring following, and made choice of T. Tatius their King to be General. Romulus made all poſſible proviſion for reſiſtance, fortifying the Capitoline and Aventine Hills. Lucumo from Solonium, a City of Hetruria, brought Auxiliary forces, and Numitor was not wanting to the aſſiſtance of his Grand-ſon.

9. The Sabines having demanded reſtitution of their Virgins, and to have the authors of the injury delivered up, (that they might have a more ſpecious pretence for their actions) received no ſatisfactory anſwer, and therefore both parties drew out into the field. The Sabines brought 25000 foot, and almoſt 1000 horſe: and the Roman Army contained 20000 foot, and 800 horſe; a very great number for a new-builded City. Tatius pitched his Tents betwixt the Quirinal and Capitolian Hill, where ſeeing all places ſtrongly fortified, and ſmall hopes for him to attempt any great matter, as he deſpaired of doing any good, one Tarpeia, the Daughter of Tarpeius who kept the Capitol, called to his men from above, and covenanted with them to betray the place into their hands. Concerning the wages ſhe was to receive, ſeveral ſtories, or fables, are related. It is ſaid, that ſhe required to have what they wore on their left arms, meaning their Bracelets; but when ſhe let them in, they threw their Targets which they carried on their left arms upon her, and therewith preſſed her to death. Being Maſters of the Capitol, they had thereby great advantage to continue the War at their pleaſure, and firſt ſome light Skirmiſhes inſued: but at length they reſolved to doe their utmoſt on both ſides, and for ſeveral days continued the fight, ſo long as till night ſevered them, for the moſt part with equal ſucceſs. This made the Sabines ſeriouſly bethink themſelves, whether they had beſt carry on the War, or retreat; and the Romans were rather more to ſeek how to hold out: yet neither party would ſtoop to deſire a Treaty. Whilſt they remained in this anxious condition, thoſe Sabine Women who were married to the Romans, and the cauſe of the War, through the perſwaſion of Herſilia, one of the principal amongſt them, became Mediators, and made Peace betwixt theſe Fathers and Sons-in-law, after the War had laſted ſix years. The Conditions were, that Romulus and Tatius ſhould reign at Rome, with equal prerogative: that the City from Romulus ſhould be called Rome, but the Citizens Quirites from Cures the native place of Tatius. Such of the Sabines as would, were made free of Rome; and a reſpect was had of thoſe Matrons who procured the Peace, that they which would live with their Husbands, ſhould be exempted from all work and ſervice, beſides ſpinning and making of Cloath.

The end of the Sabine War.

A.M. 2363.
V. C. 12.
Achazi 2.

10. Some write, that from thirty of theſe Women which undertook this Reconciliation, to perpetuate their memories, the Tribes were named: but Terentius Varro denied it, alleging that they had names before, and that by ſuch honour given to thirty, the reſt of the Women were not paſſed by and diſcouraged. For five years the two Kings reigned peaceably together, and joyntly ſubdued the Camerini, a Colony of the Albans: but in the ſixth, it happened that ſome of Tatius his friends plundring the Lavinians, and by him being protected, notwithſtanding Romulus and the Senate judged they were to be given up; moreover killing the Embaſſadors ſent to demand them, wherein they were alſo born out by him; when he went to Lavinium to ſacrifice, or perſwade the injured perſons to be quiet, the friends of the Embaſſadors fell upon and knocked him on the head. Romulus, to his great contentment thus freed from his Partner, made ſatisfaction to the injured, and burying Tatius at Rome very honourably, ſubdued Fidenæ, a Town five miles off, which had ſeized on proviſions coming to Rome in a time of famine. Thither he ſent ſome of his own to inhabit, according to his cuſtom, and then puniſhed the Cruſtumini, who had killed thoſe Planters which he placed amongſt them: and over them he obtained his ſecond Triumph. The Veii, moſt powerfull People of Hetruria, inhabiting a City no leſs than Athens, ſituated upon a craggy Rock, at ſome twelve miles diſtance from Rome, found themſelves concerned in what the Fidenates ſuffered, and by an Embaſſie required the Romans thence to remove their Garriſon, and reſtore the Inhabitants to their whole Demeſnes. This being denied, they met at Fidenæ, and there fought two bloudy Battels, wherein Romulus had the better, and triumphed the third time. Plutarch writeth, that the Veientes ridiculouſly challenged Fidenes to belong to them, and receiving a ſcornfull anſwer from Romulus, divided themſelves into two parts, whereof with one they fought the Fidenates, and with the other went to meet Romulus, who ſlew of them above 8000, with the loſs of 2000 of his own men. In the next Battel he is fabulouſly reported to have killed 7000 with his own hand, being half the number that was ſlain. The Veientes now betook themſelves to intreaties, and entred into a League with the Romans for an hundred years, on theſe Conditions; to quit a great part of their Grounds, with the Salt-pits near the River, and give up fifty Hoſtages of their moſt conſiderable Families. Romulus triumphed over them on the Ides of October, leading with him their Captain, an aged man, who had badly performed his office, for which he was afterwards perſonated by an old man in all Triumphs.

Tatius killed.

The Veii overcome.

Romulus grown tyrannical, is made away by the Senators.

11. This was the laſt War managed by Romulus, who being grown exceeding high and tyrannical upon his Succeſs, inlarged his Prerogative beyond thoſe bounds he had formerly ſet to it, and made uſe onely of the Senate to ratifie his commands. Hereby he contracted the hatred of that Order, (though the Souldiers loved him) which brought him to an untimely death. Some think he was torn in pieces in the Senate-houſe, and the Senators by piece-meal carried out his body under their gowns, ſo that it was never ſeen. Others wrote, that having drawn out the people to the place called Capræ Palus, and there making an Oration to them, a ſudden darkneſs

Called Quirinus.

darkneſs and Tempeſt happened, wherein he vaniſhed and departed from amongſt mortals. The Senators took occaſion from the ſecrecy of their fact, and concealment of his body, to perſwade the multitude that he was taken up amongſt the Gods; and Julius Proculus, a man of prime Nobility and credit amongſt the Patritians, put all out of doubt, by ſwearing moſt religiouſly that he appeared to him in the high-way, and told him, that it pleaſed the Gods, from whom he came, ſo long to let him continue amongſt men, till he had founded a City, whoſe Empire and glory ſhould excell, and then again that he ſhould return to Heaven. He bade him farewell, and tell the Romans, that if they did but uſe Temperance and Valour, they ſhould in power excell all Mortals. And he would be a propitious God unto them, under the name of Quirinus. He lived 55 years, and reigned 37, in which ſpace he much advanced the State of the City, which who firſt planted with him, were not much above 2000 foot, and ſcarce 300 horſe; but when he died, he left of the one kind 46000, and almoſt 1000 of the other ſort. After his Grand-father's death, he ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Alba, which he governed by Deputies, continuing his reſidence at Rome. The day on which he died, was the Nones of Quintilis, (afterwards called July) which anſwereth to the 26. of May, as the Calendar was reformed by Julius Cæſar. It was named Nonæ Caprotinæ from the place where he vaniſhed; and Fuga Populi, becauſe the people aſtoniſhed at the King's death took them to their heels. Tarrutius the Mathematician obſerved, that the Life of this Prince was ſignalized by three Eclipſes of the Sun: one at his Conception, which is alſo the firſt that is obſerved by Authors; another the ſame day he founded Rome; and the third on the day of his death; concerning which, for that the calculation of the former is rather founded upon Aſtrological than Aſtronomical Principles, Jacobus Capellus is to be conſulted.

An Inter-regnum for a year.

Numa.

A. M. 3291.
V. C. 40.
Ezechia 17.
Olymp. 16. an. 3.

His Religion much ſuited with that of the Pythagoreans.

12. Romulus dying childleſs, the Senate for a year's ſpace retained the Power in their own hands, which is called an Inter-regnum. They governed by their courſes, each man five days. But the People murmuring, and giving out, that for one Tyrant they had got an hundred, at length they reſolved that a King ſhould be choſen. The Sabines thought it reaſonable he ſhould be of their Nation, not having had any ſince Tatius; and the other were averſe to a Stranger, being deſirous he ſhould be ſome one of the Patritians: but at length the Fathers fixed upon Numa Pompilius, a Sabine, a man of almoſt forty years of age, and the moſt conſiderable for knowledge and ability of that time, who by conſent of the People was advanced to the Government. At firſt he excuſed himſelf; but ſolicited by his Father, and Marcius his kinſman, not to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity of his own and Countrie's preferment, he accepted of it. He thought it policy to raiſe that City by Laws, and religious Cuſtoms, which had been founded by Force and Arms, and to ſoften the Genius of it by diverſion from Warfare; it being as neceſſary to employ a People well at home, as exerciſe them abroad. He built a Temple to Janus, which was to ſtand open in time of War, and be ſhut in peace, as it continued all his reign. But it onely happened ſo to be twice from his time to that of Tiberius Cæſar, as ſome obſerve. The firſt occaſion was in the Conſulſhip of Titus Manlius and Marcus Attilius, after the ending of the firſt Punick War; and the ſecond in Auguſtus his reign, after he had ſubdued Antonius and Cleopatra, at what time there was an univerſal Peace. Numa diſbanded the Royal Guard of the 300 Celeres, as ſtanding in no need of them. To the two Flamens of Jupiter and Mars, he added the third of Romulus. To him is alſo aſcribed the bringing in of the Pontifices, whereof he himſelf was one, and the Original of which name is ſo much controverted. He alſo ordained the Veſtal Nuns, and the Feciales, a ſort of Prieſts which judged concerning the equity of War, and denounced it. His Religion much ſuited, in the manner and ſtrictneſs thereof, with that of the Pythagoreans, which cauſed the report of his being contemporary and converſing with Pythagoras; although this Philoſopher was born 100 years after his death. The reaſon of this miſtake, beſides the ignorance of the times, was his familiarity with Pythagoras a Lacedæmonian, who gave him advice concerning the ordering of his Kingdom, travelling in Italy in the ſixteenth Olympiad, the third year of which was the beginning of Numa's reign, according to Plutarch.

13. As Pythagoras taught that the Principle of all things is not to be perceived by ſenſe, or liable to motion, but inviſible, immortal, and to be apprehended by the underſtanding alone; ſo Numa forbad the Romans to uſe the Image of any God which repreſented him after the form of a Man, or any other living Creature. Neither in theſe antient times was there any painted, carved, or molten Image amongſt them: but for the firſt 170 years, though they built Temples and Sacred places, yet had they no Image at all; becauſe they thought it wickedneſs, to liken more excellent things to thoſe below them, and thought God no otherwiſe to be perceived than by the Mind. Numa divided thoſe Grounds amongſt the poorer ſort which Romulus had gained in his Wars, cauſing his Subjects to apply themſelves to Husbandry, to cultivate their Minds as well as the Earth; and that he might take away the diſtinction of Roman and Sabine, which threatned the State with endleſs emulation and prejudice, he diſtinguiſhed them all according to their Trades and occupations, making every Art a particular Company and Fellowſhip. He abated the rigour of that Law made by Romulus, concerning the power of Fathers over their Children, ordaining it ſhould not be lawfull for them to ſell ſuch Sons as by their leave had married, becauſe it was unjuſt that a Woman which had married a Free-man ſhould be conſtrained to live with a Slave. He reformed the Year, which in the time of Romulus was quite out of all order: ſome moneths had fewer than 20 days, ſome had 35, and ſome above; the variety of the ſeveral courſes of Sun and Moon was not underſtood; but onely this aimed at, that the Year ſhould conſiſt of 360 days.

He reformeth the Year.

14. Numa, conſidering that a Solar Year exceeded the Lunar by eleven days, (the one conſiſting of 354, and the other of 365) doubled theſe eleven days, and every other year inſerted a Moneth after February, conſiſting of 22 days, and by the Romans called Mercedonius, becauſe at that time wages were wont to be paid. He changed the order of the Moneths, aſſigning to March (formerly the firſt) the third place, to January the firſt, and February the ſecond; whereof this was the laſt, and the other the eleventh, in the days of Romulus. Many have been of opinion, that Numa added January and February to the reſt of the Moneths, and that formerly the Romans had but ten, which appeareth by the name of December, the laſt moneth, and becauſe the fifth and ſixth moneths from March were called Quintilis and Sextilis. Thus March muſt have been the beginning of the Year, which Romulus ſo named from Mars his ſuppoſed Father. The ſecond was April, ſo called from Venus, as ſome thought, (becauſe her ſuperſtitious Worſhip was performed in it, when the Women were crowned with Myrtle as they waſhed;) or, as others gathered, from the opening of Plants at that time of the year. The third was May, named from Maia, and ſacred to Mercury. The fourth was June, from Juno, as ſome thought: others deriving the names of theſe two from Majores and Juniores, the Elder and Younger. The reſt had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December. Afterwards Quintilis was from Julius Cæſar called July; Sextilis Auguſt, from Auguſtus. September and October the Emperour Domitian changed into his own names, but preſently after he was killed they recovered their former. Onely the two laſt ever retained their firſt appellations. Of thoſe moneths which Numa either added, or ranked, February was ſo called from the Expiations which uſed to be in it, ſignified by the word Februa: then they were wont to make Parentations to the dead, and celebrate the Lupercalia, certain Sacrifices and Games in honour of Pan, much like to the Sacrifice of Expiations. January was named of Janus, which Numa ſeemeth to have ſet before March, becauſe he would ſhew that Civil vertue is ever to be preferred before what is exerciſed in War: For Janus was accounted one of the moſt antient Gods, or Kings, (from whom, reigning in Italy, ſome make the Romans deſcended) very ſtudious for civil ſociety and humane converſe, and who changed the courſe of man's life from brutiſh and ſavage to an humane and gentle kind. He is therefore feigned to be double-faced, becauſe he brought in another faſhion of life than what formerly had been; and had a Temple built by Numa with two doors, that were ſhut in Peace, and open in War, as was before ſaid. Theſe things Plutarch relateth in the Life of Numa.

15. But Livie, and other conſiderable Authors, (a) Solinus, (b) Macrobius, and (c) Cenſorinus, write that the firſt Roman Year conſiſted but of ten moneths and 304 days; ſix of the moneths having 30 days, and the other four 31 apiece. But this account differing from the courſe of the Sun, Numa, to make them agree, added 51 days to the year. That he might make up the twelve months; from the ſix, conſiſting of thirty days, he took one day apiece, and therewith made up 57, which were divided into two moneths, whereof the one contained 29, and the other 28 days; and ſo the Year began to have 355. Of this opinion, beſides Junius Gracchanus and Fulvius, both Varro and Suetonius were, as appeareth out of Cenſorinus. Yet Licinius Macer and Lucius Feneſtella, by the ſame teſtimony, (two antient Writers of Annals) delivered that the firſt Roman Year conſiſted conſiſted of 12 moneths, agreeable to the former opinion related by Plutarch. This a * noble pair of modern Criticks prove to have been the truer opinion, affirming that January and February were not added by Numa, but transferred from the end to the beginning of the year; and endeavouring to ſhew, that they who would have the year to conſiſt but of 10 moneths make it no ſhorter than they that are for 12, diſtinguiſhing it not ſo much in number as placing of days: for the Romans in Romulus his time filled up the year, either by aſſigning more days than thirty to the moneths, or adding ſo many in the end thereof as ſeemed to be wanting. But it ſufficeth to have touched theſe things for the direction of beginners.

(a) C. 3.
(b) Satur. lib. 1. cap. 12.
(c) cap. 20.

* Joſeph. Scalig. de Emendatione Temp. lib. 2. & Lidyatus de variis annorum formis, cap. 17.

16. Numa, to gain credit and obedience to his Conſtitutions, feigned that he had converſe with the Goddeſs Egeria. He married Tatia, Daughter to Tatius the King, by whom he had a Daughter named Pompilia. Some ſaid he neither had any other Wiſe nor any more Children: but others both as to Wiſe and Children diſſented from them. He lived above 80, reigned 43 years; and at his death was buried with great honour. His body was not burned, (which he forbad) but buried in a Stone-Coffin under the Janiculum; and the Books of his Ceremonies laid by him in another, which being twelve written in Latine, and as many in the Greek tongue, were 400 years after, when Publius Cornelius and Marcus Bæbius were Conſuls, by water wrought out of the earth, and, for that it was thought wickedneſs to have ſuch things diſcovered to the multitude, (from whom he alſo kept them, after the faſhion of the Pythagoreans, not communicating diſcipline by writing, but onely by word of mouth) burned by command of the Senate. He kept the State in conſtant Peace, and his ability herein contributed to the general quiet of Italy; ſo that, by the example of his Reign, Plutarch judgeth that ſaying of Plato to be verified, That the onely means whereby men ſhould be made happy, would be, to have a Philoſophical mind and Regal power concur in a Prince, who would make Vertue ſuperiour to Diſhoneſty. But the fortune of the ſucceeding Kings added to the luſtre of his glory: For of the five which followed, the laſt was caſt out, and died in exile; and none of the reſt obtained a natural and quiet end, according to Plutarch.

Tullus Hoſtilius.

17. Numa being dead, and the Government devolved upon the Senate, after ſeveral Inter-reges, at length Tullus Hoſtilius was created King by the univerſal conſent of the City. His Grand-father was that Hoſtilius, who moſt gallantly behaved himſelf againſt the Sabines at the Cittadel, and married of that Nation, the Daughter of Herſilia. After much valour ſhown, he was ſlain in battel, and left a young Son, who at ripeneſs of age, of a noble Matron, begat this Tullus Hoſtilius, the third King of Rome; whoſe beginning, according to the account of Dionyſius, was in the ſecond year of the 27. Olympiad, wherein Eurybates the Athenian was Victor, when Leoſtratus was Archon at Athens, in the 83. year of the City, and the 31. of Manaſſes King of Judah. At his firſt beginning he purchaſed the favour of the poorer ſort, by dividing unto them, man by man, that portion of Land which the two former Kings had kept to bear their charges, ſaying, that his own inheritance would ſuffice for his own expences. Leſt theſe ſhould want room, he took in the Hill Cælius, where ſuch as wanted habitation, and now had gotten grounds, built them houſes, and he alſo dwelt himſelf. He was not onely of a different temper from Numa, but, as Livie deſcribeth him, more fiery than Romulus, being as well moved by his proper inclination, as the glory of his Grand-father; ſo that he ſought, and greedily imbraced, all occaſions for War. It was not long ere one was preſented from the Albans, who made Depredations in the Roman Territories, and were again robbed by the Romans. At that time Caius Cluilius governed Alba, who envying the growth of Rome, ſought to ſtir up Diviſion, and raiſe War betwixt the two Cities. Dionyſius writeth, that for this end he privately procured ſome to prey upon the Romans, knowing they would revenge the injury; and when they did ſo upon ſuch as they could take, he perſwaded the Albans that they had received a great affront, and excited them to take up Arms.

A. M. 3333. V. C. 82. Olymp. 27. an. 2.

His War with the Albans.

18. Embaſſadors were ſent to Rome to demand Reſtitution, and ſuch as had been Authors of the injury to be given up into their hands. This Hoſtilius being aware of, and knowing that they who firſt refuſed to make ſatisfaction would bear the Odium of the War, cauſed ſome of his friends kindly to entertain the Embaſſadors, pretending he was by neceſſary occaſions hindred from giving them audience, till he firſt ſent ſome of his own to Alba to demand Reſtitution. They received a ſharp repulſe from Cluilius; whereof Hoſtilius having notice, then gave audience to the Albans, told them how thoſe that he ſent had already received ſuch an anſwer as argued the League quite broken: whereupon he denounced denounced a juſt and neceſſary War againſt the Albans, which he would carry on not onely with his domeſtick forces, but by the aid of his other Subjects and Dependents. Both parties then made all poſſible preparations, and drew out their Forces to a place afterwards called the Ditch of Cluilius, ſome five miles diſtant from Rome. When they expected ſuddenly to decide the quarrel, Cluilius was found dead in his Tent, whether by ſome ſecret practice upon himſelf, by grief, or any other means, is uncertain. Into his place was choſen Metius Suffetius, a man of a turbulent ſpirit, and ſcarcely able for warlike matters, but thought fit for the place, becauſe as great an Incendiary as his Predeceſſor. Yet ſenſible of danger that hung over his head from the Fidenates, (who gaped after the deſtruction of both) he drew out the War in length, and at laſt fearfull to loſe all, was inclinable to a preſent Compoſure. Hoſtilius was now alſo not averſe to a determination of the buſineſs, being deſirous to puniſh the Fidenates and Veientes, who, formerly overcome by Romulus, had ſubmitted to the obedience of Rome, and in the days of Numa taken occaſion of his peaceable Government, to provide for the abſolute ſhaking off of the yoak. This time they thought preſented them with a fit opportunity; for, gathering together at Fidenæ, they were ready, when the Albans and Romans ſhould in battel have weakened each other, to fall upon both.

Dionyſius l. 3. Livius l. 1.

The Horatii and Curiatii.

19. This Plot diſcovered, wrought ſo upon both the Captains, that they came to a Conference, wherein much being alleged for the juſtice and right of both parties, at length it was agreed, that three perſons on each ſide ſhould by Combat decide the quarrel, and that City, whoſe Champions ſhould have the better, obtain preeminence and command over the other. Whilſt every Officer deſired to be one of the three, Suffetius bethought himſelf of two ternions of Brothers who were moſt fit, as he thought, to take it upon them. One Seguinius of Alba had two Daughters, whereof one he married to Curiatius his Fellow-citizen, and the other to Horatius a Roman. It happened that both being with child at the ſame time, brought forth each of them three Sons at the firſt birth, whom their Parents educated as the hope of their Families. To theſe it was that Suffetius thought the Combat concerning Principality was to be committed, being of equal years, ſtrength, and courage. The motion was imbraced by the parties, who diſpenſed with their private Affection, (no whit unſuitable to their Conſanguinity) now that the honour and welfare of their Country was concerned. In the Combat two of the Horatii were ſlain firſt, and the third left to deal with three adverſaries, ſpirited afreſh by the great advantage they had of him; but warily retreating, ſo as he might have but one upon him at a time, he ſlew them all, and Rome in him remained Conqueror. As he returned into the City, he was met by his Siſter, who fell upon him with chiding and outrageous words, for imbruing his hands in the bloud of his Couſin-germans, whereof one was contracted to her. Now elevated by his ſucceſs, and tranſported with a certain kind of eſtatical love to his Country, he killed her in the place, as one that, preferring private reſpect before publick good, was unworthy to live. Hereof he was accuſed, and Tullus neither thinking it ſeemly to quit or condemn him, as ſome ſay, created the Duumviri for capital Judgement, who condemned him: but, if ſo, there lying Appeal from theſe Officers to the People, the Multitude granted his life to the tears of his Father, who not onely took not ill his Daughter's death, but eſteemed it an heroick act, and gave her an ignominious Burial.

20. Hoſtilius dealt moderately with the Albans; but Metius Suffetius, their Dictator, or King, thinking his credit much impaired by the event of the Combat, ſought how he might betray the Romans, and wreſt the Power out of their hands. He dealt therefore underhand with the Fidenates and Veientes, who now, called to account for their Double dealings, brake out into open Rebellion, and by promiſe of aſſiſtance, incouraged them in their enterprize. And when the Romans and the other came to ingage, he reſolved to ſtand neuter till he ſaw which party had the better, intending then to cloſe with it. The Romans were diſcouraged to ſee their Friends ſtand aloof, ſuſpecting the Treachery; which Tullus alſo apprehending, gave out, that it was by his order, as meaning by ſome Strategem to ſurprize the Enemy: upon which report the Fidenates and their Companions were diſcouraged, and at length by the Romans, who reſumed their courage, put to the rout. After the Victory Hoſtilius called the Albans together, and laying open the Treachery of Suffetius, (which ſavoured the more of Treaſon, becauſe he had truſted him as his inward Friend, and kept him three years in his place) cauſed him to be pulled in pieces; having beforehand ſent Marcus Horatius to Alba, who razed the City, and tranſlated the Inhabitants thereof to Rome, after it had ſtood about 487 years, according to the account of Dionyſius, which is to be preferred before the other of Livie, or that of L. Florus, an Author not to be relied on, either as to Chronology, or order and diſpoſition of matters, to ſay no more.

Alba deſtroyed.

A. M. 3051.
V. C. 100.
Olymp. 31. an. 4.
Manaſſis 48.

21. To this end came Alba, through the power of its own Colony, having flouriſhed with Riches, numbers of Inhabitants, and been the Mother of thirty Latin Towns. After this, Tullus, having fully brought under the Fidenates, moved War againſt the Sabines, for robbing ſuch Romans as uſed to traffick into the Country, and refuſing to make reſtitution of the goods. He overthrew them at the Wood called Malitioſa Sylva, and forced them to beg Peace. Now alſo the Latines and Romans fell out, becauſe they refuſed to yield obedience to theſe, who challenged it as due to their City, which had conquered the Metropolis. The War was managed for five years with great moderation; onely, beſides continual Depredations, Hoſtilius puniſhed Medallia for an example, which in the time of Romulus had received a Roman Colony. Otherwiſe no Battel was fought, nor any Town taken and plundred; which made both inclinable to Peace. But at this time Tullus Hoſtilius died, having reigned 32 years; ſome ſay by Lightning, with his whole Family, for neglect of the Religion inſtituted by Numa: but moſt believed him taken away by the practices of his Succeſſor, though Dionyſius holdeth their opinion to be improbable.

Livie.
Pliny.
Plutarch.

Ancus Marcius.

Dionyſ. l. 3.

A. M. 3366.
V. C. 115.
Olymp. 35. an. 2.
Joſiæ 6.

22. After the death of Tullus, the State fell into an Inter-regnum, according to the cuſtom, and, by the Inter-rex and Senate, Ancus Marcius was elected King; who being confirmed by the People, began his Reign in the ſecond year of the 35. Olympiad, wherein Sphærus the Lacedæmonian was Victor, at what time Damaſias was annual Archon at Athens. He (who, according to what Feſtus writeth, had the Surname of Ancus from his crooked Arm, which he could not ſtretch out in length) was Grand-ſon to Numa, by his Daughter Pompilia. She was married to Marcius, the Son of that Marcius, who, being the Kinſman of Numa, came with him to Rome, after he had earneſtly perſwaded him to take upon him the Kingdom; and being elected into the Senate, after the King's death, ſtood in competition with Hoſtilius for his place, and miſſing of it laid violent hands on himſelf. Marcius his Son marrying Pompilia the Daughter of Numa, (whether by Tatia or Lucretia, is uncertain) begot on her this Ancus Marcius, who was five years old at the death of both his Grand-fathers. Ancus conſidering that much of the Superſtition brought in by Numa was neglected, ſet himſelf to reſtore the uſe thereof, alleging to the people, that the Diſeaſes, Peſtilence, and other innumerable Calamities which had lately fallen upon the City, together with the diſaſtrous end of Hoſtilius, proceeded from neglect of their Gods. He adviſed them to return to Husbandry, and other peaceable imployments, neglecting violence, and the profit that cometh by War. The State being thus reſtored, he thought, as his Grand-father had lived, ſo to paſs his time free from all War and moleſtation: but he found his expectation croſſed, for that he was compelled to be a Warriour againſt his will, and was never free from peril and tumult. Scarcely had he begun to reign, and modelled the Commonwealth, when the Latines, contemning him as a Sluggard, and unfit for military imployment, made Depredations upon the Roman Territories. Making preparation for War, Livie writeth, that he firſt denounced it, ſending to the Latines beforehand, and now conſtituted the Office of the Feciales, the Rules whereof he took from the Equicoli, an antient People.

Livius l. 1.
Plutarch. in Numa.

23. He ſurprized Politorium, a Town of the Latines, the Inhabitants of which he tranſlated to Rome, where (for that the antient Romans inhabited the Palatine, the Sabines the Capitoline, and the Cælian had been given to the new Denizons of Alba) to them was granted the Aventine Hill to poſſeſs, other Neighbours being added, when, within a while, Tilene and Sicania were taken. The Latines, much concerned at this loſs, conſpired againſt him for the Spring following; but at ſeveral times he defeated their united powers, and forced them to ask Peace: ſo did he the Fidenates, Volſci, Veientes, and ſuch Sabines as, not yet having felt the ſtrength of Rome, ſorely repined at the ſucceſs of an upſtart City. He laid a wooden bridge over the River Tiber, and fortified the Janiculum on the other ſide with a wall, having by a bridge united it to the City: and in the middle of Rome he made a Priſon for Malefactors. Neither did he onely extend the Pomœrium or Area of the City, but inlarged its Dominion. For having taken from the Veientes the Meſian Forreſt, his Territories reached to the Sea, upon which, at the mouth of Tiber, he built a Town called Oſtia, to ſecure the profit of Navigation unto his Subjects; for thither Commodities being brought by Ship, were in leſſer Veſſels conveyed to the City. Ancus Marcius reigned 24 years, coming behind the commendations of none of his Predeceſſors, either for the glory of Peace or War.

Livius lib. 1.
Dionyſ. l. 3.

A. M. 3390.
V. C. 139.
Ol. 41. an. 2.
Joſiæ 30.

The pedigree of Tarquinius Priſcus.

Feſtus in voce Gaia.

24. Ancus being dead, (of a natural death, as ſhould ſeem by Hiſtorians, ſave that Plutarch, as was ſaid, included him in the number of thoſe four that came to untimely ends) the Senate received power from the People to order the Affairs of the Commonwealth, and created certain Inter-reges, who holding the Aſſemblies for election, L. Tarquinius was choſen King, and began his reign about the ſecond year of the 41. Olympiad, wherein Cleonidas the Theban was Victor, Eniochides being Archon at Athens, the 139. of the City, and the 30. of Joſiah King of Judah. This man being of forein extraction, what his Original was, why he came to Rome, and how he attained to the Kingdom, is to be conſidered. There was a Corinthian, Demaratus by name, of the race of the Bacchiadæ, who trafficking much into Hetruria, changed his Merchandiſe for Tuſcan Commodities, and thereby growing very wealthy, when Troubles aroſe at home by means of Cypſelus his Tyranny, with all his goods ſailed from Corinth, and fixed himſelf at Tarquinia, a City of Hetruria; where marrying a noble Matron, of her he begat two Sons, called by the Hetruſcan names of Aruns and Lucumon. Aruns died without hope of iſſue; Demaratus for grief followed him not long after: ſo that Lucumon, poſſeſſed of the whole Inheritance, began to elevate his deſigns, and to look after ſome place of Magiſtracy in his Country. Here he received a repulſe, not being able to procure any mean Office; at which ſorely diſdaining, he heard that Rome received Strangers with great courteſie, and gave them free admiſſion unto Honours. He then reſolved to remove thither with his goods and friends, and after his arrival, was much made of by Ancus, to whom offering his Patrimony for the publick good, as exceeding that of a private man, he received Freedom of the City for himſelf and followers, with ground to build houſes, and for their ſuſtenance. Now he changed his name from Lucumon to Lucius, and his Wife from Tanaquil to Gaia Cæcilia, and from the place of his birth ſuperadded that of Tarquinius. During the reign of Ancus, who choſe him into the Senate, he flouriſhed in great eſteem with him, and in the favour of the People; in War no man ſhewing himſelf more hardy, nor in Council more dextrous, prudent, or ſucceſsfull: and his Integrity ſeemed ſuch unto the King, that he left him Guardian to his two Sons, whereof both were under age, and one but yet an infant.

He obtaineth the Kingdom.

His Wars.

25. He took advantage at the Minority of the eldeſt, as yet ſcarcely fourteen years old, whom ſending out of the way, under pretence of hunting, he made a Speech to the People, ſaith Livie, wherein he plainly begged the Kingdom, drawing to his private intereſt the example of Tatius and Numa, whom, being meer Strangers, they had choſen to reign over them: whereas He was not abſolutely ſuch, having lived a good ſpace in Rome, and been trained up both in civil and military Affairs under Ancus. He urged then his Liberality towards them. Which things not being meerly pretended, he obtained his end, and was the firſt that came to the Government through his own ambitious ſeeking. His firſt War was with the Latines, from whom he took ſeveral Towns, and amongſt the reſt Collatia, over which he placed Governour his Nephew Aruns Tarquinius, the poſthume iſſue of his Brother, and ſurnamed Egerius from his poverty, (having no Patrimony) and Collatinus from this place, which Surname continued to his Poſterity. Having forced the Latines to beg Peace, notwithſtanding their ſupplies out of Hetruria, he turned his Arms againſt the Sabines; whom after he had alſo forced to ſubmit, all Hetruria combined againſt him, becauſe he retained ſuch priſoners as he had taken of the Auxiliaries ſent by them to the Sabines. It was decreed amongſt them, that what Town ſoever refuſed to joyn againſt him ſhould not be accounted of their Body; and they preſently poſſeſſed themſelves of Fidenæ, a Roman Colony. But he ſo ordered the matter, that overthrowing them in ſundry Battels, and preparing for another Expedition, they were humbled; to purchaſe Peace owned him for their Prince, and, as tokens of fealty and allegiance, ſent him the Enſigns of Sovereignty wherewith their Kings had wont to be adorn'd. Theſe were a Crown of Gold, an Ivory Chair, a Scepter on the top of which was an Eagle, a Coat of purple wrought with Gold, and a purple Gown pinked; like to the Robes of the Lydian and Perſian Kings, ſave that it was not fourſquare, but of a ſemicircular figure. Some wrote alſo that they ſent 12 Axes for ſo many Cities, it being their cuſtom for every Magiſtrate in his own Town to have an Axe with Rods carried before him, and in a common Expedition twelve to be born before their General. Others contended that Romulus uſed theſe Axes and Rods as a badge of his Authority to puniſh Offenders; but Dionyſius replieth, that Romulus might learn this cuſtom of the Hetruſcans, ſcans, and if not, yet might Tarquinius have theſe ſent to him, ſeeing the People of Rome afterwards uſed to ſend Diadems and Scepters to ſuch Kings as they confirmed; which theſe Princes received, although they had worn the ſame Ornaments before.

26. In nine years he finiſhed the Hetruſcan War, and then fell again upon the Sabines, (who alone contended with the Romans for Superiority) a warlike Nation, poſſeſſing a large and fertile Countrey not far diſtant from Rome. Over them he obtained his third Triumph, and providing for another Expedition, they prevented him by their intreaties, giving up themſelves fully into his power, whom he received on the ſame terms as formerly he had done the Hetruſcans. Theſe were his Military actions. At the beginning of his reign, that he might bind the People to him, he choſe out an hundred of the Plebeians, who for valour or wiſedom were moſt eminent, and added them to the Senate, which now firſt conſiſted of 300. Romulus at the beginning choſe 100 out of the firſt Planters, then added 100 more of the moſt noble of the Sabines, who with theſe of Tarquinius were called Patres conſcripti, and the laſt Patres minorum gentium. Zonaras agreeth with Dionyſius concerning the number of Senators made by Romulus, adding, that Tatius and he at firſt conſulted with their Senators apart, but at length they were joyned together; ſo that thoſe are not to be heard, who will have but 200 in all during the time of the Kings, and 100 afterwards added by Brutus. He increaſed the number of the Veſtal Nuns from four to ſeven, adorned the Forum, built the Walls of the City (before patched up in haſte) with four-ſquare ſtones, whereof each was a Cart-load. He cauſed the common Sinks to be made for voiding the filth of the City into Tiber; a work ſo admirable, that Dionyſius thinketh, from the magnificence of it, as from the Aquæducts, and the high Cawſied ways, the Amplitude of the Roman Empire appeared. And this is manifeſted from what C. Aquilius wrote, that thoſe Sinks being once ſtopped, the Cenſors ſpent 1000 Talents in cleanſing them. In the Circus Maximus (a place dedicated to the beholding of Games and Exerciſes, betwixt the Palatine and Aventine Hills) he cauſed Seats to be raiſed for Spectators, whereas, before, all ſtood; and he diſtinguiſhed their places according to their dignity.

He encreaſeth the Senate.

The Veſtal Nuns.

Cloaca, or common Sinks.

27. Tarquinius intended to adde three Centuries of Horſemen, named after himſelf and his friends, to the former three inſtituted by Romulus. That King firſt choſe 300 out of the three Tribes, or Legions, and, after the taking in of the Sabines, increaſed the Legions, ſo that each contained 4000, whence it was called Quadrata, as Feſtus obſerveth. Yet afterwards a Legion compriſed full ſo many men as were found convenient for the ſervice of the Commonwealth. But he was forbidden by Actius Nævius to change the Conſtitution of Romulus, and therefore, without increaſe of the Centuries, doubled the number of the men. This Nævius was the moſt famous Augur that Rome ever knew, and ſo well verſed in his Art, that he never miſſed in his Predictions. Tarquinius on a time, to try him, asked if that was poſſible to be done which he had in his thoughts; who anſwering, Yea, he laughed him to ſcorn, ſaying, that he had thought of cutting a Whetſtone with a Razor which he held in his hand: but Nævius ſtill replying he ſhould doe it, and bidding him to ſtrike hard, he cut through it. This much inhanced the reputation of his skill, and he flouriſhed thenceforth with great honour, till at length he was ſuddenly miſſing, and his body never could be found, which turned to the diſquiet of Tarquinius. For the Sons of Ancus Marcius, now grown men, grudged him their Father's Kingdom, and often thought of thruſting him out, expecting much from martial men, who generally bore love to their Father's memory. Now they accuſed him to the People of having made away the Augur, (becauſe he had contradicted his devices) and created him ſome trouble; till Tullius his Son-in-law anſwered the objections, and cleared him of the Calumny. Miſſing of their deſign this way, they counterfeited repentance; and being eaſily reconciled to the old man, out of reſpect to their Father, cloaked their malice for three years. Then they cloathed two of their Companions like Shepherds, who going to the Court, and pretending to be faln out, did beat each other, and called loud upon the King for Juſtice, having at their backs other Conſpirators apparelled alſo in ruſtick weeds, who offered to give Teſtimony on both ſides. Being called in to the King they wounded him to death, and betaking themſelves to their heels were caught, confeſſed who were authors of the Plot, and received their juſt reward. To this end came Tarquinius (ſurnamed Priſcus, after his Grand-ſon of the ſame name had obtained the Kingdom) about 80 years old, when he had reigned 38 years, and done many and great good Offices for the Commonwealth.

Actius Nævius.

Tarquinius murthered.

28. Tar-

SECT. 2.

Servius Tullius his deſcent and education.

Dionyſius l. 4.
Livius l. 1.
Florus l. 1. c. 6.

28. Tarquinius Priſcus being dead, Servius Tullius his Son-in-law ſucceeded him in the fourth year of the 50. Olympiad, wherein Epitelides the Laconian was Victor, when Archeſtratides was Archon at Athens: concerning whoſe Original, and private life, ſomething is firſt to be ſpoken. A certain man of Corniculum, a Town in Latium, of Royal bloud, was ſlain when Tarquinius took the place, and left his wife Ocriſia big with Child; which Woman Tarquinius gave to his Queen Tanaquil. Ocriſia then was delivered of a Son in the King's houſe, named Tullius, and ſurnamed Servius by her in remembrance of her Bondage. When being an Infant he lay in the Cradle, a flame of fire is ſaid to have appeared, and incompaſſed his head; which raiſed great expectation of him in Tanaquil, a Woman skilfull in the myſteries of her Countrey. She brought her Husband into a great opinion of him, ſo that he was educated by them, and anſwering what had been conceived of him, at length was made their Son-in-law: then abroad he had Command in the Army, and at home managed publick Affairs for the King when grown old; in all things behaving himſelf with ſuch integrity, valour, and prudence, as purchaſed him the love of all the people. Now whereas Tarquinius had at his death no Sons (as Dionyſius maketh moſt manifeſt) but left two Grand-ſons both Infants, Tanaquil having a deſire that Tullius ſhould ſucceed him, kept his death private for ſome time, till he had procured the people to baniſh the Marcii; giving out that the King, dangerouſly wounded though not dead, had referred all buſineſs to him according to his cuſtom. Being ſecure of the Faction of the Marcii, he then carried out Tarquinius to be buried, as newly dead; and, as Tutor to the young Children, executed the Office of King: which Tanaquil out of the window had told the people was her Husband's will, when yet ſhe feigned him to be living. But the Patritians grudging Tullius this honour, conſpired how, the next time he aſſembled the Senate, they might conſtrain him to leave off all the Royal enſigns, and then go to an Election, according to the uſual manner.

29. He, coming to the knowledge hereof, aſſembled the People, and producing the two Boys, pleaded their cauſe and his own: he promiſed them to pay all their Debts, and divide to thoſe that wanted the publick Grounds. Hereby retaining the power under the notion of Guardian. The Patritians were ſore agrieved thereat, but the wiſeſt ſort thought it not good to ſtir, though they plainly ſaw the Authority of the Senate much infringed. For they conſidered, that if they ſhould make a King of their own Body, the people would not approve the choice; and if it were referred to the Multitude, Tullius would aſſuredly be the man: wherefore they thought it more wiſedom to ſuffer him to reign in an unlawfull manner, that ſo they might ever have ſome juſt pretence againſt him, than by ſtirring in the matter to procure him a legal Title. But he prevented this their deſign, going with his Mother, Mother-in-law, and all his Kindred, in mourning habits unto the Forum; where he ſhewed the People how lamentable his condition was through the plots of the Patritians againſt him, which he deſerved no otherways then by his good deeds towards the Commonality. He laid to their charge that they would call in the Marcii, that had murthered Tarquinius, and expoſe his Poſterity, who had ſo well deſerved of the State together with himſelf, to the ſame cruelty: and in concluſion, offering to lay down all, if ſuch was the pleaſure of the People, and undergo any hardſhip rather then be troubleſom, he offered to deſcend from the Tribunal. A great clamour then aroſe mixed with prayers and tears of thoſe that beſought him to retain the Government: and preſently ſome, that were provided beforehand, began to cry out that he was to be choſen King, and the Curiæ were to be called [illegible] the Vote; which thing was inſtantly reſolved by the Multitude. He gladly took hold of the opportunity, thanked them that they were mindfull of the benefits received from him, promiſed larger if he were elected King, and appointed a day for the Comitia, or Aſſembly, whereat he intended to have preſent thoſe alſo that were abroad in the Countrey. At the day appointed for the Aſſembly of the Curiæ, (called Curiata Comitia) he was choſen King by the Suffrages of them all, and ſo, in deſpite of the Conſcript Fathers, who refuſed to confirm the choice, as the manner was, obtained the Principality.

Obtaineth the Kingdom.

A. M. 3427.
V. C. 76.
Olymp. 50. an. 3.
Nebuch. 31.

30. Preſently after his ſettlement he accompliſhed his promiſe, concerning the diviſion of the publick Land to ſuch as were forced to preſerve themſelves by daily labour in other mens grounds; and in the Curiata Comitia preferred fifty Laws concerning Contracts and Injuries. He added two Hills to the former five, viz. the Viminal and Eſquiline, in the latter whereof he lived himſelf; and was the laſt man, if ſome rightly obſerve, that inlarged the Pomœrium of the City, the Wall whereof was never any farther ſtretched out, though very large Suburbs were afterwards added.

ded. After he had compaſſed all the Seven Hills within one Wall, he diſtinguiſhed the City into four parts, and, in ſtead of three, made four Tribes. And as Romulus diſtinguiſhed the People, according to their Seats and Communion in Sacrifices, into Tribes and Curiæ; ſo Servius, making every one give an account how much he was worth, according to their riches divided them into ſix Ranks, or Claſſes. Of theſe, the firſt and higheſt conſiſted of ſuch as were worth 110000 Aſſes (each of which anſwereth to ob. q. of our money,) the next four decreaſed in value a fourth part; and in the laſt were contained all ſuch whoſe Eſtates were of little or no value.

The Cenſus.

31. The Claſſes he did alſo ſo ſubdivide into Centuries, that 193 were made in all: his deſign herein being to know certainly how many were fit to bear Arms, and what Treaſure might be ſupplied for Wars, or other occaſions. He alſo firſt ordained the Luſtrum (ſo named à Luendo, (from paying) ſaith Varro, as Fluſtrum à Fluendo) to be celebrated after this Cenſus, or value of each according to their ſubſtance. On a certain day after the valuation, he enacted that all the Citizens ſhould meet in their Armour in the Campus Martius, every one in his ſeveral Claſſis and Century; where by ſacrifice the City was expiated, or Luſtrated. This Solemnity was termed Solitaurilia, (or rather Suovetaurilia,) becauſe an Hog, Sheep, and Oxe were ſacrificed, as we reade in Quintilian. Theſe things being performed, the Luſtrum was finiſhed, which, becauſe of continual change of mens Eſtates, he ordained ſhould be reiterated every five years; ſo that he (who begun it according to Lipſius, in his twelfth year) celebrated it himſelf four times, according to Valerius Maximus. Every fifth year the Tribute or Tax (called Cenſus) was paid; and thence Luſtrum ſeemeth to have had its name. After the Baniſhment of the Kings, the Conſuls managed this buſineſs, till the Cenſors (Magiſtrates proper to the work) were brought in. Laſtly, Joſeph Scaliger telleth us, we muſt diſtinguiſh the old Roman Luſtrum from the later or Julian, which is onely a Syſteme of four Julian years, whereof the laſt conſiſteth of 366 days abſolutely without any overplus of hours. For the old and proper Luſtrum contained five years compleat, which that cited by Cicero, concerning the Cenſors, out of the Laws of the Twelve Tables, Let them be two, Let them obtain the Magiſtracy for five years, maketh manifeſt: ſo that this Luſtrum cannot anſwer to an Olympiad, properly ſo called; of which beginners are to take notice.

Luſtrum.

De Lingua Latina lib. 5.

Lib. 1. cap. 5.

Lib. 3. cap. 4.

De legibus l. 3.

Dionyſ. ut ſupra.

32. Of the ſix Claſſes, which contained 193 Centuries, the firſt and richeſt was divided into 98, the Equites or Horſemen being counted in; the ſecond into 22, taking in Artificers; the third into 22, the fourth 20, the fifth 30; and the ſixth and laſt, of the poorer ſort, made up but one Century. Men and monies being levied according to theſe Centuries, and not by poll, (each Century ſuch a quantity) it came to paſs, that the richeſt being fewer, yet divided into more Centuries, (here the word is not to be taken for 100 perſons preciſely, being made uſe of onely to expreſs ſuch a Diviſion) were never free from warfare, and contributed alſo more money then the reſt: they that were but moderately or meanly provided of wealth, being exceeded by the other in twenty Centuries, went to the War by turns, and paid but little Tribute: and they that had not any eſtate to ſpeak on underwent no burthens. This ſeemed very juſt and equal to him, that they who were moſt concerned ſhould take moſt pains, and bear the greateſt charge; the Romans at that time maintaining themſelves in the Wars without any pay from the publick. But the richer ſort, ſomething grieved to undergo all charge and danger, for the preſervation of others as well as themſelves, Servius ſufficiently ſatisfied and requited, by giving them in a manner the whole prerogative in matters of State, the poorer being almoſt wholly removed from any power in the Commonwealth, though at firſt they did not perceive it.

The Centuries and Centuriata Comitia.

33. This Secret lay in the Comitia or Aſſemblies, where the People reſolved about the moſt important affairs; theſe three things being in their power, viz. Creation of Magiſtrates as well Military as Civil, making or abrogating Laws, and decreeing Peace or War: concerning which things the Suffrages of the ſeveral Curiæ were wont to be gathered, and the Vote of the pooreſt availed as much as that of the richeſt perſon; whence the poorer ſort, being much more numerous than the rich, ever prevailed by their Multitudes. Tullius underſtanding this, in ſtead of thoſe of the Curiæ, called the Comitia of the Centuries upon ſuch occaſions. Firſt of all were called the Centuries of the firſt or richeſt Claſſis, viz. the 18 of Equites or Horſemen, and the 80 of Footmen; which being three more in number then all the reſt beſides, if they all agreed, they overcame in number, and there was no need of calling any of the others to the vote: if they diſagreed, the 22 Centuries of the ſecond Claſſis were called, and, if need were, the third Claſſis, and the fourth, till 97 Centuries agreed in their Suffrages. If this happened not after the calling of the fifth, (192 Centuries being divided equally in number, and of ſeveral opinions) then was the ſixth Claſſis called, containing the laſt Century, free from Tributes and War; and to which ſide it joyned, that overcame.

34. This rarely happened, and was almoſt impoſſible, the Comitia being ended moſt commonly by the firſt call; but however, ſeldom came it to the fourth Claſſis, ſo that the two laſt were ſupervacaneous. By this Conſtitution the poorer ſort were deceived, thinking it enough that every man, as well one as another, gave his Suffrage, and not conſidering that the Suffrage of the whole Century was but one, whether it contained more or fewer perſons in it. But at length, ſeeing themſelves freed from danger and charge, they were content; and the richer, injoying ſuch privileges for their pains and coſt, were well ſatisfied. And this order was kept for many Ages; till afterwards, by the violent actings of ſome, the Common ſort got more power, as Dionyſius himſelf obſerved the Innovation to have broken in in his time. At the firſt Luſtrum were found 84700 Citizens; but to increaſe their number, he brought in the cuſtom of making Slaves free of the Commonwealth, whom being before manumitted or ſet free, he diſtributed into the four Tribes of the City.

The cuſtom of manumitting Slaves.

35. Theſe Slaves were either made, or born ſuch, as Juſtinian the Emperor diſtinguiſheth them. The former ſort were either taken in War,(then properly called Mancipia) or as ſuch bought of the publick,or of ſome private man. The latter were thoſe that were born either of both Parents being ſuch, or of the Mother onely. At firſt they obtained their Liberty gratis, by well deſerving ſome way of their Maſters, or ſome by payment of money earned by their honeſt labours, they having a certain Peculium, though all was ſaid to belong to their Maſters. But in proceſs of time, when the Romans degenerated from their former worth and honour, ſome by Robberies, others by breaking of houſes and other villanies, got money, whereby they purchaſed their Freedom. Some by helping their Maſters in theſe things obtained Liberty as a reward; others on condition to let them enjoy the monthly allowance of Corn out of the publick purſe, or other Largeſſes conferred by Princes upon poor Citizens. Sometimes they were manumitted through the levity and vain-glory of their Lords; ſome having by their Teſtaments ſet at liberty all their Slaves, to obtain a fame of clemency after their death, and that their Funerals might be celebrated by a great train of ſuch as wore caps upon that occaſion; in which pomp a thouſand Rogues have been ſeen, who much better deſerved hanging. This was laid to the charge of the Miſtreſs of the World, that challenging the Empire over all, ſhe ſhould defile her ſelf with ſuch impure Citizens: which cuſtom might have been reformed, as Dionyſius obſerveth, by the care of the Cenſors, who, inquiring into the lives of Senators and Knights, never conſidered what perſons were unfit to be admitted Free-men.

Tullius clippeth the King's power.

36. Tullius not onely clipped the power of the Patritians and Senate, but took away half of the King's Prerogative alſo. Whereas the former Princes called before themſelves all Controverſies, and took cogniſance of crimes as well committed againſt particular perſons as the publick, he ſeparated theſe Cauſes, making himſelf Judge of ſuch as reſpected the Commonwealth, and referring the quarrels of private perſons unto others, to whom he preſcribed Laws and Rules to go by. After he had thus ordered the Commonwealth, he cauſed the Latines to build a Temple at Rome to Diana, upon the Aventine Hill, whereat they ſhould meet and feaſt every year, and ſo preſerve themſelves as one body politick in unity and concord. If any controverſy aroſe betwixt particular Towns, it was to be decided by the judgement of others, in ſuch a manner as the Amphictyones in Greece were wont to proceed, the Council of the Ionians at the Temple of Epheſus, and that of the Dorienſes in the Temple of Apollo, built by common conſent at Epitropium. Theſe things were done by Tullius at home, according to Dionyſius, Livie, and others: to which we may adde from Pliny, that he firſt ſtamped money with the image of Cattel, whence it was called Pecunia, whereas the Romans before his time uſed it in a rude lump or Maſs. As for his actions abroad; he warred with the Hetruſcans 20 years, who refuſed to obey him, as an obſcure man, and renounced the League formerly made. In all Battels, both with the united Nation and particular Cities, he ever had the better, triumphed over them thrice, and at length forced them to ſubmit to the yoak on the ſame terms as formerly Tarquinius had impoſed it, except that from three Towns, that had been principal in the Revolt, he took part of their Grounds, which he divided to thoſe that had newly been made free of the City. Having done theſe things at home and abroad, when he was grown old and not far from the natural period of his life, he periſhed by the devices of Tarquinius his Son-in-law, and of his own Daughter.

Is murthered by his Son-in-law and his own Daughter.

37. Tullius had two Daughters by his Wife Tarquinia, which he married to their two Couſin-germans, the Grand-ſons of Tarquinius, joyning them in wedlock according to their age, as he thought it moſt equal and convenient. But it happened that they were matched together with thoſe of diſpoſitions clean contrary to one another. Lucius, the elder, a man of a bold, arrogant, and tyrannical nature, had an honeſt, modeſt Wife, and one moſt dutifull towards her Father: on the contrary, Aruns Tarquinius, the younger, being of a mild and ſweet diſpoſition, lighted on a wicked Woman, one of a bitter ſpirit againſt her Father, ready to attempt any thing. Lucius breaking out into paſſion againſt his Father-in-law, for keeping the Kingdom from him, was ſtill appeaſed by his Wife: but Aruns being content to ſtay his time, and averſe to any thing that might ſavour of diſreſpect to Tullius, was importuned ever and diſquieted by his Wife's earneſt and tedious ſolicitations, to attempt the utmoſt, though with the deſtruction of her Father, for the obtaining of the Sovereignty. This Woman being impatient of her Husband's backwardneſs, and bewitched by the fury of Ambition, reſolved to change Husbands, if it might be, and match her ſelf to the other Tarquin, who ſuited well with her own humor. She brake her mind to Lucius, telling him of what a ſordid ſpirit they were, to ſuffer an Uſurper ſo long to poſſeſs their Patrimony, railing againſt her own Husband, as a man of a poor and degenerate diſpoſition; and at length made a proffer for them two to diſpatch out of the way their preſent unequal Yoak-fellows, and then unite themſelves in that relation, thereby to bring about their noble and gallant Deſign. He was not backward to a compliance, and the device was accordingly brought about. After which, they reſolved by force to expell Tullius from the Kingdom, if he would not give place on his own accord, raiſing a Faction of the Patritians, that were diſcontented with the King's new modelling of the State, and the pooreſt Plebeians, whoſe aſſiſtance they purchaſed openly, without any reſpect to right or modeſty. Tullius was not ignorant what they intended, and feared alſo to be deſtroyed ere he could provide for his defence; yet thinking it an unſeemly thing to make War upon his Son-in-law and his own Daughter, and puniſh them as Enemies, he indeavoured by fair means to take them off; before their Friends, blaming, admoniſhing, and dehorting Tarquinius from the intended injury.

38. Effecting nothing hereby, but the other ſaying, that he would plead his cauſe in the Senate, he called together the Fathers, and gave him liberty to ſpeak. Tarquin laid his claim to the Kingdom, as his Grand-father's Heir, and alleged, that Tullius kept it from him unjuſtly, having got all his preferment from their Family, and obtained the place illegally, without the conſent of the Senate. Tullius replied, that the Kingdom was in the power of the People, to diſpoſe of it to whomſoever they would; which he proved from the Example of Tarquinius Priſcus, who, being a Stranger, was preferred before the Marcii. He mentioned how well he had deſerved of him, by protecting and taking care of him in his Minority; and as for his coming to the Government without the ordinary aſſent of the Senate, that concerned the Fathers, and not him. He then appealed to the Senate, whether ever he had wronged or carried himſelf arrogantly towards any of them, that they ſhould conſpire with his Son-in-law againſt him; and in concluſion told them, that if they thought Tarquinius the fitter man, he ſhould not be againſt the profit of the Commonwealth, but retire to a private life, and let the World ſee, he could as readily obey as be obeyed, after he had reſtored the Honour to thoſe from whom he had received it. Having ſtruck a great reverence of him into the Senate, he aſſembled the People, to whom, after a great complaint againſt Tarquin, and a recital of what good things he had performed for the Publick, he offered to reſign his place; but was confirmed therein, and after he had refuſed to give ear to ſuch as would have Tarquin diſpatched, with great acclamations brought home to his houſe by the multitude.

39. Tarquin thus prevented of what he expected from the Patritians, counterfeited repentance, and a deſire to be reconciled to the King, which was eaſily obtained. Covered with this Cloak he laid his deſigns anew, and being continually ſolicited by his Wife to attempt ſomething worthy of a Kingdom, took his opportunity on a day when moſt of the people were out of the City, with the Robes of Eſtate, and all Royal Enſigns as King, to go to the Senate-houſe. There he preſumed to call together the Fathers, and, ſuch being aſſembled as were appointed beforehand, he took poſſeſſion of the King's Seat. Tullius having notice hereof, unadviſedly with a few followers haſted thither, admiring the young man's impudence, whom ſeeing in his Chair, he fell of rating, and received as bad language; then going about to thruſt him out, Tarquin took him up by the midde, and haling him to the door, threw him down the ſtairs into the Comitium. The old man hardly recovering his ſpirits was led homewards, when his Daughter, Tarquin's Wife, being come in her Chariot to ſee the event, ſaluted her Husband as King, but told him his Principality would be but uncertain, except, perfecting what he had begun, he would ſend ſome who ſhould overtake and diſpatch Tullius. He took her advice, and the feat being done, ſhe preſently returned home the ſame way. In her paſſage when ſhe came to the place where the body lay as yet almoſt gaſping, her Chariot-driver ſtood ſtill, confounded at the ſight, and not having room to paſs beſides it. Hereat ſhe reviled him, and cauſed him to drive her over it, after ſhe had firſt thrown her footſtool at his head. The place, formerly called Cyprius Vicus, was afterwards named Sceleratus, from that occaſion. To this end came Servius Tullius, after he had reigned 44 years, a man juſt and moderate, who aboliſhed the envy contracted in his illegal aſſumption, by his after-acts, and was thought, if he had not been prevented, to have intended to lay down his Office, and reſtore abſolute Liberty with the care of the Commonwealth to the People; which ſome of the Patritians perceiving, took in the intereſt of Tarquinius, that they might preſerve their own power.

SECT. 2.

Dionyſ. & Feſtus in voce Sceleratus Vicus.

Dionyſ. lib. 4. Livius l. 1. Florus l. 1. c. 7.

Lucius Tarquinius, ſurnamed Superbus.

40. Lucius Tarquinius obtained the Kingdom by violence in the fourth year of the 61. Olympiad, wherein Agatharchus was Victor, when Heraclius (or rather Heraclides) was Archon at Athens. By his Tyrannical and imperious carriage he ſoon got the ſurname of Superbus, as that of Priſcus, for diſtinction, was given to his Grand-father. He would not ſuffer his Father-in-law's body to be buried publickly, for fear it ſhould give occaſion to the people to riſe againſt him, ſaying, that Romulus died without Burial. He murthered ſuch as he ſuſpected to favour the cauſe of Tullius, and fearing what end his wickedneſs might bring upon him, got to him a ſtrong Guard which continually attended his perſon. He reigned onely by his own arbitrary will, neither ſtanding upon the conſent of the Senate nor People. As for the former, he much diminiſhed it by the murther of the richer ſort, whoſe wealth he ſeized on for his own uſe, and reſolved to chuſe no more in, that it might wear out, and grow contemptible. All Controverſies he decided himſelf, aſſiſted by his intimate friends, and took cognizance of all Offences, ſo as he might kill, baniſh, or fine at his pleaſure. He ſought to eſtabliſh himſelf and confirm his Tyranny by great Alliance, marrying his Daughter to Octavius Mamilius, the greateſt man amongſt the Latines, (being deſcended from Telegonus the ſon of Ulyſſes by Circe;) and by falſe accuſation and a cunning device cauſed them to ſtone Turnus Herdonius, who had diſcovered to them his baſeneſs and villanies. He began a War with the Volſci, which ended not with him, but laſted above 200 years; and ſubdued the Sabines, who refuſed to obey him. From the Volſci he took Sueſſa Pometia, (where getting much plunder, he firſt caſt in his head the deſign of building a Temple to Jupiter, which his Grand-father had formerly vowed) and afterwards the City Gabii by treachery, making Sextus his eldeſt Son to counterfeit flight from him for hard uſage, whereby he was made their General, and having, according to the ſecret advice of his Father, (who, in imitation of Thraſybulus the Mileſian, carried the meſſenger into the field, and cut down the talleſt Poppies, diſmiſſing him without any other meſſage) put to death the moſt principal Citizens, at length eaſily betrayed it into his hands. After this he made peace with the Æqui, and renewed the League with the Tuſcans. Then went he forward with the work of the Temple formerly deſigned.

A. M. 3471. V. C. 220. Olymp. 61. an. 4. Cyri 26.

His Wars.

Buildeth the Capitol.

The Capitol.

41. Tarquinius Priſcus, in his laſt War with the Sabines, made a Vow, that if he got the Victory, he would build Temples to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; and with great coſt had in his life-time levelled the Rock, and formed a plot for the Building; but died before he could finiſh the work. Tarquinius his Grand-ſon, reſolving to perfect what he had begun with the plunder of Sueſſa, ſet on all ſorts of workmen; at which time, as they were digging to lay the foundation, a man's Head was found bleeding afreſh, which belonging to one called Tolus, thence the building had the name of Capitol. He perfected a great part of the Temple, but could not conſummate the work, being prevented by Exile; which was finiſhed by the City in the third Conſulſhip after its Freedom. It was ſeated upon an high Cragge, eight Acres in compaſs, almoſt two hundred foot wide on every ſide, and almoſt of the ſame length and breadth, as differing onely in fifteen feet. After it had ſtood 425 years from its Dedication, it was conſumed by fire in the days of Sylla, when L. Scipio and Caius Norbanus were Conſuls, as Tacitus writeth: Yet it roſe again with greater coſt and ornament on the ſame foundation. Its front looking toward the South had a Porch, or Gallery, with three rows of Pillars: on each ſide were alſo alſo a double row. The three Temples were contained within the ſame Walls, the middle belonging to Jupiter, and the other two to Juno and Minerva, under the ſame roof.

Hiſt. l. 3. c. 14.

42. In the time of this Tarquinius, another great bleſſing, as it was counted, happened to the Romans. A certain ſtrange Woman came to the King, offering to ſell nine Books of the Oracles of Sibyl: which when he refuſed to buy at her rate, ſhe went away, and burning three of them, returned; and demanded as much for the ſix. Being derided for a mad woman, ſhe departed, and burning half of them, returned with the other three, ſtill asking as much as at the firſt. Whereat Tarquin aſtoniſhed, ſent for the Augures to know her meaning; who anſwered, that the Nine ought to have been bought, and the Three were to be purchaſed at the ſame Rate. The Woman after the ſale and delivery vaniſhed, and never after could be ſeen. Tarquin choſe two men out of the Nobility to keep them, to whom he allowed two publick ſervants. After his Expulſion the people elected moſt noble perſons, who all their lives executing this Office were freed from all other burthens, both Military and Civil, to whom onely it was lawfull to look in them. No ſacred thing was ſo carefully kept as theſe Sibylline Oracles. They were conſulted by decree of the Senate when the Commonwealth was diſturbed by any Seditions, when any great Overthrow was received in War, or any Prodigies happened. They were kept by the Decemviri, or Ten men appointed to this Office, within a Vault under the Capitol, in a ſtone Cheſt, till they periſhed at the burning of the place. Thoſe that the Romans uſed afterwards were copied out of ſuch as belonged to other Cities, and private perſons, wherein were ſome ſuppoſititious things, which they diſtinguiſhed by the difference of the Acroſticks.

Sibyls.

Sibyls books.

43. The Woman that brought thoſe Books to Tarquin having the name of Sibylla, and there being many found to whom it hath been given beſides, ſomething is to be ſaid of thoſe Women, for diſtinction. The firſt Sibylla, or Woman-Propheteſs, (to which the * Counſel of Jupiter was communicated, as the word importeth) was a Perſian, according to (a) Varro, or elſe a Chaldæan, or an Hebreweſs, born at Noe, a City near the Red-Sea: her name was Sambetha, her father called Baroſſus and her mother Erymantha. The ſecond was a Libyan. Themis of Delphos was the third. The fourth was called Cumæa, becauſe ſhe was born at Cimærium, a Town of Campania in Italy, near to Cuma. The fifth of Erythræ, a City of Ionia in Aſia, at this day called Cabo Bianco. The ſixth was of the Iſland Samus, her name being Phyto. The ſeventh of Cuma, and called Cumana, her proper name being Amalthea, according to ſome; but Herophile and Demophila according to others. Suidas calleth her Hierophile, and ſaith ſhe brought nine Books to Tarquinius Priſcus, and demanded for them 300 Philippines, being Gold Coyn of Philip King of Macedonia. Pliny, contrary to the common account of Writers, mentioneth three books, not nine, and writeth that ſhe burnt two of them. But the eighth was called Helleſpontiaca, being born in the Trojan Country upon the Helleſpont, in a Village named Marmiſſus near to Gergetium, which Heraclides of Pontus affirmed to have flouriſhed in the days of Solon and Cyrus. The ninth was a Phrygian, and propheſied at Ancyra. The tenth was of Tybur, by name Albanea, being worſhipped for a Goddeſs at that place, near the Banks of the River Aniene, wherein her Image is ſaid to have been found holding a Book in one hand. Theſe ten are reckoned by Varro. There were ſeveral others alſo. (b) Strabo maketh two to have lived at Erythræ, whereof the latter flouriſhed in the time of Alexander. There was another of Colophon, a City of Ionia. Eliſſa, and Caſſandra the Daughter of Priamus, were accounted Sibyls. There were alſo a Theſſalian, Manto the Daughter of Tireſias the Theban, and another of Epirus. Moreover, Carmentis the Arcadian, the Mother of Evander and Fauna, or Fatua, the Siſter and Wife of Faunus, King of the Aborigenes in Italy, might be reckoned in the number.

* Σιὸς βȣλή.

(a) Vide Ludov. Vivem in Auguſtin. de Civitate Dei, lib. 18. cap. 23.

(b) Lib. 14. pag. 633.

The ſiege of Ardea.

44. In the work of the Capitol Tarquin employed the people, and in other baſer works, wherewith he even tired them out; ſo that to appeaſe them, and eſpecially to recruit his own Coffers, he made War againſt the Rutuli, and beſieged the rich City Ardea, five German miles, toward the Eaſt, diſtant from Rome. The Quarrel he pretended to be, for that they received the Roman Exiles, and endeavoured to reſtore them: but the true cauſe was his thirſt after the Riches of this moſt flouriſhing place, once the Metropolis of the Rutuli. While he lay before this Town, taking great pains to gain it, and the other as eagerly reſiſting, (yet ſo as he ſeemed to have hope to carry it) an act of his eldeſt Son Sextus occaſioned both the freedom of the one and other City. Dionyſius writeth, that he was ſent to Collatia about ſome buſineſs concerning the War, and going to the Sextus Tarquinius raviſheth Lucretia.

houſe of Tarquinius Collatinus his Kinſman, (Grand-ſon to Egerius the Nephew of Priſcus) he raviſhed his Wife Lucretia, the Daughter of Lucretius a Noble Roman. Livy and Aurelius Victor relate, that the Courtiers drinking together in the Camp before Ardea, and with them Tarquinius Collatinus the Son of Egerius, they fell ſeverally on praiſing each one his own Wife; inſomuch as proceeding to an earneſt diſpute, Collatinus ſaid there needed not many words, for that they might ſee within a few hours how far his Lucretia excelled them all; and he deſired them to ride to the ſeveral places, and judge according as they ſhould find. Being well heated with wine they agreed to this motion, and away they rode. They found not Lucretia junketing, and idlely ſpending her time as the King's Daughters-in-law, but late at night hard at work amongſt her Maids; ſo that by conſent of all ſhe far excelled the reſt, and Collatinus nobly entertaining his Gueſts returned with them to the ſiege.

45. Now was Sextus Tarquinius inflamed with a luſtfull deſire after Lucretia, becauſe of her Beauty, and, as it happeneth towards difficult or forbidden things, the more becauſe of her eminent Chaſtity. Within few days, without the knowledge of her Husband, accompanied onely with one ſervant, he returned to Collatia, where being kindly entertained by her, he was brought to his Bed-chamber: but when he thought all aſleep, having obſerved where ſhe lay, with a naked Dagger he went to her, and laying his hand on her breaſt, threatned her with death if ſhe offered to ſtir. He mixed threats with fair words, but yet could not prevail, till he told her he would firſt kill her, and then his Slave, whom laying by her ſide, he would report it was for having ſurprized her in Adultery with him; whereby obtaining his prey, in the morning he departed. When he was gone, ſhe ſent for her Father from Rome, and her Husband from the Camp, (or ſay ſome, went her ſelf to the City) deſiring they would call together ſome friends, for that a matter of great importance had befallen her. With Lucretius came Publius Valerius, and with Collatinus, Junius Brutus; who finding her in her Chamber in a ſad and afflicted condition, ſhe told them the whole matter, refuſed to admit any comfort, and intreating them to revenge her cauſe upon the Author of her ſorrow, ſtabbed her ſelf to the heart before them, with a knife ſhe had kept cloſe about her for that purpoſe.

Lucretia killeth her ſelf.

Junius Brutus.

46. Lucius Junius, ſurnamed Brutus, was the Son of Marcus Junius, who being deſcended from one of the Companions of Æneas, and, for his Vertue, very eminent amongſt the Romans, married Tarquinia the Daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus, of which he begat this Lucius. This Lucius was nobly educated, inſtructed in all diſciplines of the City, and of a pregnant wit. But after that Tarquin had privily murthered his Father, (not for any offence, but to poſſeſs his great eſtate, as he did ſeveral others) and with him his eldeſt Brother, who ſeemed to bear ſuch a mind as would revenge the injury, he being young, and deſtitute of any aſſiſtance from his kindred, counterfeited himſelf a fool, which he acted all along, and thence had the ſurname of Brutus; this being the ſole remedy againſt the cruelty of the Tyrant, who thinking his folly not feigned but real, deſpiſed the man, and having ſpoiled him of his Patrimony, kept him as an Ideot in his houſe, and ſuffered him to converſe with his Children, not out of reſpect as a Kinſman, but to make them ſport by his ridiculous words and actions, as true Ideots are wont to doe. On a time a great Peſtilence having ſeized on the City, he ſent him to Delphos with his two Sons Sextus and Titus, to conſult the Oracle. They were glad they had him to make them merry, and laughed at him for offering to Apollo a wooden ſtaff, wherein yet he had ſecretly put ſome Gold, having made it hollow for that purpoſe. Having privately enquired which of them ſhould be Prince of Rome, it was anſwered, he who firſt of all ſhould kiſs his Mother; which the young men miſunderſtanding, agreed betwixt themſelves, that at their rettrn they would doe it, and ſo reign, joyntly together. But Brutus, as ſoon as they arrived in Italy, knowing the meaning of the Oracle, fell and kiſſed the Earth which is Mother of all. When, under the Vizard of a Fool, he waited for an opportunity to revenge himſelf and Family upon Tarquin, this diſaſter of Lucretia at length preſented it ſelf.

He urgeth the baniſhment of Tarquin.

47. Being ſent for beforehand, or coming in with Collatinus his Kinſman after the death of Lucretia, as Dionyſius writeth, while her Husband and Friends were lamenting over the dead body, he told them it was not time now to weep, but to ſtudy how to revenge the injury. He acquainted them with the cauſe of his aſſuming the name and behaviour of an Ideot, and manifeſting himſelf to be a moſt cunning man, deſired they might unanimouſly joyn for the Expulſion of Tarquinius nius and his Friends from the City, ſpeaking many things efficacious to perſwade them to it. Finding every one very ready, he ſaid there was no need of words and promiſes, but real deeds, if they meant to perform any thing, and that he firſt would begin. Then went he to the dead body, and taking the bloudy knife in his hand, ſware by Mars and the reſt of their Gods, to caſt out Tarquinius Superbus with his wicked Wife and Progeny, to proſecute them or their Friends with fire and ſword, or any other way, and never after that to ſuffer the Tarquins, or any other to reign in Rome. He made them all ſucceſſively take the ſame Oath; then for the way how to bring the matter about, ſaid, the Gates of the City ſhould be ſafely kept, that the King might not hear the leaſt word, till he who was Prince of the Sacrificers, ſhould, as he might by his place, aſſemble the people, to which the dead Body being exhibited, and Lucretius with Collatinus deploring their condition, they might procure the Baniſhment of Tarquin by a publick Decree, that ſhould be preſently diſpatched to the Army for its concurrence.

48. But before Tarquinius ſhould be removed, they thought it Wiſedom to conſider what Magiſtracy was fit to ſucceed his; leſt they ſhould pull down the preſent dwelling before another houſe was prepared. Some were for Monarchy, as indeed the beſt of Governments; others for Ariſtocracy, or the Rule of the Senate; and others would have the whole Power put into the hands of the People: each party bringing examples of good Government in the ſeveral kinds. Brutus ſaid the time was ſhort, and theſe matters required mature deliberation, which neither at length could produce ſuch a form as would be void of all inconveniencies. He ſaid, he hoped that after the expulſion of the Tyrants, they ſhould have leiſure to conſider how they might beſt reform the Commonwealth, if any better way could be found out than what Romulus, Pompilius, and the other Kings had chalked out to them, wherein proceeding, till Tarquin forſook the path, the City had been happy and famous, both for its Acts abroad, and Conſtitutions at home. This he could not deny: yet however, he thought thoſe incommodities, as he called them, had procured the Kingly power to degenerate into Tyranny; and therefore were at preſent to be aboliſhed, and to be taken heed of for the time to come. As firſt, becauſe ſome men made a great matter of very Names, he thought that of a Kingdom was to be left off, and the other of Commonwealth to be aſſumed; and that for the Title of King and Monarch, ſome more modeſt and popular was to be invented. Then the Regal power he judged not ſafely to be intruſted with a ſingle perſon; but that two were to be choſen, who ſhould Govern with equal command and authority, and ſo be a counter-poize each to other. Of all royal Enſigns or Ornaments, ſuch as procured the envy and grudge of the People were to be laid aſide, viz. Scepters, golden Crowns, and purple Robes of Cloth of gold, except upon Feſtival days, and in triumphal Pomps; which rare uſe of them would not be at all ſpoken againſt: but as for the Ivory Chair in which they ſate in Judgment, with the white Robe edged with Purple, called Prætexta, and the twelve Lictors or Sergeants, bearing Rods and Axes, they were to be continued. He added, that the main thing to keep theſe Magiſtrates in order, was, to prevent their perpetual Power, which would keep them from giving account of their Actions: wherefore he thought fit their Magiſtracy, after the manner of Athens, ſhould be but Annual, that ſo each one might learn as well to be ſubject as to govern, and this would preſerve the mind from being drunk with too much liberty. Laſtly, that the name of King might not utterly periſh, (whence may be concluded, that his judgement was not againſt the Office, though his paſſion was) he would have the title given to one who ſhould be called Rex Sacrorum, and having this honour for his life, with immunity from warfare, ſhould meddle with nothing elſe but theſe ſuperſtitious Rites, of which the Kings had charge before.

Preſcribeth a new model of Government.

Dionyſius.

49. Having firſt got a Decree of the Senate for the King's Baniſhment, according to the cuſtom of publick proceeding, the Comitia were aſſembled by Brutus, and the Body of Lucretia brought in her gore into the meeting-place, where it was ſet for a ſpectacle to all. Brutus then diſcovered himſelf, told them why he had ſeemed what he now appeared never to have been; and then declared the occaſion of their meeting to be, that the Patritians might have their aſſent for baniſhing Tarquin, who, having obtained the Principality illegally, had abuſed it more than any Tyrant that was ever heard of. He illuſtrated his aſſertion by a relation of his Crimes: as of his poyſoning his own Brother before he was King, together with his lawfull Wife, and marrying the other Siſter that was partaker with him in his wickedneſs; his killing Servius Tullius, and ſtrangling his Wife whom he ought to have reſpected as Parents; then his invading the Government, without Decree of Senate or Suffrages of the People, by force of Arms. He reckoned up the injuries received by the Patritians, moſt of whom he had made away, and reduced the reſt to the eſtate of beggars; how from the Plebeians he had taken Laws, Religious Meetings, the Comitia and Suffrages, and uſed them no better than Slaves bought with money. He then demanded how long they ſhould endure this bondage; whether no longer than till the death of Tarquin: whenas he had three Sons more wicked and miſchievous than himſelf, eſpecially the elder, which he proved by the ſpectacle before their eyes; telling them then the whole ſtory. This advantage he improved to the utmoſt, ſhewing how the King being now abſent, and the Patritians reſolved, nothing could be wanting to them, if they had but courage for the enterprize; not Men, Money, Arms, Captains, nor foreign aid: urging, that it was a ſhame they ſhould think of commanding the Volſci, Sabines, or others, and be Slaves to others at home; or maintain ſo many Wars for to ſerve the Ambition of Tarquin, and undertake none for their own Liberty. As for the Army now at the Siege, there was no fear, but that for their own freedom and accommodation, they would readily cloſe with them; and if any ſhould be found to intend the contrary, they had their Wives and Children as Hoſtages in the City, whereby they might eaſily draw them off.

The people decree Tarquinius his Baniſhment.

50. The Multitude being variouſly affected with hope of Liberty, and fear to miſs of it, during his Speech, yet made acclamations to the particulars, and at the end, with one voice deſired he would give them Arms. He ſaid he would, if firſt they would confirm what was offered from the Fathers, as the beginning of their Liberty; and therewithall recited the form of this ſevere Decree, that the Tarquinii ſhould be baniſhed with all their Off-ſpring, and be capital for any one to ſpeak or act for their return. The ſeveral Curiæ being called, confirmed it by all their Suffrages; which being done, he acquainted them how it was agreed, that unto two men the Government ſhould be committed, whom they ſhould elect in their Centuriata Comitia, which was alſo paſſed. Then according to the cuſtom, by vertue of his Office formerly mentioned, he named Sp. Lucretius to be Inter-rex for holding of the Comitia or Aſſembly; who adjourned the meeting to the Campus Martius, where it was the cuſtom for the Romans in their Armour to elect Magiſtrates. There he named Brutus and Collatinus (as was formerly agreed on betwixt the Conſpirators) for to have the Regal power, and the Centuries confirmed them by their Suffrages. In the mean time, whilſt theſe things were done in the City, Tarquinius, having heard by ſuch as eſcaped out ere the gates were ſhut, that Brutus called the people to their Liberty, making none acquainted but his Sons and ſome truſty Friends, with them rode away in all haſt, to prevent the general defection; but finding the Gates faſt ſhut, and the Walls full of Armed men, in great grief he returned to the Camp. There now he could not be received; for Brutus foreſeeing his ſudden coming, ſent Letters to the Army, (or went himſelf by another way than that he knew he would come) wherein he acquainted them with the Decree of the People, and deſired that they would revolt from the King. The Letters were read to the Souldiers by T. Herminius and M. Horatius, whom Tarquin had left to govern the Army; and they being called to give their Suffrages alſo by Centuries, all thought that what their Friends at home had done was to be approved, and would not admit the King at his return. Fruſtrated of this hope, he went to Cære in Hetruria, ſaith Livie, to Gabii ſaith Dionyſius, where he had made his Son Sextus King, now gray-headed, having reigned 25 years. Herminius and Horatius took Truce with the Enemy for 15 years, and breaking up the Siege before Ardea, returned with the Army. This happened in the 244. year of the City, after the account of Cato, but the 245. according to the computation of Terentius Varro, in the latter end of the 67. Olympiad, or the beginning of the 68. A. M. 3496. Pliny writeth, that it was the ſame year wherein the Piſiſtratidæ were baniſhed Athens; and Clemens joyneth it with the recovery of Babylon by Darius Hyſtaſpis. This was ſomewhat above twenty years after the beginning of Cyrus, and the deſtruction of the Babylonian Empire.

He is driven into exile.

A. M. 3496.
V. C. 245.
Olymp. 67. an. 4.
Darii 13.

AN INSTITUTION OF General Hiſtory.

The Firſt Part.

BOOK II.

Of the Perſian Empire, and the Affairs of the World Contemporary with it.

CHAP. I.

The Perſian Empire.

SECT. I.

From the beginning of the Empire of Cyrus, to the death of Cambyſes his Son and Succeſſor.

1. CYRUS having obtained the Empire of the Eaſt through the Conqueſt of Babylon, after a three years ſiege, as is conjectured, Ezra. 1. 11. was ſenſible of Gods providence therein (whom he underſtood to have foretold it, and called him by name above 100 years before he was born) and out of obedience to his decree, gave leave to all the Jews that were in Captivity in his Dominions, to return to their own Countrey, the 70 years of their exile foretold by Jeremiah the Prophet being now expired. The Jews return out of Captivity. In compliance with this opportunity Zorubbabel the ſon of Salathiel, and Grand-ſon to Jechoniah as Captain, with Joſhua the ſon of Joſedec (which Joſedec was brother to Eſdras, and ſon to Seraiah the Chief Prieſt, who being Counſellour to Zedekiah was ſlain by Nebuchadneſar, the year wherein Jeruſalem was taken) and 42462 Jews (as Joſephus reckoneth up the number) departed, and went into Judæa. Antiqu. l. 11. c. 1. Though the other Tribes formerly led into Captivity by Salmanaſar might have the ſame liberty of returning, yet having together with the memory of their antient Countrey loſt their affection to their God, and it, regarded not the time, the Lord having onely promiſed liberty of returning to thoſe that were exported by Nebuchadneſar. And a great part of the Tribe of Judah it ſelf (if not the greater) unwilling to leave their poſſeſſions got in a ſtrange Land, as alſo diſcouraged by the difficulties and troubles they were to undergo, preferred perpetual baniſhment before the ſeat and habitation of their Anceſtors.

2. In the ſecond year of the Perſian Empire, and the ſecond moneth, when all things were in a readineſs, according to Commiſſion given by the King (who defrayed the charge out of his own Revenue, and reſtored the Golden Veſſels carried away by Nebuchadneſar) the Levites were ſet over the work of the

A. M. 3474.
V. C. 223.
*Olymp.*62. *an.*2.

Sect. 1.

The ſecond Temple built at Jeruſalem.

Lords houſe, and Zorubbabel laid the foundation of the ſecond Temple, to the joy of the younger ſort born in Captivity, but with the lamentation of the elder, who had ſeen the glory of the former houſe. When the Chuthites (whom Eſarhaddon planted in Samaria) heard of their progreſs in the work, they firſt fraudulently offered their aſſiſtance, pretending the ſame religion, and being rejected ſo corrupted the Courtiers (who either kept the thing from Cyrus, or he was then buſied in his Wars, as Joſephus writeth) that the building was hindred for ſeveral years, untill the ſecond of Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes. For this the Prophet Daniel (who was yet alive, and nigh 90 years old, as having been carried into Captivity 73 years before) mourned, and faſted three weeks, and had the great, and laſt Viſion concerning the future Kings of Perſia, of Alexander the Great, and his Succeſſors in Aſia and Egypt, untill the time of the Haſmonæans, or Maccabees. But whether he lived paſt the third year of Cyrus or no is uncertain. Dan. 10.

The end of Cyrus variouſly reported.

3. Concerning the end of Cyrus many and ſeveral things are written. According to Herodotus, Trogus and others he invaded the Maſſagetes, and periſhed in their Countrey. The Queen of this Scythian people named Tomyris he firſt made a pretence to ſue to for marriage, but ſhe being aware of this deſign to entrap her forbad him entrance; whereupon betaking himſelf from wiles to force he laid a Bridge over the River Araxes, and provided for the paſſing of his Army over. Whil'ſt he thus employed himſelf, ſhe was ſo hardy as to ſend him a meſſage, offering him either to invade her Countrey, or elſe to permit her a paſſage into his. Amazed at it, he referred the matter to his Council what ſhould be done therein, where ſome adviſed him to ſuffer her to paſs the River, but Cræſus ſtifly oppoſed it, ſhewing the danger in caſe he were overthrown but in one battle, and adviſed him after he had ſet over his men, and diſcovered the Enemy, to leave the weakeſt ſort amongſt his Army there in the Camp plentifully provided of ſtrong Wines, with which liquor being utterly unacquainted, they would make themſelves drunk, and ſo might be eaſily deſtroyed. This advice ſucceeded accordingly, and amongſt the reſt Spargapiſes the Queen's Son was taken priſoner, who as ſoon as he came to himſelf deſired to be looſed, and put an end to his life with his own hands, out of a deep ſence of his condition. His Mother knowing nothing of his death, with threatning language required Cyrus to diſmiſs him, and when ſhe ſaw he returned not, gathered together all her forces, wherewith counterfeiting flight ſhe trained the King into ſtreights, and by an ambuſh laid in the Mountains, cut him off with his whole Army to the number of 200000 men. His head ſhe caſt into a Baſon of Blood, upbraiding him with cruelty in theſe words: Satisfie thy ſelf with blood after which thou haſt thirſted. To this ſtory Diodorus addeth that ſhe nailed his Body to a Croſs. Lib. 2.

4. But Cteſias wrote that the laſt War he made was againſt the Derbices, a people alſo of Scythia, whom though he overcame, yet he received a wound in fight, of which he dyed three days after. Xenophon ſaith he died aged, and in peace, and how finding himſelf almoſt ſpent, he called to him his friends, with his two ſons Cambyſes and Smerdis, or Tanaoxares, whom (after a long Oration, wherein he diſcourſed much concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the puniſhment and reward which is due to things committed in this life) he exhorted by the ſtrongeſt arguments to perpetual concord and love. If ſo, he acted like one that had received the knowledge of the true God, which he had opportunity alſo to know from Daniel and others, being by them inſtructed in the Scriptures. Some think that the variety of theſe reports proceeded from the ſtudy of the Perſians to conceal the ſhame of his being overthrown by the policy of a woman. Others obſerve, that had he loſt his whole Army in Scythia, it is ſcarce probable that his Son would have tranſported all his remaining Forces into Egypt ſo ſoon, and hereby leave that ſide of his Kingdom deſtitute and naked, when the Scythian Nation bordering upon Media was ſo victorious: not to add that Cambyſes would not have been able to undertake, and perform ſuch a Conqueſt in ſo little a ſpace. Conſiderable certainly is that which the Writers of Alexander's Acts have committed to memory, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arrianus, and even Ariſtobulus (who by command of the King was an eye witneſs of it) as he is cited by Strabo: That he was buried in his own City Paſagardis in Perſia, where his Epitaph was plain to be read, in which after telling the Traveller who he was, he deſired him not to grudge him that Earth wherewith his Body was covered. The Tomb was opened by Alexander, either Lib. 15. p. 730. Vide Plutarch. in Alexandro.

Sect. 1.

ther out of hope to find ſome Treaſure, or (what was pretended) out of deſire to honour his dead body with ſome Ceremonies, and in it were found an old Target, two Scythian Bows and a Sword. The Coffin wherein he lay Alexander cauſed to be covered with his own Roab, and a Crown of Gold to be ſet thereon. Theſe things ſomething weaken the credit of that opinion which Herodotus relateth as the moſt probable of thoſe that were held in his time. But leſs credit is to be given to that * which will have him ſlain in a Sea-fight againſt the inhabitants of Samus; and * another that lengtheneth his life to 100 years, whereas he ſcarce paſſed 70. Herodotus giveth to his reign 29 years; but moſt agree that he reigned 30. which muſt be counted from his firſt obtaining the Kingdom of Media.

* Malela.
* Lucian in Macrobiis.

5. What time paſſed from the Conqueſt of Babylon, and the beginning of his Monarchy, unto his death, is controverted amongſt learned Writers. Some reckon ten years, or thereabouts, and others but three, of which number was once Joſeph Scaliger, who afterwards retracted it as an error; but Ludovicus Cappellus hath renewed the aſſertion, making it probable by arguments drawn from Scripture, who therefore is to be conſulted in his ſacred * Chronology. Cyrus had iſſue two Sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis, or Tanaoxares, with three daughters, Atoſſa, Meroe, and Artyſtona, to which Cteſias addeth Amytis. Atoſſa and Meroe their brother Cambyſes afterwards married; and Darius Hyſtaſpis obtained Artyſtona, as alſo Atoſſa after the death of Cambyſes. Of the two ſons, to Cambyſes he left his Kingdom, and to Smerdis or Tanaoxares aſſigned the Government of Media, Armenia, and the Caduſians, according to Xenophon.

His iſſue.

* In notis ad Tab. 13.

Cambyſes maketh War upon Egypt.

6. Cambyſes preſently after he came to the Government, made all poſſible proviſion for a war with Egypt, the cauſe wereof is to be enquired after. Herodotus telleth a ſtory how he ſent to Amaſis King of that Countrey to deſire his daughter Nitetis in marriage, which he not daring to deny becauſe of the then formidable Power of the Perſians, and not willing to gratifie him abſolutely, for that he conceived his daughter would be entertained but as a Concubine, he found out a way as he thought to ſatisfie Cambyſes, and yet keep his daughter. There was one of Apries his predeceſſor's daughters yet unmarried, her he ſent to him under the name of his own, who when ſhe had ſufficiently ingratiated her ſelf with Cambyſes, told him how indeed ſhe was nothing a kin to Amaſis, but begotten by his Lord and Maſter; whereat the Perſian conceived ſuch indignation, that, to be revenged on him, he invaded Ægypt. But that which moved Cambyſes to ſend for this woman, ſeemeth ſomething ſtrange. He had formerly deſired from Amaſis a Phyſician for the Eyes, the beſt that could be procured in Ægypt, wherewith he gratifying him, the man took it ſo ill of Amaſis to be ſent out of his native Country, that in way of revenge, he moved the matter to Cambyſes, concluding with himſelf, that the King of Ægypt would not ſend his own daughter: This was the ſaying of the Perſians; which Herodotus rather approveth than what the Ægyptians alledged, that Cambyſes was ſon to Nitetis the daughter of Apries, and that the Perſians aſcribed that to the Son which belonged to the Father, becauſe they would have Cambyſes born of Caſſandane the daughter of Pharnaſpes, of the noble race of Achæmenes; and yet he confeſſeth there was a report, that beſides Caſſandane, Cyrus kept Nitetis as his Concubine, whom he moſt affected, and that to revenge his Mother upon her, Cambyſes when but young threatned, and after his Father's death made War upon Ægypt. However things might go in reference to the daughter of Apries, Cambyſes ſeemeth to have invaded that Kingdom, upon pretence of the right he had to it as Heir by conqueſt to Nebuchadneſar, who ſubdued it, though it revolted from his Succeſſors; which might be concealed from Herodotus by the Prieſts, who ſpared not to invent lyes for a cover to the diſgrace of their Country.

Lib. 3. cap. 1.

A. M. 3476.
Olymp. c. 2.
*an.*4. *V.C.*225.
Cambyſis 1.

Vide Polyænum lib. 8.

7. While Cambyſes was yet buſie in his preparations, one Phanes an Halycarnaſſæan by birth, taking ſomething in diſtaſte from Amaſis, whom he ſerved, fled out of Ægypt by ſhip, and coming into Perſia, adviſed this King, that for his better paſſage of the ſandy Deſarts, he ſhould ſend to the King of the Arabians for ſafe conduct, who being no good friend to the Ægyptian, came and met him with Camels bearing abundance of water, which was neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of the Army in that hot and dry place. Ere Cambyſes could arrive in Ægypt, Amaſis had prevented captivity by a natural death, and Pſammenitus his Son having ſucceeded him, expected his coming at Peluſium one of the mouths of Nile. Here a Battle being fought, the Ægyptians were overthrown and fled to Memphis, whither Cambyſes ſent after them to yield up themſelves to him; but they tare in pieces the Meſſengers, and then being beſieged, ſtood out for ſome time; but at length the City was taken. Pſammenitus had his Son put to death before his eyes, to try his patience, though the Conqueror too late repented of it, and had given him his life with the Kingdom to govern, as a Province, had he not attempted new matters, for which he was forced to drink Bulls blood, and ſo died, having reigned ſix months after his Father.

Vide Herod. l. 3. cap. 4. &c.

Paſſeth through the Sandie Deſarts.

Conquereth Ægypt.

His extravagant practices.

8. This work done in Ægypt, Cambyſes betook himſelf to extravagant practices. The dead body of Amaſis he cauſed to be brought forth, to be beaten, pinched, and then burnt, contrary to the practice as well of the Perſians as Ægyptians, who abhorred ſuch a thing, becauſe the former accounted Fire a God, and the latter a ravenous beaſt, periſhing with the thing devoured by it. Then reſolved he to make a three-fold War: One upon the Carthaginians, another upon the Ammonians, or the Inhabitants of the place ſituate about the Temple of Jupiter Hammon, and the third againſt the long-lived Æthiopians, who inhabited Africk, near to the Southern Sea. He reſolved to ſend a Fleet againſt the Carthaginians, an Army of Foot againſt the Ammonians, and as for the Æthiopians, he would firſt ſend to diſcover their Country. While his Meſſengers were diſpatching towards Æthiopia, he gave order to the Phœnicians (who having yielded themſelves, were his only ſtrength at Sea) to fight againſt Carthage, which they flatly refuſed, becauſe that City was a Colony of their own, and thereby this deſign was daſhed. After the return of his meſſengers, who brought him word how he was ſlighted by the Æthiopian King, in great rage and haſte he ſet forwards againſt him, without all thought of victualling his Army, commanding all his foot to follow, except the Græcians. When he was come to Thebes, he ſent about 50000 men againſt the Ammonians, with command after they had ſpoiled them to burn the Temple; and ſo he marched on with the reſt of the Army. But ere he had paſſed the fifth part of his journy, all proviſions failed, and all the beaſts that carried burthens were eaten up; yet did he not now recollect himſelf, but proceeded till they were conſtrained to eat up every tenth man, and then returned he with great loſs and diſgrace to Memphis, where he diſmiſſed the Greeks from his ſervice. The forces ſent againſt the Ammonians, never reached thither, neither ever returned, being all overwhelmed, as was reported, in the Sandy Wilderneſs.

His fruitleſs Expeditions.

9. Cambyſes at his return to Memphis, found the Citizens in great mirth and jollity, for that Apis their god had appeared to them lately; which he interpreting as an expreſſion of Joy for his bad ſucceſs, wounded the beaſt in the thigh (thinking to ſtrike him into the belly) of which he died. He derided much the Ægyptians for ſuch deities: thoſe that were found rejoycing, he commanded to be ſlain, and the Prieſts to be beaten with rods. For ſuch impiety they accounted him ſtricken with that madneſs, which afterward appeared. For not long after, he ſent his brother Smerdis back into Perſia, having conceived great indignation againſt him, becauſe he alone of all the Perſians, could draw a Bow that was brought him by his meſſengers out of Æthiopia. After this he dreamed, that one came and told him how Smerdis ſate on the Throne, and with his head reached to Heaven, whereupon, he ſent Prexaſpes his greateſt confident to make him away, who murdered him in a pretended hunting, or as ſome ſaid, drowned him in the Red Sea. To this he added the murther of his own Siſter, whom, without any example, he had married, becauſe ſhe upbraided him with their brother's death. Memorable is the anſwer of his Judges, who, when he demanded, whether there was not a Law among the Perſians, that a man might marry his own Siſter, anſwered, they found no ſuch Law, but one there was, viz. The King might do whatſoever he liſted. Then married he one Siſter, and afterwards another, whereof the younger he killed being great with Child, as the Ægyptians reported, ſo that ſhe miſcaried double.

He murdered his brother and ſiſter.

10. To this rage and madneſs againſt his relations, he added fury towards thoſe that were neareſt about him. Asking Prexaſpes the Miniſter of his paricide, what his people thought of him, and receiving this anſwer, that they thought him too much given to Wine, that it might be ſeen how ſober he was to do miſchief, he ſaid it ſhould be a demonſtration, if he could ſhoot with an arrow the Son of Prexaſpes right into the heart, which accordingly he did. The day after he buried quick twelve other Perſians for no fault at all, and commanded Crœſus the Lydian to be ſlain for admoniſhing him gravely concerning ſuch enormities, having diſpatched him himſelf with an Arrow, if he had not taken him to his heels. His ſervants notwithſtanding preſerved Crœſus alive, expecting a reward if he ſhould afterwards repent of his death. And he really rejoyced in his preſervation, when he returned to himſelf; but put them to death for their diſobedience. Many more ſuch like things he did whilſt he remained at Memphis, and raged againſt the Images and Temples of the Ægyptians.

The Magi uſurp.

11. But whilſt he thus ſpent his time, two of the Magi, Medians by birth, conſpired againſt him. One of them he had left Overſeer of his houſhold affairs, named Patizithes, who having certain knowledge of the death of Smerdis, though it was kept very ſecret, took occaſion thereat to rebel, becauſe moſt of the Perſians thought this Prince yet living. For, having with him in the Kings houſe a brother as like him in the lineaments and proportion of body as in name, him he placed in the Throne, and ſent up and down through the Empire, to perſwade every one rather to obey Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus than Cambyſes. One of theſe meſſengers coming down to the Army towards Ægypt, found it at Ecbatane in Syria, where ſtanding in the midſt, he proclaimed what was enjoyned. Cambyſes being much ſtartled, blamed Prexaſpes for having neglected to execute his commands; but he proteſting his obedience therein, and that he had buried his Brother with his own hands, the meſſenger was perſued and fetcht back, out of whom Prexaſpes getting out that he had not himſelf ſeen Smerdis, but Patizithes had given him inſtructions as from him, eaſily conjectured what was at the bottom, and therewith acquainted the King. Then too late did Cambyſes bewail his Brother, and reſolving with all ſpeed to march for Suſa, as he mounted on horſeback his Sword fell out of the Scabberd, and wounded him in the Thigh. Demanding the name of the place, he gave himſelf for loſt, for that it had been told him he ſhould die in Ecbatane, which he had ever interpreted of the place in Media ſo called, where he hoped it would be in his old age. Twenty days after, he revealed the whole matter concerning his brother to the Nobility about him, conjuring them not to ſuffer the Empire to return to the Medes, but rather recover it the ſame way it had been betrayed. Not long after his thigh-bone being putrified, he died, when he had reigned ſeven years and five months. He left no iſſue, and ſo the direct line of Cyrus in him received it's period.

Cambyſes dieth.

SECT. II.

From the death of Cambyſes to that of Xerxes.

Lege Herod. l. 3. cap. 67, &c.

1. SMerdis the Magician (called alſo Mardus, Sphendadates, and Oropaſtes) reigned thoſe ſeven months which were wanting to compleat the eight year of Cambyſes, whom the Perſians believed not as to his brothers death, but thought that indeed he was alive and reigned, becauſe Prexaſpes feared to confeſs that he killed him. In this time he, or rather his brother, wonderfully pleaſed all men, except the Perſians, remitting to other Nations their Tributes, and excuſing them from War for three years. But in the eight month he was diſcovered by the means of Otanes, a man of higheſt rank in Perſia, who ſuſpected him for a counterfeit, becauſe he never would appear in publick, nor admit any of the Nobility into his preſence. He having a Daughter then at Court, which had been Concubine to Cambyſes, and now was in the ſame quality to him that reigned, as all the reſt of his wives; to her he ſent to know, whether it was indeed the Son of Cyrus with whom ſhe lay. She having had no acquaintance with that Prince, could give him no anſwer, and neither could ſhe come near Atoſſa, who being Siſter to Smerdis might eaſily know him, for that

A. M. 3483. Ol. 64. an. 3. V. C. 232.

The impoſture of the Magi diſcovered.

Sect. 2. the Magician to prevent intelligence, kept them ſevered one from another: This increaſing the ſuſpition, Otanes ſent to her again, charging her as he lay aſleep to know whether he had any ears; for Cyrus had upon ſome account cut off the ears of Smerdis the Magician. She obeyed her Father when it came to her courſe, notwithſtanding the danger, and the day following confirmed him fully in what he had ſuſpected.

A conſpiracy againſt them.

2. Otanes preſently diſcovered the matter to Aſpathines and Gobryas, two men of prime rank alſo among the Perſians, who eaſily giving him credit, as having ſuſpected the ſame thing themſelves, agreed to take three more, each of them one, into Council about it. Otanes brought Intaphernes, Gobryas choſe Megabyſus, Aſpathines took Hydarnes, and Darius being then arrived at Suſa from Perſia, which his Father Hyſtaſpes governed, they alſo thought fit to add him to their number. Darius when admitted, ſignified, that he had been aſſured of the cheat, how he was come to Town upon no other account than to kill the impoſtor, and urged them to joyn with him and attempt it ſpeedily. Otanes was much againſt ſuch haſty proceedings, deſiring further to conſult about it, but Darius alleging the danger of delay, for which cauſe, if they would not attempt ſomething that very day, he would go and diſcover rather than be diſcovered, at length they agreed.

3. But while they were thus debating the matter, the Magi knowing that Prexaſpes had made away Smerdis the Son of Cyrus, and conſidering how nearly it concerned them to make him their own, had ſent for him, and by vaſt promiſes endeavoured to purchaſe his ſecrecy in that private affair. He ſeemed to complie, and deſired that the Perſians might be called together under the wall, that he might perſwade them, that he who now reigned was the true Smerdis. But after he had mounted the Turret, he began to reckon up the Pedigree of Cyrus from Achæmenes, related his kindneſs and good turns done to the Perſians, and then telling the whole matter concerning Smerdis whom he had murdered, after he had laid many curſes upon them, except they recovered the Empire, and revenged themſelves upon the Magi, he threw himſelf down headlong and died. The ſeven Conſpirators utterly ignorant of this, arrived at the Court, at ſuch time as the Magi were conſulting concerning what had happened, where the Porters eaſily admitted them, becauſe of their dignity, nothing being ſuſpected of them. But coming into the houſe, they were ſtopped by ſuch Eunuches as there waited, whereupon they forced their paſſage with their Swords, and were encountred by both the Magi, who having taken the Allarm, and perceived the matter, betook themſelves to their weapons. One of them wounded Aſpathines in the Thigh, and put out the eye of Intaphernes: the other retired into another room, whither he was purſued by Darius and Gobryas. Gobryas grapling with him, Darius ſtood idle for fear of wounding his friend; but Gobryas bidding him ſtrike though it were thorow his ſides, he did it at adventure, and ſlew the Magician. Both of them being ſlain, they cut off their heads, and carrying them out, acquainted the Perſians with what they had done. Then fell they upon ſuch Magicians as they could meet, which the Perſians taking as an example, did the like, ſo that if night had not intervened, all that ſort of men had periſhed, and this day was obſerved annually as a great Feſtival, in which none of the Magicians ſtirred abroad. This was the end of the uſurpation, wherein ſeven Magi are ſaid by ſome to have been partakers; but if ſo, thoſe two brothers are to be accounted the chief, one of them counterfeiting the right Heir.

The Magi ſlain.

Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 2. Ammian. l. 23.

The Conſpirators conſult about a ſetlement.

Herod. l. 3. c. 80.

4. This tumult being over in five days time, the ſeven Conſpirators fell into conſultation about a ſetlement. Otanes ſpake for the takeing away of Monarchy, which he urged, from the example of Cambyſes and the Magician, was apt to degenerate into Tyranny, and would have had the Government remitted to the people in a Democratical way; Megabyzus was for Oligarchie; but Darius of all the three ſorts preferred Monarchy, as that into which at length the other would paſs, through ſeditions and the ambition of ſuch particular men as ſhould be able to advance themſelves above their Neighbours. The other four ſubſcribed to his opinion as beſt, which therefore being agreed on by the major part, ſeveral capitulations were made in order to the election. Otanes deſired that both himſelf and family might be exempted from the regal juriſdiction, which was granted, and all poſſible honour further decreed to him for his pains taken in the diſcovery. It was agreed amongſt the other ſix, that it ſhould be lawful for them at any time to come into the Palace, except the King were with his wife, and the King was prohibited to take a wife any where but out of their Families, As for the election, it was reſolved, that all the next morning by Sun-riſe riding into the Suburbs, he whoſe Horſe firſt neighed, ſhould obtain the Empire of Cambyſes.

Capitulations.

Darius obtaineth the Kingdom.

5. Darius obtained it through the cunning of Oebares his Groom, who having knowledg from his Maſter of the buſineſs, the night before the controverſie was to be decided, put his Horſe to Mare in the place whither they were to ride. The Horſe the next morning remembring his mate neighed, for which, as coming by accident, the other five adored Darius as King. Having thus obtained the Kingdom, though he had children already by a daughter of Gobryas; yet the more to ſtrengthen his title, he married the two daughters of Cyrus which remained; Atoſſa the wife of her brother Cambyſes, and of the Magician, and Artyſtona yet a Virgin: he alſo took Parinys daughter to Smerdis the Son of Cyrus, and Phædaina the daughter of Otanes. This he did, being alſo himſelf of regal extraction, both allied to antient and modern Kings. He was iſſued from Achæmenes; Cyrus and his Father Hyſtaſpes being brother's ſons, the one to Cambyſes, and the other to Arſamnes, as ſome have reported. This tranſlation of the Kingdom is ſaid to have been firſt revealed to Cyrus, at ſuch time as having paſſed the river Araxes, he was marching againſt the Maſſagetes; For he dreamed that he ſaw the eldeſt Son of Hyſtaſpes (which was this; for he had three younger Sons, Artabanus, Atarnes, and Artaphernes,) having wings on his ſhoulders wherewith he overſhadowed Aſia and Europe. At that time he was about twenty years old, and Armour-bearer to Cyrus (according to * Ælian) who ſent him back into Perſia, and as ſome ſaid, cauſed him to be impriſoned. After his death he was delivered out of Priſon, and made governour of the Perſian Magi, accompanied Cambyſes into Ægypt, and when he had diſcovered the impoſture of the Magi, joyned with the other Princes againſt them, and then either by the neighing of his Horſe, or by ſtrong hand, as ſome have thought, obtained the Empire.

Herod. l. 3. c. 85.

Valer. Max. L. 7. c. 3. Ext. Exemp. 2.

Juſtin lib. 1.

Polyænus Stratagem. l. 7.

Sulp. Severus. Hiſt. Sacr. l. 2.

Herod. l. 1.

* Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. c. 43.

6. Though thus Darius obtained the Soveraignty; yet it ſeemeth to ſome, to have been as a perpetual Dictatorſhip, who think it probable, that the other ſix had alſo by turns the exerciſe of Tribunitial juriſdiction, together with him. Firſt, becauſe Æſchylus who fought againſt the Forces of Darius at Marathon, nameth two kings, viz. Maraphis and Artaphrenes, betwixt the ſlaughter of the Magi and Empire of Darius, who ſeem no other than Mardonius and Artaphernes, reckoned by Cteſias amongſt the ſeven. Then in the holy Scripture, together with the edict of Darius in the ſecond year of his reign, the aſſent of Artaſhaſhta King of Perſia is joyned, which may well enough be taken for the ſaid Artaphernes; though others do otherwiſe expound the place. And, to add ſomething not altogether ſo material, the other Conſpirators foreſeeing how burthenſom they ſhould be to Darius (which in what other way could it be than this?) bound him with an * Oath moſt ſacred amongſt the Perſians, that neither with Poyſon, Sword, any other violence, nor by famine ſhould he kill any of them; though it proved not ſo ſacred as to be inviolable.

Vide Uſſerium in Annal. Vet. Teſtam. pag. 157.

Eſra 6. 14.

* Valer. Max. lib. 9. cap. 2. extern. exempl. 6.

The building of the Temple proceedeth.

7. In the ſecond year of Darius the building of the Temple which had been interrupted, began again and proceeded. The Samaritans bribed the Courtiers in the time of Cyrus, to hinder the work, and Cambyſes having been formerly no friend to it, when he came to reign ſtopped it by expreſs command, through the calumniation of ſuch as bore the Jews no good will. The Magician alſo forbad it upon the ſame account, it being clear from Scripture, that two ſeveral Princes named Ahaſuerus and Artaxerxes withſtood it; and that betwixt the reigns of Cyrus and Darius. But when the adverſaries now betook themſelves to Darius, expecting from him a countermand to the Jews (who being reproved for their remiſſneſs by the Prophet Haggai, were fallen again to build upon the foundation formerly laid) he inſtead of any ſuch inhibition, ſent them an expreſs command, not only not to hinder, but at his own coſt to further the Structure, allowing alſo to the Prieſts expenſes for the daily Sacrifices. The Jews therefore incouraged by this new Edict, and confirmed by the Prophecies of Haggai and Zachariah, proceeded proſperouſly in the building.

Eſra 4.

8. In the ſame year had the Prophet Zachariah a Viſion, in which the Angel interceding for Jeruſalem, and the Cities of Judah, mentioneth the Lord's having had indignation threeſcore and ten years. The riſe or beginning of theſe years Ludovicus Cappellus fetcheth from the deſtruction of the Temple. For from the firſt Edict of Cyrus, and the end of the Captivity, to this time, paſſed about eleven years (Cyrus according to his account, reigning but three after the taking of Babylon, lon, Cambyſes together with the Magician eight, and Darius one; from which muſt be deducted ſo much as the removal of the Jews would require) even ſo many as paſſed from the beginning of the Captivity to the deſolation of the Temple, and ſo the Temple lay deſolate full Seventy years. Hence is obſervable, that as the State and Policy of the Jewiſh Commonwealth was broken, and much impaired eleven years before the deſtruction of the Temple, ſo was it renewed at the end of the Captivity ſo many years before the re-edifying of it, which hitherto had been attempted without ſucceſs, but now renewed, was happily finiſhed in the ſixth year of Darius, as to the houſe it ſelf, though three years more ſeem to have been taken up in the building the porches and other appendices to it. And as the greateſt part of the holy Veſſels were carried away in the Captivity of Jechoniah, eleven years before the deſtruction of the Temple, ſo were they ſent back again ſo many years before the reſtauration of it. Laſtly, this alſo is obſerved, that as from the deſtruction of this typical Temple to the rebuilding of it, paſſed Seventy years, ſo from the Conception of Chriſt the true and ſpiritual Temple, to the final deſolation of the ſhadow or typical one at Jeruſalem, ſo many years paſſed, preciſely Seventy.

The Empire divided into twenty Provinces.

Intaphernes put to death

All the Conſpirators made away.

9. Darius after his ſetlement in the Kingdom, divided it into twenty Provinces (which the Perſians called Satrapies) over each of which he conſtituted a Preſident, withal appointing what tribute each Nation ſhould pay. For, hitherto, under the two former Kings, nothing was appointed concerning tribute, the ſeveral people contributing money by way of benevolence, whereupon, becauſe of this new impoſition, they ſtiled Darius an Huckſter, Cambyſes a Lord, and Cyrus a Father. Cyrus was mild, and uſed them as children, ſtriving to deſerve well of them; Cambyſes was ſharp and moroſe, and Darius by all ways poſſible purveied for mony. The next thing memorable concerning Darius, is, his putting to death Intaphernes, one of the Conſpirators, for abuſing the Porters, and violent intruding into the Palace, contrary to the Capitulations agreed on amongſt them. Having an intention to go to the King, they that kept the gate ſtopped him, ſaying that he was with his wife, which he thinking to be a lye, drew his Sword, and cutting off their ears and noſes, then tyed the reigns of an horſes bridle to their necks and let them go. They preſenting themſelves in this caſe to the King, he firſt ſuſpected ſome treaſonable deſign of all the ſix, but finding that the reſt knew nothing of the matter, he put Intaphernes to death, with all his ſons except the eldeſt, whom he granted to the intreaties of his Mother. But not only him, but all the reſt alſo who were burthenſom to him, another telleth us that he made away by a new kind of death. He cauſed many aſhes to be laid betwixt ſome walls, over which laying a rafter, thereupon he feaſted them very nobly; but being faſt aſleep the floor fell, and they therewith into the aſhes, where they periſhed. If he deſtroyed them in this ſtrange manner, probable it is, that he deſired to be rid of them, becauſe of ſome power to which they might pretend by virtue of a previous agreement, not enduring any incombrance or reſtraint upon his prerogative; for that Soveraignty is impatient of any competition in the Throne.

Herod.lib. 3. cap. 118, 119.

*Vide Val. Maxim.lib.*9. *cap.*2. *extern.exemp.*6.

Babylon rebelleth,

And recovered.

10. About the tenth year of his reign the City of Babylon rebelled againſt him, having of late recovered that greatneſs of mind which ſometimes poſſeſſed it's Inhabitants. Cyrus demoliſhed not their walls, but left them intire with the gates ſtanding, which putting them in a poſture of defence, they took courage at the forein Wars of Cambyſes, and the ſtirs that happened about the Magi. He gathered his forces together, with all ſpeed, and laid ſiege to it; but they being reſolved to ſtand out to the utmoſt, choſe every one a woman to make ready their meat, and to ſave proviſions, killed all the reſt of that Sex except their Mothers. Then, as if they had made themſelves impregnable, they derided the Perſians, ſaying, they ſhould be overcome when a Mule foaled: And above ninteen moneths they held out, notwithſtanding all their attempts and devices. At length in the 20th, Zopyrus Son to Megabyzus, one of the chief Commanders in Darius his Army, being incouraged by his Mule that foaled, mangled his face, cutting off his ears and noſe, and in gore Blood counterfeited a flight to the beſieged, as thus abuſed by the king. The Babylonians believed, and according to his expectation choſe him for their General, after which, he made ſeveral ſallies, and the beſiegers according to the former agreement fled; but within a while he betrayed the City to Darius. He demoliſhed the walls, and nailing 3000 of the principal actors unto croſſes, pardoned the reſt, for whom 5000 women were ſought out, by whom they might repair their decayed ſtock. Zopyrus was rewarded, as with other things in greateſt account amongſt the Perſians, ſo with the City of Babylon for his life. The ſon of this Zopyrus was Megabyzus, who afterwards conducted the Perſian Army againſt the Athenians and their companions: and ſon to this Megabyzus was that Zopyrus, who revolted from the Perſians to the Athenians.

Herod. ut prius cap: 150.

Darius goeth againſt the Scythians.

11. After the recovery of Babylon, Darius wanting neither men nor mony, undertook an Expedition againſt the Scythians, to be revenged on them for holding the (a) dominion of Aſia 28 years, at ſuch time as perſuing the Cimmerians they overthrew and kept under the Medes, whom they found Lords of all in the days of their King Cyaxares. This (b) Herodotus maketh the pretended cauſe of the War, but (c) Juſtin from Trogus relateth, that it was becauſe Lanthius the Scythian King denied him his daughter in marriage. Darius cauſed a bridge to be laid over the Boſphorus into Europe half a mile long, and thereon paſſing his forces croſſed the Sea himſelf by ſhip, and gave charge to the Ionians his Subjects (who together with the Æolians, and others that lived upon the Helleſpont, made up the Navie) to ſail up the Sea as far as the River Iſter (which parted Scythia from Thrace) over which he alſo enjoyned them to make a bridge. In his march through Thrace all ſubmitted to him except the Getes, who out of Ignorance withſtood him. The Ionians prepared the bridge againſt his coming, whom, after he had tranſported his forces, he commanded there to expect him Sixty days, at the end of which if he came not, he permitted them to return into their own Country.

(a) Vide l. 1. c. 2. p. 21.
(b) Lib. 4. c. 1, &c.
(c) Lib. 2.

A. M. 3497.
Olymp. 68. an. 1.
V. C. 246.
Darii 14

12. The Scythians had no conſtant dwelling or habitation, removing with their wagons, wherein they lay, and cattel, from place to place, according as they were furniſhed with graſs, living upon milk and raw fleſh, without Towns or corn, and taking their conduct from the Pole-Star, as the Chrim Tartars their poſterity at this day alſo live, the great Chrim himſelf having no other City than an Agora, or one of Carts. Having intelligence of his coming, they ſent their wives, children, and cattle towards the North; then ſtopped all the Wells, deſtroyed all Fruits of the Earth, and ſometimes appearing to the Perſians, again retired on purpoſe to deride them. Darius ſeeing himſelf thus mocked, and deſpairing to come at them by reaſon of their perfect knowledg of the Country, and his ignorance therein, fearing alſo his proviſions might fail, and eſpecially leſt the Ionians ſhould forſake him at the Bridge, now that the Sixty days were expired, bethought how he might make a ſafe retreat. The Scythians getting knowledg hereof, laboured to remove the Ionians from the Bridge, telling them how good it would be for them to returne home in ſafety; for that now the time prefixed by the King was expired. They fell into conſultation hereupon, and Miltiades Tyrant or petty Prince of the Cherſoneſus beſought them, that, having this opportunity, they would not let it ſlip, but free themſelves from the Perſian Yoak. But Hiſtiæus Tyrant of Miletus a City of Ionia, and others, who had enſlaved their own Citizens at home, fearing, leſt if the power of the Perſians, by which they were maintained, were broken, they ſhould be reduced into a private condition or worſe; by their own Country-men, reſolved, that nothing more concerned them, than that the greatneſs of that Empire might be eſtabliſhed. Yet it was judged convenient to break the Bridg ſo far, as to be out of bow-ſhot from the Scythian ſide, therein to comply with that People, who perhaps elſe might force them to do it. Beginning therefore to break it, the Scythians believed their promiſe of performing the whole, and returned to hunt out the Perſians. Expecting them to retreat that way which was beſt for Proviſions, they miſſed of them; for Darius returned the ſame he went, and with great difficulty recovered the banks of Iſter. Here he arrived by night, and was much diſcouraged when he found the bridge broken; but upon the firſt ſhout Hiſtiæus came with all his Veſſels and made it up for the tranſportation of the Army.

His tetreat.

13. Darius paſſing over his Army marched through Thrace unto Seſtus, and thence ſailed over into Aſia, leaving Megabyſus in Europe with an Army of 80000 men. Megabyzus, according to order, ſubdued the Perinthians and Pæonians, whom he tranſlated into Aſia; and having reduced to obedience all the Maritime Coaſt, ſent into Macedonia to demand Earth and Water of Amyntas the King. Theſe were Symboles of ſubjection, ſignifying an acknowledgment of fealty, and voluntary homage, the chief Soveraignty over all wherein propriety lay, being yielded up with theſe two Elements. Darius had formerly ſent to demand them of the Scythians, and they in return ſent him a Bird, Frog, Mouſe, and five Arrows, leaving him to make the interpretation, which he framing according to his own wiſh, thought that they had yielded all thoſe Elements wherein thoſe Creatures live, and their Weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas conſtrued the meaning to be this: O ye Perſians, get ye wings like Birds, dive under the water, or creep into the holes of the Earth, for elſe our Arrows will overtake you; which expoſition was accordingly verified. Amyntas doubting of his own ſtrength, kindly entertained the Meſſengers, and granting what they came for, magnificently feaſted them, in ſo much that being well heated with Wine they deſired that women, according to the cuſtom of Perſia, might be brought in to them. He replied, that it was not the faſhion of Macedonia; but yet he would gratifie them therein, which being done, they began to be uncivil towards the Women, whereat he inwardly fretted, but for fear ſuppreſſed his indignation, But his eldeſt Son Alexander being preſent, a young man of prompt boldneſs and little experience, deſired him to quit the room, and let him alone to entertain the Gueſts; and though he ſuſpected him for his courage, and diſſwaded him from any raſh attempt, yet did he withdrew accordingly. Alexander then told the Perſians they might have liberty to enjoy thoſe women, but for that it now grew late, he deſired they would let them go out to waſh, and make themſelves ready, which done, they ſhould come again. They aſſenting, he dreſſed ſo many bare-faced young men in women's Clothes, who, being brought in, when the Perſians began to dally with them, according to his command ſtabbed them with Daggers hid under their Clothes for that purpoſe. Megabyzus hearing nothing of his Meſſengers, ſent one Bubares a Perſian down with an Army to make diligent ſearch after them, but him Alexander eaſily took off by giving him his Siſter Gygæa in marriage, with whom he had fallen in love; ſo that he ſuffering the matter to reſt in ſilence, no farther inquiry was made after it.

Earth and Water demanded of Amyntas King of Macedonia.

Herod. l. 5. c. 1. &c.
Juſtin. lib. 7.

The Perſian Ambaſſadors killed.

14. The year following, being the 16th of his reign, Darius ſent as ſucceſſor to Megabyzus, Otanes the Son of Siſamnes, who took in the Cities Chalcedon, Byzantium, and Antander, with the Iſlands Lemnos, and Imbrus. He himſelf was now returned to Suſa, whither he carried along with him Hiſtiæus, who ſtood ſo much his Friend at the Bridge of Iſter. Hiſtiæus having begun to build a City of his own in Thrace, Darius out of colour of doing him honour, and uſing his advice in his moſt important affairs, drew him away from it, knowing his great abilities, and fearing his reſtleſs Spirit. There he continued for ſome years, till not being able to hear ſo much talk of Empire, and Rule, wherein he himſelf had no ſhare, he much preferred his antient Dominion though but over one City, before this Real, though plauſible impriſonment, and therefore ſought how he might kindle a Fire in Ionia, that for his intereſt in that Country he might obtain to be ſent thither to quench it, and ſo with his liberty get ſome notable advantage for a great atchievement. It hapned that his endeavours did but tend to the blowing up of that Spark, which was already kindled without his knowledge, in Ariſtagoras his Son in Law, who Governed Miletus in his abſence. The firſt riſe was occaſioned by the inhabitants of the Iſland Naxos, who having baniſhed ſome of their principal Citizens, the Exiles fled to Anaxagoras for protection and ſuccor. He knowing not well of himſelf how to reſtore them, ſent to Artaphernes the brother of Darius, and his Lieutenant of Ionia then reſident at Sardis, propoſing the Conqueſt of that Iſland to him, and offering to ſubdue both it, and all the reſt of the Cyclades to the obedience of the Perſian Empire. Artaphernes acquainted the King with the buſineſs, and he approving of it, he lent him 200 Ships under the conduct of Megabates his Kinſman. They ſayled together towards Naxos, and it hapned in the way that Megabates harſhly uſed one of Ariſtagoras his followers, for which he ſharply rebuked him, as having no authority to puniſh thoſe under his command. This the Perſian took ſo hainouſly, that he gave intelligence underhand to the Naxians of their coming, who being forewarned were forearmed, ſo that no good could Ariſtagoras do, but ſpending his time to no purpoſe, was forced at length to raiſe his Siege. For this fruitleſs attempt, fearing diſgrace, or worſe from the Perſians, that he might prevent it, he ſtudied how to revolt, and draw the Ionians into Rebellion.

Hiſtiæus.

The occaſion of the Ionian Rebellion.

Herod. l. 5. c. 30. &c.

A. M. 3500.
Olymp. 68. an. 4.
V. C. 249.
Darii 17.

15. While he conſulted with himſelf, a Meſſage came from Hiſtiæus, who becauſe the ways were ſo watched that he could ſend no Letters, ſhaved cloſe the head of his truſty Slave, and thereon with an hot iron engraved ſuch marks as ſerved to make out his ſence, and after his hair was grown ſent him to Miletus. Ariſtagoras ſhaving his head again as he was commanded, (which was all the meſſage that the Slave carried by word of mouth) preſently and gladly apprehended the matter, viz. that Idem c. 35.

Polyænus lib. 1.

that he ſhould excite the Ionians to rebel. Going now more chearfully about his work, that the Mileſians might more readily receive the motion, he reſtored them to a ſhew of Liberty, and to oblige the reſt of the Cities by one means or other abdicated the power of their petty Princes or Tyrants, as they were called. But knowing how little able this ſtrength would be to grapple with the whole power of Aſia which preſently would be upon them, he ſailed to Lacedæmon, there to deſire aſſiſtance from Cleomenes the King; who refuſing to intermeddle, he thence went to Athens, where, as before, he laid open the riches of Aſia, with the imbecillity of the Perſians the preſent Maſters thereof; and added, that the Mileſians, as a Colony of the Athenians, might juſtly expect relief from their hands.

Herodot. l. 5. c. 96, 97, 98.

The Athenians aſſiſt the Ionians.

16. The conjuncture of Affairs at preſent were ſuch at Athens, as he could not have had a more convenient opportunity: It happened that Hippias the Son of Piſiſtratus, being expelled thence had withdrawn himſelf to Sardis, where he laboured with his whole might to make the Athenians odious to Artaphernes, and bring the City into the Command of Darius, that ſo it might return to his own Dominion. They ſent their Embaſſadors after him, praying Artaphernes that he would give no credit to their Exiles; but he urging them, that if they meant to ſecure themſelves, they would receive Hippias, they choſe rather to become Enemies to the Perſian, and therefore complied with the motion of Ariſtagoras. They agreed to ſend out twenty Ships under the Command of Melanthius, a man of principal note amongſt them, with which the Eretrians (out of way of requital for aid formerly received from the Ionians) joyned other five. This was the beginning of thoſe many evils, which afterwards fell both upon the Greeks and Barbarians, and of ſuch wars as ended not till the deſtruction of the Perſian Empire. It fell out in the nineteenth year of Darius, the ſecond of the ſixty ninth Olympiad, 501 before the Æra of Chriſt, A. M. 3502.

Ariſtagoras taketh Sardis.

Capp. 99, &c.

17. Ariſtagoras with this force went againſt Sardis, which he eaſily took all but the Caſtle, wherein Artaphernes ſecured himſelf: A Fire prevented the plundering of the City, which was all turned into Aſhes by the means of a Soldier's burning one particular houſe. The Confuſion being great, the Perſians and Lydians met together in the Market place, through which ran the River Pactolus having Golden Sands, and imbodying themſelves prepared to charge the Enemy; which when the Grecians perceived they fled for fear to the Mountain Tmolus, and thence to their Ships lying at Coreſus in the Territories of Epheſus. The Perſians in the purſuit ſlew a great part of them, amongſt whom fell Eualcides Captain of the Eretrians, ſo much Celebrated by Simonides the Ceian Poet, and other eminent men: Thoſe that eſcaped diſperſed themſelves through the Cities. Ariſtagoras could not by any means perſwade the Athenians from returning home; notwithſtanding, for what had happened to Sardis, Darius was exceedingly incenſed againſt them, inſomuch that he commanded one of his Servants wherever he ſate at meat, thrice to ſound theſe words in his ears; Sir, Remember the Athenians.

Defeated in his retreat.

Cyprus revolteth.

Capp. 103, &c.

Capp. 108, &c.

18. At this time all Cyprus revolted from the Perſian, except the Amathuſians, whom alſo the Rebels beſieged; yet Darius, blinded by the ſpecious pretences of Hiſtiæus, let him go, thinking indeed that being preſent at he might do him ſpecial ſervice in extinguiſhing the Rebellion. Though the Ionians were forſaken by their friends of Athens, yet they proceeded, and croſſing the Helleſpont took Byzantium with the Towns adjacent, and thence went into Caria, a great part whereof they drew into Society with them in the War. But the ſcene of Affairs was preſently altered: Artybius the Perſian with a numerous Army was ſent againſt Cyprus, and the Ionians followed with a Fleet to the Aid of Oneſilus, who firſt procured the revolt, and now lay before Amathuſia. Both Parties being well appointed by Sea and Land, they engaged with their Fleets and Land Armies: The Ionians had the better by Sea, but on Land the Cypriots were betrayed by Steſanor, Tyrant of the Curienſes, and by the Salaminians, ſo that being utterly routed, Oneſilus was ſlain, and Ariſto-Cyprus Prince of the Solians, and Son to that Philo-Cyprus whom Solon commended in his Verſes above other Tyrants, or Reguli. The Ionians receiving intelligence of this overthrow, and how all the Cities in the Iſland were beſieged except Salamis (which the Inhabitants had already given up to Gorgus their ancient Prince) haſted away. Of all Towns Soli ſtood longeſt out, but in the fifth Month was taken by the Perſians who undermined the Walls; and thus Cyprus was reduced into its former Bondage, a year after it had caſt off the yoak.

And is recovered.

Capp. 124, &c.

19. The Perſian Lieutenants or Satrapæ, viz. Dauriſes, Hymees, and Otanes, who had married the Daughters of Darius, after they had driven the Ionians to their Ships, parted the revolted Cities which each of them ſhould fall on. The two former mer reduced many upon the Helleſpont and Propontis, and the latter by the aſſiſtance of Artaphernes, took Clazomenæ in Ionia, and Cumæ in Æolia, after which Ariſtagoras was utterly diſcouraged, and thought of nothing but flight. Hecatæus the Hiſtorian, who had formerly diſſwaded him from Rebellion, now adviſed him to build a Fort in the Iſland Lerus, where he might continue for ſome time till it were convenient for him to return to Miletus; but his reſolution being bent for Myrcinus, a Town built by Hiſtiæus in Thrace upon the River Strymon, and amongſt the Edones, thither he ſoon after departed with as many Volunteers as would follow him, leaving the Government of Miletus to Pythagoras, a man of the moſt approved Fidelity amongſt the Townſmen. He obtained the Countrey thereabout without much trouble, but beſieging the Town, was cut off by the Thracians with all his Forces.

Ariſtagoras ſlain.

20. Hiſtiæus being diſmiſſed by Darius upon that account formerly mentioned, was ere this come to Sardis: Artaphernes demanding of him what ſhould have moved the Ionians to Rebel, He anſwered that he knew not, but wondred at the thing: Whereto the other replied, telling him plainly, that He had made that Shooe which Ariſtagoras had put on. Fearing therefore to ſtay with him, whom he perceived ſufficiently to underſtand the matter, he fled the night after, and conveyed himſelf into the Iſland Chius, where the Inhabitants ſuppoſing that he came to promote the affairs of Darius, caſt him into Priſon, but upon farther advice reſtored him to liberty. Then ſent he to ſome Perſians lying at Sardis, who were partakers of his Conſpiracy, willing them to Riſe; but Artaphernes having timely notice thereof prevented it, by putting them to death. This device failing, he procured the Chians to convey him to Miletus, but there he could not be received, the Inhabitants rejoycing that they were rid both of him and Ariſtagoras; ſo that endeavouring to get in by Night he was wounded in the Thigh, and forced to retire himſelf again to Chius. Here now not being able to procure any Ships by all his intreaties, he went over to Mitylene, where he perſwaded the Leſbians to furniſh him with eight Veſſels, with which he ſailed to Byzantium; and at this Port he intercepted all ſuch Ships of the Ionians as, coming from Pontus, refuſed to obey him.

Herodotus l. 6. ad initium.

21. The Perſian Generals having much weakned the power of the Carians, and ſubdued all the Ionians that lived upon the Helleſpont, were now ready to go againſt Miletus both by Sea and Land. The Ionian Deputies aſſembling in Panionium, (the place of their Publick Councils) reſolved to levy no Land Army againſt them, but withſtand their violence from the Walls of Miletus, and make as great and ſtrong a Fleet as poſſible. They ranged themſelves in order of Battel near Læda, a little Iſland lying over againſt Miletus; the Wing that look'd towards the Eaſt the Mileſians themſelves made up with eighty Sail; to them joyned the Prienians with twelve, and the Miuſians with three: By them ſtood the Teians with ſeventeen; and by them the Chians with an hundred Veſſels. Beyond theſe were placed the Erythræans with eight Ships, and the Phocæans with three: Next to them ſtood the Lesbyans with ſeventy, and in the laſt place were ſeen the Samians making up the Weſtern Wing with ſixty Ships; the whole conſiſting of three hundred fifty three Gallies with three Ranks of Oars: But the Perſian Navy contained ſix hundred of Phœnicians, Cyprians, Ægyptians, and Cilicians.

Miletus beſieged.

Idem. ibid. capp. 6, &c.

22. Though the Perſian Fleet almoſt doubled the other in number of Veſſels, yet the Captains feared both the skill and valour of the Ionians, and therefore betook themſelves to politick Councils. They ſent for the ſeveral Reguli or Tyrants of the Cities, whom Ariſtagoras had depoſed at the beginning of the War, and deſired that every one would endeavour to draw off his own Citizens. While they were uſing their utmoſt endeavour herein, Dionyſius the Phocian Captain, and General of the whole Ionian Navy, exerciſing his men continually for the Fight, they being unaccuſtomed to ſuch Diſcipline, were after ſeven days weary of it; and pitching their Tents in the Iſland therein ſhaded themſelves, and could not be got to their Ships. The Samians doubting whitherto their ſluggiſhneſs might tend, thought it wiſdom to hearken to the Propoſitions made from the Perſians, by Æaces the Son of Syloſon their Prince, who adviſed them by a timely Repentance, to ſave their eſtates, rather than expoſe themſelves to the anger of the Perſian, who though he were beaten at preſent, was able to bring another Fleet five times as big, ſo that their labour and danger would know no end. Their Captains therefore took occaſion at the diſorder of the Ionians to deny any further obedience, and, when the Phœnicians began to tow their Fleet together to fall on, thoy hoiſed up their Sails and departed. After this pattern the Lesbians and a great part of the Ionians withdrew drew themſelves, only the Chians ſtood to it; who taking many of their Enemies Ships loſt more of their own, and at length fled to Land: Some of them running their Gallies on ground at Mycale, went on foot by night unto Epheſus, where the women then Celebrating the Theſmophoria, the Inhabitants, taking them for Thieves, iſſued out and ſlew many of them. But Dionyſius having light on the Perſian Gallies retreated not home, knowing his own Country would go to wrack with the reſt; but going into Phœnicia there robbed certain Ships of Burthen of much wealth, and thus enriched ſailed into Sicily.

23. The Perſians having thus done their work at Sea, preſently laid Siege to Miletus, which by undermining the Walls, and uſing all ſorts of Batteries, they utterly deſtroyed in the ſixth Year after the Rebellion was firſt begun by Ariſtagoras. Some of thoſe Inhabitants which ſurvived their Country, together with the Samians, tranſported themſelves into Sicily; the reſt being brought to Suſa before Darius, he, without any puniſhment inflicted on them, placed in the City Ampia, ſituated where the River Tygris falleth into the Red Sea. As for their grounds, the Perſians took to themſelves the Campagne Country, and gave the Mountainous Parts to the Carians of Pedaſus. Hiſtiæus ſeeing what was befallen Miletus, with ſome Lesbyans ſubdued Chius eaſily, being weakned before, and thence with many Ionians and Æolians, he undertook an Expedition againſt Thaſus; but hearing that the Phœnicians were gone from Miletus into the other parts of Ionia, he returned back to Lesbus. Here his Forces not truſting themſelves, he went over into the Province of Atarnes, as it were thence, and from the Territories of the Myſians adjoyning to gather Forrage, where Harpagus the Perſian then lying with a conſiderable Force, engaged with him in a Fight at Malena; and having cut off the greater part of his men, took him alive. Being carried to Suſa unto Artaphernes, they nailed his Body to a Croſs, and ſent his Head as a Preſent to Darius, who was diſpleaſed that they had not preſented him alive; and cauſed his Head to be buried, as of a Friend, and one that had well deſerved of the Perſians. Now not only Caria, but all the Iſlands and Cities on the Continent were alſo recovered without much trouble; the moſt beautiful of the Boys being made Eunuchs, and of the Girls ſent to the Perſian Court. And thus the Ionians were ſubdued the third time, once by the Lydians, and twice by the Perſians; the Tributes were eſtabliſhed by Artaphernes, according to Darius his former preſcription, and all things ſetled at the coſt of the revolters.

It is taken.

Idem ibid. Capp. 18, &c.

Capp. 26, &c.

Hiſtiæus taken and put to death.

24. Two years after the deſtruction of Miletus, and in the 26th of his reign, Darius recalling the Commiſſions of all his late Captains, ſent Mardonius the Son of Gobryas, who had married his daughter Artozoſtra, with a great power to the Sea. Mardonius coming into Cilicia, ſent away all his Land Forces towards the Helleſpont, and paſſing by Sea into Ionia, there diſſolved all the Tyrannies, as they were called, or powers of ſingle men, and brought in the Democratical Government into the Cities. After this, with his Fleet he ſubdued the Thaſians, and with his Land Army other Macedonians beſides them that formerly obeyed his Maſter; but looſing from Acanthus and coaſting by the Mountain Athos, ſuch a Tempeſt fell upon the Navy as ſunk three hundred Veſſels, wherein periſhed above twenty thouſand men. Then quartering his Foot in Macedonia, the Thracians called Brygi, fell in upon him by Night, and, killing many, wounded him alſo; whereupon he turned his Forces upon them, and ſubduing them, carried back the Army into Aſia. The year following Darius conſtrained the Thaſians, who were accuſed by their Neighbours of having an intention to revolt, to pull down their Walls, and carry all their Ships to Abdera. Then to try of what Temper the Græcians were, he ſent throughout Greece to demand Earth and Water. The Lacedemonians and Athenians threw the Meſſengers into Pits, bidding them thence to take Earth and Water to carry to their Maſter: But the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Iſlands out of fear complied, for which they were accuſed by the Athenian Embaſſadors at Sparta, as intending with the Perſians to Fight againſt Athens. Hereupon Cleomenes, one of the Kings, was ſent to Chaſtiſe the Principal Revolters, but ſuch a Contention fell betwixt him and his Colleague Demaratus about it, as ended at length in the deprivation of the latter, who thus unjuſtly outed of his Patrimony, betook himſelf to Darius, by whom he was bountifully entertained.

Capp. 43, 44, &c.

A. M. 3509.
Ol. 71. an. 1.
V. C. 258.
Darii 26.

Capp. 46, &c.

Earth and Water demanded of the Græcians.

25. When Darius ſent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, he gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coaſts to build long Ships and flat bottom'd Boats, for the Tranſportation of Horſe. The burning of Sardis by the means of the Athenians and Eretrians, was thrice every time he went to Meat ſtill ſounded in his Ears: Hippias the late Prince of Athens was yet provoking him againſt that City, and at length procured Darius ſendeth Forces into Greece.

Capt. 94, 95, 96, &c.

They take Eretria.

procured Forces to reduce him into his former place. Under colour of reſtoring him, Darius intended, if poſſible, to ſubdue all Greece, and therefore removing Mardonius, under whom the Fleet had of late miſcarried, he put in his room Dates a Mede, and Artaphernes his Brothers Son, to whom he gave in charge to lay waſt Athens with Eretria, and bring the Inhabitants thereof Priſoners into his preſence. In their paſſage they burnt Naxos, took ſome Forces and Hoſtages out of the Iſlands, and landed their Horſe upon the Coaſts of Eretria: They prepared to Fight, but the Enemy keeping himſelf within the Walls, they ſtrongly attempted the ſtorming of the City for ſix days, and on the ſeventh had it betrayed into their hands by Euphorbus and Philagrus, two of the Principal Citizens. The Athenians hearing of their approach, ſent Phidippides a famous, though ordinary Foot-Poſt, to Lacedæmon, to deſire that State to haſten their Succors. They reſolved to ſend aid, but ſaid it was impoſſible ſpedily to do it, for that they could not break the Law, which forbad them to go forth on the ninth day of the month Or, except the Moon was at the full. Whilſt they expected that ſeaſon, the Athenians made choice of Ten Captains for the War; and by this time the Perſians, now Maſters of Eretria, ſailed into Attica, wherein they were conducted by Hippias to the Plains of Marathon, as moſt convenient for Horſe. After the Athenians had taken the Field, the Platæans came into their Aid, but a great diſpute there was amongſt the Captains, whether they ſhould ſtand to the hazard of a Battel: Thoſe that were for the Negative had carried it, but that Miltiades who was all for fighting, drew over Callimachus one of the Polemarchi to his Party. The major part of the Votes then paſſing on his ſide, each Captain aſſigned his day to him, (who had formerly been Prince of the Cherſoneſus, and thence was expelled by the Perſians) committing the management of the Fight to his diſcretion.

Are overthrown at Marathon.

Lib. 2. c. 9.

26. Miltiades accepted of the Charge, yet thought good not to Fight till his own day (which was the tenth) ſhould be arrived.: Then ſet he the Army in order, and being at a miles diſtance from the Enemy, led very faſt upon him, which the Perſians attributed to madneſs, ſeeing the other ſo few in compariſon of themſelves, and badly provided both of Horſe and Arms. The Fight continued long, wherein in the middle Battel the Perſians put the other to flight; but in both the Wings the Græcians prevailed, and turning themſelves upon thoſe that worſted their Fellows, made great ſlaughter of them as far as the Sea ſide, where they alſo ſeiſed upon ſeven of their Ships. Concerning the number of the ſlain, Writers do not agree: Herodotus writeth of ſix thouſand four hundred of the Barbarians, and an hundred ninety two of the Græcians. On the one ſide fell Hippias, as Juſtin delivers out of Trogus, and Callimachus on the other. What year the Battle was fought is not certainly known, but in the ſecond or third of the ſeventy ſecond Olympiad, and four or five before the Death of Darius.

Herod. l. 6. c. 119, &c.

Idem lib. 7. c. 1, &c.

Darius declareth his Succeſſor.

Vide Juſtin. l. 2. c. 10. Plutarch. Περὶ Φιλαδελφίας. Apotheg. & in Artaxerxe.

Dieth.

27. Datis and Artaphernes returning into Perſia, carried the Eretrians Captive along with them to Suſa, where they preſented them before Darius; though Cteſias wrote that Datis was ſlain in the Battel of Marathon, and that his Body was denied to be reſtored. Darius placed the Eretrians in Anderica in Ciſſia, a Country ſo called, at two hundred and ten Furlongs diſtance from Suſa, the Poſſeſſion whereof their Poſterity held a long time together with their own Language. Notwithſtanding the defeat at Marathon, he left not off thoughts of Conquering Greece, making all poſſible proviſion for another Invaſion. But in the fourth year after, more work fell into his hands; for though Diodorus telleth us that the Ægyptians much honoured him as one of their Law-givers, they now rebelled. The year following he was provided for both Expeditions, and was about to undertake them when the cuſtom of the Country firſt required that he ſhould name his Succeſſor. He had three children before he was King by the Daughter of Gobryas, whereof the eldeſt Artobazanes, (by others called Artemenes and Ariamenes) challenged the Kingdom by virtue of his Birthright: But it was judged due to Xerxes his eldeſt Son by Atoſſa Cyrus his Daughter, who was Founder of the Empire, and he accordingly was declared at this time; although ſome make this civil and loving Context betwixt the two Brothers, to have happened after their Father's death, and been judged by Artaphernes their Uncle. But as Darius was about ſetting forwards for Greece, he was prevented by death, the firſt year after the Rebellion of Ægypt ending, after he had reigned thirty ſix years complete, in the third year of the ſeventy third Olympiad ending, before the Æra of Chriſt, 585. A.M. 3519.

Herodot. lib. 7. ad initium.

Xerxes.

28. Xerxes ſucceeded his Father in the third year of the third Olympiad, being the fourth King of Perſia, the right to the Empire whereof he fetched from Cyrus his Grandfather by the Mother's ſide. He was ſcarcely ſettled in the Throne, when Mardonius his Kinſman ſtirred him up with earneſtneſs not to give over the War which he had begun with Greece, promiſing to himſelf great command upon the Conqueſt of Europe, which he made Xerxes believe would be as readily performed as ſpoken. He, though ambitious enough, was not at firſt of himſelf very forward, but as it concerned him, thought firſt of recovering Ægypt, for which all things were left in readineſs by his Father, and in the year next after his death, turned his Forces thither with preſent ſucceſs: For he reduced that Country under the yoak, which he laid heavier upon it than formerly, and committed the Government thereof to his Brother Achæmenes, who was after many years ſlain by Inarus the Lybian.

Recovereth Egypt.

29. Ægypt being thus fortunately recovered, he was therewith much elevated and now had reſolved to follow on the War with Greece, but to hear what his Captains would ſay, he called them together to adviſe about it; to whom with vanity enough he opened his mind, and was ſeconded by an indiſcreet flattering Speech of Mardonius, who ſeemed with words to be able to blaſt the preſent Condition of Greece. His Uncle Artabanus, a grave and long experienced man, ſtrongly urged the contrary, ſhewing how vain Humane Confidence is, how brittle and unſtable the Fortune of Princes and others, which appeared ſufficiently in his Fathers expedition againſt the Scythians firſt, and ſince that againſt the Athenians; that the Greeks were not ſo weak a Nation he proved by the Battel at Marathon; that the thing which he attempted was moſt dangerous; to be thought on again and again; that without mature deliberation the Attempt would be raſh, however the ſucceſs ſhould happen; that God many times pulls down the higheſt things, and humbleth the haughty that truſt in their own ſtrength, by making them to fall into ſudden Calamities: And as for Mardonius, he chaſtiſed his youthful and ambitious heat with a ſharp reprehenſion, foretelling him what would be the reward of his raſhneſs. But this wiſe Council could not be heard from a grave man, the Ears of Xerxes being ſtopped by the ſuggeſtions of one more agreeable to his head-ſtrong and youthful humour; ſo that he imputed to his Uncle baſeneſs of mind and cowardiſe, inflicting this puniſhment upon him for it, that ſtaying at home, he ſhould not partake of ſo glorious an expedition. To this enterprize he was alſo ſtirred up by the Aleuadæ, or Princes of Theſſaly, who grudged at the Liberties of the Greeks; by the Son of Piſiſtratus alſo baniſhed Athens, who living in his Court, abuſed his credulity by the help of a Wizard or Fortune-Teller.

Conſulteth about renewing the War with Greece.

30. Yet not long after, conſidering what Artabanus had ſaid, he changed his purpoſe, and calling his Council together again, after he had commended his Uncles opinion, ſignified the ſame unto them, at which all the wiſer ſort much rejoyced; but the thing running in his mind, ſo that he was diſturbed in his ſleep, he returned to his former reſolution, and concluded on the expedition. In the preparation for it three years (Herodotus ſaith four) were taken up, all Aſia being concerned therein ſo far, as to ſeem to be removed out of its place. A Navy he provided out of all the Sea Coaſts of his Empire to the number of about twelve hundred Veſſels, which he commanded to meet at Cuma and Phocæa, and having out of all his Provinces gathered great multitudes of Horſe and Foot, at length he moved from Suſa in the fourth year of the ſeventy fourth Olympiad, and in the fifth year (not after the Egyptian Expedition, as Herodotus hath it, but) of his Reign. All the Land Forces met at Critalæ, with which he paſſed the River Halys, and came to Celænæ, a City of Phrygia, where Pythius the Lydian (or Bythinian, as Pliny will have him) entertained him and his Army, and preſented him with a vaſt ſum of mony, which he returned with advantage: And ſo at length he came to Sardis, whence he ſent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, as Symboles of Subjection. The Navy was come to the Cherſoneſus by this time, and that it might ſhun the inconvenience which that, formerly governed by Mardonius, had incurred, by ſailing about the Mountain or Promontory of Athos, he cauſed the Mountain to be cut off from the main, by a Ditch ſo broad as two Veſſels might ſail a breaſt, through which the whole Navy paſſed. And wintering this year at Sardis, he commanded a Bridge to be laid over the Helleſpont (a mile over wanting an eighth part) which being ſhattered and broken by a great Tempeſt, he took ſo hainouſly, as he commanded three hundred Stripes to be given the Sea, and a pair of Fetters to be caſt into it in token of ſervitude, and cauſing the Heads of the Workmen to be cut off, ordered other Bridges to be made.

Idem ibid. Capp. 22, 23, &c.

He wintereth at Sardis.

31. In the beginning of the Spring he moved from Sardis with his whole Army and came to Abydus, the day being turned into night by a ſudden darkneſs (though no Stars appeared) at his ſetting forth, with which portentous thing (being Ibid. Capp. 37, 38, &c.

Sect. 1.

(being no true Eclypſe) Pythius, who formerly entertained him, was ſo terrified, that of his five Sons liſted in the Army, he deſired the eldeſt, as the comfort of his old age, might be left to him, at which the King was ſo angry, that he commanded the young Man to be cut in two, and the parts ſo to be laid aſunder that the Army might paſs betwixt them. When he was come to Abydus he had an extream deſire to view all his Forces, for which purpoſe he had an high aſcent raiſed for him, where he alſo deſired to ſee a Sea-fight, which in ſhew was performed, and wherein the Sidonians had the better: with the ſight whereof, and of all his Land Forces on the Shore, he was elevated into a great paſſion of Joy apprehending of how many thouſands he was Maſter, and then preſently again into another of weeping, the cauſe of which Artabanus his Uncle demanding (who had thus far accompanied him) he told him, it was in conſidering that of ſo many thouſands not a man ſhould be alive a 100 years after. Hence that wiſe old Man took occaſion to diſcourſe to him moſt gravely of the vanity, and miſeries of this life, and being again importuned to tell his opinion concerning the expedition, did it with the ſame faithfulneſs as formerly, after which he ſent him back to Suſa to govern as his Deputy in his abſence.

Paſſeth over into Europe.

Ibid. Capp. 52, 53, &c.

32. Then prepared he for his paſſage into Europe, and having performed his Heatheniſh Devotions to the Sun, by one of the Bridges bending towards the Euxine, paſſed over his Horſe and Foot, and by another inclining towards the Ægean, his Slaves and Beaſts; ſeven days, and as many nights being taken up in the paſſage. The Fleet ſayled Weſtward to the Promontory of Sarpedon, the Land Forces marched through the Cherſoneſus of Thrace to Agora and ſo bore down towards the Bay of Melana, where a River of the ſame name failed them in drinking, as Scamander, and ſeveral others in Aſia are ſaid to have done before. Paſſing over, and moving Weſtward they came to Doriſcus, where being a vaſt plain watered with the great River Hebrus, there they pitched their Tents, and Xerxes muſtered his whole Army, both by Land and Sea.

A. M. 3525.
Olymp. 75. an. 1.
V. C. 274.
Xerxis 6.

Herodotus lib. 8. cap. 60, 87.
Diodorus l. 11. ad Olymp. 75. an. 1.
Cteſias in excerptis.
Oroſius lib. 1. cap. 10.
Ælian lib. 13. cap. 3.
Corn. Nep. in Themiſtoc.
Plin. lib. 33. cap. 10.
Iſocrat. in Panathenaico.

33. The greateſt number of Men it contained that ever were ſeen liſted under the Banners of one Man; but yet great is the variety found in Writers about the true number. Herodotus writeth of 1700000 Foot, and 80000 Horſe, beſides Camels, and Chariots; Diodorus Siculus not half ſo many Foot, viz. 800000. and yet what he aſſigns to the Foot, Cteſias attributeth to the whole Army, which he writeth to have conſiſted of 80 Myriads, beſides Chariots. Juſtin from Trogus, and Oroſius out of him, reckons 700000 men out of his own Dominions, and 300000 Auxiliares. Ælian writeth of 700000 in all, Cornelius Nepos of 700000 Foot, and 400000 (perhaps rather 40000) Horſe. Pliny 788000 (for the name of Darius, Xerxes being to be read) and Iſocrates agreeth with Ælian, mentioning only 700000 in all. As for the Navy there were found 1207 beaked Ships, and other Veſſels for carrying of Horſes, and for other uſes 3000. according to Herodotus, from whom Diodorus little diſſenteth as to the number of the Gallies, writing, there were found above 1200 of them, to which he addeth 850 Horſe-boats, and other Veſſels of burthen of 30 Oars apiece 3000. with the former agreeth Cteſias (though often diſſenting) and Cicero: with the later Iſocrates and Lyſias. Oroſius mentions 1200 beaked Gallies, and 3000 Veſſels of burthen; and as for that place in Juſtin, which encreaſeth the number of the Fleet to 10000. there is no doubt of its corruption. Herodotus by giving 200 men to every Gally, and furniſhing all the other Veſſels, conjectures 517610 men to have been beſtowed in the whole Fleet, ſo that at this muſter the Land and Sea-forces being added together, with the 20000 Arabians that drove Camels, and the Libyans the Chariots, at this rate would amount to 2317610. beſides Slaves and others that followed the Camp.

34. Notwithſtanding all this number, he commanded all the Nations in his paſſage, from Doriſcus towards Greece, to march along with him, ſo that hereby came an acceſſion of 120 Ships to his Fleet, to which giving 200 men a piece, the number will amount to 2400. and to his Land Army another of 30 Myriads, or 300000 men, as Herodotus gathereth (though Diodorus thinketh leſs ſomething then 20 Myriads) and ſo the whole number of his Aſian and Europæan Souldiers would on this account amount to 2641610. and yet he thinketh the number of Slaves and attendants to have rather exceeded this, ſo that if it only be doubled, the number of thoſe perſons that by land came to Thermopylæ, and by Sea to Sepias, amounted to five millions two hundred eighty three thouſand two hundred and twenty. As for the number of women that baked meat, and of Concubines and Eunuchs which followed, no man can aſſign them, of carriage beaſts,

The number of his men.

beaſts, and for the Waggons, and of Indian Doggs no man could count; ſo that no wonder it is that to this ſtupendous multitude ſome ſorts of Rivers failed to afford drink, or that Plutarch and Iſocrates ſhould write five millions to have followed Xerxes into Greece; the wonder is, that no greater Plague raged amongſt them, that any concord could be preſerved amongſt ſo many Nations, and that proviſions could be procured for the preſervation of the lives of ſo many Creatures.

The preparations of the Græcians for defence.

35. The Græcians all this while having had intelligence; firſt of his deſign all along from Demaratus the Spartan Exile, and then of his motions, were according to their ſeveral intereſts variouſly affected. Some, as the Thebans, and the reſt of the Bœotians (except the Theſpians, and them of Platæa) and many Theſſalians (perſwaded by the Aleuadæ) and ſeveral others, out of fear, had under-hand ſent Earth and Water, as Symboles of ſubjection: Many alſo were uncertain in their reſolutions, not knowing what to do. The reſt meeting at the Iſthmus, and conſulting for the publick ſafety, reſolved, and ſwore to joyn together in War againſt the Perſians, and with United power to defend the liberty of Greece; at the preſent to wave all their private differences for that purpoſe, and to remit the monies owing to each other; to devote the tenth to Apollo, i. e. to do to death the tenth man of all thoſe that had already given up themſelves to the Enemy. The War which had often been patched up, and ſtill brake out again, betwixt the Athenians and them of Ægina, was compoſed. By occaſion of this War the Athenians of late had ſtrengthned themſelves exceedingly at Sea, through the procurement of Themiſtocles the Son of Neocles, a very wiſe man, who had brought the people to lay out the mony, which iſſued out of the golden Mines of Lamio, and was to be divided amongſt the multitude man by man, upon ſhiping, whereby the Fleet was encreaſed to almoſt two hundred ſayl, and Greece came to be preſerved. About the ſame time it hapned that the Athenians aſking Counſel at Delphos, the Oracle anſwered, that wooden Walls alone would be ſecurity to them; which ſeveral interpreting ſeveral ways, he expounded Ships to be meant by it, and preſſed hard that a Sea Victory was promiſed them at the Iſland Salamine, which being received by the greater part, they ſet themſelves with all their might to the ſtrengthning of their Navy.

36. But thoſe of the League finding it convenient to call in the help of their Friends, and Allies, ſent into Sicily, Corcyra and Crete, to deſire aid and aſſiſtance of the Greek Colonies againſt the publick Enemy; and to Argos to excite them to joyn againſt him with the reſt of their Neighbours. But all was to no purpoſe; for Gelon, who then had all Sicily in his power, and was thought to have more Ships then all the aſſociates put together, refuſed to give any aid except he might be declared Captain-General of the whole Army; the Corcyræans promiſed great matters, confeſſing their ſafety to be involved in that of Greece; but reſolving to make uſe of the ſucceſs of their party, when danger threatned Greece from Xerxes, they ſent ſixty Ships, under ſhew of ſupply, but commanded the Fleet to hover about Laconia, and apply it ſelf to Xerxes, if Conquerour, as coming in to his aſſiſtance; which being obſerved, after the Fight the Officers excuſed themſelves for being abſent at the Battel of Salamine, becauſe the Eteſian Winds blowing contrary, they could not double the Cape of Malea. The Cretans very powerful at Sea put off the matter under pretence of hearing an anſwer from the Oracle at Delphos, whither they ſaid they had ſent: and the Argives out of hatred to the Lacedæmonians, propoſed ſuch conditions as could not be admitted, and preſſed them ſore with the reſt of the aſſociates.

37. The Athenians then and Lacedæmonians being moſt ingaged (againſt whom the deſign of the Perſian was moſt bent) applied themſelves with all their might to make reſiſtance. Xerxes being about to paſs over into Europe, the Theſſalians ſent to them, demanding help to ſecure themſelves, as elſe being unable to ſtand out. The Council General at that time being aſſembled in the Iſthmus, thinking it wiſdom to withſtand him at the firſt entry into Greece, rather than to defend it in broken parts, ſent preſently away by Sea ten thouſand men into Theſſalia, under conduct of Evenetus a Spartan, and Themiſtocles the Athenian, who in conjunction with the Theſſalian Horſe, at the River Peneus, flowing betwixt the Straights of Oſſa and Olympus, might hinder the paſſage of the Perſians; but after they came there, it being ſhewed to them to be but a vain thing there to oppoſe themſelves againſt ſo great a multitude, (eſpecially ſeeing there were other paſſages into Theſſalie,) by Alexander King of Macedonia, they returned back again to the Iſthmus, and the Theſſalians thus forſaken, gave themſelves up to the Perſians. Afterwards the Council again deliberating what ſhould be done, reſolved to ſeize upon the Straights of Thermopylæ, being the only paſſage out of Theſſalie into Greece, and better to be maintained by far than the other, and concluded on ſending ſix thouſand Foot thither under command of Leonidas the valiant King of Sparta. Sea-matters were committed to the care of the Athenians and Æginætans eſpecially, and it was reſolved, that the Fleet ſhould ſail to the Artemiſian Shore, towards the North part of the Iſland Eubœa, and not far from the Straights. Xerxes drawing near, this was done accordingly, both as to Land and Sea Forces; but the Navy receiving an Alarm, through a miſchance of three of it's Ships, retreated into the Straights betwixt Eubœa and Bœotia, where Euripus floweth betwixt Chalcis and Aulis; but underſtanding of a great Wrack ſuffered by the Perſian Fleet, wherein by tempeſtuous weather were loſt four hundred Veſſels, with a great multitude of Men, and much treaſure, it returned back after a few days; in the mean while Xerxes drew down with his innumerable multitudes to the Straights.

Sect. 2.

38. He ſent before a Spie to look how Leonidas and his men behaved themſelves, who bringing him word how he found the Spartans, who then kept watch, exerciſing themſelves in gymnick Games, and dreſſing their Heads as on ſome Feſtival, he demanded of Demaratus their Country-man the reaſon thereof. He told him they were fully reſolved to die for their Country, and ready to fight it out to the laſt man, if need required; whereat he derided him as before when he ſpake of the valour of his Country-men, thinking they would be ſo skared at his multitudes, as not to dare to come to hand-ſtrokes. But finding no ſuch matter, but Demaratus his words to be true, on the fifth day after, he commanded a party of Medes to fall upon them, who being with great ſlaughter repulſed, he ſent his Band of Perſians, which being invincible as was thought, he named were Immortal, and they, though wanting no courage under the eyes of the King, who from an high Throne beheld the Fight, came off with the ſame ſucceſs; whereat he was aſtoniſhed, and grew melancholly, as being now ſollicitous for his whole Army. The next day the Fight wae renewed, but with the ſame Iſſue, great ſlaughter being made of the Perſians, ſo that the way being more narrow by the Carkeiſes, there was no room for a multitude to Fight, which being driven one upon another, the confuſion and conſequently the Slaughter was the greater. At this, Xerxes was ſtruck with great conſternation, not knowing what to do.

The fight at Thermoplæ.

39. There was one in the Army, a Trachinian, named Epialtes, or Ephialtes (as Pauſanias writeth it) who underſtanding his trouble went to him, and offered to ſhew a way over the Mountains, by which, though with much difficulty, he might ſend a Party to come about, and fall on the backs of the Græcians. Being cheared with this, he ſent as many as ſhewed themſelves moſt forward, with him, under the command of Hydarnes, who paſſing over the River Aſopus, got in the dark of the night up into the Mountain, where beating down the Guard of Phocians which there watched, they began to come into the more plain and eaſie way, when the thing was carried by ſome fugitives to the Græcians. They were ſtricken with great terror at the report, all but Leonidas with his Spartans, who for that the Lacedæmonians were told by an Oracle, that they muſt either loſe their City or one of their Kings, was very ready to abide to the utmoſt. Wherefore he willingly gave way to his aſſociates to depart, bidding them reſerve themſelves for the better condition of their Country, who all preſently falling off, except the Theſpians, and ſuch Thebans as the reſt of the Græcians had forced thither, not ſo much to help them, as to keep them as Hoſtages; with them and his three hundred Spartans he prepared himſelf to fight, with a mind devoted already to death. When the Sun was up, and the Perſians not yet got down, thoſe reſolute Grecians paſſing the Straights to redeem their lives at deerer rates, fell in upon the multitudes of their Enemies, with which being compaſſed about, they were all cut off, with Leonidas, except ſuch as retiring back into the Straights took an hill, and fighting valiantly with thoſe Perſians whom Epialtes had led down upon them, ſold their lives as their fellows very deer; twenty thouſand of Xerxes his Army with this handful of men being ſlain. The Thebans alone lifted up their Targets begging quarter, crying out they were brought thither againſt their wills, and that they were Xerxes his Subjects; yet were they ſlain, or being taken were ſtigmatized for diſgrace. The body of Leonidas being found was nailed to a Croſs. Theſe things hapned at Thermopylæ in the middle middle of Summer, while ſome of the Græcians in Peloponneſus were Celebrating the Games of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, in the beginning of its firſt year, wherein Callias was Archon at Athens, as we are told from Diodorus Siculus, of whoſe Hiſtory digeſted according to the years of their Solemnities, that part now extant beginneth with this Expedition; at which time alſo Philoſophy was tranſlated out of Ionia to Athens by Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, Scholar to Anaximenes the Mileſian, who now being twenty years old began to profeſs it in that City, way being made for Learning there, by the Library collected through the Induſtry of Piſiſtratus.

Juſtin.

Laertius in vita Clemens Stromat. lib. 1.

40. Xerxes having now had experience of what Demaratus had ſaid to him, asked his advice for carrying on the War; being in great doubt what to do, after he had heard how they of Sparta were able to Arm well nigh eight thouſand men of ſuch temper as the former, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to thoſe, were very valiant. Demaratus being of this opinion, that all the Land forces would aſſemble together at the Iſthmus, to defend that entry into Peloponneſus, adviſed him to ſend three hundred Ships well mann'd to ſpoil the Country of Laconia, thereby to keep the Lacedæmonians and their Neighbours entangled at home; while having ſubdued the reſt, he might afterwards fall upon them, who would be then too weak of themſelves to ſuſtain his power: He farther alſo adviſed, that three hundred Veſſels ſhould ſeiſe upon Cythera the Iſland, which lying near the Coaſts of Laconia, might ſerve as a place of Retreat or Rendezvouz for their own ſecurity, and indamaging of the Enemy; Chilon the Lacedæmonian having been wont to ſay, that it were better for them to have it drowned in the Sea, than to ſtand ſo as it did for their diſadvantage. But Achæmenes the Brother of Xerxes ſtiffly impugned this advice, leſt by the ſevering of the Fleet after ſuch loſs by the Tempeſt, they might prove too weak for the Græcians at Sea; and to this out of fear the King ſubmitted, hoping his Land Army and Fleet ſhould ſtand each the other in good ſtead, both holding one courſe and not lying far aſunder.

Herodotus l. 8.

41. The Fleet of the Græcians ſtood all this while at Artemiſium; as a Bulwark to Eubœa, Commanded by Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, to whom the Athenians for quietneſs and ſafety gave place. But now the Peloponneſians having every one an eye upon his own Country, longed to go farther into Greece, and were only ſtayed by the cunning of Themiſtocles, till ſuch time as the Eubœans could ſecure their Wives and Children, with the principal of their Goods. In the mean time, the Perſians thinking to incompaſs them, ſent two hundred Sail to come behind about the Iſland, they lying in the Straits betwixt it and the Main. They had knowledge of this device, and not ignorant of the loſs ſuſtained by the Perſian Fleet in the laſt Tempeſt, ſet ſail at midnight and met theſe two hundred Ships with a counterſurpriſe, took and ſunk thirty of them, and forced the reſt to take the Sea, where by foul weather they were driven upon the Rocks, and all caſt away. The news of this was brought to the Græcians by fifty three Athenian Ships, ſent in to increaſe the Fleet, which doubled the joy thereof; ſo that elevated with new hopes, they ſet next day upon ſome Cilician Ships which were ſevered from the reſt of the Fleet, and, damnifying them much, returned to Artemiſium.

A Sea-Fight:

42. The Perſians taking this in great indignation, and fearing the anger of Xerxes, reſolved to redeem their credit with ſome notable exploit, and for that purpoſe the next day in the form of a Creſcent invaded the Grecians. They cheerfully gave them battel, and the Fight endured from Noon till Night, ending with equal loſs to both parties: For though more of the Perſian Veſſels were loſt, yet the leſſer damage fell as heavy upon the other, which being ſmaller could leſs bear it, though they fought moſt manfully for their Liberty and Country; the Athenians deſerving beſt amongſt them and amongſt the Athenians, Clinias the Father of Alcybiades, a famous man in the next Age. Amongſt the Perſians the Egyptians fought moſt ſtoutly, and theſe things happened at Sea thoſe ſame three days in which the Land Action was at Thermopylæ, in both the Straits the Greeks endeavouring to hinder the Enemies acceſs into their Country. But ſhortly after that they had intelligence by one ſent out on purpoſe, what was become of Leonidas and thoſe with him, they would needs depart from Artemiſium, and draw their Navy, much battered in the former Fights, more inwards and nearer home. Themiſtocles ſeeing this reſolution, before they weighed Anchor, perſwaded them to kill up the Cattel of the Eubœans, and bring the meat on Shipboard, rather than to leave them a Prey to the Enemy, and engraved upon ſtones upon the Shore, and at the watering places where he knew the Ionians would come, an Exhortation to Revolt to the Greeks and ſide with their Mother Country, or elſe ſtand neutral in the Fight, or Fight coldly. This he hoped would either prevail with them, or at leaſt render them ſuſpected with the Perſian.

Idem ibid. Plutarch in Themiſtoc.

43. From Artemiſium they ſailed to the Coaſt of Attica, and at the deſire of the Athenians took up their harbour at the Iſland Salamine: The Perſian Fleet removed to Artemiſium and the Coaſt adjoyning to Hiſtæotis. Xerxes now having paſſed the Streights of Thermopylæ, marched through the Country of Doris into Phocis, which being forſaken of its Inhabitants he waſted, and when he came to Panopæa a Town thereof, he divided his Army into two parts. With the one he invaded Greece, and the other he ſent to rifle and burn the famous Temple of Delphos; but as it's ſaid, this party was almoſt wholly deſtroyed without humane help, by Thunder and Lightning, and two Rocks, which breaking off from the Mountain Parnaſſus, overwhelmed it: Thoſe that eſcaped were generally killed by the Phocians, who having fled into the Mountain for fear of Xerxes, fell upon them, ſo that few remained and eſcaped to their Friends in Bœotia. Xerxes now marched through Bœotia, the Country of his Allies, into Attica, with intention to do his utmoſt againſt the City of Athens it ſelf.

A Party ſent by Xerxes to deſtroy the Temple of Delphos, conſum'd with Thunder and Lightning.

44. In the mean time, the Gracian Fleet lying at Salamine, though ſtrengthned with a new acceſſion of Ships at the Coaſt of Træzene, could hardly be contained there; for every one being ſollicitous for his own Countrey, and deſpairing of Attica and the reſt of Greece without the Iſthmus, was buſie in fortifying this neck of Land, and labour'd thither to bring the Navy, whence there might be ſafe retreat into Peloponneſus if need were. This the Athenians underſtanding, were ſore troubled, as having juſtly expected that the Peloponneſians would joyn with them, and the reſt of the Aſſociates in defending Attica, as they had fought for them at Artemiſium; but making the beſt uſe of it they could, they begged of them ſo long to ſtay there till they could provide ſome way for themſelves. Having obtained this, they publiſhed an Edict by the procurement of Themiſtocles (who improved the Oracle formerly mentioned to this purpoſe, and invented other devices) that all fit by Age ſhould come aboard, and tranſport their Wives and Children out of the City with their Slaves, and what they could; which was done, moſt carrying them to Træzene, where they were kindly entertained; and that Ariſtides, a man famous for wiſdom, juſtice, and integrity, but lately baniſhed for a time by the Oſtraciſm, by the potent faction of Themiſtocles, might return home; by the ſame procurement another Order was made to recall all whoſoever were baniſhed, that they might now in time of need ſerve their Country, and out of fear, leſt they ſhould joyn themſelves to the Enemy.

The Athenians remove.

Plutarch ut ſupra.

45. In the Fleet now at Salamine were three hundred fifty eight armed Ships, beſides other Veſſels of leſs importance, of which an hundred and eighty were provided and furniſhed by the Athenians; ſixteen only by the Lacedæmonians; the Corinthians ſent forty; the Inhabitants of Ægina thirty, which were notable for ſwiftneſs; the Megarians twenty; they of Chalcis furniſhed as many, having the Veſſels of the Athenians; the reſt were ſupplied in leſſer numbers by the Chians, Naxians, Melians, and Seriphians Iſlanders. Whilſt the Officers were in Council about the place of Battel, News came that the Enemy was entred Attica, waſting all with Fire and Sword; for having in Bœotia burned the Towns of the Theſpians and Platæans, who had forſaken their Habitations, he haſted into Attica, where conſuming all things he entred Athens, three months after he had paſſed over his Forces into Europe. The Caſtle, ſome few who would not leave their ancient Seat held out to the laſt, and were all put to the Sword; having refuſed quarter upon a vain confidence of the Oracle, that the City ſhould be defended with wooden Walls, and thinking they fulfilled the ſame by fortifying themſelves with Boards and Palliſadoes: the Temple of Minerva in the Caſtle he burn'd to aſhes. The Meſſage being brought, the Captains departed every man to his Ship, decreeing nothing, and all the reſt of the Peloponneſians determined to ſail to the Iſthmus.

46. This reſolution might have proved fatal to all Greece, had it not been prevented by the wiſdom of Themiſtocles, who being ſtirred up by Mneſiphilus of Athens, followed Eurybiades the Admiral into his Ship, and obtained of him again to aſſemble the Council. Here he overcame him by his mildneſs, who lifting up his Rod in an heat to ſtrike him, he bad him ſtrike ſo he would but hear. When he came to ſpeak of ſtaying at Salamine, one Adymantis upbraided him with the loſs of his Country, ſaying; It was not fit that ſuch an one ſhould give Council to them, that had theirs remaining to them: To whom he boldly replied, that though they, the Athenians, had left their Houſes and Walls, dead things, and not to be valued with their liberty, yet they had a City left them, than which there was none greater in Greece, viz. two hundred Ships which as yet was preſent, and ready to help their Aſſociates: But if they would depart and betray them, he would have them know they ſhould preſently hear, that the Athenians had both a free City and Territories as good as that they had left, meaning Siris, a Town in Italy, in their power. Eurybiades hearing this, and fearing to be deprived of the Athenian Fleet, ſo neceſſary for their ſupport, inclined to his opinion, inſomuch that the Græcians reſolved to ſtay and prepared themſelves for the Fight; but the Perſian Fleet drawing down to Phalerus the Athenian Port, and the Land Army to the Sea ſide, the Peloponneſians were ſo affrighted thereat, that having all their minds upon the Iſthmus, the advice of Themiſtocles was not at all regarded, and they reſolved to weigh Anchor and to be gone that night, and notice hereof was given to the Mariners.

Herodotus & Plutarch ut prius.

47. For now Xerxes his Fleet was drawn down ſo repaired, and increaſed by a new acceſſion of Ships, that it was altogether as conſiderable as before the Shipwrack at Sepias, and taking all Nations as he paſſed along with them, his Land Army contained as great a number as heretofore at Thermopylæ. The King came down from Athens to Phalerus the Port, and called a Council to deliberate what ſhould be done. All the Captains were for a Sea Fight, the Kings of Tyre and Sidon being firſt asked their opinions by Mardonius; only a woman, Artemiſia Queen of Halicarnaſſus, a wiſe and valiant Perſon, who had followed Xerxes in this expedition with five Ships, with grave and important Arguments diſſwaded a Sea Fight, and adviſed him to enter Peloponneſus with his Land Army, for thereby he would preſently diſſolve the Greekiſh Fleet, and finiſh the War. Though this advice followed would have been enough, and Xerxes could not but commend it, yet the major and worſe part carried it, and it was reſolved to fight the Græcians out of hand at Salamine. The Anchors then were weighed, and the Fleet made thitherwards; but Night coming on, ſuffered them not that day to reach the Iſland.

Plutarch in Themiſtoc.

48. At this time were the Peloponneſians ready to depart homewards, and thereby the Eſtate of Greece to be ruined, by their breaking their united Power, and reducing themſelves into their particular and inconſiderable Conditions, had not Themiſtocles, born for the preſervation of his Countrey, relieved it by his wiſdom in its great neceſſity. There was one Sicinus a Perſian, who, taken Priſoner, was a great lover of Themiſtocles, and taught his Children: Him he ſent privately to the King, to tell him that he, preferring his good before that of the Græcians, gave him now firſt to underſtand that they were about to flee, and adviſed him not to ſuffer it, but prevent them and ſet upon them whilſt they were diſordered, and the Fleet was ſevered from their Land Army. Xerxes gladly hearing the meſſage, as believing it to proceed out of Themiſtocles his affection to him, communicated it to his Officers, and while the reſt could be furniſhed with Soldiers, ſent two hundred Ships about the Iſland to block up the Streights, ſo that none of the Enemies might eſcape. Themiſtocles communicated what he had done to Ariſtides, who approving of it, went to perſwade the Greeks to Fight; when preſently, while their minds hung in ſuſpence, came a Ship of Tenedos from the Perſian Fleet, and acquainted them with what was done in the Streights; ſo that Neceſſity completed what was but half effected by the ſpeech of Ariſtides.

Idem & Herod ut prius.

49. Then prepared they themſelves unanimouſly to the Battel. Themiſtocles made a ſpeech unto them, wherein he ſhewed where their concernments lay, exhorting them to Fight manfully for their Country and Liberty, for their Parents, Wives, Children, and whatſoever was dear to them; with which, being provoked, they applied themſelves to their Ships, and put forth the Fleet into the Main. Xerxes placed himſelf on an high Throne to behold the Fight over againſt Salamine, and had ſome with him to write down the particulars thereof: A bloody Fight indeed was fought with great earneſtneſs on both ſides, the one fighting under the eyes of their King, who marked every paſſage and accordinly was affected, and the other for as much as could be dear to them in ſo dangerous a condition. Herein the Greeks had the advantage, that they were more exerciſed in Sea matters, and having all they had lying at the ſtake, they did it with the more earneſtneſs, and in that they fought with greater order: The Perſians, with ſo great a multitude of Ships, fought in diſorder and hindred one another, and if the Veſſels ſunk, were all loſt; whereas their enemies, by their skill in ſwimming, ſaved themſelves. At length the Ionians, ſollicited as was ſaid, by little and little withdrawing themſelves from the Fight, the reſt what by that diſcouraged, and overcome by the pertinacious valour of their enemies began to flee, the Athenians preſſing hard upon them, and deſtroying many of their Ships: Of ſuch as fled towards Phalerus, many were intercepted by the Ægenatans, the Emulators of the other in deſerving well of Greece; ſuch Xerxes his Fleet defeated.

ſuch as eſcaped them, and got to the Port, thence withdrew themſelves to the Land Army.

50. Of all the Græcians, the Athenians and Æginætans deſerved beſt, and amongſt them Themiſtocles; the Captains of the Fleet each one, when upon their Oaths they pronounced who merited moſt, naming him after themſelves. Amongſt the Perſians the valour of Artemiſia the Queen was moſt conſpicuous, acknowledged by Xerxes himſelf, who thereupon ſaid, that his men were turned women, and women became men: She was ſaved as it happened, and eſcaped to Phalerus. Many Noble Perſians fell, amongſt the reſt Ariabignes the Kings Brother; but few of the Græcians. Xerxes exceedingly diſcouraged with this great loſs, conſidered of his ſafe retreat out of Europe, fearing the Ionians might break the Bridge laid over the Helleſpont; yet that he might colour any ſuch intention, he began a new project by caſting earth into the Streights, to joyn the Iſland Salamine with the Continent. But Mardonius knowing his temper, and bethinking himſelf in what caſe he himſelf might ſtand for being the firſt adviſer to the War, went to him, and extenuating the loſs, the Land Army being left intire, at length propoſed to him to leave him three hundred thouſand men, with which he would engage to revenge him upon Greece, and reduce it all under his power if he pleaſed to depart himſelf into Aſia, being nothing tainted in honour for that things had not ſo well ſucceeded in this Encounter, becauſe the miſcarriage was procured by the Cowardiſe of the Ægyptians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and others no better than Slaves; the Perſians having gallantly enough behaved themſelves; and he, their Prince, having ſubdued already the greater part of Greece, and taken Athens it ſelf, againſt which the War was principally intended.

51. He liked very well the motion, but ſtill diſſembled the matter, anſwering that he would refer it to his Council, which he accordingly called, and asked the advice particularly of Artemiſia. She approved of Mardonius his Opinion, for that if he ſhould ſubdue Greece it would be to the King's advantage, and if he miſcarried it would be no diſgrace to him, who in his own perſon had accompliſhed the main deſign of the expedition, in taking and waſting Athens. He was pleaſed therewith, ſent her before hand away with his Sons he had brought with him, and gave liberty to Mardonius to make choice of what, and how many forces he pleaſed; all this being done the ſame day with the Fight at Salamis. The Night following, in great fear and diſorder, the Fleet looſed from Phalerus, and fled amain towards the Helleſpont, which the Græcians ſeeing purſued them as far as Andros one of the Cyclades, and took in there, for that they could then no more diſcern them, and that Iſland had been of the Perſian Faction. Here it being debated in the Council of Officers whether the Enemy ſhould be any further purſued, Eurybiades the General, for ſeveral grave and urgent reaſons diſſwaded it, a Bridge being rather to be laid for him; inſomuch that he convinced the reſt; and Themiſtocles, who as Herodotus ſaith, was formerly for the purſuit or elſe diſſembled, for reaſons which followed, changed his opinion, and reſtrained the Athenians.

52. And further foreſeeing that through their inconſtancy and known ingratitude, he might have cauſe in time to come to uſe Friends; that now he might make one of Xerxes, and therein alſo further provide for the good of his Country, he betook himſelf to his wonted craft and policy. He diſpatched away to him his former truſty Meſſenger, to acquaint him how careful he was for his ſafety, in diſſwading the Græcians from purſuing him, and to adviſe him by all means to make towards the Helleſpont, e're the Bridge ſhould be broken down, which he thought would be within a ſmall time. He being much affrighted hereat retreated preſently with all his Forces the ſame way he came into Theſſaly, where delivering to Mardonius three hundred thouſand men picked out of the whole Army, and ſettling other matters, with a ſmall and obſcure Train fitteſt for haſt (all the reſt being commanded to follow) he haſted through Macedonia and Thrace to the Helleſpont, where he arrived after forty five days. Here, whether he found the Bridge whole and ſo paſſed over it, or (what the Græcians have believed) broken in pieces by Tempeſts, and ſo paſſed over obſcurely in a Fiſhers Boat, obſervable is the great change upon him, who with ſo great pride had formerly beaten the Sea, and caſt Fetters into it. His Army following was a great part conſumed by the Plague, Famine, and other caſualties; ſo that the Fowls of the Air continually followed it, the way being full of Carkaſes. And being ſhipped over to Abydus, very many died by intemperate uſe of dyet, and drinking too much in the dyſentery, wherewith they were ſorely grieved. Thoſe that remained, by ſlow Journeys reached their King, lying at Sardis.

Herodotus, Plutarch. Diodorus ut ſuprà.

53. Artabazus, a man of prime note amongſt the Perſians, accompanied Xerxes

He flyeth.

to the Helleſpont, with a partie of ſixty thouſand men taken out of Mardonius his Army, who finding at his return the inhabitants of Potidæa in Macedonia to have revolted, fearing the Pallenians round about would do the ſame, and ſuſpecting alſo Olynthus, which then was inhabited by the Bottiæans, he beſieged both Towns, of which the latter he took, and killing the Towns-men gave it to one Critobulus of Chalcis to govern, after which, they of that place inhabited it. He then more ſtrongly beſieged Potidæa, but after three months having layn before it to no purpoſe, many of his men being loſt in the Sea, which broke in with an unuſual Tide, he roſe up and departed to Mardonius, who, for that Winter was at hand, had taken up his quarters in Theſſaly, and the adjoyning places of Macedonia. The Perſian Fleet being returned to the Coaſt of Aſia, wintered at Cumæ, for the greateſt part, onely ſome Ships at Samos, whither in the Spring they all ſailed, being increaſed to the number of three hundred by the addition of the Ionians, on whoſe Coaſt now they lay to keep them in obedience, being little deſirous of ſailing any more Weſtward, for the experience they had lately had of the Græcians at Salamina; and yet being in as little fear of their coming to them, whom they expected to be kept in awe, ſo as not to ſtir far from home, becauſe of Mardonius.

54 They ſtirred not indeed about providing any Land-forces wherewith to oppoſe Mardonius; but very buſie they were at Ægina in rigging their Fleet, over which Leutychides King of Sparta (iſſued from Procles, and put into the place of Demeratus,) was made Admiral: Xanthippus Father to Pericles being General of the Athenian Fleet, which contained the moſt Ships. While they abode here, came ſix men from Chios, who having conſpired againſt Strathes their Tyrant, upon diſcovery of the Plot, fled, Beſeeching them that they would undertake the freeing of Ionia; and ſo far they prevailed, as to get them to ſail to Delus; but no further would they go, becauſe unacquainted as yet with the affairs of Aſia, they feared the Perſians; ſo that both parties ſtood in awe of each other.

Mardonius left behind.

55. Mardonius thinking of his promiſe made to his Maſter, conſulted the Oracles; but they refuſing to anſwer, he ſent Alexander King of Macedonia, now in great grace with the Perſians, through the marriage of his Siſter to Bubares, in ambaſſage to the Athenians, to take them off from the ſociety with the reſt of Greece. He knew they gave the moſt mortal blows in the Battle at Salamina, and thought, that if they could be taken off, the reſt would be conquered with little or no difficulty. The fame of this Ambaſſage flying abroad, came to Sparta, which netled the Lacedæmonians, and made them with all ſpeed to diſpatch away Ambaſſadors of their own, to prevent the alliance ſo dangerous to all Greece, and the Athenians refuſed to give audience to Alexander, till they were arrived, that they might alſo be preſent thereat. Alexander told them that Xerxes had given order to Mardonius to ſignifie to them how willing he was to remit what was paſt; to reſtore them their Territories, and more than them if they would; to leave them to their own freedom, and repaire their Temples at his own charges, if they would enter into a League of amity with him; otherwiſe they could not be ignorant how great inconveniences they drew upon themſelves from ſo potent a Prince, able to ſend other Armies if they now with Mardonius ſhould be overthrown: to theſe things ſpoken as from Mardonius, the Ambaſſador added as a friend, that they ſhould not let ſlip ſuch an opportunity. After him the Ambaſſadors of Sparta ſpoke, and ſhewed how unworthy a thing it would be for the Athenians of all others, to forſake the publick cauſe, they having been the Authors of the War, and their Anceſtors ſo renowned for ſetting others at liberty; wherefore they hoped that they would not be acceſſary to the ſlavery of all Greece. Their anſwer was to Alexander, that ſo long as the Sun ſhould hold his courſe, they would never enter into alliance with Xerxes, but reſiſt his Forces with their own; and him they deſired, whom they reſpected as a Friend, not any more to bring ſuch an unwelcome meſſage, leſt he might ſuffer ſomething from the angry people. To the Spartans they anſwered to this purpoſe, that they would never any of them as long as they lived enter into confederacy with the Perſian: they thanked them for their kind offer to maintain their Wives and Children in caſe of neceſſity, which they hoped they ſhould not have much cauſe to need, ſo as to be troubleſom to them; and deſired them to haſten away to them their ſupplies, for that they beleived the Barbarian would not loſe time after the report of their anſwer, but preſently invade them; and they thought it moſt convenient to meet him in Bœotia.

Herod. lib. 9.

56. Mardonius having received this anſwer from Athens, in great wrath marched thitherwards out of Theſſalie. When he came to Thebes, the Inhabitants adviſed him to go no farther, for that he ſhould never ſubdue Greece united together, but ſtay there in a commodious place, and corrupt with mony thoſe that were moſt prevalent in each City, whereby he might divide the Gracians into factions, and ſo eaſily maſtering the diſſenters, ſubdue the whole Country. But he not hearkening to this advice, proceeded, hoping by Fires made in the Iſlands, to give notice to Xerxes ſtill lying at Sardis, that he was again got into Athens, which the Inhabitants upon his approach, and the Peloponneſians deferring to ſend their ſuccors, again quitted and departed to Salamine. He entered Athens, the tenth Moneth being now compleated after Xerxes had the poſſeſſion of that City, and having ſo done, ſent to Salamine to the owners of it, once more offering them the ſame conditions he had formerly propoſed by Alexander of Macedonia, hoping, that upon this extremity to which they were once again reduced, they might change their ſtubbornneſs for a more complying diſpoſition.

Sect. 2.

57. But they were ſo far from harkening to what he offered, that they ſtoned one Lycidas a Senator, for ſaying it deſerved to be taken into conſideration, and to be propoſed to the whole body of the People, and his Wife and Children were uſed in the ſame manner by the women. Then ſent they (together with the Megarians and Platæans) ſeriouſly to expoſtulate with the Lacedæmonians for the non-performance of their promiſe, whereby their Country was again expoſed to the will and pleaſure of the Enemy, and plainly to tell them, that except their aſſociates would better ſtand to their word, and diſpatch away their ſuccours in time, they muſt needs provide for themſelves apart, for as much as yet a way was open for their entry into confederacy with the common Enemy. The Ambaſſadors found them celebrating annual Games, and underſtood that the Peloponneſians were only intent upon their prefecting the Wall at the Iſthmus, having no regard at all to them, whereof they highly complained to the Ephori. They promiſed them an anſwer the next day, but deferred from day to day, until after ten days the wall of the Iſthmus was perfected.

58. After this time came a man of Tegea to them, and blaming them for their neglect of their allies, convinced them of the vanity of the Wall, in caſe the Athenians ſhould joyn with Mardonius; for they could with eaſe convey him otherwiſe than by the Iſthmus into Peloponneſus, wherewith being ſtartled, in the dead time of the Night, and without privity of the Ambaſſadors, they ſent out five thouſand men beſides ſeven thouſand of the Heilots or publick Slaves, under the conduct of Cleombrotus Tutor to Pliſtarchus the young King. In the morning the Ambaſſadors came again to them expoſtulating as before, whereto the Ephori anſwered, that their Succors were already on their way, whom then the other underſtanding the matter, followed, and with them other five thouſand gathered out of the places bordering upon Sparta. Mardonius having intelligence how things went in Peloponneſus from the Argives, who all this while, were of his party, was ſomething abaſhed, having till now had ſome hopes of the Athenians their compliance, for which reaſon he had ſpared their Territories. But now he deſtroyed all he could both in City and Country, and forſaking Attica as a Region dangerous to his Army, by reaſon of the unevenneſs of the Ground, and hard to be quitted ſodainly in time of danger, he returned into Bœotia a Champain Country, and in alliance with him, where in the Territories of the Thebans he pitched his Tents at the River Aſopus, bringing much dammage to his friends round about, in taking up ſuch things as were but neceſſary to the ſuſtenance of his Army. The Spartans in the mean time lying at the Iſthmus, the other Peloponneſians after their example came alſo thither, whence they marched to Eleuſine. Thither came the Athenians from Salamine, and joyned with them, whence they followed Mardonius into Bœotia, and ſate down over againſt his Camp at the foot of the Mountain Cithæron.

Burneth Athens, and goeth into Bœotia.

59. The Greeks brought into the Field eleven Myriads or eleven hundred thouſand, according to Herodotus, from which number (a) others take the odd thouſands, and make them juſt one hundred thouſand. The number of the Perſian Army amounted to thirty Myriads or three hundred thouſand, beſides the Greek Auxiliaries, which he conjectureth to have been about five Myriads more; the three hundred thouſand are owned by Plutarch, another (b) numbereth but two hundred thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand Horſe; but Diodorus on the contrary ſaith, that beſides theſe Forces drawn out of Xerxes his Army, Mardonius had out of Macedonia and Thrace, and the aſſociate States, about twenty Myriads,

(a) Diodorus, Juſtin, Oroſius.

(b) Corn. Nepos in Ariſtide.

UMI

Herodotus ut Supra.

riads, and that his whole Army contained fifty Myriads or five hundred thouſand Men. Mardonius when the Græcians were encamped, ſent a party of Horſe to aſſail them, which objecting cowardiſe to them, and provoking them, very light skirmiſhes enſued, wherewith the Megarians were ſore put to it, being on diſadvantagious Ground, but being releived by three hundred ſtout Athenians, all others refuſing, a ſharp encounter followed, in which Maſiſtius who commanded the Party of the Perſians was ſlain. A great conteſt followed about the Body, the Perſians labouring with all their might to redeem it, all the Perſian Horſe coming into the Quarrel, and then the whole Army of the Græcians; but at length they were fain to return without it, and it was carried in triumph about the Greekiſh Camp. This as it brought great Sorrow to the Perſians, ſo the other were much elevated in their Minds thereby, and removed their Camp into the Territories of Platææ, whither Mardonius alſo followed them, and encamped over againſt them, both parties neglecting to fight (only excepting ſuch Skirmiſhes as was made by the Perſian Horſe) for ten days.

60. On the eleventh, it being palpable that the Greekiſh Army daily waſted by the revolt of many of their Countrymen, and yet that the Perſian groaned under its own Burthen, Mardonius called a Council of his Officers to conſult what was to be done. Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces, a man of great Nobility, and an emulator of the General, contended with him, urging that the beſt was to decline the Fight, and march to Thebes, where they might have plenty of Proviſion, here wanting, and whence by ſending Money into the principal Cities of Greece (according to the advice formerly given by the Thebans) they might diſpatch the War with Eaſe. But Mardonius being more hot and earneſt, thinking his Army to be for the preſent ſtronger than the Enemy, reſolved to fight, not ſuffering himſelf by any perſwaſions to be removed from his Purpoſe, and becauſe of his Authority the reſt daring not contradict it, it was reſolved to fall on the next morning by break of the day. Notice hereof was given by Alexander the Macedonian to the Athenians, who adviſed them in caſe Mardonius ſhould not fight, to ſtay it out; for the Perſians were ſtraightned for Proviſions. The Athenians bring this News to Pauſanias the General, who being ſomething ſtruck therewith, he deſired them to change places, becauſe they were better acquainted with the Perſian manner of fighting ſince the Battle at Marathon, and the Spartans were more uſed to the Theſſalians and Bœotians now oppoſed to the Athenians; they ſoon condeſcended hereunto, but Mardonius having notice of it, made his Perſians change place with the Bœotians and the other; and though Pauſanias again reduced his men into the former place, yet was neither this hid from Mardonius, who ſtill to prevent him did the like.

61. Mardonius upon this ſent and upbraided Pauſanias and his Spartans with cowardize, eſpecially ſeeing he had made a challenge to fight with them, with his Perſians, either a certain number of each, or all together, both which were refuſed. Then ſent he his Horſe upon them, which with Darts ſore troubled the whole Army, and moſt of all in that it hindred the fetching of Water, that the Græcians were conſtrained to change the place, and reſolved to paſs into an Iſland compaſſed about with the River, and neer the Walls of the City, which was very convenient for watering, and lay alſo well for Proviſions. By night they removed, but moſt miſſing of the place went to the Temple of Juno in the Highway to Platæa, and there encamped themſelves, whom the Spartans being commanded to follow, much trouble aroſe thereupon by the means of one Amompharetus a valiant man, who for ſome time would not ſtir with his Regiment, crying out, it was contrary to the Laconick Diſcipline to fly from the Enemy, and ſuppoſing Pauſanias and the reſt durſt not forſake him. But towards morning he came off from his reſolution, and ſo all marched to the Temple of Ceres, ſituate upon the River Moloe, being followed cloſe by the Perſian Horſe.

The battle at Platæa, and Mardonius ſlain.

62. The Sun being riſen, Mardonius grievouſly inveighing againſt the cowardiſe of the Græcians, and Artabazus for his late opinion, marched with his whole Army, as to purſue the Enemy flying, and all his Horſe began ſore to preſs upon the Backs of the Spartans and Tegeatans, joyned with them at the Chappel of Ceres, ſo that then enſued a ſharp Fight betwixt them, and betwixt the Athenians who came into their Succour, and ſuch Greeks as were confederate with the Perſians. The Tegeatans charged the Perſian Infantry, in which after much toyl and Bloodſhed, Mardonius fighting on a white Horſe in the midſt of one thouſand choice men, was ſlain by Armneſtus the moſt valiant Spartan. After his death, his men diſcouraged, were ſlaughtered in great numbers, and put to the rout, which Artabazus ſeeing, ſhifted for himſelf with a party of forty thouſand commanded by him, and fled towards the Helleſpont: the Greeks that aſſiſted Mardonius, though nothing inferiour to their Countreymen for valour, were put to flight; and three hundred of Thebans, who moſt ſtoutly behaved themſelves, were ſlain upon the place.

63. In the mean time the Corinthians, Megarians, Phliaſians, and the reſt, who had taken up their ſtation at the Chapel of Juno, hearing of the Victory of their Friends, haſted to the place all out of order, the Corinthians over Hill and Dale the neareſt way; but the reſt through the plaine, who were circumvented by the Theban Horſe, and many of them cut off. The Perſians fled into their Camp, which they had fenced with a Rampire for ſecurity, whither they were followed by the Spartans, who laboured with all their might to ſtorm the place, but were ſtoutly repulſed by the Defendants, till the Athenians coming in, and better exerciſed in ſuch attempts, brake into the Camp. The Tegeatans followed with great violence, and took, and plundred the Pavilion of Mardonius with his braſen Manger, and then followed an unſpeakable ſlaughter of the Perſians, ſo that of thoſe three hundred thouſand left to Mardonius by Xerxes, excepting thoſe forty thouſand, which fled with Artabazus, not three thouſand remained, one hundred thouſand according to Diodorus, without mercy being put to death within the Rampire. Of the Græcians not many were ſlain, according to Herodotus, who reckoneth thirty one Spartans, ſixteen Tegeatans, and fifty two Athenians, mentioned at large by him; but Plutarch mentioneth one thouſand three hundred and ſixty of the Greekiſh Army to have been ſlain, and Diodorus increaſeth the number to above ten thouſand. The Mantineans and Eleans came after the Victory, at which they were ſo aſhamed, that returning home they baniſhed their Captains as Authors of the delay. The Conquerors thence marched to Thebes, where the Inhabitants gave up the Authors of their revolt to the Barbarians, whom being carried to Corinth, all but Attaginus that eſcaped, he there put to death.

In Ariſtide.

64. Whilſt theſe things were thus done in Bœotia, the Greekiſh Fleet of which Leutychides the Spartan King was Admiral, harboured at the Iſland Delos: Hither came three Ambaſſadors from Samus, deſiring aid againſt the Barbarians, and their Tyrant impoſed upon them, ſhewing that it was moſt equal that Græcians ſhould one vindicate the liberty of another, and that this Enterpriſe would be without difficulty, for as much as if the Ionians did but once ſee their Fleet, they would revolt from the Perſians, of whom ſuch as were amongſt them would either fly, or might eaſily be made a Prey; Laſtly, if the Ambaſſadors were miſtruſted as not repreſenting things according to their Commiſſion, they offered themſelves as Hoſtages, till the truth might be cleared. Leutychides taking an Oath of them that they came impowred from the Samians, retained Hegeſiſtratus (becauſe his Name he took for a good Omen) who had been the mouth of the reſt, and ſending the other two before, followed the next day to Samus. The Sea-men that were there, ſtricken with great fear at the report of the Fleet approaching, diſmiſſed the Phœnician Veſſels, and fled with the reſt to the Continent, hoping to keep them ſafe under the protection of the ſixty thouſand Foot left on the Coaſts by Xerxes to keep Ionia in obedience, over whom Tigranes was General, a man of a moſt proper and amiable perſonage.

65. The Perſians having drawn their Ships under the Foot of the Mountain Mycale, near the Temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and barricaded them with great Stones, Wood, and other Materials, came the Græcians with their Fleet prepared for a Fight. But underſtanding what was done, Leutychides coming near the Shore, by the voice of a Cryer aloud (as Themiſtocles had done before) endeavoured either to make the Ionians revolt, or at leaſt to render them ſuſpected to the Enemy; which being done, preſently he landed all his men, reſolving to try the event of a Land Battel. The Perſians ſuſpecting the Samians, diſarmed them, and ſent the Mileſians to keep the paſſages leading up into the Mountain. As the Armies were going to meet, a ſudden Rumour was ſpread abroad through that of the Græcians, that Mardonius with his Forces were cut off, which elevated their Spirits, and made them to Charge with great alacrity, which was alſo increaſed; for that they were now to fight at the Temple of the ſame Goddeſs, as they heard their Friends had done with Mardonius in Bœotia. Then charged they the Perſians in a double Body, the Athenians with the Corinthians and others, on the Plain by the Sea-ſhore; the Lacedæmonians, and others joyned with them, through the mountainous and precipitous places, who whileſt they were getting up, the Athenians fell on, and calling on one another to endeavour to deprive the Lacedæmonians of the Honour of the Victory, charged the Enemy ſo furiouſly, that at length they beat them back, and forced them into their Camp, whither alſo they brake in with them.

The battel at Mycale.

66. Hereupon enſuing a bloody Fight, all the reſt fled except the Perſians, who fighting with great reſolution, were yet cut off and defeated upon the coming in of the Lacedæmonians and the reſt. Two of the Sea-Captains were ſlain, two eſcaped, and with the reſt fell Tigranes, the General of the Foot, and of the Greeks periſhed not a few. The Samians, though diſarmed, and other Ionians came in and helped their Friends, and the Mileſians ſet to guard the Paſſages of Mycale, fell down upon the Perſians another way, and made great ſlaughter of them. So was Ionia rent from the Perſian Empire again, and joyned to the Græcians. After this performed by Land, the Conquerours burnt all the Perſian Ships in the Haven, and being inriched with great Spoil returned to Samus. It was found out afterwards that this Victory at Mycale was obtained on the ſelf ſame day as the other at Platæa in Bœotia, the later in the Morning, and the former at Evening, which cauſed the wonder how intelligence could be given to theſe that fought at Mycale of the ſucceſs of their Countrey-men ſo far off. This hapned often in following times as will be ſeen, although ſome have thought that no report was brought any way to the Army of the Victory of Platæa, but that it was ſo given out on purpoſe as a Stratagem by Leutychides to animate his Souldiers, who then being wholely ignorant of any ſuch thing, he invented that which afterwards proved accordingly. Theſe two Battels, and Victories, hapned on the third or fourth day of the Moneth Boedromion, in the ſecond year after the invaſion of Greece by Xerxes.

Ionia revolteth.

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*75.an. 2. *Polyænus ſtr.l.*1 Front. lib. 1. *cap.*11.*Exemp.*7.

67. The Græcians lying at Samus fell into diſpute about tranſlating the Ionians, and Æolians, out of Aſia into Greece, for that they could not be always in a readineſs to defend them, and they could not ſubſiſt of themſelves; and the Spartans moved that thoſe who had revolted to the Perſian ſhould be caſt out, and they placed in their rooms; but the Athenians fearing to be deprived of the right of their Colony, which yet the Ionians acknowledging themſelves, might own the reſt of the aſſociates for their patrons, upon ſuch a change, daſhed the project. Then were the Samians, Chians, Lesbians, and others, who had revolted, religiouſly and ſolemnly ſworn to the obſervation of the League, and the Græcians departed towards the Helleſpont to break the Bridge there, which when they found broken to their Hands, they conſulted about returning home. The Athenians were for going into the Cherroneſus of Thrace to recover it out of the hands of the Perſians, and, though the Peloponneſians returned, proceeding in their reſolution went and beſieged Seſtus an Æolian Town, ſituate in the Cherſoneſus, over againſt Abydus. Before this Town they continued till the Autumn was far ſpent, and then pined out the Inhabitants, who forſook the Town, but were overtaken, and either ſlain, or made Priſoners, amongſt the later ſort of which was Artagetes the Governour, who becauſe he had violated the Sepulchre of the Chapel of Proteſilaus, a great Saint in that place, ſaw firſt his Son ſtoned before his Face, and then was hanged by command of Xanthippus the Athenian Admiral. Then returned the Navy home to Athens, and nothing was done further this year, which was the ſecond of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, and the ſeventh of the reign of Xerxes, of the World three thouſand five hundred twenty ſix, and before Chriſt the four hundred and ſeventy ſeven.

Herodotus ut prius lib. 9. cap. 105. & Diodorus ut prius.

The Median War endeth after two years.

68. Xerxes all this while lay at Sardis, and thither thoſe few that eſcaped from Mycale betook themſelves. In the way Maſiſtes Brother to the King fell foul upon Artayntes, one of the Captains of the Fleet, amongſt other reproachful words telling him that he had in this behaved himſelf more cowardly than a Woman, whereupon the other drew his Dagger, and had ſtabbed him, but that one Xenagoras an Halicarnaſſean interpoſed himſelf, whom for this ſaving of his Brother, Xerxes rewarded with the Government of Cilicia. Whilſt he lay ſtill at Sardis he fell in love with the Wife of Maſiſtes, but ſhe being too honeſt for his adulterous intentions, he married her, and his Brothers Daughter Artaynta to his Son Darius, hoping to enjoy her this way, which Ceremony being over, he returns home, leaving part of his Forces to continue the War with the Græcians. In his (a) flight he burned all the Temples of Aſia except the Epheſian, out of indignation at his late bad ſucceſs, and amongſt the reſt the Oracle of Didymean Apollo amongſt the Branchidans, who becauſe they betrayed the Treaſures of their God to him, durſt not ſtay behind, but followed him. (b) Some ſay he went to Suſa, others to Ecbatane, a (c) third, that by Babylon into Perſia. That in his way back from

(a) Strabo lib. 14.
(b) Herodotus.
(c) Diodorus.

from Græce he (d) deſtroyed the Temple of Belus in that City, we alſo read, with all the other religious places of the Babylonians, taking away a Statue off that Wall of twelve Cubits, and all of beaten Cold, and killing of the Prieſt who offered to hinder the removal of it.

(d) Cteſias. Arrianus lib. 7. Herodotus ut Prius cap. 183. Strab. lib. 16.

Xerxes his incontinence.

69. Being returned to Suſa, he fell from the Mother to the Daughter too, being in love with Artaynta his Daughter-in-law, whom inceſtuouſly he uſed conſtantly. She begged of him a Coat, which with much art and induſtry Ameſtris his Wife had made for him. By her wearing of this the Queen knew how matters went, and thence followed the deſtruction of the whole Houſe of Maſiſtes; for on Xerxes his birth-day, when he uſed not to deny her any requeſt, ſhe asked Maſiſtes Wife to be given up into her Power, which he doing, ſhe cut off her Breaſts, Noſe, Ears, Lips, and Tongue, and in this caſe ſent her home. Maſiſtes inraged at this barbarous uſage, conſpired with his Children how to be revenged, and reſolved to fly into Bactria, of which he was Governour, then to ſtir up that Province, and the Sacæ with whom he was very gracious, into rebellion againſt his Brother. But Xerxes coming to the knowledg of the matter, ſent a party after him, which cut him off with his Children, and all his retinue. Theſe things happened about a year after his return, with which endeth the Hiſtory of Herodotus the Father of hiſtory (as Cicero called him) ſeeing he is the moſt antient of all Heathen Writers now extant.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 75. an. 3. Thucid. lib. 1.

70. The ſame year being the third of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, and the eighth of the Reign of Xerxes, a year after the finiſhing of the Median War, ſo called by the Græcians, the Lacedæmonians ſent Pauſanias, famous for his Generalſhip at the Battel of Platæa, to ſet at liberty ſuch Greek Cities as yet were under the Perſian, who accordingly with fifty Gallies ſet Sail out of Peloponneſus, and taking thirty more out from Athens, commanded by Ariſtides, firſt went to Cyprus, where he ſet at liberty ſuch Towns as were yet held by Perſian Garriſons, and thence to the Helleſpont, where he took Byzantium, and therein many Noble priſoners of the Perſians, whom he delivered to one Gangylus an Eretrian, to be kept as he pretended, to be put to death, but indeed to reſtore them to Xerxes. For he ſent this man ſecretly to the King, and bargained for his Daughter to be given him in Marriage to betray Sparta and all into his Hands. He gladly received the Meſſage, and wrote back again to him by Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces whom he ſent to the Sea-Coaſts to hold Intelligence with him, and for that purpoſe gave him the Government of Daſcylis, recalling Magabates who was over that Province. But Pauſanias growing more inſolent, hereupon was ſuſpected, and afterwards at length diſcovered, and puniſhed for his Treaſon, as farther is to be diſcovered in it's proper place.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 77. an. 3.

71. In the third year of the ſeventy ſeventh Olympiad, and the ſixteenth of Xerxes, Demotion being Archon, or chief Magiſtrate of Athens, the Athenians made choice of Cimon the Son of Miltiades for their General, and with a conſiderable force ſent him into the Maritime Coaſts of Aſia, with order to relieve the Aſſociates, and ſet at liberty ſuch as were ſtill under the ſlavery of Perſian Garriſons. He bends his courſe towards Byzantium, and took Eione and Scyrus, inhabited by Pelaſgians and Dolopians, and divided the Grounds thereof by lot; then caſting in his Mind greater deſigns, ſailed back to the Piræus, and furniſhing himſelf with more Ships, increaſed his Navy to the number of two hundred, to which he added of the Aſſociates one hundred more, and with all this Power ſailed towards Caria. Here all the Maritime Greek Cities revolted to him, and what did not, he ſubdued by ſtrong Hand, which having done, he ſailed to Lycia, where he had the ſame ſucceſs, and now requiring Ships to be provided by ſuch as had joyned themſelves in Society with the Athenians, he thereby mightily increaſed his Navy.

Vide Plutarch. in Cimone.

72. The Perſians now levied both a Land and Sea-Army, the former within themſelves, and the latter out of Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Cilicia, the General being Tithrauſtes the baſe Son of Xerxes, who by ſome other is ſaid to have only had command of the Fleet, and that Pharendates was over the Land-forces, though this place by another is given to Ariomandes the Son of Gobryas. Cymon having made diſcovery that the Perſian Fleet Rode nigh to Cyprus, ſailed thither, and with two hundred fifty Ships made Head againſt three hundred forty, whereupon enſued a ſharp Fight, both Parties fighting with great courage and animoſity, till at length the Athenians overpower'd the other, and ſpoiling many of their Veſſels, took about one hundred with the Men in them, the reſt eſcaping to Land at Cyprus, the men ſaved themſelves by Flight, but the Ships fell into the Hands of the Græcians. Cimon not contented with this Victory, ſailed towards the Land-Army of the Perſians, then lying upon the River Eurymedon. To deceive the Enemy, he put his moſt valiant men aboard thoſe Veſſels lately taken in the Fight, adorned and cloathed after the Perſian faſhion, ſo that the Perſians not doubting at all but that it was their own Eleet, kindly welcomed theſe counterfeits as their Friends. Hereby Cimon received as ſuch, landed his men by night and fell upon the Enemies Camp, whence enſued great fear and tumult, his men preſently killing all they meet, and amongſt the reſt Pheredates Nephew to the King by his Brother. Of the common ſort many were ſlain, others ſorely wounded, and ſhortly all put to flight, yet they knew not by whom, not ſuſpecting the Græcians to have any Land-Army, and therefore concluding themſelves ſurprized by the Piſidians upon whom they bordered.

Idem ibid. Diodorus ut prius. Polyænus l. 1. Frontinus Stratag. lib. ult. cap. ult. exempl. ultim.

73. Suſpecting therefore this Storm to come from the Continent, they betook themſelves to their Ships, and the Moon then not ſhining, and the Night being very dark, the Error was the more increaſed, ſo that not diſcerning any thing, they ran upon their own Ruine, and great ſlaughter was made of them on all ſides. All things being thus in confuſion, the Græcian General fearing the ſtraggling of his Soldiers too far for Booty, according to former order, that when he ſet out a Light they ſhould all come back to that place, gave out that ſign by the Ships, upon ſight of which they withdrew themſelves thither. Notwithſtanding theſe two Victories, which in ſome ſence ſeemed to excel thoſe of Salamina and Platæa, being fought on the ſame day, yet would he add one thing more as a Supplement to them. Underſtanding eighty Phœnician Ships (expected as Plutarch ſaith, by the Navy at Eurymedon, which was the cauſe why he ſet upon it ſo ſoon, being unwilling they ſhould joyn) to be arrived at Hydrus, he ſailed haſtily thither, where as yet the News had not arrived, but now the Phœnicians ſuſpecting the truth, and thereby diſcouraged, he eaſily overcame, took and ſunk all their Ships, and therein the greateſt part of themſelves miſcarried. Hereupon enſued a certain agreement betwixt the King and the Græcians.

Plutarch ibid.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 78. nn. 4. Juſtin. lib. 3. cap. 1. Cteſias.

74. The next thing conſiderable concerning Xerxes, is his Death, placed in the fifth year after the former tranſactions, by Diodorus. There was one Artabanus an Hyrcanian by birth, of great power about him, as Captain of his Guard, who conſulted about making him away, and transferring the Kingdom to himſelf, and for that purpoſe inveagled Mithridates the Eunuch the King's Chamberlain, by whom being let in by Night with his ſeven Sons, they ſtrangled him in his Bed. He reigned twenty one Years, or twenty with odd Moneths, though ſome there be that cut off nine Years from that number. Their ground is, for that Themiſtocles the Athenian being baniſhed his Country, came to Artaxerxes, then the new King of Perſia, according to Thucydides, ſo that Xerxes muſt at that time have been dead. Now the ſame Author placeth this flight of Themiſtocles betwixt the Siege of Naxus, which the Athenians ſubdued, and the former exploits of Cimon, ſo that his Expedition muſt have happened alſo not in the days of Xerxes as we have fixed it according to Diodorus, but in the reign of Artaxerxes his ſucceſſor: and Euſebius placing the flight of Themiſtocles in the fourth Year of the ſeventy ſixth Olympiad (though Diodorus in the ſecond of the ſeventy ſeventh) hence it muſt follow, that the beginning of the Reign of Artaxerxes muſt be placed higher by near to nine Years. The authority of that grave Author is in no wiſe to be deſpiſed, yet notwithſtanding, this ſhortning of the Reign of Xerxes which muſt neceſſarily follow, is not agreeable to the Teſtimony of other Writers: eſpecially it is to be conſidered what difficulty will ariſe hereby to the Chronology of the ſacred Story, it being moſt probable, that the ſeventy Weeks of Daniel commencing in the ſeventh Year of Artaxerxes, and at the death of Jeſus Chriſt; which cannot be, if their beginning be to be aſſigned nine Years higher. This may incline us to believe, that ſome reaſon Diodorus had (who could not but have opportunity to ſee and compare ſeveral Hiſtories) not to follow Thucydides, and makes us rather ſubſcribe to the number of Years by general conſent aſcribed unto the Reign of Xerxes.

Xerxes murdered.

Uſher.

SECT. III.

Sect. III.

From the death of Xerxes, and the beginning of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, containing the ſpace of one hundred and three Years.

Diodorus ibid.

vid. Juſtin.

Artaxerxes.

1. XERXES left three Sons, Darius, and Artaxerxes, both of them at the time of his Death reſident in his Court, and Hyſtaſpes, who was abſent in his Government of Bactria. Artabanus having murdered their Father, preſently in the dead time of the Night went to Artaxerxes, and made him believe that his elder Brother Darius had made him away, out of ambition to reign himſelf, counſelled him to provide for his own ſafety and honour, before he ſhould eſtabliſh himſelf, and offered him the Guard to rid him of him, whereby he being perſwaded, ſent and ſlew his Brother. When this was done, Artabanus called his Sons together, telling them this was the time of obtaining the Kingdom, and drew his Sword with an intention now alſo to kill Artaxerxes. But he being only lightly wounded, laid ſo about him, that he ſlew him upon the place, as we have it from one; though others with more reaſon defer the time of Artabanus his Death, to whom alſo ſeven Moneths in the Empire are attributed by * Euſebius.

* In. Chron.

2. It is probable, that for that time the Treaſon of Artabanus not being diſcovered, or for ſome reaſons winked at, he might by a Vicegerency govern the Kingdom. By his means came Artaxerxes to it in his youth, a Prince of a great Spirit, and yet of a mild Nature, Sirnamed μακρόχειρ, or Longimanus, becauſe his right Hand was longer than the other, in the fourth year of the ſeventy eight Olympiad, or in the beginning of the ſeventy ninth, Lyſitheus being then Archon at Athens. A. M. 3540, four hundred ſixty three Years before the birth of Chriſt. Within a while Artabanus laid in wait for his Life alſo, communicating his deſign to Megabyzus, who had married the Daughter of Xerxes, and for her looſe life was fallen into a diſcontent, Megabyzus ſwore ſecrecie as well as he, but revealed the whole matter, ſo that Artabanus finding not the ſame ſucceſs as in his other Treaſons, was ſent the ſame way and by the ſame means with which he intended to diſpatch Artaxerxes. Now came out the whole truth concerning Xerxes and his Son Darius; and, Spamitres (or Aſpamitres) the Eunuch, who was acceſſary to the Murders, was tortured to Death. Juſtin telleth us, how the King fearing the number, and power of Artabanus his Sons, commanded his Soldiers to be ready armed the next morning, both for a Muſter, and to exerciſe them. Amongſt the reſt appeared he according to his place, with whom Artaxerxes deſired to change his coat-armour, pretending his was too ſhort for him, which to do, he firſt putting his off, the King took the advantage and ran him thorough with his Sword.

Cteſias.

Artabanus put to death.

3. After his death, his party being ſtrong, great troubles enſued, which ended at length in the deſtruction thereof, three of his Sons falling in fight, and Megabyzus who oppoſed them being ſorely wounded, for whom now great lamentation was made throughout the Court, till at length he eſcaped the danger by the ſkill and induſtry of Apollonides the Phyſician, native of the Iſland Cos. The Bactrians alſo, according to Cteſias, revolted, with another of the King's Officers named Artabanus, who ſeemeth to have had ſome other command than over Bactria. For we are told elſewhere, that Hyſtaſpes the Son of Xerxes was Satrapas or Governour of that Province, and thence may almoſt conclude him to have been the principal cauſe of the Revolt, out of indignation that being the ſecond Brother, the youngeſt of all the three ſhould be preferred before him. Two Battels were fought in this quarrel, in the latter of which the Wind being full in the Faces of the Bactrians, ſo diſturbed them, that thereby Artaxerxes became Victor, and reduced all that Country into Obedience. Artaxerxes having thus revenged his Father's and Brother's death, and brought Artabanus and his complices to condign puniſhment, Bactria recovered.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 79 an. 2. Thucyd. lib. 1.

Sect. 3.

puniſhment, and recovered Bactria, ſetled the affairs of his Kingdom. He took care of his revenue, ſetled the Militia, diſplaced ſuſpicious Governours of Provinces, and carrying all things with much moderation and Juſtice, gained great Authority from his Subjects. In the mean while the Egyptians hearing of the death of Xerxes, and in what diſturbance the affairs of the Perſians were, out of deſire to recover their liberty, hearkned to the Counſel and perſwaſions of one Inarus King of Libya, the Son of Pſammetichus, ſo that the greater part of the Countrey revolted, and making him their Prince, ſent about to crave aid, and amongſt others to the Athenians. They thought it their intereſt to impair all ways poſſible, the intereſt of Perſia, and concluding it not amiſs to get ſome footing in Egypt, reſolved upon ſending three hundred Ships, and prepared for the ſetting of them forward with all earneſtneſs. Artaxerxes hearing on the other hand how things went in Egypt, determined to overmatch the Revolters in Proviſions for the War, and for that end levied Forces throughout his Dominions, Rigged his Fleet, and omitted nothing requiſite for an expedition of that moment.

The Egyptians revolt.

4. He thought firſt of going down himſelf, but being overruled by his Friends ſent Achæmenides his Brother, according to Cteſias, but according to Diodorus, Achæmenides the Son of Darius, and his great Uncle, whith an Army of above three hundred thouſand ſaith Diodorus, or four hundred thouſand Foot, and eighty Ships, who marching as far as the River Nile, there pitched his Tents, refreſhed his Souldiers, and prepared all things for a Battel. The Egyptians aſſiſted by the Libyans expected the Athenian Fleet, which at length arrived, and got poſſeſſion of the River. Preſently after this a Land Battel enſued, in which, though the Perſians for a time prevailed by their Multitudes, yet the Athenians, who were now acquainted with their manner of Fighting, preſſing ſore upon that Wing with which they joyned, did ſuch execution as put it to flight, at which all the reſt out of Fear betook them to their Heels. Great ſlaughters were then made in the purſute, the greateſt number of the Barbarians fell, and the reſt betook themſelves to a Fort called White-wall, whither the Athenians purſuing, took two parts of Memphis, and beſieged them in the third diviſion called by that Name; of four hundred thouſand that came into Egypt, Cteſias writeth one hundred thouſand to have been ſlain, and with them their Captain, killed by the Hands of Inarus, whoſe body was ſent back to Artaxerxes. That Achæmenes the Son of Darius was ſlain with many Perſians, * Herodotus tells us by an anticipation of the Story.

The Perſians defeated.

* *Lib.*7.*cap.*82.

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*79 *an.*3. Thucyd. ut ſuprà.

5. Artaxerxes underſtanding what bad ſucceſs his Affairs had in Egypt and knowing the main blow to have been given from the Athenians, ſent Megabyzus with a great ſumm of Mony to Lacedæmon to hire that State to make War upon them, and give them ſomething to do at home, to divert them from the aſſiſtance of his Rebels. The Lacedæmonians would not be bribed to fall out with Athens, and refuſed to hearken to any thing elſe the Ambaſſador offered on his Maſters behalf, ſo that he recalled him home, and gave in charge to Megabyzus the Son of that Zopyrus who recovered Babylon to Darius, to prepare for another expedition, with whom he alſo joyned Artabazus, making choice of them both out of reſpect to their great valour, and skill in Military matters.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 80.*an.*1. Thucyd.

They by the Spring having got together an Army of (above three hundred thouſand men, ſaith Diodorus, two hundred thouſand onely ſaith Cteſias) marched down into Cilicia, where, and in Phœnicia they reſted their men, and cauſed the inhabitants of theſe places, together with the Cyprians, to provide a Navy, which being done, to the number of three hundred Ships, they furniſhed them with the ableſt Souldiers, and all ſorts of Weapons, and whatſoever was requiſite for a Sea-fight, and in this preparation, together with the exerciſing, and training of their men, ſpent they almoſt all the Summer. In the mean while the Athenians laboured to ſtorm the White-wall wherein the Perſians were beſieged, but they made ſuch effectual reſiſtance as they kept them out all this year. When Winter was over, Megabyzus and his Colleague led down their Army through Syria and Phœnicia, the Navy Coaſting all along not far off; and at length came to Memphis, where the fear of them preſently looſed the Siege of their Countrey-men, whom joyning to themſelves they gave Battel to the Egyptians and their Aſſociates. Many fell on both ſides, but moſt of the Egyptians; at length Megabyzus wounded Inarus in his Thigh, and put him to flight, who betook himſelf to Byblus, a Town ſituate in an Iſland of Nile, called Proſopitis, and with him ſuch Greeks as had eſcaped the Fight, after which the Egyptians returned into Obedience, making their Peace with Megabyzus.

Cteſias.

Egypt recovered.

Sect. 3.

Thucyd. lib. 1. Diod. Ibid. Cteſias.

6. Megabyzus purſuing them, beſieged the place, which yet was ſo defended that they held it ont a Year and ſix Moneths in deſpight of him. The Athenian Fleet lay in the River before the Town, which the Perſians at length conſidering, and how it was poſſible by Ditches to drain the Water, and derive that courſe thereof another way, ſet about it, and ſo drained the Channel that the Iſland was now joyned to the Main, and the Ships reſted on dry Land. Now Diodorus ſaith, the Egyptians forſook their Confederates, and returned to obedience, which the Athenians underſtanding, and how their Ships by this Stratagem of the Enemy were rendred uſeleſs, burnt them all, and nothing affrighted with ſo great a danger in which they were involved, called upon one another with exhortations not to commit any thing unworthy of their former noble Atchivements, ſo that excelling thoſe their Country-men, if poſſible, who loſt their lives at Thermopylæ, they reſolved to fight. The Perſian Commanders ſeeing their Courage, and conſidering their own loſſes already great, having loſt many thouſands, though they had recovered the Iſland, yet gave them theſe terms to return with ſafety out of Egypt. Their number being ſomething above ſix thouſand, they returned home by Cyrene above their expectations, having conſumed ſix Years in the War to no good purpoſe, Inarus taken and Crucified; Artaxerxes then recovered all Egypt except ſome fenny parts, near which Amyrtæus reigned, who by reaſon of the difficulty of the place, and the fierceneſs of the People, could not be reduced into order.

Thucyd. ibid.

In the mean time, whilſt the Athenians travelled homewards, came fifty Ships more to their relief, which being utterly ignorant of what had paſſed, took up their harbour at Mendeſium, one of the Mouths of Nile. Here they were ſet uppon by the Perſians on Land, and the Phœnicians by Sea, and loſt moſt of their Veſſels, a few only eſcaping home, and ſuch was the end of this expedition of the Athenians with their aſſociates into Egypt.

Eſra 7. 12.

7. Artaxerxes in the ſeventh Year of his Reign made a Decree in the behalf of the Jews, that whoſoever of them would, might go up with Ezra to Jeruſalem and inhabit it. He and his Counſellors contributed much Treaſure, and gave them liberty to Collect what they could, and commanded his Treaſurers beyond the River Euphrates to furniſh him yearly with what he wanted, as far as one hundred Talents of Silver, one hundred Meaſures of Wheat, one hundred Baths of Wine, one hundred Baths of Oyl, and Salt without meaſure, for the Sacrifices and other Uſes, according to the diſcretion of Eſra. He commanded that all things ſhould be done according to the mind and will of the God of Heaven, leſt his Anger might break out againſt the Kingdom of him and his Sons: the Prieſts and Levites he made free from all impoſitions, and gave Power to Eſdras to Conſtitute Judges and Governours over the people, for the ſettlement of the Politie or Commonwealth.

8 Now though here in this Edict be no expreſs mention of repairing the Walls of Jeruſalem, or of the Requeſt of Eſra in that behalf, yet is it probable enough that he would deſire it, becauſe of the often incurſions of their Enemies, the Samaritans, and others, neither could their habitation in the City be ſecure, nor the work of the Temple go on with ſafety: and in what could all that Treaſure be ſpent but in Fortifications? So that we may even conclude ſufficient Licence and Authority to be included in this Decree, and that Eſra began to build the Walls, but was either hindred by other occaſions, or the negligence of the Jews, or (more probably) the moleſtations of their Enemies; who becauſe the Licence was not expreſſed, took thence occaſion to interrupt the work till thirteen years after it was renewed, and perfected by the procurement and induſtry of Nehemiah, who obtained a confirmation rather of the former Edict, than any new Decree; So though Cyrus had firſt of all granted Licence for the rebuilding of the Temple, yet becauſe the work was hindred by the Enemies of the Jews, there was need of another Edict granted out by Darius. As the decrees of theſe two Kings were in effect the ſame, ſo alſo thoſe were only put in execution afterwards by Nehemiah, becauſe the execution of it, as to the rebuilding of the Walls, was either remitted by negligence, or by malice of the Borderers.

Daniel 9. 24.

9. If ſo, the beginning of the ſeventy weeks of Daniel, fitly may be taken hence, ending moſt probably in the death of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. Seventy weeks ſaith the Angel, are determined upon thy People, and upon thy holy City, to finiſh the tranſgreſſion, and to make an end of ſins, and to make reconciliation for Iniquity, and to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs, and to ſeal up the Viſion and Prophecy, and to anoint the moſt holy. Know therefore, and underſtand, that from the going forth of the Command, to reſtore, and rebuild Jeruſalem, unto the Meſſiah the Prince, ſhall be ſeven Weeks, and threeſcore and two weeks: and the Street ſhall be built again, and the Wall, even in troublous times. And after ſixty two weeks ſhall Meſſiah be cut off, but not for himſelf: and the people of the Prince that ſhall come, ſhall deſtroy the City and the Sanctuary, and the end thereof ſhall be with a Flood, and unto the end of the War deſolations are determined. And he ſhall confirm the Covenant with many in one week: and in the midſt of the week he ſhall cauſe the Sacrifice and the Oblation to ceaſe, and for the overſpreading of abominations he ſhall make it deſolate, even until the conſummation, and that determined ſhall be powred upon the deſolate. Thus the Oracle, in which is contained a Prophecy concerning the rebuilding of Jeruſalem, and the coming of Chriſt, who ſhould bring unconceivable benefits along with him, and yet at length be put to death, not for himſelf, but others, and this ſhould be all accompliſhed within ſeventy weeks of years, which contain four hundred ninety. Laſtly, it foretels, that for that horrible ſin of the Jews in murdering the Meſſias, they ſhould loſe both Principality and Prieſt-hood, and be puniſhed with perpetual Exile, and the utter and unreparable deſolation of the City.

10. Many are the opinions concerning the beginning and end of theſe ſeventy weeks amongſt Chronologers. Some begin them in the firſt year of the Empire of Cyrus, and end them in the Nativity of Chriſt. Others fetch their riſe from the ſecond of Darius Nothus (Succeſſor to Artaxerxes) and conclude them with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by Titus Veſpaſian. Some make them Commence from the twentieth of Artaxerxes (when Nehemiah obtained another Decree of him) and to conclude with the paſſion and death of Chriſt; and others will have them begin in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and end in the deſolation of the City by the Romans. But many there are who rejecting all theſe, with beſt reaſon, fix the beginning of them in the ſeventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and their concluſion in the death of Chriſt, in which termination moſt of the Learned, both ancient and modern, agree.

The beginning of Daniel's ſeventy weeks.

11. For if we ſeriouſly conſider the account of time, and judge of it according to the beſt approved Authors, the three former opinions will be found either to exceed, or come ſhort of the number. From the beginning of the Perſian Empire to Chriſt's Nativity paſſed about five hundred thirty years. From the ſecond of Darius Nothus indeed to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, neer upon four hundred ninty years intervened; but concerning any Edict made by that Prince, there is not a word in Scripture. From the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death and paſſion of Chriſt, are found four hundred ſeventy ſix, or four hundred ſeventy ſeven, which come too ſhort by thirteen of the four hundred ninety, and betwixt the twentieth of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, are found but about four hundred fifty, which come far ſhort of the true account; as alſo the Chronology of ſuch as would fetch the riſe of the four hundred ninty from the firſt of Darius Medus; and the ſecond or ſixth of Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes. And although the Angel mentioneth the Puniſhment to be inflicted on the Jews, yet doth he not compriſe it in the four hundred ninty years, the end of which he ſignalizeth by the anointing and ſufferings of the Meſſias, but aſſigneth half a week or of ſeven years for the accompliſhment of thoſe Plagues, which in ſuch a quantity of time were to be inflicted upon his murderers.

Vide Ludovic. Cappelli tabulis in Chron. Sacra.

12. But if we reckon from this ſeventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, down by his Succeſſors in the Perſian Empire, the Ptolomies of Ægypt, after that of Alexander the Great, and then by the Aſſamonæans or Jewiſh Princes till we come at length to Herod the Great, and ſo to Chriſt, the juſt number of four hundred ninty we ſhall find accompliſhed at his death, with ſuch ſmall difference, as is pardonable to ſo many Authors handling ſo many things. Or if we reckon by the years of the Olympiads and the building of Rome, we ſhall find Chriſt to have died in the four hundred nintieth year after the promulgation of this Decree. The ſeventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus fell in with the ſecond and third of the eightieth Olympiad, according to Euſebius, and the two hundred ninty fifth, or the two hundred ninty ſixth of the City, from which continuing to the ſecond year of the two hundred and ſecond Olympiad, and the ſeven hundred eighty fifth of the City, (in which Chriſt was crucified) four hundred eighty nine years, or four hundred ninty are preciſely found; ſo that farther we ſhall not enquire about theſe ſeventy weeks, having therein already ſatisfied what this deſign and work requireth, leaving the further inquiry thereof to the ſtudious Reader, and the judgment to the Learned.

Thucyd. lib. 1. Diodorus ad Olymp. 82. an. 3.

Plutarch. in Cimone.

Cimon dieth in Cyprus.

13. In the fifteenth year of Artaxerxes the Athenians having recalled Cimon, whom for ten years they had baniſhed by the Oſtraciſm, ſent him with a Fleet of two hundred Sail againſt Cyprus ſubject to the Perſian. Sixty of theſe Ships he ſent into Ægypt to the aid of Amyrtæus, who ſtill was up in the mariſhes, and with the reſt he ſet upon Citium a Town in the Iſland. At this time were Artabazus and Megabyzus ſtill Generals of the Forces of Perſia: the former lay with three hundred Ships in the Road of Cyprus, and the other with a Land-Army of three hundred thouſand men quartered in Cilicia. Cimon when he had beſieged Citium ſent ſome Meſſengers to Delphos to enquire ſomething of the Oracle, but ere they got to their Journeys end, he died before the place, either of Sickneſs, or by ſome Wound, both which are affirmed. When he ſaw he ſhould dy, he councelled his men forthwith to depart, and conceal his death, and they doing ſo, it hapned that neither the Enemy, nor Aſſociates knew any thing of it. At this time came back the Fleet ſent into Ægypt, ſo that all joyning together again, they ſailed to Salamine a Town in Cyprus, where they fought with the Phœnicians and Cilicians, who were come to aid their Friends of Cyprus. In a Sea-fight they ſunk many of their Veſſels, took one hundred with the men in them, and purſued the reſt as far as Phœnicia. The Perſians with that part of the Fleet which yet remained, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyſus lay, but the Athenians followed them with ſpeed, and landing fell upon them, and making great ſlaughter, amongſt the reſt ſlew Anaxicrates the Sea-Captain, who moſt galantly fought whilſt life laſted. Then the Greeks victorious got them to their Ships and ſailed home.

Diodorus ad Olymp. ejuſdem ann. 4.

Herod. lib. 7. cap. 101.

14. The King underſtanding what loſs he had received in Cyprus, called a Council to deliberate what ſhould be done thereupon, at which, when all was conſidered, it was reſolved that it was requiſite to procure a Peace if poſſible. He wrote then to his Captains about Cyprus, to make peace upon as good terms as might be; according to which order Artabazus and Megabyzus ſent to Athens to treat about it. The Athenians not being averſe from hearking to them, both ſides ſent their Commiſſioners with full Power to conclude; at which time alſo the Argives ſent to Artaxerxes to demand of him whether the confederacy into which they entered with his Father remained, or they were accounted by him as Enemies; to which he anſwered, that he did not doubt of it's continuance, and as for his part he accounted no City more friendly to him than that of Argos.

Plutarch & Diodorus ut prius.

Diod. ad Olymp. 84. 3.

The Articles of Peace concluded with the Athenians were, That all the Greek Cities in Aſia ſhould be free: though in the Peace with Lacedæmon it was agreed they ſhould be under the Perſian; that the Perſian Generals ſhould not come within three days journey of the Sea, that none of Perſian Subjects ſhould come with a long Ship between the Cyanian and Chelidonian Iſlands. The Athenians on the other part took an Oath, not to invade the King's Territories. For the Joy conceived about this Peace, they built an Altar of Peace, and graced Callias the principal of the Embaſſie with the greateſt Honours. Cimon was dead, and with him in a manner the true gallantry of the Greekiſh Nation; for none of their Captains after him did any thing to purpoſe againſt the Barbarians (as they termed all except themſelves) but being drawn by their Orators to inteſtine differences, and none after him being left to take them up, they fell one upon another, and ſo afforded an happy occaſion to the Perſian to breath himſelf, and for a good time to effect his own ſecurity with the imparement of their intereſt. For though Ageſilaus afterwards (as will be ſeen) paſſed over his Army into Aſia, and made a ſhort War with the Perſian Commanders on the Sea-Coaſts, yet without doing any thing of much conſequence, was he recalled by Seditions at home, leaving the Perſian Officers behind him, who exacted Impoſitions from the Cities confederate with Greece: whereas whilſt Cimon was in command, not ſo much as a Carrier appeared in theſe quarters, nor an Horſe came within four hundred furlongs diſtance of the Sea.

Nehem. 1. 11, &c.

Nehemiah obtaineth leave to repair Jeruſalem.

15. In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, Nehemiah his Cup-bearer the Son of Hachaliah the Jew received a meſſage, that the remnant of the Captivity left in Judæa were in great affliction and reproach: that the Wall of Jeruſalem was broken down, and the Gates thereof burnt with Fire. Becauſe of this he wept, faſted, and mourned certain days, and praying to God to make the King favourable to him, obtained to be ſent with ample Commiſſion to build up the Walls. Now was no new Edict promulgated in behalf of the Jews, which had been done ſufficiently thirteen years before by the conſent of the Princes: only Letters were written to the keeper of the King's Forreſt, to furniſh Nehemiah with wood ſufficient for building of the Gates and Walls of the City, for the Temple, and an houſe for himſelf; and the Governours beyond the River were ordered to convey him over till he came into Judah. By virtue of this Authority he came to Jeruſalem, and notwithſtanding the indignation and oppoſition of the Enemies of the Jews, by his great diligence and valour, finiſhed the work of the Wall in fifty two days. From the new Moon of the moneth Niſan, which followed this repairing of the Walls, to that new-Moon of the ſame Month in which Chriſt ſuffered, paſſed four hundred ſeventy five Julian years, which make up four hundred ninty Lunar years, conſiſting each of twelve Lunar Moneths. This being not without a providence, that as from the going out of the decree to the death of Chriſt intervened four hundred ninty Solar years; ſo alſo from the rebuilding of the Walls to his death, ſhould intervene ſo many conſiſting each of twelve Lunary Moneths. This gave occaſion to many eminent men both Antient and Modern to follow the opinion of Africanus, in placing the beginning of the ſeventy weeks in the twentieth year of this King, and concluding them with the death of Chriſt: although he reckoneth from that time to the fifteenth of Tiberius four hundred ſeventy five years; whereas there are to be accounted but four hundred ſeventy two; and Chriſt died not in the fifteenth year of his Reign, but was then baptized.

Nehem. 7. &c.

16. Nehemiah not thinking it ſufficient to repair the Walls whilſt the frame of the State was out of frame, reſtored both the Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Polity, thereof. Taking notice how all ranks of men, and eſpecially the Prieſts were out of order, no certainty being of their Pedigrees; he cauſed to be ſought for, and read, the Regiſter of thoſe who returned with Zorubbabel, from which whoſoever could not prove his deſcent from ſome Prieſtly Family was caſt off from the Prieſthood. Twelve years ſtaid he at Jeruſalem, governing with great moderation, and ſelf-denial, and reforming abuſes both in Religion and State. The Rulers of the People dwelt at Jeruſalem, the reſt of the People caſt lots to bring one of ten to dwell therein, for that it was little inhabited, and nine parts to dwell in other places, the People bleſſing all ſuch as willingly offered themſelves to dwell in Jeruſalem. Then return'd he to the King, from whom he yet obtained leave to come again into Judah, where he ſeemeth to have lived until the ſixteenth year of Darius Nothus, in which the firſt part of the ſeventy weeks endeth, conſiſting of fourty nine years, viz. ſeven weeks, which are thought to be thoſe of which the Angel ſpake, that the Street ſhould be built again and the wall, even in troublous times.

17. After Artaxerxes had made peace with the Græcians, he fell into civil and inteſtine Broils with Megabyzus, who had done him ſuch ſervice in Ægypt and elſewhere, if credit be given to Cteſias, from whom we have a relation of theſe tranſactions. This Megabyzus, after he had quieted Ægypt, and committed it to the Government of Sartamas, departed thence and went to the King, leading along with him Inarus and ſome Greekiſh priſoners, after he had obtained a promiſe from him, that no puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on them, though Amytis (or rather Ameſtris) the King's Mother had ſo layn upon him to deliver into her hands not only them, but Megabyzus himſelf her Son in Law, being inraged for the death of Achæmenes, who in the former Expedition was ſlain by the Ionians. For five years he endured her importunity without yielding, but at length being wearied and overcome, he gave up the Greeks and Inarus into her power. His Body ſhe nailed overthwart to three croſſes, and beheaded fifty of the Greeks, which were all ſhe could take. That Inarus was crucified Thucydides witneſſeth, though nothing of this time or manner; and Herodotus reporteth, that his Son Thannyras was reſtored by the Perſians to the Principality of his Father.

Artaxerxes his civil War with Megabyſus.

Lib. 3. cap. 15.

18. Megabyzus being ſorely moved with the uſage of his priſoners, concealed his diſpleaſure for a time; but getting leave to depart to his Government in Syria, whither he had privately ſent ſome Greeks beforehand, broke out into open Rebellion, and got an Army together of one hundred fifty thouſand men. Againſt him then was ſent Oſiris with two hundred thouſand, who joyning Battel with him wounded him in the Thigh, but received two wounds from him, one in his Thigh and the other in his Shoulder, with the anguiſh whereof, and loſs of Blood, he fell from his Horſe and was taken priſoner; and though his men well behaved themſelves, yet were they overthrown, and Megabyzus getting the Victory uſed him very curteouſly, and ſent him back to the King who deſired it. After this was ſent more Forces commanded by Mexiſtenes Nephew to Artaxerxes, by his Brother Artarius the Governour of Babylon. He alſo giving battel to Megabyzus, was wounded by him both in Shoulder and Head though not mortally, and being put to flight Megabyzus obtained another famous Victory.

19. Things going thus, Artarius dealt with him by Meſſengers, then Artoxares the Eunuch Governour of Paphlagonia, and Ameſtris alſo adviſed him yet to be reconciled to the King, afterwards Artarius himſelf, Amytis his Wife, and Artoxares (now twenty years of age) were ſent to him to perſwade him to go to him: being perſwaded, after his return the King ſignified to him by a meſſage, that he freely pardoned him all that was paſt, but going on a time a hunting with him, when a Lyon ſet upon the King, as he raiſed himſelf up Megabyzus ſlew him, whereat Artaxerxes was in a great rage, that he had ſtricken him before he could touch him, and commanded his Head to be cut off. But by the interceſſion of Ameſtris, Amytis, and others, his life was ſpared, yet was he baniſhed to Cyrta, a Town upon the red Sea, and Artoxares the Eunuch into Armenia for ſpeaking freely to the King in his behalf.

Five years he then continued in exile, at the end of which feigning himſelf to be a Piſagas (which in the Perſian tongue ſignifieth a Leper, at whom no man might come) he fled away and came to his Wiſe Amytis at his own houſe, by whom ſcarcely being known, he was by her means and the help of Ameſtris reconciled once again to the King, who made him eat at his own Table as formerly, and ſo continued in great favour till his death at ſeventy ſix years of age, for which the King was much troubled.

Thucyd. l. 4.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 84. an. 3.

20. Whilſt the Græcians were buſie with one another in the Peloponneſian War, of which now ſeveral years had paſſed, Artaxerxes ſent Artaphernes a Perſian to the Lacedæmonians, with a Letter written in Aſſyrian Characters, in which, amongſt other things, he deſired to know plainly of them how they ſtood affected, for that he was utterly ignorant of what they thought, many Ambaſſadors coming, and no one of them agreeing with another, wherefore he deſired, that if they intended to declare themſelves, they would ſend ſome of their own back with Artaphernes. What was effected hereby is not known, but we find elſewhere, that the Lacedæmonians entred into a League with him in one main matter, contrary to that formerly made with the Athenians. For whereas it was provided firſt in the one, that the Greekiſh Cities in Aſia ſhould be left to their own liberty, in the other they were expreſly left under his Dominion; ſuch influence had then the Civil Wars of Greece upon the matters of Aſia; perhaps becauſe the Lacedæmonians were jealous of the Ionians, as the Colony of their adverſaries the Athenians, who, if not now, entred into War with them, were much ſuſpected, Jealouſies abounding betwixt them. Not long after this Meſſage, Artaxerxes died, having reigned according to Diodorus fourty years compleat, according to Sulpicius Severus forty one, but after Cteſias forty two, amongſt which opinions 'tis probable that he died in the beginning of the fourty ſecond year, after the death of Xerxes, in the ſecond year of the eighty ninth Olympiad. A. M. 3582. four hundred twenty one years before the birth of Chriſt.

Artaxerxes dieth.

Ad Olymp. 88. an. 4.

Cteſias in Excerptis Hiſtor. Perſic.

21. Artaxerxes had only one legitimate Son by his Wife Damaſpia, named Xerxes, but ſeventeen by Concubines, amongſt which were Sogdianus Ochus, and Arſites. Xerxes ſucceeded his Father, but was ſlain by Secundianus, as he was drunk, in the fourty fifth day after his death. Secundianus then became King, but cauſing Bagorazus the Eunuch to be ſtoned for ſomething done about his Fathers Body, incurred the diſpleaſure of the Army, which becauſe of this, and his Brothers death, could never be taken off by all the gifts he beſtowed on them. Being jealous of his Brother Ochus, whom his Father had made Governour of the Hyrcanians, he ſent for him; but he refuſed to come, and ſo did ſeveral times, till he had got a conſiderable Army. For Arberius General of the Horſe revolted to him, then Arxanes the Viceroy of Egypt, and Artoxares coming out of Armenia cauſed him to take the Cidaris (or Citaris) a Cap peculiar to the Kings and Prieſts of Perſia.

Ochus.

Idem.

Jacobus Capellus.

Ochus thus taking the Royal Enſign and Title of King, changed his name into Dariæus, and was alſo moſt commonly called Darius Nothus. By the advice of Paryſatis his Wife, he enticed by all means Secundianus to come to him, not ſparing Oaths, or any other ways to get him into his Hands, and ſo far prevailed, that though Menoſtanes the Eunuch counſelled Secundianus not to truſt himſelf, yet he came to him, and being caſt into Aſhes he died the ſame way as Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes formerly made away his Emulators, though ſome think this Darius to have been the firſt inventor of this Puniſhment, and that it is falſly aſcribed by Valerius Maximus, to the Son of Hyſtaſpes. Then reigned he alone by himſelf after his brother had reigned ſix months and twenty dayes. The three Eunuchs, Artoxares, Artibarxanes, and Athous were in great power with him; but eſpecially, he was adviſed by his wife, by whom he had two Children, Amiſtris a daughter, and Arſaces a ſon (called afterwards Artaxerxes) before he came to the Kingdom. Afterwards he begot of her another ſon, called Cyrus, from the Sun; and others to the number of thirteen. But all the reſt died young, except theſe two and his fourth ſon named Oxendras.

His Children.

22. After this Arſites his own brother, both by father and mother, and Artiphius the ſon of Megabyzus revolted from him. Artaſyras was ſent with an Army againſt them, who falling upon Artyphius, was worſted in two battels; but in the third overthrew him, and corrupting the Greeks that fought for him, drew away all his Company, except three Mileſians; ſo that upon the Oath of Artaſyras for his ſecurity, for that Arſites could not be found, he yielded himſelf to the King. He was minded to put him to death, but Paryſatis his wife perſwaded him to ſpare him for a time, for Arſites ſeeing him unpuniſhed would alſo be moved to yield himſelf, and then he might rid himſelf of them both together, which accordingly came to paſs, both being caſt into the aſhes; though Darius was hardly brought by her perſwaſions to make away his brother: now alſo Pharnacyas, who with Secundianus had ſlain Xerxes, was put to death, and Menoſtanes being apprehended ſhunned the ſame puniſhment by laying violent hands upon himſelf.

Cteſias.
Stirs in his time.

This Rebellion was followed by the revolt of Piſathnes the Governour of Lydia, againſt whom Tiſſaphernes and others being ſent, he met them, having in his Army Lycon the Athenian, with ſuch Greeks as he had brought with him, who being corrupted by the Kings Captains revolted from him, ſo that with fair words he was drawn in, and carried to the King, who caſt him into the aſhes, and gave his Government to Tiſſaphernes, and the Cities with the regions adjoyning to Lycon for a reward of his treachery. After this followed the treaſon of Artoxares in great power with Darius, who conſpired about killing him, and transferring the Kingdom to himſelf. For this purpoſe being an Eunuch, he cauſed his wife to make him a beard, that he might ſeem no other than a perfect man; but the matter being revealed by her, he was delivered into the hands of Paraſytis, who put him to death.

23. Arſaces (afterward called Artaxerxes) the eldeſt ſon of Darius, married Statira, the daughter of Idarnes, a man of prime rank amongſt the Perſians; and Terituchmes the ſon of Idarnes, who after his death ſucceeded in his Government, married Amiſtris daughter to the King. She had a ſiſter named Roxana, who being very beautifull, and well skilled in ſhooting, Terituchmes fell in love with her, and having to do with her deteſted his wife, inſomuch as he reſolved to murder her by the help of three hundred men, with whom he practiced to revolt. Whileſt he thought hereof, one Udiaſtes, a man in great power about him, being promiſed great matters if he could deliver the Kings daughter from ſo great a danger, ſlew him; but the ſon of this Udiaſtes, who was Armour-bearer to Terituchmes, and was not preſent at his death, after he had notice thereof curſed his father, and ſeizing upon the Citie Zaris delivered it up to Terituchmes his ſon. Then did Paryſatis bury alive the Mother, Brethren, and Siſters of Terituchmes, and commanded Roxana to be cut in pieces alive. Darius would have had her to have made away Statira his daughter-in-Law together with the reſt; but through the importunity of Arſaces her husband, ſhe ſpared her; of which Darius told her, that afterwards ſhe would ſorely repent, as it came to paſs.

From the ſecond year of this King, * Sulpicius Severus, and * many learned men with him, count the beginning of the ſeventy weeks of Daniel, ending them with the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, becauſe the number of years do agree, and the Angel maketh mention of that deſolation; though nothing be ſpoken in any place concerning any going out of a Decree during the reign of this Prince, from which thoſe weeks muſt needs have commenced. They muſt needs allow the work now to have been carried on by the ſollicitation of the Prophets Haggai and Zachariah, which had been interrupted for one hundred fifteen years, ever ſince the ſecond year of the return of Zerubbabel and Jeſhua, at which time they begun to build. But now at this time, and before this, lived Malachias the laſt of the Prophets, who exhorts not the people to the building of the Temple as the others did, which is an evidence of the finiſhing of it before; but reprehends thoſe corruptions which * Nehemiah in his ſecond Government had obſerved amongſt the Jews, viz. marriages marriages with ſtrangers, unjuſt detention of Tithes, and corruption of Divine worſhip. And becauſe the ſucceſſion of Prophets was no more to be expected; in the later end of his Prophecie he exhorts the people to keep the Law of Moſes, untill ſuch time as the great Prophet the Meſſias ſhould be revealed, before whom John Baptiſt was to come, in the ſpirit and power of Elias. The ending of the Canon of holy Scripture is by Euſebius placed in the thirty ſecond year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. After theſe Prophets the Hebrews held the men of the great Synagogue to have ſucceeded; but the latter Jews reckon the three laſt Prophets amongſt them, and Eſra as the Preſident of the Council.

* Hiſt. ſacr. lib. 2.

* Joſephus Scaliger, Edu. Livelæus, Junius.

* Cap. ult.

24. Againſt this Darius the Medes rebelled, but were after ſome time reduced again into obedience. At this time the States of Greece being plunged deep in the Peloponneſian War, he made his advantage thereof as much as he could, ſiding with the Lacedæmonians againſt the Athenians, who did him moſt hurt in Aſia, both by their great skill and practice in Navigation, and being allied to the Ionians, whom as their Colonies they helped againſt him; ſo that much entercourſe, and great tranſactions paſſed betwixt Tiſſaphernes his Lieutenant, and thoſe of Sparta, which are involved in the affairs of Greece. In the ſeventeenth year of his reign he ſent his ſon Cyrus (born ſince he came to the Government) down to the Sea-ſide as Satrapa, or Lieutenant, with a kind of power over the other his Lieutenants there, and Captain General of all the forces which were wont to muſter at the plains of Caſtolus: giving him in charge to aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians in the War againſt the Athenians, and by his help did they recover to the hopes of their former fortune. When he had continued in his charge a year or two, he grew ſo high that he killed his two Couſin-Germans, Autobæſaces and Mitræus, becauſe they came not to him with their hands folded under their Clothes, which Ceremony was onely obſerved in the preſence of a King. Their Parents of this complaining highly to his father, and alledging how unjuſt it was to connive at ſuch practices, he ſent for him to come to him, alledging he was not well, lying then incamped in the Country of the Medes, againſt the Caduſians, bordering thereupon, who had revolted, Xenoph. Hellenic. 10.

Idem ibid. & Exped. Cyri lib. 1. Diodorus ad Oylmp. 93. an. 1. ad Oylmp. 94 an. 2. Juſtin. lib. 5.

Cyrus for his miſdemeanors ſent for.

25. Leaving the command of the Cities, with all his Treaſure, and the aſſignment of his Tributes to Lyſander the Spartan, he went up, taking along with him Tiſſaphernes as his friend, with three hundred Greeks, under the leading of Xenias the Parrhaſian. His father lived not long after he came to him, whom in his ſickneſs, Paraſytis his wife having ruled him all his life, loving Cyrus above her eldeſt ſon, urged him to leave him his Succeſſor, as Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes did Xerxes, for that he was born to him being a King, and the other but a private perſon. But he thinking it not juſt refuſed to do it, but left him thoſe Cities over which he had made him Governour, and his Kingdom to Arſaces, or Artaxerxes his eldeſt ſon, and ſo died after he had reigned nineteen years, in the fourth of the ninety third Oylmpaid, the twenty ſeventh of the Peloponneſian War now ending. A. M. three thouſand ſixty; four hundred three years before the birth of Chriſt.

Xenoph. ibid.

A.M. 3600. Ol. 93. an. 4. U.C. 349.

Ochus death.

Arſaces then, by the pleaſure of his father, or his intereſt in the great ones, obtained the Kingdom, and changed his name into Artaxerxes, being for the excellency of his memory ſirnamed Mnemon. When he had made ſure his poſſeſſion, his wife Statira thinking it time then to revenge the death of her brother, and the reſt of her kindred, cauſed Udiaſtes, who ſlew Teritachmes, to have his tongue drawn backwards through his neck, and cut off, and got his ſon Mitridates, who had delivered the Citie Zares into the hands of Teritachmes his ſon, to ſucceed in his Government. Not long after his fathers death Artaxerxes went to Paſargada, there to be initiated by the Perſian Prieſts in the royal myſteries. There was a Temple dedicated to ſome warlike Goddeſſe, thought to be Diana, whoſe Temple he that was to be initiated entring muſt put off his own Clothes, and put upon him a Garment worn by Cyrus the Great, before he came to the Empire; there was he to eat ſuch a quantity of Figs, to drink Milk mingled with Vinegar, and perhaps uſed ſome other unknown Ceremonies. Whilſt the King was about theſe things came Tiſſaphernes unto him, and with him a Certain Prieſt, who having been appointed the inſtructer of his brother Cyrus, had taught him the Magical Arts. He accuſing him of treaſonable practices, had more credit given to him, becauſe Cyrus had reſolved to ſet upon the King in the Temple, and kill him as he ſhould put off his Clothes; ſome ſay he was apprehended upon this accuſation, others, that he came indeed Artaxerxes. Mnemon ſucceedeth. Cteſias.

Plutarch. in Artaxerx.

Cyrus attempts his brothers death.

into the Temple, and being hid by the prieſt, was diſcovered and taken.

Idem & Xenoph. Expedit. Cyri lib. 1.

26. The King was minded to put him to death, and out of reverence to his Family cauſed him to be bound in Golden Chains, but their mother took him in her arms, wrapped him in her hair, laid her neck to his, and with great lamentations and intreaties prevailed for his pardon, and ſent him back again into his former Province of Lydia, and the Sea-coaſts. When he came there, not at all contented with this command, nor ſo much as remembering that he was ſaved by his mother's interceſſion, as that he was taken and bound by his brothers, burned more than ever with a deſire of reigning. And to this purpoſe, as ſecretly as he could, gathered forces of the Greeks; and under one pretence or other, laid out for forein aid both far and near, hoping to ſurpriſe his brother. The Ionian Cities given up now into the hands of Tiſſaphernes revolted to him, all except Miletus, the Inhabitants of which he finding to practice the ſame, killed ſome, and drove away the reſt, who flying to Cyrus, he beſieged the City both by Sea and Land, endeavouring to reſtore them. Then wrote he ſubmiſſively to his brother, deſiring he might have the Government of thoſe Cities rather than Tiſſaphernes, and herein he was furthered by his Mother, who lying as it were his Lieger at Court, made the beſt of all things. Hence was Artaxerxes deluded, ſuſpecting nothing, but accounting theſe forces to be kept together againſt Tiſſaphernes, betwixt whom and Cyrus he little regarded though there were a War, and the rather, becauſe Cyrus ſent him the Tributes due from the Cities, which Tiſſaphernes had formerly kept in his hand.

Is pardoned but

Idem & Xenoph. Expedit. Cyri lib. 1.

Practizeth new matters.

Idem ibid.

27. Clearchus at this time being baniſhed from Lacedæmon, came to Cyrus, who after conference with him admired the man, and gave him ten thouſand Daricks, wherewith he levied an Army, and paſſing out of Cherroneſus warred upon the Thracians that inhabited above the Helleſpont, thereby greatly promoting the affairs of the Greek Cities, inſomuch that they willingly furniſhed him with money to maintain his Forces which were onely raiſed for Cyrus, though thus employed for a cover to the deſign, and till he could be in a readineſs. There was alſo one Ariſtippus a Theſſalian a gueſt of Cyrus, who being overpowered by his Country-men of the contrary faction came to him, and requeſted him to ſpare him two thouſand Mercenaries and three months pay, alledging that thereby he ſhould be able to overcome his adverſaries. He granted his requeſt, and doubled both the number of men and ſum of money, deſiring him withal, not to agree with his adverſaries till they two had conference together; and ſo this Army in Theſſalie (though not diſcovered) was kept on foot and maintained for him. Further he ſent to Proxenus the Bœotian, his friend, to bring unto him as many men as he might, under pretence of warring againſt the Piſidians, who ſpoiled his Country; and Sophænetus the Stymphalian, with Socrates the Achæan, who likewiſe were both his Gueſts, to come to him with as many men as they could make, under colour, together with the baniſhed Mileſians, of making War upon Tiſſaphernes.

29. When he was now reſolved to march up into the higher Provinces againſt his brother, and for that purpoſe muſt gather all his Forces together, he gave out, that his purpoſe was to chace the Piſidians wholly out of the Country, and ſo, as for that intent, aſſembled both his Barbarian and Græcian Troups. He commanded Clearchus with the Army he led to come unto him, Ariſtippus to compound with his adverſaries, and ſend him his Forces, and Xenias the Arcadian (whom he had appointed General of the Mercenaries that lay in Garriſons in the Cities) leaving onely ſo many as ſhould be neceſſary to keep the Cittadels, gathered thoſe Forces together, and brought them to Sardis, being about four thouſand armed Foot. He ſent for thoſe that lay before Miletus, and invited the baniſhed men to his ſervice, promiſing, if his affairs ſucceded, not to give over till he had reſtored them, which they gladly accepted of. Proxenus came with fifteen hundred heavy-armed and five hundred light-armed foot. Sophænetus the Stymphalian brought one thouſand armed, Socrates the Achæan about five hundred, Paſion the Megarean three hundred, and as many Paltaſts or Targetiers.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 94. ann. 4.

29. He had before this ſent to Lacedæmon, deſiring of that State, that as he had formerly aided them againſt the Athenians, ſo they would not refuſe now in his need to do the ſame for him: boaſting in his letters, that if they ſent him Foot-men, he would provide for them Horſes, if Horſe-men, Chariots, if they had before of their own certain pieces of ground, he would give them whole Villages, and he would not count but meaſure their pay to them. They counting it but juſt and agreeable enough to their own intereſt (not conſidering againſt whom they engaged) decreed aid to be ſent to him, thinking hereby if he overcame, to ingratiate themſelves with him; but if Artaxerxes ſhould get the better, to excuſe themſelves well enough, as having decreed nothing againſt him abſolutely. The Ephori then preſently wrote to their Admiral, to do whatſoever he ſhould command, who accordingly went to Epheſus and joyned himſelf with Tamos the Ægyptian and Admiral to Cyrus, with whom he ſailed into Cilicia, and there prevailed that Syenneſis the Prince of that Country hindred not Cyrus as he paſſed by Land againſt his Brother. Tiſſaphernes conceiving that theſe preparations were greater than fitted the War againſt the Piſidians, with a party of five hundred Horſe, haſted to the King with all poſſible ſpeed, who as ſoon as by him he had the intelligence, made contrary preparations. Cyrus after he had committed the care of Lydia to ſome Perſians of his Kindred, and given the charge of Lydia, Æolis, and the parts adjacent to Tamos of Memphis his faithful friend, he preſently ſet forwards toward Cilicia and Piſidia, it being bruted up and down that ſome of theſe people had revolted. From Sardis he marched through Lydia, and after four encampings, came an hundred and twelve miles and an half to Coloſſe, a great, rich, and well inhabited City, where he ſtayed ſeven days, and Menon the Theſſalian came to him with a thouſand Armed Foot, and five hundred Dolopian, Ænian, and Olynthians Peltaſts. From thence he marched in three Encampings ſeventy five miles and an half to Celænæ, a great and rich City of Phrygia, where he reſted thirty days, and Clearchus the Lacedæmonian came to him with a thouſand Armed Foot, and eight hundred Thracian Peltaſts, and two hundred Cretian Archers; and Soſias the Syracuſian brought a thouſand Armed Foot, and Sophenætus the Arcadian, the ſame number. Here he alſo muſtred the Greeks, and found them to be eleven thouſand Armed, and about two hundred Peltaſts or Targetiers.

Plutarch in Artaxerxe.
Juſtin.lib.5.
Xenoph.Expedit. Cyri,lib.1.
Diodorus.
Xenoph. ibid.

Cyrus marcheth up againſt his Brother.

30. From Celæne he marched, in two Encampings, ten Paraſangs, or thirty ſeven miles and an half, and came to Peltæ, where he ſtayed three days; and thence, in two Encampings, forty five miles, and arrived at the Market of the Ceramanians, a City full of People, and the laſt in the Country of Myſia: And hence, in three Encampings, he marched thirty Paraſangs, an hundred and twelve miles, and reached to the Plain of Cayſter, a City well peopled, where he reſted his Army five days. Here the Army made much ado for pay, being more than three months behind, which he was enabled to pay them with a month over, by the coming of Epiaxia, Wife to Syenneſis, King of Cilicia, who brought good ſtore of Treaſure with her. From thence, in four Encampings, he proceeded ſeventy five miles as far as Tyriæum, a City full of people, and hence, in three Encampings, ſeventy five miles, and arrived at Iconium the laſt City of Phrygia. He ſtayed here three days, and then marched, in five Encampings, through Lycaonia an hundred and twelve miles, which Country he ſuffered the Greeks to ſpoil as Enemy. Now he ſent away the Cilician Queen by the neareſt way into her own Country, and with her Menon the Theſſalian and his Regiment, to make way for his paſſage into that Country.

31. Cyrus with the reſt, marched through Cappadocia twenty five Paraſangs, or ninety three miles and an half in four days, and came to Dana a great and wealthy City, where he put to death two Perſians for Treaſon againſt himſelf. From hence attempt was made to break into Cilicia, but the Streights were ſo narrow, that one Chariot could but paſs at once, and withal exceeding ſteep, ſo that if reſiſtance was made it was impoſſible, which Syenneſis the King was ſaid to be ready to make at the height of the Streights; and the Army for that reaſon ſtaid in the Plain. But the next day word was brought that he had quitted the paſſage, after he perceived Menon's Troops to be got into Cilicia beyond the Mountains, and heard how a Fleet of Lacedæmonian Gallies were with thoſe of Cyrus, under Sail to paſs from Ionia thither, under Conduct of Tamon. Then aſcended he the Mountain without any oppoſition, from which deſcending, in four Encampings, he marched ninety three miles and an half, and came to Tarſus and a great rich City of Cilicia, where was the Palace of Syenneſis, and through which runneth Cydnus, a River two hundred foot in bredth.

32. The Inhabitants thereof, except ſuch as bought and ſold, fled with their King to the tops of the Mountains, leaving the City to be ſacked with the Palace by the Soldiers, enraged for the loſs of an hundred of their Companions of Menon's Regiment. Cyrus ſent for the King to come to him, who refuſed it, till overcome by the perſwaſions of his Wife, and then he gave him great ſums of money to uphold his Army, and received back ſuch gifts as were accounted moſt honourable amongſt Kings, as an Horſe with a golden bit, a Chain of gold, Bracelets, a ſword decked with gold, a Perſian Garment, and Freedom of his Land from ſpoil; as alſo reſtitution of Slaves taken in ſpoil by the Souldiers whereſoever they could be found. Here the ſoldiers now imagining that they were lead againſt the King flatly refuſed to go any farther, it being, as they ſaid, no part of their agreement. Clearchus went about to force his men to proceed, but they, as ſoon as he offered to go forwards, caſt ſtones at him and at his carriage beaſts, whereby he was forced to betake himſelf to a fair and politick way; and to effect it (which with trouble enough he did) Cyrus gave out that he went againſt Abrocamas an Enemy of his, who laid upon the River Euphrates about twelve encampings from thence, that if he found him there, he would be revenged on him, and if he fled away they ſhould deliberate what to do. Hereupon, though they ſuſpected the matter, yet they reſolved to hold on, and upon demanding more pay, he promiſed them half as much more as formerly they had: viz. a Darick and an half inſtead of one Darick to every Soldier. All this while no man heard in publick they were led againſt the King.

33. From Tarſus in five encampings he marched about eighty three miles to Iſſos, the laſt City of Cilicia, well peopled, large, and rich, and ſituated upon the Sea, where he remained three dayes. Hither out of Peloponneſus came to Cyrus thirty five Lacedæmonian ſhips, under the command of Pythagoras, together with Tamos, who brought from Epheſus twenty five of Cyrus his ſhips, wherewith he had beſieged Miletus, and Cheriſophus the Lacedæmonian whom Cyrus had ſent for, and who brought with him ſeven hundred armed Foot. Whilſt the Army lay here, the Græcian Mercenaries that ſerved Abrocamus, viz. four hundred armed Foot revolted and came to Cyrus. From hence in one encamping he came about eighteen miles to the Streights of Cilicia, and Syria, defended with a wall on each ſide, betwixt which ran the River Kerſos a hundred foot broad. The diſtance betwixt the walls was three furlongs, admitting no paſſage by force, the nether way toward the Sea being narrow and fenced with ſtrong walls, and the upper nothing but inacceſſible Rocks, in either wall there being ſet a gate. This paſſage Cyrus ſuſpecting to be ſtopped by Abrocamas, ſent for his ſhips to tranſport ſo many men as might force it: but he upon hearing of Cyrus his coming into Cilicia, returned with all ſpeed out Phœnicia to the King though reported to have an Army of three hundred thouſand men.

34. From the Streights he marched in one encamping eighteen miles, and upwards, and came to Myriandrum a City of Syria, inhabited by the Phœnicians, upon the Sea, being a place of traffick, where many ſhips of burthen then rode in the Haven. Here he remained ſeven dayes, and Xenias the Arcadian Collonel, with Paſion of Megara ſhipping themſelves ſailed homewards, diſcontented, as was thought, becauſe Cyrus ſuffered Clearchus to keep their Soldiers, which refuſing to go any further againſt the King, removed into his Camp, with intent to return into Greece. From thence in four encampings he marched ſeventy five miles to the River Chatos, a hundred foot broad, which was full of great tame Fiſh, which the Syrians counted gods, and therefore ſuffered them not to be harmed no more than Pigeons. The Villages wherein they encamped belonged to Pariſatis, being aſſigned her for her maintenance. Thence in eight encampings he marched a hundred ſixty eight miles to the River Euphrates, whoſe breadth was three furlongs, and upon which was built the great and rich Citie Thapſacus, where the Army remained five dayes.

35. Here it was openly declared to the Greeks that they were led againſt the King, for which they were very angry with their Officers, who, they ſaid they were ſure, knew it before, for not acquainting them ſooner with the deſign; and refuſed to ſtir one foot forwarder, except upon promiſe of as much as their Country-men had, who formerly waited on Cyrus to his father. He promiſed to give every man five pounds in ſilver (of the value of fourteen Mnæ pounds, eleven ſhillings, eight pence, ſterling) as ſoon as they came to Babylon, and to continue their whole pay, till they ſhould be ſent back into Ionia, to which conditions moſt of them yielded, and Menon prevailing with his Regiment to paſs over the River firſt, whileſt the other were yet in conſultation, thereby to gain greater favour with Cyrus, all the Army followed, not a man being wet above the breaſts in wading over; ſo that this paſſage ſeemed to be miraculous, and to portend more good to Cyrus than followed, the River giving way to him, which they of Thapſacus reported never to have been paſſed over on Foot before, but only with ſhipping, which Abrocamus had burnt to hinder him in the paſſage. Thence in nine encampings he marched fifty Paraſangs, or one hundred eighty ſeven miles and upwards through Syria, and came to the River Araxes. Here they ſtayed three days, and made proviſion of Victuals, and then departing thence, marched through the Wilderneſs of Arabia, one hundred thirty miles in five encampings, having Euphrates on the right Hand, and proceeding through this Countrey came to the River Maſca, where they ſtayed three days in making proviſion for the Army; whence in thirteen encampings they marched through the deſert ninty paraſangs, or three hundred thirty ſeven miles and an half, and came to the Straights.

36. Proceeding in their Journey hence, they might diſcover the footings, and dung of Horſes; for a party had been ſent of about two thouſand, which going before the Kings Camp, burnt up the Fodder, and made havock of all things profitable for uſe. Now came Orontes a Perſian to Cyrus, whom having ſought to betray him in times paſt, and pardoned by him, attempted now to do the like, but was diſcovered, and put to death. Marching ſtill forward they proceeded in three incampings fourty five miles through the Countrey of Babylon. In the third encamping at midnight Cyrus ſet his men in order, thinking his Brother to be near, and would give him battel the next morning. The Græcians were in number ten thouſand four hundred Armed, and two thouſand four hundred Targetiers, the Barbarians with Cyrus were ten Myriads (or one hundred thouſand) beſides about two hundred Sythed Chariots. From hence in order of Battel he marched ſome twelve miles, thinking the King would have fought that day, becauſe at the end of this half days Journey he found a Trench caſt five Fathoms broad, and three deep, running up fourty five miles into the Countrey, as far as the Wall of Media, where the four Chanels begin that derived out of the River Tigris, fall into Euphrates. This Trench the King cauſed to be made after he heard that Cyrus was ſtirring, who now paſſing it without any diſturbance, he and all his Army were ſtrongly perſwaded that the King determined not to Fight; whence he had not ſo great care of his March the next day, and the third day after he advanced ſitting in his Chariot: the moſt of his Army marched confuſedly, many of the Souldiers having their Arms laid upon the Wains, and carriage of Beaſts.

37. Now it was time, the Market was full, and the place of encamping where they ſhould quarter was at hand, when Patagyas a Perſian, one of the faithfulleſt of Cyrus his Train was ſeen to come upon the Spur, his Horſe dropping with Sweat, crying out in the Perſian and Greek language that the King was hard by, with an huge Army, ready and prepared for Fight. This news made a great confuſion, all thinking they ſhould be charged in that diſorder, Cyrus leaping from his Chariot, put on his Curace, and mounting on horſback, took his Dart in his Hand, and commanded the reſt to arm, and every man to take his place. Clearchus ſtood in the point of the right Wing, by the River Euphrates, Menon and his Regiment held the point of the left, and Cyrus himſelf the midſt with ſix hundred horſmen armed with great Curaces, and Taſes, and all of them with Casks, except he alone, who ſtood waiting the Fight with his Head unarmed, according to the cuſtom of Perſia. The King had with him ninty Myriads (or nine hundred thouſand) and one hundred fifty Chariots, having on both ſides Sythes prominent, and bearing ſtraight forth from the Axle-trees, and ſome from the former ſeat of the Chariot with their Points turned towards the Ground, that they might cut in pieces whatſoever they met and ſtruck upon: His purpoſe was to ſend them with high ſpeed againſt the Ranks of the Græcians, to break and rent them aſunder.

Artaxerxes and Cyrus joyn battel.

38. The Kings Army came on an equal and ſlow pace, in great ſilence, quietneſs, and order, which amazed, and diſcouraged Cyrus, and the Græcians, little expecting any ſuch thing. Cyrus now galloping up to the right Wing, cried out to Clearchus to lead the Græcians againſt the middeſt of the Enemies battel, becauſe the King was there, ſaying that if he were overcome, there would be no more for them to do. Clearchus ſeeing the middeſt of the Battel, and hearing from him that the King, by reaſon of his multitude which ſtretched out the Body, was far without the point of the left Wing of the Græcian Phalang, would not for all that draw away the right wing from the River, fearing to be confronted, and incompaſſed on both ſides: but anſwered, he would have a care that all things ſhould go well. The word was betrayed before they joyned ſo that they were forced to change it to Jupiter the ſaviour, and victory, after the giving of which the Græcians ſinging the Pæan, and running on with a ſhout, the Barbarians, before they came within an Arrows ſhot, turned their Horſes and fled, the other following the Chace with all ſpeed, and crying to one another not to haſte too much, but to follow in good order. The Chariots void of Guides were carried, ſome upon the Enemies themſelves, ſome upon the Gracians, who upon a forecaſt opened, and let them paſs through, only ſome were overthrown by fear, who notwithſtanding were reported to have had no harm, nor yet any other Gracian in this whole fight, one only excepted, who was ſtrucken with an Arrow in the left ſide.

Cyrus worſhipped as King.

39. Cyrus beholding this ſight much rejoyced, and was now worſhipped as King by thoſe about him; notwithſtanding he followed not the Chaſe, but keeping by him his ſix hundred Horſe, obſerved what the King would do, who being in the midſt of his Phalang, without the point of Cyrus his left Wing, and ſeeing no man to fight againſt him on the contrary part, wound, and turned his Battel to the left hand, to overwing, and encompaſs in his Enemies. Cyrus perceiving it, and fearing, leſt coming on the backs of the Gracians he ſhould cut them in pieces, galloped forth, and met him in front, and charging with his ſix hundred, overcame, and put to flight the ſix thouſand that were ordered before him, and with his own Hands (as was reported) ſlew Artagerſes, one of his Generals. His ſix hundred purſuing hotly were diſperſed, except a few that were left with him, for the moſt part ſuch as uſually ſat at his Table, with which being accompanied, he eſpied the King, and the Troup about him, and after he had ſaid I ſee the man, flew out directly againſt him, ſtruck him on the Breaſt, and wounded him through the Curace, as Cteſias of Gnidus the Kings Phyſician related, who reported alſo that he cured the Wound. Whilſt Cyrus thus fought, one with a Dart hit him a ſore blow under the Eye.

Xenoph. ut ſupra et Plutarch in Artaxerxe.

40. The King and Cyrus with their followers in defence of either of them thus coping together, Cyrus was ſlain by the King, as his flatterers ſaid, as others by a Carian, though Cteſias writeth his death to have hapned after the King had withdrawn himſelf to an Hill, being firſt wounded beſides the Eye, and then diſpatched by a thruſt into his left Leg, by a Caunian of a baſe condition, who with other of his Companions had thruſt himſelf, it being now dark, in amongſt his followers. Here he died in the battel of Cunaxa a place diſtant from Babylon five hundred Furlongs, or ſixty odd Miles, a man in the opinion of ſuch as had acquaintance with him, of a moſt Kingly diſpoſition, and moſt worthy a Crown of all the Perſians that ſucceeded Cyrus the Great. Clearchus before the Fight adviſed him to keep himſelf behind the Army, and not to venture into danger, to whom he replied as one who wiſhed him to carry himſelf unworthy a Kingdom whileſt he fought for one. In the opinion of Plutarch, not ſo much his raſhneſs (though inexcuſable) as the lazineſs, not to ſay cowardiſe, of Clearchus is to be condemned, who having marched ſo many Miles for no other purpoſe than to place him in the Throne, not ſo much endeavoured his ſafety and Conqueſt, as his own eaſe and ſecurity: The event of the Fight ſhewed, that none of thoſe about the King would have endured the leaſt brunt from the Gracians, and that after they had been put to flight, and he with them, or elſe killed in the place, the Victory and Kingdom muſt have remained to Cyrus. But this advantage was loſt by Clearchus, who ſo placed his men that Artaxerxes could not have deſired a more convenient order, on his part, they being at greateſt diſtance from him and his Army, inſomuch that he neither perceived himſelf overcome by them, and Cyrus was ſooner ſlain than they could reap any fruit of their Victory. This Battel was fought about the beginning of the fourth year of the ninty fifth Olympiad, Epænetus (or Xenanætus) being Archon at Athens, in the third ending, or fourth beginning of Artaxerxes.

Cyrus ſlain.

A.M. 3607.
V. C. 353.
Xenoph. & Plutarch. ut prius & in Periclc.

41. Artaxerxes commanded the Head, and right hand of Cyrus to be cut off, and following the Chace, chanced upon his Camp, which they plundred, and took thence his Phocæan Concubine, called the wiſe and beautiful, whoſe name in her own Countrey was Mitto, but by Cyrus called Aſpaſia, whom the King moſt loved, and kept amongſt his three hundred ſixty Concubines. Now were he and the Gracians near four Miles aſunder; the laſt giving Chace to ſuch Enemies as ſtood before them, as if they had been Conquerours of the whole Army; the other rifling the Camp of the Gracians, as if his Army had gained the Victory. After this both parties rallied again for a new engagement, but the Barbarians received not the Gracians, but fled with greater ſpeed than before. Having perſued them ſome way, the Gracians made an Holt, and reſted themſelves, wondering they ſaw not Cyrus, being ignorant what was befallen him.

The Gracians having the better in the battel, are ignorant of Cyrus his death.

Then after ſome conſultation what was to be done, they returned to the Camp about Supper time, where they found the moſt of their other Goods rifled, and eſpecially the Meat and Drink, and the four hundred Wains loaden with Meal and Wine, which Cyrus had prepared to relieve them, in caſe the Army ſhould at any time be driven to want. The moſt of them therefore were ſupperleſs, having alſo wanted their Dinner that day: for that the King came in ſight before they could refreſh themſelves. Thus this day ended, and together with the Story, the firſt Book of the Aſcent of Cyrus commonly aſcribed to Xenophon as the Author.

Xenoph. An. lib. 2.

42. The Græcians hearing of Cyrus his death were much troubled, and offered Ariæus (a Perſian, who followed Cyrus, and commanded his left Wing) to place him in the Throne; but he refuſed it, for that, as he ſaid, there were many Perſians in all reſpects better than he, who would never endure that he ſhould be King. Artaxerxes ſent a Meſſage to them to lay down their Arms, and to repair to his Gate, there to ſubmit themſelves to his mercy. The Coronels were divided in their opinions concerning it, and gave ſeveral anſwers according to their apprehenſions, but Clearchus, for all a doubtful one, viz. that if they might be accounted as his Friends, they ſhould be better Friends having Arms, than delivering them up to any man; if no remedy there was but War, they ſhould better make War with Arms, than without, after they had rendred them up. And whereas he offered them Truce, as long as they abode in the ſame place, but threatned War if they ſtirred thence, he replied only, that they would expect accordingly. Then reſolved he, after he knew Ariæus his anſwer, and how he invited them to march back again into Ionia, for that the Sacrifice killed about marching againſt the King was not proſpitious, to joyn the Army unto his, which accordingly he did, Ariæus, and the Officers of the Græcians taking an Oath to be Friends, Confederates, and not to betray one another. The League was entred into on this manner: They killed a Boar, a Bull, a Wolf, and a Ram; and the Græcians dipped the point of a Sword, the Barbarians of a Spear in the Blood of theſe Beaſts, being powred out into the hollowneſs of a Target.

They joyn with Ariæus, and retreat.

Xenoph: Aſcenſ. Cyri. lib. 2. & Diodorus ad ann. 4. Olymp. 94.

43. The length of the Journey from Epheſus in Ionia to the place of the Battel was ninty three encampings, five hundred thirty five paraſangs, ſixteen thouſand thirty Furlongs, two thouſand Miles and above, which though very long, yet reſolved they to take another and longer way through Paphlagonia, becauſe the former was deſtitute of Proviſions. Then ſet they forward that way, marching more ſlowly for the better gathering of neceſſaries, and after the King had ſomewhat recovered of his Wound, he purſued them, and pitched his Tents hard by theirs; but with the noiſe of them his men were ſo affrighted, that ſome of the neareſt to them removed their Tents, and on the next day ſetting their men in order for Battel, he who before had made ſuch large demands, ſent and offered them Truce, and covenanted to let them have free paſſage through his Territories till they came to the Sea, and afforded them Proviſions for their money, which was alſo granted to all the Mercenaries who ſerved under Ariæus (or Aridæus) and Clearchus. Then proceeded the Greeks on their Journey, and the King returned to Babylon, where rewarding thoſe that had beſt deſerved on him in the laſt Battel, he judged the Service of Tiſſaphernes to have been moſt eminent, therefore as a reward (amongſt ſeveral other noble Gifts) he gave him his own Daughter to wife, and the government of ſuch places as formerly had been under Cyrus, binding him to him thereby ſo, as he proved ever moſt faithful to him.

The King purſueth and is forced to diſmiſs them.

44. Tiſſaphernes ſeeing how the King was incenſed againſt the Græcians, promiſed him to deſtroy them all, if he were but furniſhed with Forces to that purpoſe, and could but withdraw Ariæus from them, by whom he doubted not but they might eaſily be betraied. The King accepting his offer, gave him leave to chuſe of the moſt valiant of his Army as many as he would, with which he followed after, and incamping near to them, ſent for Clearchus and the other Coronels to come to him, pretending he had ſomewhat for their good to ſay to them. They with the Captains of the ſeveral Companies going to him, with two hundred more (who went to buy Victuals) he ſecured the Coronels called into his Tent, and killed the Captains at the Door with the other two hundred, of which one chanced to eſcape with the News thereof to the Camp. The Coronels were ſent to the King, who put them all to death except Menon. The Soldiers at firſt greatly terrified, having now no body left to command or lead them, by the advice of Xenophon made choice of other Leaders, amongſt whom Cheiriſophus was chief, and he himſelf was one, being elected into the place of Proxenus, Tiſſaphernes intrappeth their Officers.

Sect. 3.

Xenoph. Exped. lib. 3.

The Soldiers make a new choice, in which Xenophon is one.

Proxenus, who being his ancient Friend and Gueſt ſent for him, and promiſed him if he would come, to make Cyrus his Friend, who, as he eſteemed him, would be more to be prized than his own Country. He communicated the matter to Socrates the Philoſopher and his Maſter, who, for that Cyrus his intereſt ſeemed croſs to that of the City of Athens, ſeeming to ſtand with the Lacedæmonians, adviſed him to conſult the Oracle of Delphos. Thither he went, and enquired how he might beſt accompliſh his Journey, to which was anſwered, that he muſt Sacrifize to thoſe Gods to whom he ought to Sacrifize, which he reporting again to Socrates, he blamed him for ſo propounding his Queſtion, alleging he ought to have asked whether he ſhould travel or no, and not as one reſolved already to do it; but ſeeing it was ſo, he muſt do as he was bidden, and accordingly he followed Cyrus to Sardis, where Proxenus preſented him to him.

Idem ibid. & Diodorus ut prius.

45. The Græcians marching on towards Paphlagonia, where dogged at the Heels by Tiſſaphernes, who being affraid of the valour of deſperate men, never durſt ingage in any Battel with them, but only flancked them or fell in upon their Rear, as he could have opportunity, and yet followed them as far as the Borders of the Carduchians, after which, ſeeing he could not do them any conſiderable hurt, he departed with his men towards Ionia another way. The Carducians a warlike Nation and at Enmity with the King, and much exerciſed in ſlinging of great and maſſie Stones, much diſturbed the Græcians in their paſſage of their Country, and in the paſſing the Mountains thereof were ſpent ſeven days. With great difficulty and danger having paſſed it, they went over the River Centritis into Armenia; of which Artabazus being then Governour, entred into league with them, and ſuffered them quietly to paſs; but in travelling thorow the Mountains they were near all being overwhelmed in the Snow, the diſcerning of ways being taken away thereby. The whole Army had periſhed alſo by extream cold, had they not light upon ſome Villages near hand, wherein being furniſhed with plenty of neceſſaries, they refreſhed themſelves. The Houſes ſtood within the Ground, into which the men deſcended by Stairs, and their Cattel by deſcents made for that purpoſe. Having here ſtayed eight days, they journeyed thence to the River Phaſis.

Xenoph. lib. 4. Diodorus.

46. Having continued four days at this River, they marched through the Country of the Tacchi and Phaſiani, by whom being oppoſed, they fought and made great ſlaughter of them, and then ſeized upon their Villages, which were plentifully furniſhed with ſuch things as they wanted, they there reſted fifteen days. Thence marching through the Territories of the Chalcidenſians, in ſeven encampings they came to the River Harpaſus, and thence coming into the Plains of the Taſcutini, they there refreſhed themſelves three days, and proceeding, in four encampings they arrived at a great City called Gymnaſia. The Prince of this Countrey entring into a League with them, furniſhed them with Guides to the Sea, of which, after fifteen days being got up to the Hill Chenius, they got a ſight a far of, at which the Front ſhouted ſo for joy, that thoſe in the Rear thinking they had been ſet upon by ſome Enemy, prepared themſelves for a Fight, and there laid they a great heap of Stones as a Monument to Poſterity, of the Spoils obtained from the Barbarians, and the immortal memory of their Expedition.

They came to Trapezond upon the Euxine Sea.

Exped. Cyri, l. 5.

Diodorus ut ſuprà.

47. Then came they into the Country of the Macri, with whom they made a League, by taking and receiving a Spear, according to the cuſtom of theſe Barbarians. Having got over their Mountains they came into the Territories of the Coleti, where a great multitude oppoſing them, they made no ſmall ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, and made a great ſpoil, where they found a kind of Honey, of which whoſoever did eat, became according to the quantity eaten, drunken, mad, or as dead, but the next day at the ſame hour returned to their right Senſes, and after three or four days aroſe as having received ſome Medicine. Thence in two encampings they come to Trapezond a Græcian City well inhabited, ſituate upon the Euxine Sea, being a Colony of the Sinopeans, placed in the Colchian Country. Here Jaſon with his Companions are reported to have arrived with their Ship Argos. They ſacrifized to Hercules and Jupiter, and celebrated Games of Exerciſe, and hence was Cheriſophus ſent to Byzantium to provide Ships for the tranſportation of them home, and for him here they ſtaied thirty days, but after that term he returning not, their Proviſions growing ſcarce, though they had made excurſions both by Sea and Land, they put on Shipboard (having obtained a little Shipping of the Trapezuntans) the Sick, all thoſe above fourty Years of Age, with the Women and Children, and paſſed in three dayes to Ceraſunt a Græcian City ſituate upon the Sea, being alſo a Colony of the Sinopeans in the Colchian Countrey. Here they remained ten dayes, and taking a muſter, found eight thouſand ſix hundred remaining of thoſe that aſcended with Cyrus into Perſia, the reſt being conſumed by the Enemies hand, or Snow, or ſickneſs. Here alſo they divided the money that aroſe out of the ſail of Captives, the tenth part of which the Officers took into their hands, being ſevered as an offering to be made to Apollo and Diana of Epheſus; every one keeping and preſerving a ſhare for his gods.

Sect. 3.

48. From Ceraſunt they came into the Country of the Meſynecans, the verieſt Barbarians they had met with in the whole Journey, which they paſſed by force in eight encampings, and in three more that of the Tibarenes through which they came to Cotyora a Græcian Colony alſo of the Sinopæans. Thus far the Army marched one foot, the whole length of the retreat from the place of the battel in the Babylonian Territories hither, being a hundred twenty two encampings, ſix hundred twenty paraſangs, ten thouſand eight hundred twenty furlongs, one thouſand three hundred fifty two miles and ſomething more. At Cotyora they continued fifty dayes, making encurſions upon the neighbouring people of Paphlagonia. Then the Heracleans and Synopeans, a Colony of the Mileſians in Paphlagonia, furniſhed them with ſhipping, into which they put themſelves and their baggage, and ſailed away, Cheriſophus meeting them with a few Veſſels. Holding on their courſe they ſailed by Jaſon's ſhore, where the Ship Argo is ſaid to have anchored, and by the mouths of the Rivers Thermodon, Halys, and Parthenius, by which after they had paſſed, they arrived at Heraclea a Græcian City and Colony of the Magaræans, ſituate in the Territory of the Maryandens, and came to anchor near the Cherroneſus or Peninſula of Acherouſia, where Hercules is ſaid to have fetcht the Dog Cerberus out of Hell; the marks being there ſhewn of his decent, and the depth of the place, being more than two furlongs.

Xenoph. lib. 6. Diodorus.

They part aſunder at Heraclea.

49. Here the Souldiers, through the perſwaſion of Lycon an Achaian, making unreaſonable demands of money from the Heracleans, they ſhut their gates upon them, and provided for their own defence, which bred a ſedition in the Army, ſo that they parted aſunder. The Arcadians and Achæans being more than four thouſand five hundred all heavy armed, ſailed away firſt, having got ſhipping of the Heracleans, that falling ſuddainly upon the Bithynians, they might prevent the reſt, and make the greateſt prey. Cheriſophus a little before choſen General, having one thouſand three hundred armed, and ſeven hundred Peltaſts, (who were the Thracians that followed Clearchus) marched on foot from Heraclea, and as ſoon as he entred Thrace, led along by the Sea-coaſt being now ſick, and preſently dead of a Medicine he took in an Ague. Xenophon with one thouſand ſeven hundred Armed, three hundred Peltaſts, and forty Horſe, taking ſhipping, landed in the confines of Thrace, and marched through the midſt of the Land. With great difficulty paſſed they through the Country on foot, the Thracians of Aſia and Bithynians, grievouſly afflicting them, till meeting together again, they reſolved no more to part, and decreed it ſhould be death for any one to move ſuch a thing. Then came they ſafe, though with great difficulty, to Chryſopolis a City in Chalcedonia, whence without much trouble ſome returned home, others were employed by Seuthes the King of Thrace; and after that Thymbro joyning them to the reſt of the Græcian Forces, made War with them againſt Tiſſaphernes.

Xenoph. l. 7. Diodorus.

They return home.

The Governours of the King's Provinces at their return.

50. The Governours of the King's Provinces through which they journyed were Artymas of Lydia, Artacamas of Phrygia, Mithridates of Lycaonia and Cappadocia; of Cilicia Syeneſis, of Phœnicia, and Arabia Darnes, of Syria and Aſſyria Beleſis, of Babylonia Raparas, of Media Arbacas, of the Phaſians and Heſperites Teribazus. The Carduchans, Chalybes, Chaldæans, Macrons, Cholcans, Moſynæcans, Coitans, and Tibarens, were free people, and under no man's ſubjection. Paphlagonia, was ruled by Corylas, the Bithynians by Pharnabazus, the Europæan Thracians by Seuthes. The total number of the Aſcent and Deſcent, was two hundred twelve encampings, one thouſand one hundred fifty paraſangs, thirty four thouſand two hundred fifty five furlongs, four thouſand two hundred eighty one miles and more. The time of the Aſcent and Deſcent one year and three monthes. Thus theſe Strangers wanting all things, ignorant of the Countries through which they paſſed, over precipitous Mountains, ſtraight and (almoſt) impaſſable wayes, notwithſtanding the malice of Enemies, ſharpneſs of air, and difficulty of the Soil, by the wonderful Providence of God, and ſingular prudence of Xenophon, returned home into Greece, as we have it deſcribed by Xenophon himſelf, though the ſeven Books of this Expedition, notwithſtanding the conſtant opinion of Antiquity, are adjudged by a late Learned Man (by reaſon of the diſagreement of their manner of writing from his other works) from him, and are aſcribed to Themiſtogenes the Syracuſian, whom* elſewhere he mentioneth to have related theſe matters. However this Service performed to Cyrus coſt him the loſs of his Country, being for that baniſhed by the Athenians his Countrymen; but the Lacedæmonians taking pity of him, gave him ſome Lands in the Country of Elis and the Territories of Triphyllis, whence we may very well fetch an account of his writing that elegant Treatiſe of the form of their Commonwealth.

* Hellen. 3.

Plutarch in Artaxerxe.

51. In this mean time whilſt the Græcians were on their way homewards, Paryſatis the Queen-mother of Perſia greatly lamented the death of her Son Cyrus, and meditated nothing but revenge upon ſuch as had been inſtruments in his death, whom one way or other getting into her Hands, ſhe killed with moſt exquiſite Torments. The Carian, who vaunted he, and no other, had killed him, being deſigned by Artaxerxes to be beheaded, becauſe he robbed him of the glory of ſo valiant an action, ſhe begged of the King, that ſhe might have the puniſhing him, and ſo delivered him to thoſe, who for ten days tormented him; then digged out his Eyes, and laſtly made an end of him by powring melted Braſs into his Ears. Mithridates guilty of the ſame Crime of Boaſting, and thereby greatly incenſing the King, who would have had all men to believe that he alone in a ſingle Duel had ſlain his Brother, was condemned to be put to death after an odd kind of Puniſhment full of Cruelty, then in uſe in Perſia. The Malefactor was laid on his Back between two hollow things, in form like to Boats, ſo fitted together that his Head, Hands, and Feet might lye out, and the reſt of the Body be contained within. Being thus made faſt Meat was given to him, and if he would not receive it, he was forced to eat by pricking of his Eyes; and when he did eat, inſtead of Drink, Honey and Milk mixed together were powred into him, being ſo placed as ever to have his Eyes againſt the Sun. Hereby it came to paſs, that his Face would be wholely covered with Flies; and doing that within the Engine, which a man needs muſt who keepeth conſtantly eating and drinking; from the putrefaction of the Excrements were Maggots and Worms bred, which creeping up into the Entrails fed upon the Body, ſo that the miſerable man being dead, and the upper part of the Engine removed, they might ſee the Fleſh devoured, and Swarms of Filth ſticking on the Carcaſe: After this manner was Mithridates by degrees extinct, after ſeventeen days.

Paryſatis rageth againſt ſuch as had any hand in the death of her Son Cyrus.

Idem ibid.

52. Paryſatis after this, having won from Artaxerxes her Son at Dice, the Eunuch Megates, who had cut off the Head and Hands of Cyrus, cauſed him to be flead alive. Her ſtudy then was how to rid herſelf of Statira her Daughter-in-law, whom ſhe never cared for, now hated Mortally, and emulated her by reaſon of her Hatred againſt Cyrus, and her Power with the King her Husband, ſo as ſhe reſolved in the procurement of her deſtruction to hazard her own ſafety. Being now in an appearance reconciled, and all old things forgotten, ſo as they met and Supped together, ſhe thence took occaſion ſecretly to work her death. There was a Bird in Perſia, called Rhyntaces, in which being nothing ſuperfluous or of excrement, all the inward parts were filled with Fat. This, as Cteſias wrote, ſhe cut it in two with a Knife, whereof the one ſide was only poyſoned, and then taking the clear half to her ſelf, ſhe gave the other which the Poyſon had toucht unto Statira, who ſuſpecting nothing, for that ſhe ſee her eat her ſelf of the Bird before her, did eat it up, and died after great Convulſions and Torment. She ſuſpected her before her death, and poſſeſſed the King with the matter, who knew ſufficiently the cruel, and implacable diſpoſition of his Mother. He preſently with Tortures examined her neereſt Servants, but ſhe kept Gygis a woman who had been acceſſary to the Fact, and would not give her up to him, till at length having notice that ſhe ſhould go out of the Houſe by night, he ſurprized, and condemned her to dy the Death due to Poyſoners by the Perſian Law, which was, that the Head of the Malefactor being laid on a great Stone, with another it was broken and flatted. As for his Mother he hurt her not at all, either by word or deed, but ſhe deſiring to go to Babylon, he ſent her, adding only this, that he would not ſee that City ſo long as ſhe lived. This was the ſtate of the Domeſtick affairs of Artaxerxes.

The Bird Rhyntaces, wherein Paryſatis poyſoneth Statira.

53. After

Sect. 3.

Diodorus ad an.1.Oylmp.95.

53. After the overthrow of Cyrus, he ſent down Tiſſaphernes (not Pharnabazus, as is falſly written in Diodorus) to the Sea-Coaſts to recover them into his power, the Governors of which fearing now to pay dearly for their compliance with Cyrus, ſent to make their peace with this new General, and ſought all wayes poſſible to be received into his favour. But Tamos a man of prime note amongſt them, and Governour of Ionia, ſhipping his goods, and all his ſons (except one, named Cyaos, who afterwards became Captain of the Kings forces) ſayled for fear of Tiſſaphernes into Egypt to Pſammitichus the King, hoping for former courteſies to be received; but he, without conſideration of former benefits, to get his ſhips and money to himſelf, murdered his friend with his Children.

Idem ibid. Xenoph. Hellen lib.3. Juſtin. lib.6.init.

In the mean time the Ionians fearing Tiſſaphernes, and deſirous to enjoy their liberty, ſent to the Lacedæmonians, now the cheifeſt State in Greece, deſiring, that being the Captains, and Protectors of all Greece, they would not neglect them Originally of the ſame ſtock, but endeavour that they might enjoy their liberty, retain their Lands, and not utterly be deſtroyed, as danger ſeemed to threaten them from Tiſſaphernes, whom they had incenſed by revolting from him to Cyrus. They, who were nothing contented with the doubling of their power by the acceſſion of that of Athens lately ſubdued, but ſtill according to the nature of men deſiring more, began to caſt in their heads how they might attain to the Empire of Aſia, being alſo encouraged by the retreat of their Country-men, did not unwillingly receive the embaſſy; but promiſing them ſpeedy releif, firſt ſent to Tiſſaphernes, deſiring him not to offer any violence to the Greek Towns, but he neglecting their Meſſage, and falling upon Cumæ, in the Territories of which he did much harm, and took many priſoners, then they created Thymbro their Captain General againſt the King, giving him one thouſand of their own Citizens, and order to take up as many from amongſt their aſſociates as he ſhould think convenient.

Diodorus & Xenoph.ut prius.

Thimbro ſent to the aid of the Greek Cities, falleth on Magneſia.

54. Thimbro then with theſe marched to Corinth, where making them up to the number of five thouſand, beſides three hundred Athenian horſe, he thence ſayled to Epheſus. Having there out of the Aſſociates and others, raiſed two thouſand men more, he removed and fell upon Magneſia, a Town ſubject to Tiſſaphernes, which he took at the firſt onſet, and preſently after attempted Tralles, a Town of Ionia; but it being to no purpoſe, he retreated to Magneſia, which being Fortified with no Wall, fearing that Tiſſaphernes might after his departure recover it, he removed it to an Hill hard by, named Thorax. Then invaded he, and haraſſed the Enemies country, but hearing that Tiſſaphernes was coming towards him with a great power of horſe, he thought himſelf unable to graple with him, and therefore returned unto Epheſus. Not long after upon promiſe of pay he procured Xenophon his forces to joyn with him, with which then he took the field againſt Tiſſaphernes, whereupon Pergamus yielded to him, together with Teuthrania, and Halyſarnia Governed by Euryſthenes and Procles, who were deſcended from Demaratus the Lacedæmonian. Other Towns alſo were delivered up to him, and ſome he took by force, till at length he ſate down before Lariſſa, called the Egyptian, which attempting for ſome time to no purpoſe, his Superiours at Lacedæmon were nothing ſatisfied with his management of the War, ſo that he received orders from the Ephori to leave Lariſſa, and remove the Army into Caria. He obeyed, and when he was come on his way as far as Epheſus, Dercyllidas (a man ſo famous for his rare invention and cunning, that he got the ſirname of Siſyphus) being appointed his Succeſſor, there met him, and diſcharged him of his employment. Returning home, he was accuſed by the Aſſociates for giving his Souldiers liberty to ſpoyl the friends and confederates of the State, and for that was baniſhed, Dercyllidas ſucceedeth him.

Xenoph. ibid. Juſtin lib.6. init. Diodorus ad Oylmp.95.an.2.

55. Dercyllidas taking the Army into his hands, and not ignorant how he had to do with two Perſian Lieutenants, Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus, who feared and hated each other; leſt he ſhould be overmatched with both he reſolved if he could to make peace with one of them. He had conceived ſome diſtaſte againſt the later for an affront he put upon him, when he formerly ſerved under Lyſander in Aſia: wherefore he made peace with Tiſſaphernes upon certain conditions, and lead his Army into Æolis, without any hurt to the confederates in the way, which was under the Command of Pharnabazus, where taking nine Cities in eight dayes, and getting into his hands all the Citties of Troas, he conſulted by what means he might ſo quarter his Souldiers in Winter as not to be burthenſom to the Aſſociates as Thimbro was, and yet prevent Pharnabazus from troubling the Cities with the excurſions of horſe, of which he had good ſtore. He ſent then preſently to Pharnabazus to offer either war, or peace, who making choice of a Truce, for that he ſtood in fear of Phrygia, which bordered upon Æolis, and where he had his ſeat, he thereupon lead his forces into Bithynia to Winter there; the other not being unwilling he ſhould ſo do, becauſe the Bithynians were often troubleſom to him.

56 In the beginning of Spring Dercyllidas marching out of Bithynia came to Lampſacus, where he met with three Lacedæmonians ſent from the State to ſignifie to him the Prorogation of his Command for another year, who alſo by order from the Ephori, rebuked the Souldiers for the injuries offered by them to the aſſociates in the time of Thimbro, and commended them for their great moderation laſt year, warning them for the time to come, to which one of the Officers anſwered (who had followed Cyrus) that the Souldiers were one and the ſame, but that the change of Generals produced a change in their behaviour. The meſſengers being departed out of Aſia, he ſent again to Pharnabazus, offering him either peace, or War, as before, who making the ſame choice, he out of hand paſſed over the Helleſpont, and by the hands of his Souldiers, amongſt whom the work was divided, fortified the Iſthmus of the Cherroneſus of Thrace with a Wall, thereby to defend it from incurſions of the Thracians, who now had fallen upon it, and whom to repell he was ſent for. He ſo incouraged the minds of the Souldiers by hope of reward, that the work being began in Spring was finiſhed before Autumn, being thenceforth a great advantage to the inhabitants. After this he returned into Aſia, where viſiting the Cities he found that the Exiles of Chius having ſeized upon Atarna, there lurked, and lived upon ſuch booty as they could make out of Ionia; wherefore he beſieged the place, though ſtrong, and well victualled, and after a ſiege of eight months forcing them to yield, he committed the care of the Town to Draco a Pellenian, and returned unto Epheſus.

Diodorus ibid. Juſtin. ibid. Pauſan. in Atticis & Iſocrates in Evagora & ad Philip.

57. In the mean while Pharnabazus, after he had made Truce with him, went up to the King, to whom he accuſed Tiſſaphernes, as not having repelled the Lacedæmonians out of Aſia, but ſuffered them there to continue at his loſs and damage, alledging how unworthy a thing it was to fight more with money than Arms, and to reſtrain an Enemy more with rewards than valour. He adviſed him to make ready a Fleet, and give the Command thereof to Conon the Athenian, a man of great experience in things that concerned War, who ſince the diſaſter of his Country ſojourned with Evagoras the King of Cyprus. Artaxerxes yielding, gave him five hundred Talents to provide ſhips; and Conon hoping by this means to do ſome ſpecial ſervice for his Countrey, undertook the charge, but the Fleet being not yet ready, he ſayled with fourty Phœnician Veſſels into Cilicia, there to ſet all things in order. About the ſame time the Ionians ſent to Lacedæmon to declare to that State, that if Caria were invaded in which Tiſſaphernes his principal ſeat was, there might be hope that he would leave them to their Laws and Liberty. This ſo wrought with the Spartans, that the Ephori thereupon ſent order to Dercyllidas to lead his forces into that Countrey, and to Pharaces their Admiral to ſayl thither with his Fleet.

Conon the Athenian is made Admiral to Artaxerxes.

Xenoph. & Diodorus ut ſuprà.

Tiſſaphernes though impeached by Pharnabazus continued in his power.

58. Notwithſtanding the ſecret accuſations of Pharnabazus, yet ſtill was Tiſſaphernes truſted by the King, and ſo far as with the Chief power in the War againſt the Græcians; in ſo much that Pharnabazus, though much againſt his will, was forced to come to him at ſuch time as Dercyllidas invaded Caria. He firſt carried him thither, where taking what order their affairs required, and re-inforcing their Garriſons, they returned into Ionia, and Dercyllidas perceiving they had croſſed the River Mæander, after he had conſulted with Pharaces the Admiral about the preſervation of the Ionians at that time but naked of defence, he alſo paſſed the River after them. The Perſian forces were in number twenty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe; Dercyllidas his whole Army amounted but to ſeven thouſand, and though the Peloponneſians well enough behaved themſelves, yet ſuch as came from Priene and out of the Ionian Cities and Iſlands had liſted themſelves under him, ſome of them throwing their Arms into the Corn (which grew plentifully by the River,) took them to their heels, and the reſt ſufficiently evidenced what they would do if they came to fight. Yet Tiſſaphernes having not forgot how ſuch Greeks as followed Cyrus had put them to it, and judging all their Country-men to be of the the ſame metal, would by no means hear of fighting, which Pharnabazus

Sect. 3.

Dercyllidas maketh an agreement with them.

ſore preſſed him to; but ſent to Dercyllidas, deſiring to come to interview. After Hoſtages given and received on both ſides, they met, and an accommodation was made on theſe terms : That the King ſhould leave all the Greek Cities to their own liberty; that the Greekiſh Forces ſhould all depart out of his dominions, with all Lacedæmonian Governours from his Cities, and that a truce ſhould be for ſo long a time, till both parties could hear from their Superiours, concerning their reſolutions herein. Then marched away the Armies to their quarters, the Perſian to Tralles, and that of the Greeks to Lexcophrys.

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 3. Hlutarch. & Æmilius Probus in Ageſilao.

59. Notwithſtanding this truce entred into by theſe Captains, yet the rigging of a new Fleet went forwards in Phœnicia, and nothing do we hear concerning the confirmation of the Treaty by the King. It hapning that one Herodas a Syracuſan, living with a Sea-man in Phœnicia, and taking notice how great diligence was uſed in preparing a Fleet, which he heard ſhould be compleated to the number of three hundred Veſſels, he took the firſt opportunity of a ſhip and ſailed into Greece, giving notice that ſuch a Navy was providing by the King, and Tiſſaphernes, though he knew not, as he ſaid, upon what deſign. The Lacedæmonians hereat ſtartled, began to look about them, when Ageſilaus one of their Kings, through the perſwaſion of Lyſander, offered himſelf to undertake an Expedition into Aſia againſt the Perſian; provided they would ſend with him thirty of his chooſing, by whoſe advice he might manage affairs; give him two thouſand men from home, and ſix thouſand more of the aſſociates, which being granted him, together with proviſions for half a year, he ſailed with Lyſander (who had procured himſelf to be one of the three hundred, hoping by this means to reſtore the Decemvirates in the Aſian Cities, which he having erected, the Ephori had again diſſolved) unto Epheſus with ſuch ſpeed, that he landed his Forces before the Perſian Lieutenants knew ſo much as of his coming, and thereby took them at unawares.

Ageſilaus the Lacedæmonian King invadeth Aſia.

in Ageſilao cum Plutarcho & Æmilio Prob. ſive Cor. Nepote.

60. At Epheſus he raiſed new Forces to the number of four thouſand, and increaſed his Army to ten thouſand Foot and four hundred Horſe, with which he took the field, a great company of raſcally men, not inferiour in number to the other, following the Camp out of greedineſs for prey. Tiſſaphernes ſent to him to know the cauſe of his coming into Aſia, to whom he anſwered, that it was to reſtore the Greek Cities to their liberty; to which the other replyed, deſiring a ceſſation of Arms for ſo long a time, as he could ſend to the King, hoping to obtain from him that which he required. Ageſilaus gave little credit to his bare word, thinking, as indeed it was, that he protracted onely the time; but ſwearing moſt ſolemnly, that without any deceit he would do what in him lay to procure a Peace, he alſo upon this condition ſware to hold the Truce; but Tiſſaphernes having little regard of his oath, ſent onely to the King for new forces to joyn with his old ones, which though Ageſilaus ſufficiently knew, yet kept he his Faith inviolable in preſervation of the Truce; and when he denounced war againſt him, except he would forthwith quit Aſia, he gave notice thereof joyfully to his Souldiers, and ſent to the Ionians, Æolians, and the Greeks living upon the Helleſpont, to diſpatch their ſupplies unto Epheſus. Contrary then to the expectation of Tiſſaphernes (who thought he would have made for Caria) he invaded Phrygia, where ſetting upon the Cities at unawares, he got much booty, and without any loſs came to the confines of Daſchylium, where his Forlorn-hope meeting with a Party of Horſe belonging to Pharnabazus, were worſted, loſing twelve Men, and two Horſes, till he with the Infantry coming in to their relief, the Barbarians retired with the loſs of one Man, and Ageſilaus ſpending the greateſt part of Summer in waſting Phrygia, marched back with his Army mightily inriched, and came back in Autumn unto Epheſus, where he took up his Winter quarters.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 96. ann. 1

61. Whileſt the Lacedæmonians thus acted in Aſia againſt Artaxerxes, that they might ſtrengthen their intereſt abroad, they ſent to Nephereus the King of Ægypt, which now for a good ſpace had revolted from the Perſian Empire, to procure him to joyn with them in the War, who ſent them one hundred Gallies, and five hundred thouſand meaſures of Wheat for a ſupplie, Pharax then with a Navie conſiſting of a hundred twenty Sail departing from Rhodes, ſailed to Caunus, where he ſet upon Conon, who there had forty Ships lying at anchor; but Artaphernes and Pharnabazus coming in to the relief of the ſhips and Place with great Forces, he retired back to Rhodes, the Inhabitants of which not long after expelled his Fleet, and revolting to the Perſians received Conon and his Navy. It hapned after this revolt, that thoſe that brought the Corn from Ægypt being ignorant of what had happened, thruſt their ſhips into the Haven, which Conon and the Rhodians ſeizing upon, thereby well furniſhed the City. Afterwards came in to Conon ninety Gallies more: Ten from Cilicia, and the reſt out of Phœnicia, of which the petty King of Sidon had the charge. And here the ſouldiers of Conon mutinied for want of pay, who therefore more earneſtly called for their Arrears, becauſe their ſervice was the ſtricter under ſo great a Captain. Juſtin lib. 6.

Xenoph. Plutarch. & Æmilius Probus ut prius.

62. Ageſilaus knowing that without Horſe he could not well carry on the War, in Champain places, in the Winter-time took order about it, permitting ſuch rich men in the City as would not fight themſelves, to furniſh him with each of them an Horſe and a Man in their ſtead. Then upon the approach of the Spring, drawing together all his Forces to Epheſus, he trained and exerciſed them in the management of Arms, that City ſerving them as the ſhop of War, during theſe Exerciſes. When he had thus prepared their minds, and encouraged them by rewards, and otherwiſe, he gave out he would march ſtreight into the moſt fortified places of the Enemies Country, further to exerciſe them for the Fight. Tiſſaphernes thinking this rumor to be ſpread on purpoſe to deceive them, again marched into Caria, whither he thought indeed he meant to go; but Ageſilaus, as he ſaid, invaded the Territories about Sardis, which waſting round about, on the fourth day his men ſtragling about for plunder, were ſet upon by the Enemies Horſe, which ſlew many of them. He going in to their relief, underſtanding the Perſians had no Foot there, and conſidering how he had all things in a readineſs, reſolved to make ſomething of it, ſo that falling on in good earneſt, he got a conſiderable Victory near the River Pactolus, and plundering the enemies Camp, from what belonged to friend and foe, got booty worth above ſeventy talents, amongſt which was Camels which he carried with him into Greece.

Diodorus & Juſtin ut ſupra. Æmil. Probus in Conone.

63. Tiſſaphernes at the time of this engagement (if we may believe Xenophon, who accompanied Ageſilaus in this Expedition, rather than Diodorus or Pauſanias) was at Sardis, and upon that account was accuſed by the Perſians to have forſaken and betrayed them. About this time it happened that Conon the Admiral of the Perſian Fleet, having to no purpoſe for a long time ſollicited the King by letters, for money to pay his men, reſolved now himſelf to go to him, Pharnabazus egging him on that he might accuſe Tiſſaphernes of treachery. Leaving then his Fleet to the care of two Athenians, he came to Thapſacus in Syria, and paſſing down Euphrates unto Babylon, made ſupplication to Tithrauſtes, to whom he ſignified that hee would ſpeak with the King. But none being to be admitted to his preſence, except he adored him, he tranſacted his buſineſs by Letters and Meſſengers, and prevailed to have Tiſſaphernes adjudged an Enemy, the Lacedæmonians to be proſecuted with War, and to chuſe whom he pleaſed for the paying of Moneys; and with great Gifts returned he to the Sea, having Commiſſion to charge the Phœnicians, Cyprians, and other maritime Inhabitants, with long Ships, and having Pharnabazus for his Aſſociate, according to his deſire, to provide a Navie for the defence of the Seas againſt the next Summer.

Xenoph. Diodorus ut prius. Plutarch. in Artaxerxe & Ageſilao. Polyænus Stratagem. lib. 7.

64. The accuſations of Tiſſaphernes were ſo proſecuted by Paryſatis who bore him mortal Hatred in the behalf of her Son Cyrus, that Artaxerxes made Tithrauſtes Captain General of the War in his ſtead, enjoyning him to make him away, and granting Letters to all the Cities and Lieutenants to be obedient to him. He gave him two Letters at parting, whereof the one was written to Tiſſaphernes, being a pretended Commiſſion to him to have full and abſolute Power in the War: the other to Ariæus Lieutenant of Lariſſa, commanding him to aſſiſt Tithrauſtes in the apprehending of him. He delivered the Letter as ſoon as he came to Colloſſe in Phrygia, whither Ariæus procured Tiſſaphernes to come, as to adviſe together about the War, and as he was in the Bath having laid by his Scimiter, cauſed his Servants to take him, and ſent him to Tithrauſtes, who carrying him as far as Celæna cut off his head, which he conveyed to the King. He ſent it to his Mother, who greatly rejoyced at the ſight, with her alſo the Græcian women who had loſt their ſons or husbands through his fraud; and the whole Nation in the death of their mortal Enemy.

Tiſſaphernes put to death.

Xenoph. Hellen. 30.

65. Tithrauſtes now ſent to Ageſilaus to acquaint how the incendiary betwixt the King and the Græcians was deſervedly puniſhed, ſo that his Maſter thought it reaſonable that he would withdraw his Forces out of Aſia, and the Greek Cities being left to their own laws, ſhould pay their accuſtomed tribute to him. He denyed to do any thing herein without conſent of the Lacedæmonian

State,whereupon they agreed that Tithrauſtes paying him thirty talents for the maintenance of his Army, he ſhould depart into the parts ſubject to Pharnabazus, till ſuch time as he underſtood the will of his Superiors. Then led he towards Phrygia, when in the way he met with an Order come from Lacedæmon, whereby not only the power at Land, but over the Navy alſo was given unto him, over which he might make Admiral whomſoever he pleaſed. He then to gratifie the Cities and thoſe who at home ſtudied to pleaſure him, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty Ships, over which he ſet Piſander his Wives Brother, a man indeed greedy of honour, and of prompt boldneſs, but of little experience in ſuch great concernments.

Plutarch in Ageſilao. Pauſan. in Lacon.

66. Tithrauſtus taking notice hereof, and how Ageſilaus did not intend to quit Aſia, but rather conceived great hopes of overthrowing the King, reſolved there was no way to be taken but to find his Countrymen ſuch work at home, that they muſt neceſſarily recall him. To this purpoſe he ſent one Timocrates a Rhodian into Greece, with Gold to the value of fifty Talents, to the intent that he might therewith corrupt the leading and principal Men of the ſeveral Cities, and engage them into a War with the Athenians againſt Lacedæmon, which was accordingly brought about. Ageſilaus in the mean time entring Phrygia, which was ſubject to Pharnabazus, about Autumn, ſpoiled the Country, and by fair or foul means took many Cities. Thence marched he into Paphlagonia, which he withdrew from the Obedience of the Perſian, and received one thouſand Horſe and two thouſand Foot from Cotys the King, and after this he went to Daſcylium, where Pharnabazus his Palace was, and there, it being a place plentious of Proviſions, he took up his Winter-quarters.

Xenoph. ibid. Plutarch. in Artax. & Ageſilao. Pauſan. ibid.

67. Whilſt his Soldiers ſtraggled abroad for Booty in great contempt of the Barbarians, Pharnabazus light on a party of Horſe, and therefore ſlew one hundred. Three or four days after Herippidas (the principal of thirty Counſellors who accompanied Ageſilaus) having notice from Spithridates, that Pharnabazus lay incamped in a large Village named Cave, twenty Miles of, procured of Ageſilaus four thouſand Foot and as many Horſe-men as he could perſwade to accompany him, with which beginning his march as ſoon as it was dark, by break of Day he fell in upon the Enemies Camp, killing moſt of the Myſians who kept the Watch before it. Then the Perſians fled; Pharnabazus fearing to be beſieged, ſo that he wandred from place to place like the Scythian Nomades, and Herippidas got much rich Plunder, amongſt which the coſtly Stuff of Pharnabazus, but ſeeking out too auſterely all the concealed Prey, he took from Spithidrates and the Paphlagonians all they had gotten; with which diſgrace being exceedingly affected, they went away by Night to Ariæus lying at Sardis, who had formerly rebelled and waged War with Cyrus againſt the King. At this departure of Spithridates and Megabates his Son (who was moſt dear to him) Ageſilaus was ſo troubled, as alſo at that of the Paphlagonian Forces, that nothing more vexed him of all things that fell out in this Aſiatick Expedition.

Pharnabazus defeated.

68. Afterwards Ageſilaus and Pharnabazus met together to treat about a Peace by the procurement of Apollophanes of Cyzicus, who was gueſt unto them both. Pharnabazus profeſſed that if he were not made General of the War he would revolt from the King; but if he ſhould be, he would carry it on againſt the other with all his might, and to his utmoſt ability. Ageſilaus on the other ſide promiſed he would ſpeedily depart out of his Territories, and as long as any other remained to make War upon, would ſpare him and his Eſtate. Upon the approaching of Spring, he led down his Forces into the Plains of Thebes, where pitching his Tents near the Temple of Diana Aſtyrina, he levied all the Forces he could; for he intended an Expedition into the upper Countries, being confident to turn all in his paſſage from their Obedience to the King, his Fame being ſpread abroad far and near, having ſpent now two Years in the War. But the Gold ſent into Greece the laſt year by Tithrauſtes, had by this time ſo wrought upon the Humours of the ſeveral States there, that they conſpired together in a great and dangerous War againſt the Lacedæmonians, who thereupon ſent to Ageſilaus, ſetting him a Day by which he muſt needs be at home with his Army for the preſervation of his Country. It troubled him much to leave Aſia, for the Conqueſt of which he was in ſo fair a way, yet he reſolved to obey the call of his diſtreſſed Conntry,ſeeing(as he himſelf expreſſed in his anſwer to the Ephori) a General then truly and juſtly commandeth, when he obeyeth the Laws,and the Ephori or whatſoever Magiſtrates elſe are in the City.

Plutarch in Ageſilao, Artax. & Apotheg. Laconicis. Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 40.

Ageſilaus called home through the device of Tithrauſtes.

At his departure he is reported to have ſaid, that the King expelled him Aſia by thirty thouſand Archers, wittily intimating the ſame number of Daricks ſtamped with the Effiges of an Archer, whereby he had procured the conſpiracy of the Græcian Cities againſt Lacedæmon.

69. Having paſſed the Helleſpont, and being come to Amphipolis, he received news of a Victory obtained by the Lacedæmonians about Corinth, whereupon he diſpatched Dercyllidas preſently back into Aſia, by theſe tidings to confirm the aſſociated Cities. In the mean time while he marched through Macedonia and Theſſalie towards the Straights of Thermopylæ, Conon the Athenian and Pharnabazus, Admirals of the Perſian Fleet, lay about Doryma a place in the Cherſoneſus, with about ninty Gallies, who having notice that the Enemies Fleet were about Gnidus, prepared themſelves for an engagement. Periarchus (or Periander) the Lacedæmonian Admiral weying Anchor ſailed from Gnidus with one hundred twenty Ships to Phyſens another place in the Cherſoneſus, and thence directed his Courſe ſtraight againſt the Kings Fleet, and at the firſt had the better of it, but the Perſian Gallies coming in a pace to the relief of their Friends, the Lacedæmonian confederates began to ſhift for themſelves. The Admiral thought it unſeemly and unworthy of the Spartan valour to run away, and therefore directed his Ship to the front of the Enemy, where firſt killing many of his Enemies, at length he was ſlain. Then the followers of Conon purſuing the Lacedæmonians to the Continent, took fifty Veſſels, and five hundred Men, the moſt part ſwimming to ſhore and ſaving themſelves; and the reſt of the Gallies with ſafety recovered Gnidus. By this Victory of Conon (who made uſe of the Kings Forces for the recovery of the Eſtate of his own Country) Athens and all Greece which heretofore were under the Lacedæmonian Yoake, again recovered their liberty. Diodorus placeth it in the ſecond year of the ninty ſixth Olympiad, when Diophantus was Archon at Athens; but Lycias in the year following, being under the government of Eubulides, and the eleventh of Artaxerxes.

Xenoph. ibid. Plutarch in Ageſilao. Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 4. Diodorus ad ann. 2. Olymp. 96. Corn. Nepos. in Conone.

Juſtin lib. 6.

Conon the Athenian obtaineth a Victory againſt the Lacedæmonians.

70. Pharnabazus and Conon for the improvement of this Victory, laboured with the Iſlands and Maritime Towns of Ionia, to revolt from the Lacedæmonians, which they effected, ſome caſting out the Garriſons, and maintaining themſelves in their antient liberty, others yielding unto Conon, only Dercyllidas lying at Abydus at the time of the Fight, retained that place, and Seſtos over againſt it, ſtill in hoſtility againſt the Perſians, though endeavoured alſo to be reduced. In the next Spring the two Perſian Generals invaded the Maritime parts of Laconia, which after they had waſted as they might, and now were about to return, Conon perſwaded the other to let him have the Navy, with which he ſaid he would ſail to Athens, and there build up again the long Walls, and the Piræus or Haven, than which he affirmed nothing could happen more diſagreeable to the Lacedæmonians. This he eaſily obtained, and Money alſo to rebuild the Walls, for which ſailing thither with eighty Gallies he took order; giving thoſe fifty Talents which he had received of Pharnabazus unto the Athenians.

Idem ut ſupra, & Plutarch in Apotheg. Laconicis.

Idem cum Diodoro Olymp. 96. ann. 3.

The Lacedæmonians having notice of this, being very fearful the Athenian State ſhould again recover it's antient power, ſent away Antalcidas to Teribazus another of the Perſian Lieutenants who governed Sardis, if poſſible to draw him to their Party, and reconcile them to the King. After this was known at Athens, they alſo ſent Conon and others to him, and with them joyned ſeveral other States, as the Bœotians, Corinthians, and Argives who were weary of the Power of the Spartans. Antalcides declared how thoſe that ſent him were ready to imbrace a Peace upon ſuch terms as the King pleaſed, for that they would no longer contend with him about the Greek Cities in Aſia, thinking it ſufficient, that the reſt which were elſewhere ſituated might be left to their own Laws and liberty: he alſo laboured earneſtly to render Conon ſuſpected to the King, alleging, that at the King's coſt he only promoted the Affairs of his own Country, ſeeking with his Forces to obtain as many Cities as he could for the Athenians, to whom under-hand he went about to reſtore Ionia and Æolia alſo. This offer concerning the leaving of the Greek Cities to the King's diſpoſal, ſo nearly concerned his affairs, that the other Ambaſſadors in no caſe admitting it, for private reſpects returned home, without any thing concluded of; and though Teribazus durſt not without Commiſſion joyn himſelf to the Lacedæmonians, yet gave he privately Monies to Antaclidas to enable them to build a Fleet, wherewithal to conſtrain their adverſaries to ſubmit to accommodation, and laying hold of Conon committed him to cuſtody, till ſuch time as going himſelf to the King he might know his pleaſure concerning theſe things.

Antalcidas ſent from the Spartans to Artaxerxes.

Iſocrat. in Panegyr. Æmil. Probus. in Conone. Diodorus ad Olymp.97. ann. 3.

71. Some have reported how Conon was carryed to the King, and by him put to Death, but others that he made an eſcape. Whilſt Teribazus was yet with the King, he ſent Struthas into Aſia the leſs, to take care of the Sea-Coaſts, who ſhewing himſelf very bitter againſt the Lacedæmonians for the Evils which the Provinces had ſuffered of Ageſilaus, and favourable upon that account to the Athenians, the Spartans ſent over Thymbro to make War upon him. He with eight thouſand men took Coreſſus the high Hill ſome five miles diſtant from Epheſus, whence he made excurſions into the King's Dominions; but Struthas lying not far from him with a great Power of Horſe, beſides Foot, at ſuch time as with a Party he was ranging about for Booty, fell upon him, killed him amongſt many others, and putting the reſt to Flight, took many; the other ſecuring themſelves where they might beſt do it. The year after the Lacedæmonians ſending Ecdicus to the aid of the Exiles of Rhodes with eight Ships, diſpatched away with him one Diphridas, with order to paſs into Aſia, there to gather up the remnant of the Forces, with which, and as many more as he could raiſe, he was to protect thoſe Cities which had received Thymbro, and to grapple with Struthas. He acted accordingly, and ſo ordered his Affairs, that he proved hard enough for Struthas, and amongſt other commendable actions took Priſoner Tigranes his Son in Law, as he was going with his Wife to Sardis, whom releaſing for a great Ranſom, he ſeaſonably made uſe of for the payment of his Soldiers.

Xenoph. ut ſupra.

Diodorus ad an. 2. Olymp. 97. Iſocrates in Evagora.

Artaxerxes looketh after Cyprus.

72. Whilſt theſe things paſſed betwixt Artaxerxes and the Common-wealth of Sparta, he was alſo imployed about the affairs of Cyprus which he ſtrove to get into his Hands. There was in that Iſland one Evagoras of great Birth (being deſcended from thoſe who firſt built Salamine the Principal City therein) who being lately expelled through a Sedition, returned with a little Force of Auxiliaries, and expelling Abdemon the Tyrian, who then had the Power over the City, and a great Friend of the King of Perſia, made himſelf King of Salamine, and within a ſhort time growing very Rich, gathered Forces, and by the help of his Son Protagoras ſubdued almoſt the whole Iſland. But the Amathuſians with the Solians and Citians ſtood out againſt him, and by their Ambaſſadors ſollicited Artaxerxes for Aid, accuſing Evagoras for the death of Agyres, who had been Confederate with the King, and offering him their help for the poſſeſſing himſelf of the whole Iſland. He being jealous of the growth of Evagoras, and conſidering how convenient this Iſland might be, by reaſon of its ſituation, for the promoting of his Affairs at Sea, by which eſpecially Aſia could be defended, reſolved to aſſiſt them, and diſmiſſing the Ambaſſadors to their content, gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coaſts to build Ships with all ſpeed, he himſelf travelling into the upper Provinces for the raiſing of a great Land Army.

Xenoph. ut ſupra.

Diodorus ad annum 2. Olymp.98.

Plutarch. in Artaxerxe.

Antalcidas concludeth a Peace with him.

73. Till he had compoſed matters with the Græcians, no conſiderable thing could he attempt upon Cyprus, and though they favoured the cauſe of Evagoras in oppoſition to him, yet their enmity one againſt another hindred that effect which their Union might have produced, to the great impairment of his Affairs. The Athenians ſent ten Ships to the aid of Evagoras; but it happening that Teleutias being ſent by the Lacedæmonians at that time to ſucceed Ecdicus in the Fleet, and to defend their Intereſt in Aſia, met with them, and intercepted them all, whereby it hapned that thoſe who were Enemies to Artaxerxes overthrew thoſe who went to make War againſt him. After this theſe two Commonwealths contending ſore with each other at Sea to their mutal damage, at length Antalcidas was ſent by the Lacedæmonians to the Government of the Fleet, becauſe they knew him to be in great Grace with Teribazus. He coming to Epheſus, left Nicolochus his Lieutenant, and according to his private inſtructions went with Teribazus to Artaxerxes about a Peace, towards whom he ſo behaved himſelf (to pleaſe him caſting off the Spartan Gravity, and not refuſing to dance before him) that the King, who before could not endure the Spartans, as counting them the moſt impudent of all men, imbraced him with ſingular Reſpect and Courteſie.

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 5. Diodorus & Plutarch. ut prius.

74. He concluded of a Peace with him for the Lacedæmonian State, in caſe the other Græcians would not conſent to ſuch overtures as the King made, and returned with Teribazus, who giving notice that all who could might accept of the Conditions which his Maſter propoſed, they diſpatched their ſeveral Deputies to him. He ſhewing them the King's Seals, opened the Letters wherein was contained, that Artaxerxes the King accounted it meet that the Cities in Aſia, and,

Iſlands Clazomenæ (ſince joyned to the Continent) and Cyprus, ſhould be under his Dominion: as for the other Greek Cities, both great and ſmall, that they ſhould be left to their own Liberty; except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scyrus, which having been ſubject to the Athenians time out of mind, he thought it reaſonable they ſhould ſo continue. Thoſe that ſhould not receive this Peace, he with the reſt who would embrace it, would proſecute with War to his utmoſt Power, both at Sea and Land. The Ambaſſadors went home, and made report of what was propoſed to the ſeveral Commonwealths, who grudged it much that the Cities of Aſia, for whoſe Liberty Ageſilaus had taken ſo much Pains, ſhould be ſo unworthily again betrayed. But being neceſſitated to ſubmit, they accepted of the Conditions; and the Peace was ſworn to at length by all Greece, in the ſecond Year of the ninty ſixth Olympiad, and the eighteenth Year of Artaxerxes. A. M. 3618.

A.M. 3618.

Diodorus l. 16. ad Olymp. 98. ann. 3.

75. Artaxerxes being thus freed from this tedious Controverſie with the Græcians, ſet himſelf to a preparation for the Wars of Cyprus, from which as yet he had been diverted. Evagoras by this time, through the aſſiſtance of Chabrias, whom the Athenians had ſent to his aid with eight hundred Peltaſts, and ten Gallies, had brought under the whole Iſland, having got together alſo a moſt numerous Army, whilſt the King was kept in play by the Græcians. For he entred into Society with Acoris King of Egypt, who furniſhed him with great ſtore of Money, and Hecatomnus the Viceroy of Caria underhand ſupplied him with ſome for the hiring of forein Souldiers; and the King of Arabia with others, who bore no good Will to Artaxerxes, ſent a great Power of Men. He had in a readineſs ninty Gallies, whereof twenty lay at Tyre in Phœnicia, which with other Cities he had got into his Hands, and the reſt anchored readily furniſhed before Cyprus. The King gathered together both his Land and Sea Forces, the former conſiſting of three hundred thouſand men, and the latter of three hundred Gallies. Over his Land Army he appointed General Orontes his Son-in-law, and Teribazus Admiral of his Navy, who taking up their Forces out of Phocæa and Cuma, marched down into Cilicia, whence paſſing over into Cyprus with great Induſtry they began the War.

Artaxerxes turneth his forces from the Græcians againſt Cyprus.

76. Evagoras having ſix thouſand Men of his own, many more Auxiliaries, and having hired a great Force of Strangers over and above, (Money being very plentiful with him) firſt with his Pinnaces well Armed ſet upon the Enemies Ships as they brought in Proviſions, whereof ſome he took, others he ſunk, or chaced away. Hereby it came to paſs, that no Commodities being imported into the Iſland, a great Dearth enſued in the Perſian Camp; and hereby a Mutiny of the Souldiers, eſpecially of the Mercenaries, who fell upon their Officers, and killed ſome of them. This put Glaus the Admiral upon a reſolution to Sail with the whole Fleet into Cilicia, whence he brought ſufficient ſupply; which Evagoras ſeeing, and conſidering his Navy to be far inferiour to the Perſian, he got ready other ſixty Ships, and procuring fifty more from Acoris (who readily furniſhed him with all things neceſſary for the War) he made up his Fleet two hundred Sayl. Then exerciſed he his Men often to prepare them for a Fight, and that to the terror of the Enemy who beheld it, and at length as the Perſian Fleet ſayled by Citium he fell upon it, taking ſome Veſſels, and ſinking others, but the Admiral and other Commanders ſtanding cloſe to their Tackling, a ſharp Conflict enſued, in which though Evagoras at the firſt prevailed, yet Glaus with all his Power, and with great earneſtneſs and Valour grapling with him, he was at length after great Loſs put to flight.

Getteth a victory at Sea againſt Evagoras.

77. The Perſians after this Victory muſtered all their Forces, both by Sea and Land at Citium, and preſently both ways laid Siege to Salamine. Now Evagoras, though he had had the better of it formerly in ſome Sallies out upon the beſiegers, cooled in his Courage after this Defeat. Though the Siege was very ſtraight and preſſing, yet reſolving to continue the War, he left his Son Pythagoras for the defence of the City, with full Authority, and departed by Night with ten Gallies into Egypt, where he laboured hard with Acoris the King, to perſwade him to carry on the War with him, and that with all his Power. He granted him ſome Money; but for that he was diſcouraged by the late Defeat, nothing according to his Expectation, ſo that returning, and finding the City very much ſtraightned and himſelf deſtitute of Succour, he was forced to ſend about an accommodation: Teribazus offered his conſent upon theſe Terms, that quitting all the Cities except Salamine, he ſhould for that pay a yearly Tribute to the King, and be at his Command as a Servant to his Lord; which though hard, he conſented Diodorus ad ann. 4 Olymp. 98.

ted to, except the laſt, thinking it a great Diſgrace to be at his back as a Servant, and more reaſonable to be ſubject to him as one King to another.

His Captains diſagree, and peace is made.

Iſocrates in Evagora.

78. Teribazus not admitting of this Exception, Orontes his Colleague, and emulator, accuſed him by ſecret Letters to the King, as well for other matters, as that having an opportunity ſufficient to take Salamine, he did not uſe it, but ſpent his time in Treaties with the Enemy; he farther laid to his charge privatly entring into Friendſhip with Lacedæmon ſending to conſult the Oracle about warring againſt the King, and eſpecially alluring the Officers by Honours, Gifts, and Promiſes. Artaxerxes believing theſe things, wrote back to Orontes to arreſt Teribazus, and ſend him preſently unto him, who accordingly ſent, earneſtly deſired to be brought to his Tryal, but being for the preſent committed to Priſon, and the King employed in the Caduſian War, his Judgment was ſtill delayed. In the mean time Orontes being now General with full Power and Authority in Cyprus, finding that Evagoras with great Courage ſtill held out, and that his own Souldiers taking ill the Impriſonment of Teribazus refuſed to obey him, ſent to Evagoras to treat of Peace, offering him the ſame Conditions he was formerly willing to admit of from Teribazus. He being thus delivered beyond Hope, concluded a Peace on theſe Terms; to pay a yearly Tribute for the Kingdom of Salamine, and as King, to be obedient to the King of Perſia. And thus the Cyprian War ended ten Years after the firſt preparation for it, and after it had been managed two Years. Artaxerxes after all this time, and the expence of fifty Talents, leaving Evagoras in effect, in the ſame Condition he was before.

Diodorus ut ſupra.

Gaus out of fear conſpireth with the Lacedæmonians againſt the King.

79. Gaus the Perſian Admiral, after this War, having married the Daughter of Teribazus, fearing, leſt becauſe of his Affinity, he ſhould be ſuſpected alſo by the King, and ſuffer upon that Account, reſolved for a prevention to fortifie himſelf againſt him, by entring into League with his Enemies. This he did preſently with Acoris of Egypt, and wrote to the Lacedæmonians to excite them to break the Peace, making large offers of what he could do for Greece. They had of late as before caſt in their Heads how to make themſelves Maſter of all Greece, and finding that they heard ill for the Peace concluded with Artaxerxes, in which the Intereſts of their Countrey-men were betrayed, they ſought for, upon a new advice, a fit opportunity to renew the War againſt the Perſians, and therefore now not unwillingly accepted of this Confederacy with Gaus.

Plutarch. in Artax. cum. Diodoro ad Olymp. 98. ann. 4.

Artaxerxes invadeth the Caduſians to no purpoſe.

80. At this time Artaxerxes made War upon the Caduſians, leading againſt them an Army of three hundred thouſand Foot, and ten thouſand Horſe. He caſt himſelf into great Straights marching into a Country uneven, rainy, and bringing no Corn, but nouriſhing only its Inhabitants with Pears, Aples, and ſuch like Fruits; ſo that finding there no Proviſion, and not able to come by it from elſewhere, the carriage Beaſts were killed for Meat, an Aſſes Head could ſcarce be bought for ſixty Drachms, the Kings ſet Meals were laid down, and very few Horſes remained; the reſt being all eaten up. Then Teribazus under diſgrace ſaved the King and his whole Army; for there being two Kings of the Caduſians, he himſelf went to one of them, and ſent his Son to the other, each of them ſignifying to him whom he went to, that his Colleague had ſent about a Peace to Artaxerxes, having left him out, wherefore his advice was, that they ſhould ſend with him Ambaſſadors to treat, and conclude a pacification firſt, which, being both deceived, they did, and a League was entred into by both apart. Then returned he homewards, and in the way, to give a good example to others, alighted from his Horſe, and with Quiver and Target upon him travelled on Foot over the Mountains, and rough places, and coming at length to a place called the Kings Inn, compaſſed with pleaſant Gardens and Groves, becauſe of the extremity of Cold, he gave leave to the Souldiers to cut down the Cypreſſes and other Trees, which becauſe they out of modeſty refuſed, he took an Axe, and himſelf cut down the moſt beautiful. But coming home, and upon ſence of his great loſs, both of Men and Horſes, ſuſpecting he was contemned for his ill Succeſs, he ſlew many of his principal Subjects, of whom he thought he had cauſe to be jealous.

81. The Caduſian War being finiſhed, he cauſed Teribazus to come to his Tryal, commending the matter to three of his moſt eminent Judges, who upon conſideration of what was alleged, pro and con, and of his former great Merits, abſolved him, to the ſatisfaction of the King, who then beſtowed on him the greateſt Honours, expunged the name of Orontes his falſe accuſer out of the Catalogue of his Friends, and caſt upon him the greateſt Ignominy. About the ſame time following herein the Example of Cambyſes his Predeceſſor, he cauſed certain Judges convicted of unjuſt Decrees to be flead alive, and their Skins ſpread over the Judgment Seat, where the reſt heard, and determined cauſes, that they might have a conſtant Memento before their Eyes.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 99. ann. 2.

Gaos ſlain.

Not long after Gaos the Perſian Admiral, who, as before was ſaid, had entred into Society with the Lacedæmonians, and the King of Egypt, whileſt he was managing his Revolt, was ſlain by ſome that cunningly laid in wait for him. One Tachos undertook the carrying on of his deſign, and fortifying himſelf with an Army, built a City in an high Rock upon the Sea, called Leuca, where was a Chapel dedicated to Apollo; but he dying a little after, great controverſie hapned about the place betwixt the Clazomenians and Cumæans (whereof the former obtained it) and thereby thoſe Rebellions in Aſia fell of themſelves, and the Lacedæmonians, thinking it beſt to intermeddle no more with Perſian matters, gave their minds wholly to eſtabliſh their Power in Greece, got into their Hands ſeveral Cities by one means or other, and not obſcurely ſought after the Empire of all Greece, contrary to the form of the League, made by the means of the Perſian King at the procurement of Antalcidas, amongſt all the Græcians, as Diodorus telleth us.

Idem ad Olymp. 100. ann. 4.

Acoris of Egypt ſtrengtheneth himſelf againſt Artaxerxes.

82. Acoris the King of Ægypt, who of late had entred into Society with Gaus, and before had given aſſiſtance to Evagoras againſt Artaxerxes, as one who laid claim unto his Kingdom, to ſtrengthen himſelf raiſed a great Army of Strangers, and for that he gave very good pay, and ſought otherways to diſerve well of Military men, many Græcians gave their Names and liſted themſelves in his Service. But wanting ſtill ſome famous and expert General, he procured Chabrias the Athenian, a man of great Command and no leſs Valour; though without the conſent of the People. Artaxerxes made Pharnabazus (now of late his Son in Law) the General of his Forces, who furniſhed with Money made great preparations for the War, and ſent to Athens to complain of Chabrias, who as he ſaid, by his Service to the Ægyptian, alienated the Kings Affection from that State; and deſired that they would ſend Iphicrates to be a Captain in his Wars. The Athenians being deſirous to have both the King and Pharnabazus their Friend, preſently recalled Chabrias, and gave order to Iphicrates to aſſiſt the Perſians.

Idem ad ann. 3. & 2. Olymp. 101.

Artaxerxes againſt him.

Pharnabazus and Iphicrates. ſent againſt Acoris.

83. Pharnabazus ſpent ſeveral Years in preparation for the War, of which Iphicrates being weary, told him he wondred, that he being ſo quick in ſpeaking ſhould be ſo ſlow in doing, to which he anſwered, that the reaſon was, that he himſelf was Maſter of his Words, but the King of his Actions. The Græcians were again fallen into civil Diſſentions, the former Peace being not long continued through the ambitious practices of the Lacedemonians; which Artaxerxes conſidering, and how needful their help was to him in this Egyptian Expedition, he ſent to mediate and take up their Differences, which they all liked well and accepted, except the Thebans. At length after three or four Years ſpent in preparation, the King's Forces were drawn down into Ace a Town of Syria, where being a general Muſter, there were found two hundred thouſand Barbarians, under the command of Pharnabazus, and twenty thouſand Greeks under the Enſigns of Iphicrates: the Navy amounted to the number of three hundred Gallies, beſides a great number of Veſſels of Burthen. In the beginning then of Summer they marched for Ægypt; the Fleet ſailing along the Coaſts, and coming near the Mouths of Nile, found the Ægyptians furniſhed ſufficiently for a War; warning enough having been given them by the delay of Pharnabazus, who (as other Perſian Generals) having not the full diſpoſal of things in his Power, was conſtrained to ſend to the King, to know his Pleaſure concerning particulars, whoſe anſwer not being quickly obtained at a great diſtance, procured much ſlowneſs in all Expeditions.

Idem ad Olymp. 101. ann. 3.

The Ægyptians defeated.

84. Nectanebis the King of Ægypt (for Acoris was now dead) ſent to ſpie out the number of the Perſian Army; but his chiefeſt hope was in the ſtrength of the Country, which was mightily fortified againſt any Invaſion, by the ſeven Mouths of Nile, whereof each was ſtrengthened with a Caſtle, and a wooden Bridge, to hinder the paſſage of any Ships up the River. But eſpecially he took care of Peluſium the readieſt paſſage from Syria, ſtopping up ſuch places as might be paſſed by Water, and drowning ſuch as gave acceſs by Land. Pharnabazus his Officers finding Peluſium ſo ſtrongly fortified, reſolved there was no paſſing there, and to carry the Fleet up to the Mendeſian mouth of the River, where landing three thouſand men, Pharnabazus and Iphicrates ſet upon the Caſtle. The Ægyptians brought in three thouſand Horſe and Foot to the relief of it, and thereby enſued a moſt ſharp encounter; but being at length overpow'red by the number of Perſians which coming in continually to the Fight, encompaſſed them; a great ſlaughter was made of them, and many taken alive. The reſt betaking themſelves to the Fort, Iphicrates his men brake in with them, took it, and razing it, carried the Defendants away Priſoners.

85. Iphicrates now underſtood by theſe Priſoners, that the Garriſon was called out of Memphis the ſtrongeſt City in Ægypt; whereupon he adviſed Pharnabazus with all ſpeed to Sail thither, before the Ægyptians ſhould have time to unite their Forces. Pharnabazus anſwered, he would firſt ſtay till all his Army arrived, by the which the taking of Memphis would be more eaſie; but the other replyed, that if he would but let him have all the Mercenaries in the Army, he would promiſe to reduce the City. Pharnabazus hereupon grew jealous of his Valour, and fearing he might thereby, with his Skill and Courage bring Ægypt into ſubjection, denyed him what he required; to which refuſal he oppoſed this ſolemn Proteſtation, that if the Perſians ſhould let ſlip out of their Hands this fair Opportunity, this Expedition through their Fault would prove ſucceſsleſs. Nothing being procured hereby but Hatred and ill Words, the Ægyptians by the means of this delay reinforced the Garriſon of Memphis, and with all their Forces came to the Fort which the Perſians had demoliſhed; where dividing their men into ſeveral parties, they ſet upon the Enemy, and prevailed ſo much upon him, that making great ſlaughters, the Perſian Generals, having ſpent much time about the Place, and now the Nile ſwelling, and beginning to overflow all the Grounds about them; leſt they ſhould ſeem to ſtrive with Nature it ſelf, reſolved to retreat out of the Country: And this was the fruit of ſo long a preparation, and ſo much Expence.

Emulation betwixt Pharnabazus and Iphicrates fruſtrateth their deſign.

86. Being returned into Aſia, the differences betwixt them brake out afreſh; inſomuch that Iphicrates fearing leſt he might be attached as Conon formerly had been, withdrew himſelf by Night, and returned to Athens. Thither Pharnabazus ſent after him, to accuſe him as guilty of the miſcariage of the Expedition, to which the Athenians anſwered, that if they found him guilty, they would puniſh him; but within a while they gave him the command of their Fleet. This year Nicocles the Eunuch ſlew Evagoras the King of Salamine, and ſeized on the Kingdom, according to Diodorus, who in no caſe is to be believed, as to the Author of the Paricide; for though it be confirmed by one (a) that he was killed by an Eunuch; yet it appeareth from another, that his name was Thraſydæus; ſeeing it is clear from Iſocrates, that Nicocles (to whom he wrote one Oration; another concerning the Office of a King, he ſtiled by his Name; and made a funeral one concerning Evagoras) was the very Son of Evagoras, and ſucceeded him in the Kingdom and is not to be reckoned amongſt Eunuchs.

(a) Ariſtot. Polit. lib. 5. cap. 10.
(b) Theopompus apud Photium Biblioth. num. 176.

87. The next Year, Artaxerxes underſtanding how Greece was ſhaken with inteſtine Broiles, which he ſtill looked upon as by it's help to recover Ægypt, ſent to compoſe the difference amongſt the ſeveral States. They all aſſented to his Offers, except the Thebans, who having a deſign to be Maſters of all Bæotia, would not enter with the reſt into the League, which the Lacedæmonians ill reſenting; and ſuſpecting their ambitious Practices for the dominion of all Greece, invaded them as the publick Enemies. Hereupon enſued a great and bloody Battel at Leuctra, in which the Thebans had the better, through the Conduct of Epaminondas, who ſo abated the Strength of the Spartans, that they ſent Ageſilaus their King into Ægypt, and Antalcidas to Artaxerxes, to deſire a ſupply of Money. But the King, either becauſe they ſought to his Rebels the Ægyptians, or upon ſome other account, ſlighted the Meſſage, and rejected Antalcidas, in ſo much that returning home, when he found that he was laughed at by his Enemies, and fearing the ſeverity of the Ephori, he ſtarved himſelf to death.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 102. ann. 1.

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 6. Plutarch in Artaxerxe.

88. Yet ſtill did the King endeavour to reconcile the Græcians, for that as long as they exerciſed mutual feud, he could not have any conſiderable ſupply from them. This Year on the former meſſage Philiſcus of Abydus was ſent to them, who procured both the Thebans and their Aſſociates, and the Lacedæmonians to meet at Delphos; but the controverſie reſting about Meſſene, and the Thebans refuſing to conſent that it ſhould be under the Lacedæmonians, the Treatie had again the ſame ſucceſs: which ſo offended Philiſcus, that he left two thouſand

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 7. Diodorus ad Olymp 102. ann. 4.

Soldiers he had hired to the Lacedæmonians, and returned into Aſia. The Thebans not long after having a Deſign to bring all Greece into ſubjection, and knowing their endeavours to be vain, except they made Artaxerxes their Friend, or at leaſt induced him to ſtand neuter, reſolved to ſend Ambaſſadors to him. Calling together then their Aſſociates, they pretended the thing to be neceſſary, becauſe Euthycles the Lacedæmonian was already there, and diſpatched away Pelopidas from themſelves, Antiochus from the Arcadians, Archidamus for the Eleans, and another for the Argives, which being known at Athens, they alſo ſent Timagoras and Leon from their State.

Xenoph. ibid.

89. Pelopidas found the moſt favour at the King's Hands, pleading (and not falſely) that the Thebans had only aſſiſted the Perſians at Platæa, and ſince that had never fought againſt that Kingdom; and that for this only cauſe were they invaded by the Lacedæmonians, becauſe they refuſed to follow Ageſilaus againſt the King, having alſo prohibited him to Sacrifize at Aulis, where Agamemnon Sacrifized when he paſſed into Aſia and took Troy. The late Victory of the Thebans at Luctra, and the Invaſion of the Lacedæmonians Territories, did not a little add to the eſteem of Pelopidas, who to inhance the renown of his Country, ſtuck not alſo to aver, that the reaſon why the Argives and Arcadians had of late been overthrown by the Lacedæmonians, was, becauſe the Thebans were not at the Battel. He obtained of the King, that Meſſene being exempted from the juriſdiction of the Lacedæmonians, ſhould be left to its own Liberty, and that the Athenians ſhould withdraw their Ships, or elſe War was to be made upon them, which being read to the publick Miniſters of the other Republicks, Leon the Athenian openly ſaid, that the Athenians muſt find out another Friend beſides the King, who replyed, that if they knew any more equal thing, they ſhould acquaint him therewith.

In Artax. & vide Ælian. var. Hiſt. lib. 1. cap. 21.

90. With Pelopidas was joyned in Commiſſion Iſmenias the Theban, as we have it from Plutarch. He being brought by Tithrauſtes a Colonel into the Kings Preſence, and commanded, according to the Cuſtom, to adore him, took off his Ring ſecretly from his Finger, and caſt it down at his Feet, and then ſtooping down to take it up, as he thereby ſatisfied the King, and obtained his requeſt; ſo he thought he provided ſufficiently for the credit of himſelf and Country. Timagoras the Athenian communicated by Letter ſome Secrets to Artaxerxes, for which he was rewarded with one thouſand Daricks, a coſtly Supper, and eighty Cows to find him with Milk for his Health; with a coſtly Bed and Furniture to it, and ſome Perſians that knew how to make it, the Greeks being accounted ignorant in theſe things. But returning home with the reſt of the Ambaſſadors he was put to Death; either becauſe he accepted of theſe Gifts, as Plutarch believed; or for that he adored the King after the Perſian manner, wherewith they counted their whole State to be reflected on, or (what is moſt likely) becauſe of this intercourſe betwixt him and Artaxerxes they queſtioned his Fidelity; his Colleague moreover impeaching him at their return for refuſing his Company, and imparting all the Secret of their Negotiation to Pelopidas.

Val. Max. l. 6. c. 3. exter. exemp. 2. Xenoph. ut prius.

Idem ibid.

91. After the return of the Ambaſſadors, the Thebans ſent for the Deputies of the ſeveral Cities, whom, when the Letters from the King were read, they commanded, all that would be accounted his and their Friends, to ſwear to the Contents of them. The Deputies anſwered, their Commiſſions were to hear, and not to take any Oath, which if they would exact from Cities, they muſt ſend to them. This they did, hoping that the particular States would not dare to refuſe the Society of the King and them; but the Meſſengers firſt coming to Corinth, and that City refuſing to Swear, the reſt followed their Example, and ſo this device of the Thebans came to nothing Then fell the Græcians into great Broyls again, making havock of the Territories, and Goods of one another, which Artaxerxes ſtill looking upon as againſt his deſign for the recovery of Ægypt, ſent once more and procured a Peace betwixt them, whereby the Laconick, or Bœotian War (as it was called) ended, after it had endured about five years from the firſt beginning, in the thirty ninth Year of Artaxerxes.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 103. ann. 3.

Idem ad Olymp. 104. ann. 3.

92. This Peace yet effected nothing on his behalf, the intereſts of the ſeveral States being at this time ſo contrary, that they preſently after broke out afreſh into civil Wars; and what Forces could be ſpared out of Greece, being not employed for, but againſt him. For, three or four Years after, the Maritime Parts of Aſia revolted from him, and Tachos now King of Ægypt made great Proviſion for the War, both by Land and Sea; and hiring many Soldiers out of ſeveral Republicks in Greece, drew alſo to his party the Lacedæmonians, who had conceived diſpleaſure againſt Artaxerxes, becauſe he made Meſſene to be comprehended in the general Peace. At the ſame time had he then to deal with the Ægyptians, the Greek Cities in Aſia, and the Lacedæmonians; and beſides them ſeveral of his Lieutenants in Aſia revolted; amongſt whom were Ariobarzanes of Phrygia (who had lately ſeized upon that Country after the Death of Mithridates) Mauſolus of Caria, a powerful Prince, having many ſtrong places, eſpecially Halicarnaſſus, in his Power; with whom joyned Orontes of Myſia, Autophradates of Lydia, and of the Ionian Race, the Lycians, Piſidians, Pamphylians, Cilicians: and beſides theſe the Syrians, Phœnicians, and almoſt all that bounded upon the Sea. The General Command over all was given to Orontes. By this ſo general a defection, half of the Tributes were withdrawn from the King; and the other half ſufficed not for warlike preparations.

Sect. 3.

A defection from Artaxerxes.

93. But Orontes having got the chief Command, and therewith received a years pay for twenty thouſand men, betrayed thoſe that had entruſted him with ſo great a Power. For, promiſing himſelf no ſmall matters from the King, he firſt ſent up to him thoſe that brought him the Money, and then betrayed many Towns, and a Band of Mercenaries to thoſe who were ſent from him for that purpoſe. At the ſame time things went in the ſame courſe in Cappadocia, accompanied with ſome memorable Circumſtances. Artabazus the King's General invaded that Country with a numerous Army, and Datames the Governour thereof, who had revolted, meeting him with a great Party of Horſe, and twenty thouſand Foot, pitched his Tents againſt him. The Captain of Datames his Horſe was his Father in Law, who to ingratiate himſelf with the King, and to provide for his own ſafety, having firſt agreed with Artabazus, by Night paſſed over with all his Troops unto him. But Datames not at all diſcouraged hereby, exhorted his Mercenaries to conſtancy, and promiſing them a large Donative, preſently led them againſt the Revolters, whom he fell upon, juſt as they were joyning with the Enemy, and with great Violence made great ſlaughter of both. Artabazus being ignorant of the matter, ſuſpected that the Revolters went about again to betray him, and return to Datames, and therefore gave order to his Souldiers to fall upon the Horſe approaching; whence Mithrobarzanes (for ſo was the Revolter called) being ſhut up in the midſt, whilſt one part laboured to repel the Traytor, and the other to be revenged upon him for his Treachery, was reduced into great Straights, and out of extreme deſpair made great Slaughter on both Sides, till at length having loſt ten thouſand men, the reſt were put to Flight by Datames, to whom ſome returned and asked Pardon; others betook themſelves to a place, whence being not able to ſtir they were kilſed, to the number of five thouſand men.

94. Whileſt theſe things were thus carried on, Rheomithres was ſent into Egypt to Tachos for aid, from whom obtaining five hundred Talents, and fifty Gallies, he returned to Leuca, a Citie in Aſia, where ſending for many of the Officers of the Revolters he laid Hands on them all, and ſent them up to the King, by which Treachery he reconciled himſelf unto him. Tachos by this time had prepared all things for the War, having obtained out of Greece two hundred Gallies, ten thouſand moſt valiant Souldiers, and out of Egypt it ſelf raiſed eighty thouſand Foot. Ageſilaus the King of Lacedæmon he alſo procured to come to him, promiſing him the Command of all his Forces. Upon the report of his landing, all ſorts of Preſents were diſpatched to him; but the Courtiers finding no Train, nor any thing of State about him, only an old Man, little of Stature, not at all trimmed, but with coarſe and old Cloathes, ſitting on the Shore upon the Graſs, they greatly deſpiſed him, and were ſeized with wonder at his poorneſs of Spirit, when they beheld how amongſt the Preſents, taking the Meal, Calves, and Geeſe to himſelf, he gave the ſweet Meats and Oyntments to be divided amongſt the Slaves. And Tachos himſelf gave him not the chief Command according to his Promiſe, deriding him for the ſmallneſs of his Stature, and ſaying, that the Fable was fulfilled in him, the Mountains are in Travel, and a Mouſe is brought forth; to which with Anger and Scorn he anſwered, that afterwards he ſhould have cauſe to think him a Lyon.

Xenoph. Plutarch. & Æmilius Probus in Ageſilao.

Tachos King of Egypt ſtrengtheneth himſelf.

Diod. & Plutarch.

95. With Tachos alſo was Chabrias the Athenian, though not ſent from the State as was Ageſilaus, but on his own account, who adviſed him wanting Treaſure, to command his richeſt ſort of Subjects to furniſh him with as much Money as they could ſpare, and he would repay them out of his yearly Tributes, which courſe he following got great ſtore of Money, and yet injured no man.

To

Sect. 3.

[illegible]

Nectanebus King of Egypt.

To him he committed his Fleet, to Ageſilaus the Conduct of the ten thouſand mercenary Gracians, to Nectanebus his Son (or rather the Son of his Brother, or Siſter, being called his Nephew;) reſerving to himſelf the command over all; and though Ageſilaus adviſed him rather to manage the War by his Lieutenants, and ſtay in Egypt, he ſayled into Phœnicia, the Spartan following him, though againſt his Dignity and Diſpoſition. Coming into Phœnycia, he ſent Nectanebus againſt the Cities in Syria, to whom came a meſſage from the Viceroy of Egypt left there by Tachos, ſignifying that he had revolted, and now invited him to ſeize upon the Kingdom; to which he conſenting, drew preſently to his party, all the Officers by gifts, and the Souldiers by large Promiſes. Tachos now being in fear of his own Servants, and Ageſilaus whom he derided, betook himſelf to Sidon, and thence to Artaxerxes, by whom he was curteouſly entertained, though not declared General in the Egyptian War, (and ſo by the help of Ageſilaus recovered his Kingdom) as Diodorus writeth.

Plutarch. Xenoph. Cornelius Nepos & Diodorus ut ſupra.

96. Another King beſides theſe two was made by the Egyptians of Mendeſium, of whom ten thouſand aroſe, and for him made War upon Nectanebus. The Caſe being ſuch, Ageſilaus took part with Nectanebus, whom he thought more to favour the Græcians, ~~took the other Priſoner, and confirmed him in the King~~dom, who importuning him to ſtay and winter with him, he refuſed, haſting homewards, for that he knew the Lacedæmonian State to be at this time ingaged in a War, deſtitute of Treaſure, and yet to keep Strangers in conſtant pay for want of their own men. Nectanebus when he would not ſtay, diſmiſſed him with great Gifts and Honours, giving him two hundred and twenty, or two hundred and thirty Talents for the maintenance of the War at home, with which taking Ship, he ſayled homewards, though in the midſt of Winter; making haſte, leſt through his abſence the State ſhould do nothing the next Summer; but being carried by Tempeſt into a deſert place, called the Haven of Menelaus, lying betwixt Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell ſick and died. His Friends laying his Corps in Wax, for want of Honey, carried it to Lacedæmon, where it was buried according to his worth and dignity.

Ageſilaus having ſerved him, in his return dieth.

Plutarch. in Artaxerxe, Juſtin. lib. 10.

Artaxerxes dieth, having before his death made Darius King, who plotting againſt him,

97. About the time of his Death died alſo Artaxerxes the King of Perſia, after he had reigned fourty three Years. He had one hundred and fifteen Sons, of which three only were legitimate; Darius, Ariaſpes, and Ochus, the reſt being begotten of Concubines, of which he kept three hundred and ſixty, with which yet he could not be contented without the addition of Atoſſa his own Daughter, his own Mother to pleaſe him, becoming a Bawd to his inceſtuous affections. When he was grown old, perceiving his Sons to ſtrive about the Succeſſion, and eſpecially Ochus (who although the youngeſt, hoped by the means of Atoſſa to procure the Kingdom of him) fearing leſt after his death he might do as his Uncle Cyrus had formerly done, contrary to the cuſtom of Perſia, which ordinarily admitted not of two Kings at the ſame time, he made Darius the eldeſt, now fifty years old, King, whilſt he lived, leſt his Death ſhould involve the Empire in civil Broils. It was the faſhion for him that was made King, to ask, and receive ſomething at the hands of him that made him, according to which Darius asked Aſpaſia to Wife, which formerly having been Concubine to Cyrus, Artaxerxes took, and afterwards married. He out of Indulgence to him firſt granted his requeſt, for that ſhe being a free woman, and no Slave, might chuſe whether ſhe would have him, and hoping ſhe would refuſe; but ſhe willingly accepting of the thing, and he then repenting of what he had raſhly promiſed, conſecrated her as a Nun to Diana, that ſhe might live for the remainder of her days a ſingle life. Darius hereby incenſed, through the provocation of Tiribazus, (who bore Artaxerxes malice for defrauding him of his Daughter Amiſtris, whom he promiſed to him, but married her himſelf) entred with fifty of his Brethren into a conſpiracy againſt the Life of his Father, and the Plot being revealed by an Eunuch, was put to death with his complices.

Is put to death.

Ochus his wicked Practices for the Kingdom.

98. Darius being removed out of the way, Ochus was more inflamed with a deſire of reigning, to which he was more incenſed by Atoſſa his Siſter. But he feared two of his Brothers; Ariaſpes legitimate, and the elder, and one Arſames, who though baſe born, and the younger, yet was much eſteemed for his Wiſdom, and eſpecially beloved by his Father. Both of them he reſolved to deſtroy; the former by his cunning, and the latter by down-right cruelty; for he hired ſome who never ceaſed to tell Ariaſpes, as a great Secret, that his Father was reſolved to make him away by a cruel, and ſhameful Death, and ſo often inculcating it unto him as ſpeedily to be done, drove him to that fear and deſperation that

Sect. 4.

that he poyſoned himſelf, Artaxerxes mourned for him, but knowing the kind of his death, and ſuſpecting the cauſe, yet through extreme Age was unable to ſearch into the matter and find it out: only he imbraced Arſames more affectionatly than ever, and not obſcurely ſignified that he only could truſt, and rely upon him. Ochus judging then that no delay was to be uſed, procured Harpates the Son of Teribazus (who fell in the Treaſon of Darius) to murder him. Artaxerxes was already ſo ſpent with Age that he ſeemed to want but the leaſt furtherance to his Death, ſo that word being brought him of the death of Arſames, he was not able to bear it, but died Heart-broken with Sorrow, after he had lived ninty four Years, in the forty third of his Reign; in the third of the one hundred fourth Olympiad. A. M. 3644. about three hundred and ſixty before the Birth of Chriſt. He was eſteemed mild and loving towards his Subjects, which Opinion was mightily confirmed by the Cruelty and Paricide of his Succeſſor.

SECT. IV.

From the Death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the beginning of Ochus, to the Death of Darius Codomanus, Containing the ſpace of thirty two Years.

Diodorus.

Ochus ſucceedeth.

Jacobus Cappellus, alii.

Eſther's Huſband.

1. OChus Succeeded his Father, after whom he was alſo named Artaxerxes, and whoſe Name the Perſians put upon his Succeſſors for a memorial of his mild and proſperous Government. Some think him by the Perſians to have been called Ochoſueros, or Achoſueros; and that he is to be taken for that Acheſuerus, or Ahaſuerus the Husband of Eſther, mentioned in Scripture, who by the ſeventy, and Joſephus after them, is named Artaxerxes. Some have thought Cambyſes to have been the Man, but he reigned only ſeven Years, whereas above twelve are given to Ahaſuerus. Neither could Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes be he, if the Jews with others rightly accounted the Book of Eſther to have been the laſt in Order of all the Canonical Scripture of the Old Teſtament, and for that Vaſhti his Wife is thought to be Atoſſa, the Daughter of Cyrus, it cannot be, becauſe he never put away Atoſſa, on whom he begat Xerxes, and although ſome plead hard for Xerxes becauſe his Wife is called by Herodotus, Ameſtris, which they take in the Perſian Tongue to be only Ham-Eſther; yet 'tis apparent out of the ſame Author, that ſhe was the Daughter of Otanes a Perſian Satrapa, by Religion an Heathen, and of a moſt cruel Diſpoſition. Beſides, Ahaſuerus in the ſeventh Year of his Reign was at Suſhan; but Xerxes in the ſeventh of his Reign was abſent in the War with Greece, and though the Greeks corrupted forein Names, and might call Xerxes him, whom the Perſians named Artachſaſta, or Artachas-ta, yet not one in his own Language called Achoſchveroſch. Neither is it probable that Longimanus could be the man, who is both in Sacred, and prophane Story called Artach-ſaſta, and Artaxerxes; but no where Achaſuerus. The ſame may be ſaid of Nothus, who both by Nehemiah and Greek Writers is called Darius, and of Artaxerxes Mnemon, concerning whoſe Wife Statira, ſuch things are written as can neither agree with Vaſhti nor Eſther. Now if that of Eſther be the laſt Canonical Book; and Nehemiah lived to the time of Darius Nothus, then is it probable, that Eſther lived in the Reign of his Son, or Grand-ſon, and cannot ſo conveniently be aſſigned for a Wife to any as to Ochus.

Polyænus Stratagem. lib. 7.

2. Ochus knowing of how great Authority his Fathers Name was to his Subjects, and how contemptible he ſhould be after his Death was known, procured of the Eunuches, Chamberlains and Colonels to conceal for ten Moneths, and in the mean time ſending about the Royal Seal, commanded in his Father's name, to proclaim Ochus King. When all owned, and obeyed him as King, he then confeſſed his Fathers Death, and commanded a general Mourning, according to the cuſtom of Perſia, and preſently taking away all Competition, filled (a) the Court with the Blood of his Kindred, and Relations, no regard being had, either to Sex or Age. Amongſt the reſt he put to death his (b) Siſter Ocha, being alſo his Mother-in-law, with cruel Torments, and his Uncle with his two Sons and Nephews, he cauſed to be ſet in an empty place, and killed with Darts, who ſeemeth well to have been Father to Siſigambis (Mother to Darius the laſt Perſian King) whoſe eighty Brethren together with their Father, Curtius reporteth to have been murdered by Ochus.

(a) Juſtin. lib. 10.
(b) Valerius Max. lib. 9. cap. 2. Ext. ex. 7.

Lib. 10. cap. 8.

3. From Ochus revolted Artabazus, againſt whom were ſent ſome of the Perſian Satrapaes with ſeventy thouſand men, and yet by the help of Chares the Athenian he overthrew them, and rewarded Chares with a great ſumm of Money, which he laid out in the paying of his Souldiers. Ochus knowing of this, expoſtulated ſeriouſly with the Athenians about it, who hearing that he intended with three hundred Ships to aſſiſt their Enemies (with whom they were now ingaged in the ſocial War) preſently clapt up a Peace with them. Artabazus being forſaken of the Athenians, betook himſelf to the Thebans, who ordered Pammenes with five hundred men to paſs over into Aſia to aſſiſt him; by whoſe help Artabazus again overthrew the King's Forces ſent againſt him in two great and bloody Battels, which got no ſmall Credit to Pammenes, and his Bœotians. Yet a few Years after, when the Thebans were ingaged in the Phocian War, and reduced to extremity for want of Money, they ſent to Artaxerxes Ochus, and obtained of him three hundred Talents, which he granted as it ſeemeth to put an obligation upon them to aſſiſt him in the War, which he renewed againſt the Egyptians.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 106. ann. 1. & 4.

Artabazus revolteth from him.

Idem ad Olymp. 107. ann. 2

4. Although Egypt had long before this revolted from the Perſian Empire, yet Ochus not at all affecting War had kept himſelf quiet; for, having ſent ſome Armies thither, by the Treachery, or ignorance of their Captains, they miſcarried, ſo that having ſeveral times badly ſped, though deſpiſed on that account by the Egyptians, yet being a lover of his eaſe and quiet he ſubmitted to the Diſgrace. But now at this time (about the eleventh Year of his Reign) the Phœnicians and Cyprians taking Heart, and rebelling alſo, he reſolved to chaſtiſe them all with Arms, and that in his own Perſon; and making great Proviſion of all things for the War, raiſed three hundred thouſand Foot, thirty thouſand Horſe, and three hundred Gallies, beſides Veſſels of Burthen. The firſt Tempeſt of the War fell upon Phœnicia, which revolted upon this Occaſion. A famous Citie there was therein named Tripolis, conſiſting, according to it's Name, of three Cities diſtant a Furlong from each other, and inhabited by Tyrians, Sidonians, and Arcadians, in which the aſſembly General of the Phœnicians met and reſolved of their moſt important affairs. Herein the Perſian Satrapaes and Ambaſſadors, behaving themſelves very uncivilly, and abuſing the Sidonians, they thereupon reſolved to rebel, and perſwading the other Phœnicians to ſide with them for the obtaining of their Liberty, ſent to Nectanebus King of Ægypt to deſire him to receive them into Confederacy againſt Ochus. Then to begin their Hoſtility they cut down the Paradiſe wherein the Kings of Perſia, when they came that way, uſed to divert themſelves; burnt the Hay which the Satrapaes had gathered for uſe in War, and puniſhed ſuch Officers as by whom they had been abuſed.

He invadeth Phœnicia.

5. Ochus having notice of this, longed to be revenged of all the Phœnicians, but eſpecially of them of Sidon; and gathering his Forces together at Babylon, ſet out thence againſt them. In the mean time whilſt he was on his way, the Preſident of Syria and Mazeus Governour of Cilicia, with joynt Forces fell upon the Phœnicians; but Tennes King of Sidon, having received out of Ægypt a ſupply of four thouſand Græcians, over which Mentor the Rhodian was General, with them and his Citizens together, fell upon the Satrapaes, worſted, and expelled them out of Phœnicia. Whilſt things were thus carried there; another War aroſe to the Perſians out of Cyprus, wherein were nine Cities of good account, having the leſſer Towns in their Subjection, and each of them a King; but all Subjects to the Perſian, all which now, imitating the Phœnicians, revolted. Ochus receiving tidings hereof, wrote to Adrieus Prince of Caria (who being newly come to the Government, was by the tenure of his Principallity a Friend and Aſſociate in War to the Perſian Empire) to provide Forces both for Sea and Land againſt them, who accordingly with great expedition making ready forty Gallies and eight thouſand Mercenaries, ſent them into Cyprus, under the conduct of Phocion, the Athenian, and Evagoras, who heretofore had held the Iſland as King. Theſe two landing their Men, laid cloſe Siege to Salamine both by Land and Sea, and the Iſland having been quiet of late, and for that reaſon abounding with Riches, great numbers flocked out of deſire of Plunder from Syria and Cilicia, inſomuch that the number of the Beſiegers was doubled. Hereupon all the other Cities ſubmitted themſelves; only Protagoras held out ſtill, and Evagoras thought by force to re-inveſt himſelf of that Kingdom, devolved upon him from his Anceſtors: But at length Protagoras alſo ſubmitting, obtained Salamine ſtill; and Evagoras contented himſelf with a large Dominion given him in Aſia, which ill governing, he fled again into Cyprus, and there taken was put to death.

UMI

Mentor the Rhodian offereth to betray Sidon to him.

6. The King was on his March towards Phœnicia, when Mentor the Rhodian underſtanding what ſtrength he had, and how unable the Rebels were to make reſiſtance, ſent one to him privately, offering to betray Sidon into his Hands, and to do him eſpecial Service in the Conqueſt of Ægypt, being very well skilled in that Country and the River. Ochus not only offered him indemnity, but a large reward, if he would perform what he promiſed, and placing his greateſt Felicity in the recovery of Ægypt, ſent to the chiefeſt of the Græcian States, to deſire aid. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſignified their deſire to retain Amity and a good Correſpondence with him, but at preſent could yield him no aſſiſtance; but the Thebans ſent him one thouſand men, the Argives three thouſand, and the Greeks in Aſia willing to ſhew their readineſs, furniſhed him with ſix thouſand. Before their arrival the King was got into Phœnicia, and ſate down not far from Sidon, which the Inhabitants had by this time ſtrongly manned within, and fortified with a threefold large Ditch, and high Walls, beſides a Fleet of one hundred Gallies. For they exceeded by far all their Neighbours in Riches.

Tennes King of Sidon joyneth with him, and yet put to death by Ochus.

Sidon taken and burnt by the Inhabitants.

7. But Tennes their King had aſſociated himſelf with Mentor to betray the City, whom leaving therein with command of a Part thereof for the better carrying on of the Treachery, he himſelf with five hundred Soldiers went out, pretending to go to the publick convention of the Phœnicians, having with him one hundred of the prime Citizens as his Counſelors. Theſe he brought ſtraight to Ochus, who put them all to death as Authors of the Rebellion, and after them five hundred more, who came as Suppliants with Olives in their Hands, after he had underſtood from Tennes that the City ſhould be ſurrendred to him without any Conditions, thereby to ſtrike a Terror into the other Towns. After this, Tennes eaſily prevailed with the mercenary Ægyptians to let him and the King into the Town, which being done, and Ochus having it in his Power, judging him now to be of no uſe to him, he commanded him alſo to be ſlain. The Sidonians before the King approached had burnt all their Ships, leſt any private Perſon ſhould convey himſelf away during the Siege. Now ſeeing themſelves betrayed, and their City full of the Enemy which ſwarmed on every ſide, they ſet fire to their Houſes, and therein burnt themſelves with their Wives and Children, ſo that (accounting Slaves) above forty thouſand are thought to have periſhed in the Flames. The King ſold the Rubbiſh thereof for many Talents, much Gold and Silver being found therein, becauſe it had flouriſhed with great Riches. By this Tragedy of Sidon the other Cities being terrified, yielded themſelves unto the Perſian.

Ochus invadeth Ægypt.

8. The (a) Auxiliaries out of Greece being come to Ochus after the taking of Sidon, he ſet forward with his whole Army towards Ægypt, (b) taking Jericho a City of Judæa (as it's probable) in his way, and drawing many Jews along with him in his Expedition. Coming (c) to the Lake Sirbonis, he loſt part of his Army in the Whirlpits and Bogs, through ignorance of the place, and at length arrived at Peluſium the firſt frontier-Town, which was held with a Gariſon of one thouſand Men. Now the King divided the Græcian Forces into three Bodies, and over each conſtituted a Captain of their own Nation, and joyned a Perſian with him: the other Forces he kept in his own Command, being greatly intent about the main buiſneſs. On the other ſide Nectanebus was not a whit diſcouraged, having in pay twenty thouſand Græcians, and as many Africans, beſides ſixty thouſand of his own Ægyptians, and an innumerable Company of Boats for the River. But by his Conceitedneſs and want of Skill he miſcarried, ried, having formerly proſpered whilſt he uſed the Conduct of the Græcian Captains, but now his Fortune changing upon his ſole managing the War, for which he thought himſelf ſufficiently able. After then he had fortified his Garriſons, with thirty thouſand Ægyptians, five thouſand Greeks, and half of the Africans, he ſeized upon ſuch places, as were moſt advantagious for paſſage into the Country.

(a) Diodorus ad Olymp. 107. ann. 3.

(b) Solinus cap. 35. Ariſteus de 70. Interp.

(c) Diodorus ibid.

9. Things ſtanding thus betwixt them, Nicoſtratus the Captain of the Argives getting ſome Ægyptians for Guides, paſſed with the Fleet through a Ditch, and in a place ſomething remote and out of ſight landed his men, and pitched his Tents; which being known by the Garriſon, a party iſſued out, and fell upon them; but the Græcians after a ſharp conteſt, ſlew their Captain, and of them about five thouſand men. Nectanebus upon report made of this Defeat was greatly diſcouraged, fearing all the reſt of the Perſian Army might be eaſily tranſported, and ſuſpecting leſt the Enemy ſhould bend his utmoſt ſtrength againſt Memphis the Metropolis, was eſpecially concerned for it, and with that party which accompanied him returned thither. In the mean time Lacrates the Theban, General and principal of the Græcian Captains drained the Chanel by cutting a Ditch, and paſſing over his Soldiers, raiſed a Battery againſt Peluſium, by which the Walls being much broken, the defendants raiſed ſtill Palliſadoes in the place, and the Græcians within ſtoutly defending the Fort, a great Conteſt hapned for ſeveral days. But as ſoon as they heard of the Kings departure, they deſired a Parley, and Lacrates interpoſing an Oath, that upon yielding of the place, they ſhould depart with ſuch things as they brought out of Greece, they preſently yielded. Then Artaxerxes ſent Bagoas an Eunuch of great authority with him, with a party of Barbarians to take poſſeſſion of Peluſium, who meeting the Græcians took from them many things contrary to the agreement. This they received in great diſdain, and called upon their Gods as Witneſſes of the Oath, which to keep Lacrates fell upon the Barbarians, put them to flight with the loſs of ſome, and defended his Country-men, for which being accuſed by Bagoas, the King defended what he had done, and puniſhed the Authors of the Violence.

10. Peluſium being taken, the other Towns were eaſily reduced by this ſtratagem of Mentor the Rhodian, the third Captain of the Græcians. Theſe places being held by Garriſons conſiſting of two ſorts of Nations, Græcians and Ægyptians, he cauſed this Rumor to be ſpread abroad, that Artaxerxes had reſolved to deal mildly with all thoſe who ſhould deliver up any Towns, but ſuch as ſhould withſtand him, he would proſecute with as great ſeverity as the Sidonians; and he gave in charge to the Sentinels to let as many Citizens go out as would. By this means this report was preſently ſpread all over Ægypt, and thereupon mutinies followed betwixt the Strangers and Natives in every Garriſon, each endeavouring firſt to betray their truſt, and gain credit of the Conquerours by their ſpeedy Treachery. Accordingly when Mentor and Bagoas laid Siege to Bubaſtis, the Ægyptians ſecretly ſent to the latter to yield to him the Town upon ſecurity of a free diſmiſſion. The Græcians ſuſpecting the matter, purſued the Meſſenger, and getting from him the whole truth, in a great rage fell upon the Ægyptians, whereof ſome they ſlew, others they wounded, and drove the reſt into a corner of the Town. The Ægyptians ſignified this to Bagoas, and deſired him with all ſpeed to come and take poſſeſſion of the Town, and in the mean time a Meſſenger was ſent to Mentor from the Græcians, who adviſed them as ſoon as Bagoas ſhould enter the Town to fall upon the Barbarians. As ſoon therefore as part of his Soldiers with him was entred, they ſhut the Gates, and killing all the Soldiers, took Bagoas himſelf Priſoner.

11. Bagoas (a) ſeeing his only hope to be in Mentor, earneſtly beſought him to be the means of his deliverance, promiſing him to do nothing for the future without his approbation, who procuring his releaſe, and having the Town delivered up into his own Hands, as he got the credit of the enterpriſe, ſo ingaged he Bagoas to him, who entred by Oath into Friendſhip and endearedneſs, which he alſo kept to the laſt, and by which Union they both became afterwards the moſt powerful of all the King's Officers. After the ſurrender of Bubaſtis, the other Cities made their Peace, but Nectanebus lying at Memphis, and ſeeing what Progreſs the Enemy made in his Conqueſt, would not endanger his perſonal ſafety for a Kingdom, but packing up all his Treaſures got him away into Æthiopia. Then became Artaxerxes Maſter of all Ægypt, and demoliſhing the Walls of the greater Towns, ſpoyled the Temples, and got much treaſure. He carried away the Writings of the Prieſts, which afterwards Bagoas reſtored to them for a great ſum of money, he (b) derided Apis and all their gods, and for that the Ægyptians had for his dulneſs (c) called him an Aſs, he ſacriſiſed Apis being taken by violence, to an Aſs, making his fleſh alſo be dreſſed up for meat. Then rewarded he the Græcians with great munificence, according to their particular merits, and making Phærendates Satrapa of Ægypt, he returned laden with glory and ſpoyl unto Babylon, taking (d) in his way a great number of Jews captive, of whom ſome he placed at Babylon, and others in Hyrcania upon the Caſpian Sea.

(a) Diodorus ut ſupra.

Nectanebus flieth out of Ægypt.

(b) Sulp. Severus Hiſt. Sacr. lib. 2.
(c) Ælian. var. Hiſt. lib. 4. c. 8.
Suid. in Ocho.
(d) Oroſius l. 3. cap. 7. quære Diodorus ad Olymp. 107. ann, 4.

12. Ochus rewarded Mentor the Rhodian with one hundred talents of ſilver, and much coſtly houſholdſtuff, and making him governour of the Coaſts of Aſia, gave him full power to make war upon his Rebels. He uſed his power moderately towards Artabazus and Memnon, who formerly had revolted, and now were fled to Philip King of Macedonia: thoſe he reconciled to the King, and ſent for them both with their Families; for Artabazus had by the Siſter of Mentor and Memnon eleven Sons and ten Daughters, by which number Mentor being much affected, not onely procured him his pardon, but preferred by degrees all the youths to honourable command in the Army. After this promiſe of pardon he allured Hermias the Eunuch Governour of Atarnus into his hands, whom caſting into priſon, he took his Ring and therewith ſigned letters, wherein was commanded in his name, that ſuch as had command of any Caſtles or Towns ſhould deliver them up into the hands of the bearers, which was accordingly done, and then ſent he Hermias up to the King, who cauſed him to be hanged, Ariſtotle the Philoſopher and Xenocrates the Chalcedonian, (whom he had ſent for to him) made their eſcape out of ſuch places as the Perſians had got into their hands. Afterwards Mentor either by force or policy, reduced all ſuch Captains as had revolted.

Idem ibid.
*Polyænus. lib.*6.
Strabo lib. 13.

Philip King of Macedonia oppoſed by Ochus.

13. Philip the ſon of Amyntas at this time reigning in Macedonia, grew very potent, and beſieged Perinthus, a Town in Thrace, ſituate upon the Propontis, with thirty thouſand men, and very ſtrong proviſion for War; ſo that he ſtraightly preſſed the inhabitants, giving them no reſt through his continual attempts. This Artaxerxes Ochus taking notice of, and being very jealous of his ſudden growth, commanded the Satrapaes of the Maritime Coaſts of Aſia to relieve the Perinthians as effectually as might be, which they ſo perfomed as he miſſed of his deſign; and this afterwards was objected as a ſufficient cauſe, amongſt others, for the invaſion of Aſia.

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*109. *ann.*4.

Affairs of Judæa in the time of Ochus.

14. In the reign of Ochus, as ſome think, hapned thoſe things which are *ſaid to have been done in Judæa, during the reign of Artaxerxes, and to have given an occaſion of impoſing a Tribute upon that Countrey. After the death of Eliaſhib the Prieſt, his ſon John ſucceeded him in his Office according to his birthright, who had a brother named Joſhua. This Joſhua being in great favour with Bagoſes, the Kings General, had a promiſe from him that he ſhould have the Prieſthood, by which he was ſo heartned as to ſtrive with John in the Temple, and ſo far provoked him as he ſlew him there. Bagoſes hearing this, endeavoured to enter the Temple, and when he was forbidden asked if they counted him more impure than the Carkeſs that lay within, and getting in by force, took thence occaſion to puniſh the Jews ſeven years for the death of Joſhua. For two Lambs being dayly offered in the conſtant ſacrifices, he impoſed upon every one a Tribute of fifty drachms, which amounted to the yearly rate of ſixty Attick Talents. But if theſe things hapned in the time of this Artaxerxes, and he be taken for Ahaſuerus, then muſt this murther have been committed towards the beginning of his reign, and this Tribnte of ſeven years been exacted before Mordecai the Jew came in favour, which was after the fall of Haman, in the twelfth year of Ahaſuerus,

* Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 11. *cap.*7.

15. During the reign of Ochus, in his ninth dear, died Mauſolus the petty King of Cariia, more famous after his death than whileſt living, to whom his wife Artemiſia ſucceeding, becauſe he left no Children, burned with ſuch affection towards him, that reducing his bones and aſhes into pouder ſhe drunk it, deſiring to become a quick and breathing monument of her husband. She propoſed great rewards to ſuch Orators as would ſpeak eloquently in his commendation, in which did ſeveral notable men of that time. For the preſervation of his memory ſhe raiſed ſuch a monument as deſerved to be reckoned amongſt the ſeven wonders of the World, and in the work whereof the moſt exquiſite artificers that then could be found were employed. Scopas on the

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*106. *ann.*4.
Strabo lib. 14.
Gellius lib. 10. *cap.*18.

Mauſolus his monument.

Eaſt part, Bryaxes on the North, Timotheus on the South, and Leochares on the Weſt, who notwithſtanding Artemiſia died of melancholy before the work was compleated, yet proceeded to the finiſhing of it, intending it as a monument, not onely of Mauſolus (upon which account the * Romans called their moſt exquiſite pieces of Architecture Mauſolea) but alſo of the excellency of their Art; to tranſmit their own names as well as his poſterity.

*Plinius lib.*36. *cap.*5.

* Pauſan. in Arcadicis.

16. Bagoas had riſen to that power with Ochus, that he ruled all things at his pleaſure, the King doing nothing without his conſent. Yet either misboubting of his ſecurity through the cruel diſpoſition of the King, or willing to have a greater power, owing Ochus alſo ſome diſpleaſure for killing the Egyptian God Apis (he belonging to that Countrey) he poyſoned him by the means of a Phyſician, after he had reigned twenty three years. Being dead, he caſt him to the Cats to be devoured, another being buried in the Royal Sepulchre, in his ſtead, and that he might expreſs his cruel diſpoſition, of his Thigh-bones he cauſed ſword hilts to be made. In his ſtead he made King his youngeſt ſon Arſes, killing all his other ſons, that the new King being deſtitute of kindred and friends, might yeild the more obedience to himſelf. In reality he now reigned, uſurping all, except the meer Title; but Arſes beginning to look to himſelf, when he had ground to ſuſpect that he intended to call him to an account for his wickedneſs, he made him away alſo with all his Children in the third year after he had ſet him up.

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*111. *ann.*2.
*Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib.*6. *cap.*8.

Bagoas killeth Ochus, and ſetting up Arſes maketh him away within a while.

17. All the Children of Arſes periſhing with him, and the Royal family thereby being deſolate, Bagoas made choice of one (a) Codomannus his friend, and placed him in the Throne, whom ſome Authors would have not at all to be deſcended of the Royal line, being a Carrier of Letters, but others make him the ſon of Arſames (brother to Ochus) by Siſygambis his ſiſter, according to the cuſtom of the Perſian marriages. Whileſt he was a private man in the Caduſian War he ſhewed himſelf valiant, killing an Enemy, who challenged any one of Ochus his Army to a ſingle Combat, and thereby for the preſent procuring great rewards, honour, and the Government of Armenia, after Arſes his death came to be remembred by the people, which made choice alſo of him for their King, and that nothing of Royal Majeſty might be wanting to him gave him the name of Darius. Not long after his perferment Bagoas repented him of what he had done, and being much verſed in King-killing, provided a potion to ſend him, after Ochus and Arſes, which he having notice of, called him to him, and in a pleaſant humor offered it to himſelf to drink, and thereto compelled him, ſatisfying the people ſufficiently in that he thus requited him, who ſought the ſame way to entrap him

Darius Codomannus.

(a) Diodorus. Strabo lib. 15. & Plutarch. in Alexand. alibi, Diodorus, Arrianus, Curtius.

Juſtin. lib. 10.

*Curtius lib.*6. *cap.*6.

18 By this Darius was ſent into Samaria, as a Satrapa, Sanballet, a Cuthæan by birth, and ſo of the ſame Original the Samaritans themſelves were. He thinking it good policy to procure Amity with the Jews, his Neighbours, married his daughter Nicaſo to Manaſſes the brother of Jaddus the High Prieſt.

Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 11. cap. 7.

19. Darius with the Empire of Perſia was neceſſitated to eſpouſe a quarrel with the greateſt Monarch then known in the World except himſelf, and with ſuch a people in combination with him, as eaſily excelled all others in Military skill and valour. The quarrels which hapned betwixt the Perſians and Græcians had been many, and as many bickerings and conteſts in the field had enſued thereupon, wherein as the Greeks both at home and abroad had conſtantly had ſucceſs agreeable to their dexterity, ſo each foil of the Perſians gave as great a ſtroak to their credit, inſomuch as they were ſlighted by the other, eſpecially after the retreat of thoſe that aſſiſted Cyrus, who in deſpight of all Artaxerxes could do, marched through the midſt of his Territories as Conquerours, and having ſeen the great riches of thoſe Countreys through which they paſſed, carried home a longing deſire after them, and an indignation that ſuch things ſhould be enjoyed by thoſe who ſeemed not in capacity to defend them.

Together with his Kingdom eſpouſeth a quarrel with the King of Macedonia.

20. The diſadvantage of the Perſians was the riſing of the Kingdom of Macedonia, to that high pitch of greatneſs to which it had been of late advanced by the abilities of Philip the preſent King, who though he might have pretended a cauſe where none was, yet there was ſome occaſion of offence given him, though but counted a neceſſary allay to his riſing fortune ſo terrible to the Perſian Empire: For when with great preparations he had beſieged Perinthus a Citie of Thrace, Ochus gave order to his Lieutenants to aſſiſt the beſieged, which was ſo powerfully done, as his deſign miſcarried. Yet he having brought all Greece to his beck, and eſtabliſhed his intereſt ſufficiently in Europe, reſolved upon on Aſia, and aſſembling the eſtates at Corinth, procured himſelf to be declared General of all Greece for the Perſian War; for which he made mighty preparations, impoſing a certain number of Souldiers upon every Citie. The next Spring he ſent over as before him into Aſia three Captains, Parmenio, Amyntas, and Attalus, under pretence of freeing the Greek Cities there, which hapned the ſame year that Arſes died, and he lived himſelf not long after, being ſtabbed by one Pauſanias, as he was ſolemnizing the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus. Hereupon Darius, who before ſtudied how to turn the War into Macedonia, thought himſelf ſecure, deſpiſing the youth of Alexander his ſon and Succeſſor, who exceeded not the age of twenty years.

*Vide Arrianum lib.*1. *pag.*41.

21. But Alexander being a young man of a great and reſtleſs ſpirit, and of wiſdom and valour far above his age, overcame all difficulties both in Greece and Aſia, which his Enemies had raiſed (getting himſelf to be choſen in a little time General of the one, as his father had been, and in the other ſuppreſſing betimes the ſedition of the Army of Attalus, by taking of him out the way) and moſt vehemently burnt with a deſire of the Conqueſt of the Perſian Empire; from an endeavour after which he might by no means be diverted. Having either by fair, or foul means ſetled his matters in Europe, he paſſed over into Aſia two years after his fathers death, and landed at Troas with a Fleet of ſixty long ſhips. He firſt caſt a ſpear out upon the ſhore, and leaped out in a frisking manner, as taking poſſeſſion of the Continent. Then preſently he made a viſit to the Tombs of Achilles and Ajax, to whom he made a parentation, and muſtered the Army he had brought over with him. Concerning the number of Forces, thoſe that were there preſent themſelves have not agreed in their relation, but according to the greateſt probability, there were of foot thirteen thouſand Macedonians, of the Aſſociates ſeven thouſand, and five thouſand Mercenaries, beſides of Odryſæ, Triballi, and Illyrians five thouſand, and one thouſand Archers, with ſuch as fought with Darts. Of horſe there were one thouſand eight hundred Macedonians, one thouſand eight hundred Theſſalians, and of other Græcians ſix hundred, beſides a Guard of nine hundred Thracians and Pæonians.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. *ann.*3.
*Juſtin. lib.*11.
Arrianus lib. 1

Alexander of Macedonia invadeth Aſia.

22. Darius after he had heard how Alexander was declared General of Greece, and was much ſpoken of for his valour, ſhook off his former ſecurity and buckled himſelf to preparation for reſiſtance. He got together a conſiderable Navy, and raiſed great Forces, for command of which he made choice of moſt expert Captains, and amongſt the reſt of Memnon the Rhodian, a man very excellent in Military matters, whom he ſent into Phrygia with a band of five thouſand Mercenaries to reduce Cyzicus to his obedience. He paſſed over the Hill Ida, and on a ſudden ſet upon the Citie, and had well-nigh taken it; but the Defendants making ſtrong reſiſtance, he plundered the Territories adjacent, and then retreated with much booty. In the mean while Parmenio, one of the three Captains ſent into Aſia by Philip, and who ſtood cloſe to the intereſt of Alexander, took by ſtorm Strynium, a Town of Phrygia, and ſold the inhabitants. From thence he went to Pitanes to attempt the ſame upon it, but Memnon coming upon him ſtruck ſuch a terrour into his men that he was forced to raiſe his ſiege. After this, Callas with a band of Macedonians and Mercenaries ingaged with the Perſians in a battel at Troas, but being overmatched in numbers, he was worſted, and betook himſelf to Rhæteum. Theſe things fell out before the paſſage of Alexander into Aſia.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. *ann.*2.

23. After (a) Alexander was landed, the Perſian Captains met to conſult about carrying on the War, whom Memnon adviſed by no means to hazard a battel; but to lay waſt the Countrey before him, thereby to hinder his march any farther for want of neceſſaries, and then to paſs all their Forces over into Macedonia, and ſo to transfer the ſeat of the War into Europe. This wholeſom Councel was rejected as below the Perſian courage, and a reſolution taken to ingage, ſo that gathering their forces together they marched into Phrygia towards the Helleſpont, and pitched their Tents upon the River Granicus (which runneth through the plains of Adraſtea) intending it ſhould be a defence to them. (b) Alexander in his way thither paſſed by Lampſacus, the inhabitants of which either having already revolted to the Perſian, or elſe ſuſpected of ſuch an intent he reſolved utterly to deſtroy. As he was thus minded Anaximenes an Hiſtorian of that place, well known formerly to his father, and alſo to him, preſented himſelf to him, to whom he ſwore in ſo many words, that he would not grant what he was about to ask, which the other readily apprehending deſired deſired of him that he would deſtroy Lampſacus, ſo that wit h his ſharpneſs of wit being circumvented, he was conſtrained to ſpare it againſt his will.

(a) Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. *ann.*3.

(b) Valer. Maximus l 7. *cap.*3. *Exter Exemp.*4. *Pauſan. Eliac. lib.*2.

The battel of Granicus.

(a) Diodorus ibid.

24. Alexander having with great trouble and danger paſſed the River Granicus, then (a) ingaged with the Perſians in a great and bloody battel, wherein much valour was ſhewn on both ſides. Spithrobates, a Perſian Satrapa of Ionia, and ſon in Law to Darius, a man of a great courage, with a ſtrong body of Horſe fell upon the Macedonians, whom no one being able to ſuſtain, Alexander himſelf grapled with him, a fierce combat enſued, he wounding the King, who yet at length ſlew him. But Roſaces his brother coming in upon Alexander, gave him ſuch a blow upon the head as broke his helmet and lightly wounded him, and a ſecond had killed him outright but that Clitus, Sirnamed Niger, a Macedonian, putting ſpurs to his Horſe, in good time cut off the hand of the Barbarian. A great conflict then enſued betwixt the principal Perſians and Macedonians, and many of the former loſt their lives upon the place; amongſt which of ſpecial note were Atyxes and Pharnaces, brother to the wife of Darius, and Mithrobarzanes Captain of the Cappadocians. Theſe being ſlain, thoſe that oppoſed Alexander began to flye, and afterwards all the reſt; of the hundred thouſand foot which the Perſians brought into the field about ten thouſand being ſlain, and of the twenty thouſand Horſe, two thouſand. Of Alexander his Army one (b) reports nine Foot-men, and a hundred and twenty Horſe-men to have fallen, but (c) another only thirty four in all, amongſt which were nine Foot-men. The King by confeſſion of all deſerved moſt commendation for his valour, and next to him the Theſſalian Horſe-men. (d) Arſites the Perſian fled into Phrygia and there killed himſelf, becauſe through his advice, he ſeemed to have been author of this overthrow.

(b) Juſtin ex Trogo.

(c) Plutarch. ex Ariſtobulo.

(d) Arrianus lib. 1.

Diodorus ut prius.

25. Alexander after he had refreſhed his Army, marched through Lydia, having Sardis delivered up to him, and came to Epheſus, where he diſſolved the Oligarchical form of Government, and ſet up a Democratical one in its room, commanding the ſame to be done in all Greek Cities, which he otdered to be left to their own Laws. The Perſians which eſcaped at Granicus were come to Miletus with Memnon the Rhodian, againſt which Citie he went and beſieged it both by land and Sea, and by his Engines making great breaches in the walls, the Inhabitants yeilded themſelves to his mercy, to whom he gave both life and freedom, but ſuch Barbarians as he took he either ſlew or ſcattered them up and down in the quality of ſlaves. A little after he diſſolved his Fleet, conſiſting of a hundred and ſixty Ships or more, only reſerving a certain number for the conveying of Engines and other inſtruments for a ſiege, amongſt which were twenty Auxiliary Veſſels belonging to Athens.

Alexander ſeteth at liberty all Greek Cities.

26. Memnon, after the taking of Miletus, with the moſt conſiderable Perſian Officers, and a multitude of Mercenaries, betook themſelves to Halicarnaſſus, the greateſt and moſt elegant Citie in Caria, which he took upon him to defend for the King, to whom he ſent as Hoſtages his Wife and Children, and thereupon command was given to all the Maritime parts of Aſia, to obey him as their Captain General in the War. Alexander in the mean time ſent his Engines thither by water, together with proviſion for his Army, and marched himſelf by Land thitherwards with his whole Force, ſetting at liberty in his way all the Greek Cities, which he left to their own Laws, and freed from Tribute, profeſſing that he undertook this Expedition for the freedom of the Greeks. In his way he was met by Ada the Queen of Caria, who after the death of her Husband Idrieus, was depoſed by her Brother Pexodarus. She delivered up Alinda, the ſtrongeſt City in the countrey wherein ſhe dwelt, into his hands, and imploring his help for the rocovery of the Kindom, adopted him for her ſon. He deſpiſed it not, and left her the Government of Caria, over which he declared her Queen, by which courteſie the Cities being overcome, ſent him Crowns of gold, and delivered up themſelves into his power.

Diodorus & Arrianus ut ſupra.

27. Orontobates a Perſian, Son in Law to Pexodarus, after his death kept poſſeſſion of Halicarnaſſus. With whom Memnon the Rhodian and other Perſians, after the taking of Miletus, joyned themſelves. Alexander now beſieged it, and with all his might endeavoured the taking of it by aſſault; but ſuch was the pertinaciouſneſs of the defendants, that they held him out, and making a ſallie had given him a defeat, if the old Souldiers buckling their Arms to them had not come in in good time, and repulſed them with great ſlaughter; after which the Enemy forſook the City, and ſo he took it, and levelled it with the ground. The Caſtle he fortified with a wall, and a notable ditch, in which which for the defence of Caria he left three thouſand forein Foot, and two hundred Horſe under the command of Ptolomy; and reſtored to his adoptive Mother Ada, the Principality of the Country. Thence he proceeded towards Lycia and Pamphylia, that reducing the Sea-Coaſts into his power, he might render the Enemies Navy unſerviceable to him, which he in a good meaſure performed, and came in the midſt of Winter into Mylias a Region of Phrygia, where he entred into League with the Ambaſſadors ſent to him from Phaſelis, and the lower Lycia, who ſurrended all the Cities into his hands. Afterwards he went into Phaſelis, where he ſtormed a Caſtle built by the Piſidians, to infeſt the Country.

He taketh & razeth Halicarnaſſus.

(a) Arrianus lib. 1.

The treaſon of Alexander Lynceſtes.

28. Whilſt (a) he here remained, he underſtood of a plot againſt his life, by Alexander Aeropus, called alſo Lynceſtes (from Lyncus a Town of Epirus, as it's probable) who was promiſed by Darius the Kingdom of Macedonia, and a thouſand talents of Gold beſides, if he could any way procure his death. His Mother had by letters adviſed him to take heed of him, and the thing being confeſſed by Aſiſines a Perſian, whom Darius under a ſhew of a Meſſage to the Governour of Phrygia, had ſent to deal with him in this matter, he committed him to cuſtody, not thinking it ſafe to put him to death, leſt thereupon ſome trouble ſhould follow, in Macedonia. From Phaſelus he marched to Perga on the ſhore of the Pamphylian Sea, concerning which many antient Hiſtorians reported, that it by an extraordinary providence gave way to him, and herein Joſephus hath rather been too credulous, whereas (b) at a low water the place uſed to be dry, and gave way to paſſengers; only Alexander hapning to come thither in Winter-ſeaſon, and truſting all to the goodneſs of his Fortune, would march through before the water was fallen off, ſo that his men waded all the day in water up to the navel. (c) Subduing all in his paſſage, at length he came to the Lake of Aſcania in Phrygia, and thence in five Encampings to Celænæ, the Caſtle of which being held by the Satrapa of Phrygia, with a thouſand Carians, and an hundred mercenary Græcians, after ſixty dayes truce (in which they had in vain expected relief from Darius) was yielded unto him.

(b) Strabo lib. 14.

(c) Arrianus ibid.

Curtius lib. 3. Arrianus lib. 1. & 2. Plutarch in Alexand. Juſtin lib. 11. Curtius l. 4. c. 2.

29. In Celænæ he left a Garriſon of one thouſand five hundred Souldiers, and declaring Antigonus, Satrapa of Phrygia, went forward for Gordium, having written to Parmenio to meet him there with his Forces, who accordingly came; and there arrived alſo a ſupplie of one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty men out of Greece. This Gordium a City in Phrygia, had been the regal City of Midas the Son of Gordius King of this Country (concerning whom notable Stories are related) and herein was a Temple of Jupiter, wherein Alexander heard that there was a yoak belonging to Gordius, the bands of which whoſoever could untie, the Oracles promiſed him the Empire of all Aſia. When he had taken the Town he came into the Temple, and asked for the yoak, which being brought to him, when he could not find the ends of the thongs which were hid among the knots, leſt his fruſtrate endeavour ſhould be ominous, he cut them in pieces, with his ſword, and thereby either eluded or fulfilled the Oracle.

He cutteth in two the Gordian knot.

Diodorus, ad Olymp. 111. ann. 4.

30. Darius this while ſent a great ſum of money to Memnon, whom he had declared General of all his Forces, wherewith he raiſing many men all over where he came, and rigging a Navie of three hundred ſhips, betook himſelf ſeriouſly to his work. He preſently reduced Chius, and ſailing to Leſbus eaſily took Antiſſa, Methymnus, Phyrrhus, and Ereſſus; but Leſbus and Mitylene more ſtrongly fortified, with great loſs of men. His name being blazed abroad by theſe actions, moſt of the Iſlands Cyclades ſent their Ambaſſadors about a Peace, and a rumour being ſpread that he intended to fall upon Eubœa, a great fear ſeized upon the Inhabitants thereof, and many of the Græcians who envied the Fortune of Alexander, began to take courage, and conceive new hopes, amongſt which were the Lacedæmonians, who alwaies had deſpiſed both his alliance and that with his Father. Thus proſperouſly ſucceeded Darius his affairs under the management of Memnon; but Providence having otherwiſe determined concerning his eſtate, Memnon died ſhortly after, and with him the King's ſucceſs was even extinct. He was in good hope that the War would have been tranſlated out of Aſia into Europe, neceſſitating Alexander to return; but underſtanding of his death, he conſulted with Friends whether he ſhould manage the War by his Lieutenants, or go himſelf in perſon, and give the Macedonians battel.

Arrianus l. 2.

Memnon Darius his General dieth.

Diodorus ibid. Curtius lib. 3.

31. The Perſians perſwaded him to march in the head of the Army, which thereby would fight with more alacrity, but Charidemus, (or Eudemus) an Athenian, a man much admired for valour and prudence (who by the command of Alexander being baniſhed his Country, was come to the Perſian Court) adviſed him not raſhly to commit the Fortune of his Empire to the hazard of his own life, but keeping the chief Power in his own Hands to ſend ſome expert Lieutenant to the War. He told him that one hundred thouſand men would be ſufficient for this Enterprize; a third part of them being Græcians, with which he doubted not to engage to perfect what already was well begun by Memnon. The King at firſt gave ear to what he ſaid; but the Perſians obſtinately oppoſed it, and ſo interpreted his words as if he affected the chief Command, for that end, that he might betray the Empire to the Macedonians. Hereat he grew angry, and in his Paſſion upbraided the Perſians with Cowardiſe, which ſo far incenſed the King, before this exaſperated againſt him, that his Anger overtopping his Reaſon, he caſt a Belt about him after the Perſian manner, and commanded him to be put to death, who foreſeeing his Ruine, cried out as he was led away, that ſhortly he would repent it, and pay ſufficiently for ſo unjuſt proceedings. After the cooling of his Paſſion he repented too late of his raſhneſs, and conſidering the valour of the Lacedæmonians, bethought himſelf what man of worth he might find fit to ſucceed Memnon; but finding none to whom he might commit ſo great a Truſt, was neceſſitated to expoſe himſelf to danger for the preſervation of his Kingdom. Then raiſed he Forces in all places, which he commanded ſhould meet at Babylon, where accordingly were found four hundred thouſand Foot, and above one hundred thouſand Horſe, and with this number (taking his Mother, Wife, one Son of ſix Years of age, and two Daughters marriageable along with him) he marched towards Cilicia.

32. Alexander in the mean while placed Satrapaes over Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, which voluntarily yielded themſelves, and haſtned towards the Straights of Cilicia called Pylæ, which being quitted by thoſe that were there placed to maintain them, he eaſily paſſed, and came to Tarſus, which Arſames the Perſian alſo forſook, and waſting Cilicia, to ſtraighten the Macedonian Army of Proviſions, fled amain to the King. Here Alexander fell ſick of a Diſeaſe which (b) one wrote he got by too much Toil, (c) others aſſign no particular cauſe at all; but according to the general Tradition, (d) he contracted it by caſting himſelf all hot and ſweaty into the River Cydnus, whence ſuch a cold ſeized upon his Nerves that he fell ſpeechleſs, and ſo ſmall hopes there were of recovery, that little probability was conceived of protracting the danger. Only one Phyſician named Philip an Acarnanian, who uſed a ſpeedy and deſperate kind of courſe in his practice, undertook the Cure. But by Letters from Parmenio he was lately adviſed to beware of him, as being corrupted by Darius for a great ſum of Money to make him away. Yet he counting it ſafer to commit himſelf to the doubtful fidelity of the man, than periſh by a certain Diſeaſe, put himſelf into his Hands, and taking the Potion, gave him the Letters of Parmenio to read, fixing his eyes upon him as he drank, whom as he ſaw nothing troubled at the matter, he took more courage, and recovered the fourth day after.

Arrianus & Curtius ut ſupra.

(b) Ariſtobulus.
(c) Diodorus.
(d) Juſtin l. 11. Curtius. Plutarch. Arrianus & Val. Maximus lib. 3. cap. 8. extern. exemp. ult.

33. Darius having notice of the ſickneſs of Alexander haſted towards Euphrates, thinking to prevent him, and ſeize upon Cilicia. But he ſending Parmenio before to poſſeſs himſelf of the Pylæ, or Straights that part Cilicia and Syria, followed from Tarſus and came to Anchiale built by Sardanapalus; and thence to Solos, where he placed a Garriſon, and fined the Inhabitants two hundred Talents of Silver for their affection to the Perſians. Hence he marched againſt the Cilicians, inhabiting the Mountains, which having brought under, he returned, and underſtanding how Ptolomy and Aſander his Lieutenants had overthrown Orontobaces the Perſian, who held the Caſtle of Halicarnaſſus, whereby the parts adjacent were reduced to obedience, upon this good news he ſacrifized to Æſculapius, and reſtored the Democratical Government of the Solians. Then giving order to Philotas to lead about the Horſe to the River Pyramus, he marched with the Foot by the Sea-Coaſts, and came thither, whence he paſſed over to the Citie Mallos, where he had notice that Darius lay at Sochus, a place diſtant two days march from the Straights. From Mallos he paſſed to the Citie Iſſus, which being forſaken by the Perſians, Parmenio had ſeized on, and cleared the Paſſage thither, where he conſulted whether he had better paſs forwards, or there expect his ſupplies out of Macedonia. Parmenio perſwaded him that no place could be more convenient for him to fight in than that ſtraight one about Iſſus, becauſe both their Armies would then be equal in effect, ſuch narrow places being uncapable to receive a multitude. After three days he paſſed the Straights and came to Myriander, where much Rain falling held the Macedonians in their Tents.

Quintus Curtius ibid.

Sect. 4.

34. Darius in the mean while by the perſwaſion of ſome Græcians about him, had made choice of the Plains of Syria, moſt capable to receive his Multitudes, and opportune for the Horſe to charge in; and for ſome time here he continued; but Alexander delaying his march, he was perſwaded by his Courtiers that he dared not to adventure any further, or look him in the Face, and becauſe Winter approached he would loſe no time, and therefore ſending away his Money and Stuff of moſt value, with ſuch Perſons as were not fit for War, unto Damaſcus, he haſted into Cilicia, where he ſuppoſed Alexander to have poſſeſſed himſelf of the difficult paſſages, as not daring to try battel in open Field. Suppoſing that he pretended Sickneſs, and hid himſelf in the Straights, he paſſed over the Mountain, and went to Iſſus, moſt imprudently paſſing by, and leaving him at his Back. Taking this place, and therein ſuch of the Enemy as being ſick and weak were there left, he cut off their Hands, and then ſearing their Arms ſent them away to tell their King what they had ſeen; for he thought now the Enemy to have left Iſſus, and fled for fear of him, and for that reaſon haſted over the Hill Pinarus, thinking to fall upon him in the Rear. Alexander knowing for certain that he was paſſed by, took thence occaſion to encourage his Soldiers, who now could not be overmatched by Multitudes, and ſending a party of Horſe to view the Straights, returned thither by Night, and repoſſeſſed himſelf of them. Then refreſhing his men for the reſt of the Night, he ſet a ſtrong Watch upon the Rock, and in the Morning went down into the path, and ſet his Army in order for a Battel.

The Battel of Iſſus.

35. This being done the Armies joyned ere long, and Alexander ſeeing where Darius was, made towards him, which when Oxyathres the Brother of Darius ſaw, to prevent him, he placed a Company of moſt valiant Horſe-men before the Chariot, which cut off many of Alexander his men, who preſſed forwards. But the Macedonians giving way to none in Valour, with great violence broke in amongſt them, and then a mighty ſlaughter followed, and a great heap of Carkaſes lay before Darius his Charriot. Many of the moſt noble Captains amongſt the Perſians fell, ſome of the Macedonians, and Alexander himſelf received a wound in his Thigh. Darius his Chariot Horſes being wounded with Spears began to fling, and threatned the overturning of him, when fearing he ſhould be taken alive he leaped out, and mounting on Horſe-back, he caſt away his royal Apparel, and ſhifted for himſelf, after which his Cavalry was put to the rout and ran away. The Infantry diſcouraged herewith made no conſiderable oppoſition, the great multitudes being unſerviceable in ſo ſtraight and precipitous a place, and being put to the rout ſo hindred the flight, and trode one another down, that more damage accrued hence than from the meer ſtrength of the Enemy. Of the Perſian Horſe Arrianus writeth ten thouſand to have been ſlain, and of the Foot ninty thouſand, with whom others conſent as to the number of the Horſe, but as to the Foot there is little agreement, ſome accounting more, and others leſs: forty thouſand are reported to have been taken.

36. Of Alexander's men five hundred and four Curtius ſaith were wounded; thirty two Foot-men were ſlain, and of Horſe-men one hundred and fifty, which ſome reckon leſs by twenty, though another increaſeth them to three hundred. Alexander following the Chace was forced to paſs with his Phalange over the Enemies dead Bodies, and with one thouſand Horſe did great execution, but was not able to reach Darius, who rode upon a Mare that had a Fole left at home, and therefore ran with more ſpeed, he being accuſtomed to have ſome kept for ſuch neceſſities. His Tents were eaſily taken, and therein his Mother, Wife, Son, and two Daughters; but of Money not above thirty thouſand Talents; the reſt being ſent before-hand to Damaſcus. The Women hearing that Alexander was returned with the Robe of Darius, made great lamentation, which he underſtanding, ſent Leonatus to them to put them out of fear as to his Death; to promiſe them the maintenance of their former dignity, and a Viſit from him to be made the next morning. As ſoon as it was light, he went to them with Hephæſtion his greateſt Favourite, both whom when the Mother of Darius ſaw, and knew not which was the King, ſhe made reverence to Hephæſtion, as ſeeming to her from the worth of his Clothes to be the greater perſon, which when ſhe underſtood to have been amiſs, was troubled at it, and asked his pardon; to which he anſwered, ſmiling: Be not troubled Mother, for he alſo is Alexander. This Battel of Iſſus was fought in the Moneth Mæmacterion, Nicoſtratus (or Nicocrates) being Archon at Athens, in the fourth year of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, the fourth of the reign of Darius, and the fourth of Alexander. A. M. 3672.

A. M. 3672.
Olymp. 111.
ann. 4.
Darii 4.
Alexand. 4.

37. Alexander

Sect. 4.

*Curtius lib.*3.

Darius his Lieutenants revolt to Alexander.

Juſtin. lib. 11.
Curtius lib. 4.

His offers corn by Alexander.

37, Alexander, after this victory, marched for Syria, and ſent Parmenio before him to Damaſcus to ſeize upon Darius his Treaſure, which by Cophenes the Keeper thereof was betrayed into his hands, and for that he was rewarded with death by one of his Complices, who ſent his head to Darius. Of Coyn here was found two thouſand and ſix hundred Talents beſides five hundred pound weight of Bullion, and a World of other riches. Of men and women thirty thouſand were alſo taken with ſeven thouſand beaſts that carried burthens. Then was Parmenio ſent to ſeize upon the Perſian Fleet, and others to take in the Cities of Syria, which upon the report of the ſucceſs of the battel at Iſſus was eaſily done, the Governours of Darius yielding themſelves with their Treaſures. As Alexander travelled into Syria, many petty Kings met him adorned with their Diadems, whereof ſome he received into friendſhip, and others he deprived of their principalities, as they had deſerved of him. When he came to the Citie Marathon, he received Letters from Darius, wherein he deſired the ranſom of his Wife, Mother, and Children, and offered other conditions of peace; but ſuch as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been thrice ſhamefully beaten, not vouchſafing, in his direction to Alexander, the Title of King. He diſdained his offers, juſtified his War from the invaſion of Greece by the former Perſian Kings, and the treachery of Darius himſelf, who hired one to murder him, as Philip his father had formerly been killed by ſome ſet on by them. He promiſed him his relations without Ranſom, if he would come himſelf as a Suppliant for them, and ſafe conduct, both knowing, as he ſaid, to overcome, and ſhew favour to the Conquered. And the next time he wrote he bad him remember that he did it not onely to a King, but to his own King alſo.

*Arrianus lib.*2.
*Curtius lib.*14.
Juſtin. lib. 11.

*Diodorus ad Olymp.*111. *ann.*4.

38. Alexander marched to Byblus, which yeilded to him upon compoſition, and thence to Sidon, the inhabitants of which being ſo hardly uſed formerly by Ochus, in hatred of the Perſians ſent for him. The King of Sidon was one Strato, who being the ſon of Geroſtratus the King of Aradus the Iſland, Governed it in his abſence (he joyning his ſhips, as the reſt of the Phœnician Kings, to the fleet of Darius) and meeting Alexander as he came into Phœnicia, put a Golden Crown on his head, and gave up Aradus, and Marathus, a great and wealthy Town, ſtanding upon the Continent over againſt it, with Mariamne, and all that belonged unto them, into his hands. But now becauſe he had done this rather for that the will of the people was ſuch, than out of his own inclination, Alexander deprived him of his Kingdom, and permitted his beloved Hephæſtion to beſtow it upon any of his friends. He choſe to confer it upon a Sidonian by whom he was entertained; but he refuſed it, for that it was unlawfull for any but one of the Royal ſtock to poſſeſs it. He wondering at the greatneſs of his ſpirit, joyned with ſo much honeſty, bid him chooſe any one of the Royal Race on whom to beſtow it, who accordingly made choice of Abdalmon (or Abdalomnius) a poor Gardiner who wrought for his living, but of unblameable life, and deſcended of the Royal family. Alexander admitting of him, ſaid, the habit of his body could not hinder the nobleneſs of his ſtock, but deſired to know with what patience he had endured ſuch poverty, to whom he anſwered, That he wiſhed he could as well bear a Kingdom, and that thoſe his hands had ſatisfied his deſire: whileſt he had nothing, nothing was wanting to him. The King being much taken with his carriage, not onely gave him the houſ-hold ſtuff of Strato, but moſt of the booty got from the Perſians, ſubjected the Countrey adjacent unto his power, and afterwards alſo the Citie of Tyre, according to Diodorus.

*Curtius. lib.*4.
*Juſtin. lib.*11.
Diodorus ad Olymp. 112. *ann.*1.
Plutarch. in Alexandro.
*Arrianus lib.*2.

39. Now was all Syria in the hands of the Macedonians, and whole Phœnicia alſo except Tyre, which Citie was ſeated in an Iſland about half a mile diſtant from the Continent. As he marched thitherwards, the Tyrians ſent him a Crown of Gold of great value, in a Congratulatory way, and a large quantity of proviſions; which he received as from friends, and friendly ſignified to the Meſſengers his intention to go into their Citie, to pay ſome vows he had made to Hercules. They told him there was a Temple of Hercules without the Citie, in the place called Old Tyre, wherein his devotion would be moſt ſuitably performed, and ſo diſſwaded him from entrance, that he was inraged thereat, and threatned ruin to the Citie, telling them, that though they were confident in the ſtrength of the place, and deſpiſed his Land Army, yet in ſhort time he would make them find they were in the Continent. And in confidence that their Town, not onely fenced with high and ſtrong Walls, but alſo with the Sea, was impregnable, they reſolved to ſtand out againſt him, being incouraged alſo by the Carthaginian Ambaſſadors, who after their yearly cuſtom (in token of obſervance to their Mother City) were come to celebrate the ſacred Anniverſary, and promiſed them certain, and ſpeedy ſupply by Sea, which for the moſt part at that time was commanded by their Fleets.

40. Alexander yet having not his Navy at hand, and foreſeeing that a long ſiege would be a great hindrance to his deſigns, ſent to them about an agreement; but contrary to the Law of Nations, they ſlew the Meſſengers, and caſt them into the Sea, with which affront being much moved, he reſolved to beſiege them. Ere he could do this, ſuch a quantity of earth or other matter was to be caſt into the Sea, as to joyn the Iſland to the main land, which by reaſon of the depth of the water, and the force of the Current, was a task almoſt inſuperable; but there being great ſtore of ſtones and rubbiſh at hand in Old * Tyre, he cauſed it to be utterly demoliſhed, and by the hands of many thouſands of his own men, and the people of the neighbouring places, ſet upon the work. The Tyrians (whoſe King Azelmicus being abſent with Darius his Admiral, had left them to the Government of his ſon) hindred it all wayes poſſible, and when it was near concluded, a violent wind ſpoiled a great part of it, but to repair it he cauſed great Trees to be cut down in the Mountains, which together with the boughs caſt in, and earth heaped upon them, reſiſted the violence of the waves, and at length by the great number of hands, and incredible induſtry, the Iſland became a Peninſula. But for all this, the Tyrians having the command of the Sea, their City ſeemed yet to be impregnable, whereupon Alexander had thoughts of gathering together a Fleet; but in the mean time came in the Kings of Aradus and Byblus, who had withdrawn themſelves with their Fleet from Autophradates the Perſian Admiral, and with them the Sidonian Gallies. Beſides theſe Veſſels belonging to Phœnicia (which were eighty in number) at the ſame time came ten from Rhodes, from Solos and Mallos three, and from Lycia ten, beſides one great Gally from Macedonia. All theſe he pardoned, as having been neceſſitated to joyn with the Perſians. And Azelmicus the King of Tyre now left Autophradates and came home; Arrianus writing that he was taken in the City.

Alexander his great attempt for the Conquering of Tyre.

* Palætyrus.

41. From the Mountain Libanus was wood brought for the making of Engines, Towers, and Ships, in which work whilſt Alexander his men were imployed, ſome of the wild Arabians fell upon them, ſlew thirty, and took ſcarcely ſo many, He upon notice hereof left the charge of the Siege to Perdiccas, and Craterus, and ſpeedily with a ready Band of men went into Arabia, where when they came to the mountainous parts of the Hill called Antilibanus, they left their Horſes and marched on foot. When it grew night, and the Enemy, approached, though his men were before, yet would he not leave his School-maſter Lyſimachus being weary and ſpent, but ſtill drawing him on was parted from the Army, and forced with a few about him to paſs the night in a dark and cold place. But ſeeing many fires to be kindled afar off by the Enemy, he being nimble of body ran to one of them, and killing two Barbarians that there ſate, brought away a fire-ſtick burning to his Companions, who therewith kindled a great fire, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Arabians, as all that night they paſſed in quietneſs. Then partly by force and partly by agreement he reduced the Country into obedience, and in eleven dayes time returned to Sidon, where he found arrived out of Peleponneſus four thouſand Greekiſh Mercenaries, under the conduct of Alexander the Son of Polemocrates.

42. Having then got together a Navy of an hundred and ninety or two hundred ſhips, he ſet ſail from Sidon and came to Tyre, the Inhabitants whereof refuſed to fight by Sea, but yet abated none of their courage, though thirty Meſſengers were come from Carthage to let them know, that that State being hindred by a domeſtick War, could not afford them any ſuccour. They ſent their wives and children thither to be out of the danger, being thereby the more willing to undergo any themſelves, which they little regarded, making ſtout reſiſtance, but at length the City was taken; one ſaith by treachery, another by a ſtratagem, but more by plain force; Alexander himſelf alone firſt going down from the wooden Tower he had reared, by a bridge laid upon the Wall. The Inhabitants, though the Enemy had entred, called one upon another, and fortifying the narrow paſſages ſtood out ſtill, till the number of ſeven thouſand (the moſt of thoſe that fought) were ſlain. The Conquerour condemned the women and children that were found unto bondage, the young men to the number of two thouſand he cauſed to be hanged all along the Shore, or crucified, as another telleth us, (which was accounted a ſervile kind of death) becauſe the Tyrian Slaves had formerly conſpired againſt their Maſters, and ſlain them all with their whole Families, leaving no free people alive, except one Strato and his Son, to whom and his Poſterity they committed the Kingdom. Fifteen thouſand the Sidonians ſaved upon the account of Kindred (they reckoning both Tyre and Sidon to have been built by Agenor) from whom the City was again re-peopled, and to ſuch as had fled to the Temple of Hercules, Alexander granted indemnity, amongſt which the King and his Family were, with ſome Carthaginians which were come for the Honour of Hercules to the Metropolis. This befel Tyre in the Moneth Hecatombæon, when Annicetus (otherwiſe called Niceratus and Nicetas) was Archon at Athens, in the firſt year of the hundred and twelvth Olympiad, the firſt of Darius, and the fifth of Alexander, A. M. 3673.

Tyre taken

A. M. 3673.
Ol. 112. an. 1.
V. C. 422.
Darii 5.
Alexand. 5.

43. During this Siege, the Officers of Darius which eſcaped from the Battel at Iſſus, with all thoſe that followed them, and the youth of the Cappadocians, and Paphlagonians, attempted to recover Lydia; but Antigonus who there commanded for Alexander overthrew them thrice in ſeveral places. At the ſame time alſo Ariſtimenes, who was ſent with ſome Ships by Darius to recover the Coaſt of Aſia, lying upon the Helleſpont, was wholly defeated by a Fleet of Macedonians which Alexander had ſent for out of Greece.

Darius ſendeth new propoſals to Alexander, which he refuſeth.

44. Whilſt Alexander lay before Tyre, another Ambaſſage came to him from Darius, who now offered him ten thouſand Tallents as a Ranſom for his Relations, and all Aſia betwixt the Helleſpont and the River Halys in Dower with his Daughter; which Conditions that he might incline him to receive, he ſet before him the difficulties of paſſing into the eaſtern Countries, and laid the loſs of the laſt Battel to the ſtraightneſs of the place: he ſought to terrifie him by threatning to incompaſs him in the plain Countries, and bade him conſider how impoſſible it was to paſs the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the reſt, with things of the like nature. The Propoſals being brought before a ſelect Committee of Alexander's Friends, Parmenio who was now old, and full of Riches and Honour, ſaid, that if he were Alexander, he would accept of them, to which the King anſwered, that ſo would he, if he were Parmenio. But he returned anſwer to Darius, that he offered him nothing but his own, and what Victory and his own Valour had poſſeſt him of; that he was to give Conditions and not to receive any, and that having paſſed the Sea it ſelf, he diſdained to think of reſiſtance in tranſporting his Army over Rivers. As for his Daughter, he ſaid he would marry her, though without his conſent, and if he would taſte of his humanity, he ſhould come and refer himſelf to him. Darius having received this Anſwer, prepared himſelf anew for the War.

Euſeb. in Chronico.
Plin. lib. 12. cap. 25.
Joſephus Antiquit. lib. 11. cap. 8.

A Temple built by Sanballat on mount Gerizim.

45. Tyre being taken, Alexander invaded Judæa, reſolving to bring all Palæſtine into ſubjection. At this time Jaddus was the High-Prieſt there, whoſe Brother Manaſſes married Nicaſo the Daughter of Sanballat, who had been ſent from Darius to govern Samaria, being both Sons to John, called in Nehemiah, Jonathan, and Johanan, who was Son to Jehoiada. Manaſſes thus matching himſelf, the People was diſpleaſed at it, and Jaddus deſired him to put away his Wife; not only the People but the Law ſo requiring it. Hereupon he repaired to his Father in Law, and told him, that his Wife was dear unto him; but he muſt either part with her or his Prieſt-hood, who anſwered that he would ſo bring it about, that he ſhould not only be Prieſt, but an High-Prieſt alſo, being minded to build for him upon Mount Gerizim near to Samaria a Temple like to that of Jeruſalem, which thing he would obtain to be confirmed by Darius. Many betook themſelves to Manaſſes, being allured with the Newneſs of the thing, and the liberality of Sanballat; but Alexander at that time paſſing the Helleſpont, the conſultation thereupon was diſturbed. After Darius was beaten and retired back into Perſia, Sanballat revolted unto Alexander, and going over to him with eight thouſand men, though now very old, deſired of him leave to build this new deſigned Temple, perſwading him it would be for his intereſt, that thereby the Jews being divided amongſt themſelves, might be the leſs able to reſiſt him. Alexander yielding to his requeſt, he returned, and falling with great induſtry upon the work, he died not long after.

Jaddus the High-Prieſt of the Jews refuſing to break his Faith,

46. This was at ſuch time as Alexander lay before Tyre, during which Siege, he ſent round about to demand an Oath of Allegiance, and Aſſiſtance from the ſeveral Cities, and amongſt the reſt the Meſſengers came to Jeruſalem, Jaddeus or Jaddus the High-Prieſt anſwered, that he had entred by Oath into Alexander invadeth Judea.

But his wrath is appeaſed.

Society with Darius, and whilſt he lived he might not by any means break his Faith; with which anſwer Alexander being moved, after the taking of Tyre (not of Gaza as Joſephus thinketh, for then he muſt have returned backwards) he invaded Judæa. The High-Prieſt and People then looked for nothing but Ruine, but he imploring the aſſiſtance of God, was warned in a dream to go out and meet him, adorned with his Pontifical Veſtments, with the Levites and People, as in a ſolemn Proceſſion. Alexander meeting this long Train, lighted from his Horſe, and adored the Prieſt, at which thing all the reſt being amazed, Parmenio asked him the reaſon thereof, to whom he anſwered, that he worſhipped not the Prieſt, but the God whom he ſerved, for that whilſt he was yet in Greece, and conſulted about his Expedition into Aſia, ſuch an one appeared to him, adviſed him to it, and promiſed him ſucceſs. Then going up to the City he aſcended to the Temple, and ſacrifized according to the directions of the Prieſt, who ſhewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein was foretold, that a Gracian ſhould obtain the Empire of the Perſians. He accounting himſelf the man rejoyced thereat, and the next day offered to the People whatſoever they would ask of him, who requeſted that they might live after their own Laws and Cuſtoms, that on every ſeventh year in which they ſowed not, they might pay no Tribute, and that ſuch of their Country-men as inhabited Babylon and Media, might alſo be left to their own Laws, all which he readily granted them. He offered them alſo, if they would follow him, the freedom of the exerciſe of their Religion, whereupon many gave their Names to the Expedition; and then leading his Forces to the neighbouring Cities, he was friendly received by them.

47. The Samaritans met him in the way, deſiring him to viſit their City Sicima, (ſeated at the foot of the Hill Gerizim, and inhabited by the Runagates of the Jewiſh Nation) to honour their Temple with his preſence, and to remit to them alſo the tribute of every ſeventh year, they ſowing not therein; for that they were Hebrews, though not Jews, as deſcended of Joſeph and his two Sons Ephraim and Manaſſeh, all which he referred to his return. By this time his Officers had recovered ſeveral places that had revolted, as Callus, Paphlagonia; Antigonus, Lycaonia; and Balacrus, Miletus, after he had overthrown Idarnes the Captain of Darius. Cilicia he had committed to the care of Soſcrates, and the Country about Tyre to Philotas the ſon of Parmenio, who had delivered his charge of Cebeſtia to Andromachus, that he might follow the Expedition. All the Towns of Paleſtine he had got now into his hands, except Gaza, which Batis the Eunuch reſolved to hold out againſt him. This was a City diſtant from the Sea about two miles and an half, of difficult acceſs by reaſon of the depth of ſand about it, the Sea near unto it being very muddy; it was large, ſeated upon an high Rock, and compaſſed with a ſtrong wall. Hither, having commanded Hephæſtion to go before with the Fleet, he came, and ſate down before it with all his Forces.

Curtius lib. 4.

He beſiegeth Gaza.

Diodorus, Joſephus, Curtius, Arrianus, ut prius.

48. Having viewed the ſituation of the City, he reſolved that light kind of earth to be fit for receiving of mines, which he commanded preſently to be attempted, and ſeeing that no wooden turrets could be erected by the walls becauſe of the looſneſs of the ſand, he made a great heap of earth and ſtones to be laid, which equalled the height of the walls, on which he planted his Engines for batterie. By the advice of Ariſtander his Prophet, he contained himſelf for a time without the reach of the Arrows, but the Arabians whom Batis the Governour (called Baberneſes by Joſephus) had hired, iſſuing forth ſet fire to the Engines, and beat away the Macedonians from the Mount, upon which he ran in with the Targetiers to the reſcue, and kept his men from running, but he himſelf received a wound on his ſhoulder. Afterwards thoſe Engines being come by water with which he had taken Tyre, he cauſed the whole City to be ſurrounded with mounts two furlongs broad, and two hundred and fifty foot high, whereby conflicting both with Engines above ground and below, at length after two moneths it was taken, the wall being broken by a Mine, at which breach the Macedonians entred. Alexander himſelf led in his men, and when his former wound was not yet quite cured, received a bruiſe on his thigh with a ſtone. The defendants ſtirred not from their places, but fighting to the laſt, were all ſlain to the number of ten thouſand. The women and children the Conquerour made Slaves, and furniſhing the City with a new Colony gathered out of the places adjacent, uſed it as a Garriſon in the War.

Diodorus. ad Olymp. 112. ann. 2. Curtius lib. 4.

49. From Gaza he ſent Amyntas the Son of Andremo with ten Gallies into

He marcheth for Egypt.

Macedonia, to make a Levie of the ſtouteſt young men, and bring them over, becauſe the War though proſperous, waſted his old ſtock of Soldiers, and he could not ſo well truſt foreiners as his own ſubjects. Then marched he ſtrait for Egypt, and the ſeventh day after his removal from Gaza arrived at that place, afterwards called Alexanders-Camp, and came to Peluſium. Here met him great multitudes of Egyptians, who being weary of the inſolence and avarice of the Perſians, expected his coming, and gladly received him. Placing a Garriſon in Peluſium, and commanding that the Ships ſhould ſayl up the River to Memphis, he having the Nile on his right hand, came, through the deſart to Heliopolis, and thence croſſing the River, unto Memphis, which when he approached, Mazaces the Perſian Governour met him, and delivered into his hands eight hundred Talents, with all the royal houſhold-ſtuff. Here he ſacrifized to all the Egyptian Gods, and celebrated Games, and then ſayled down the River to the Sea; and when he came to Canopus ſayled about the Lake Mareotis, betwixt which and the Egyptian-Sea, he choſe out a place whereon to build a City, which he would have called after himſelf Alexandria.

Strabo lib. 17

Plutarch. in Alexandro.

Foundeth Alexandria.

50. In this place towards the Sea and Haven ſtood once a Village named Rhacotis. When the figure of the new City was to be delineated, for want of Chalk, they marked out the ground with Meal, which preſently was ſeized upon by an innumerable company of Fouls of all ſorts, that from the Sea and Lake came flocking thither, and devoured it all. Hereat the King was diſcouraged, but his Prophets told him, that it ſignified the City ſhould be exceeding populous and wealthy, and nouriſh all ſorts of men. He himſelf deſigned in what place the Forum ſhould be, and where the Temples that were to be Conſecrated to the Egyptian and Græcian Gods, and herein uſed the skill of that noble Architect Dinocrates (called alſo Staſicrates) who was imployed by the Epheſians, in reſtoring their Temple formerly conſumed with fire. This (afterwards Famous) City was founded by Alexander in the fifth year of his Reign, and the firſt of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, the four hundred and ſeventeenth of Nabonaſar, from which year, the moneth Thoth, as alſo the fifth of Darius, the ſupputation of the years of Alexander is begun by Ptolomy the Mathematician, and a Native of this City, A. M. 3673. three hundred twenty nine years before the Æra of Chriſt.

Iidem.

*Arrianus lib.*3

Diodorus ad Olymp. 112. ann. 2.

Juſtin. lib. 11

51. Leaving the care of his new deſigned City to fit Overſeers, he took a journey toward the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon, ſituate in the vaſt ſandy deſarts of Libya, becauſe he had heard that Perſeus and Hercules had formerly gone thither; or to know his fortune, or that he might at leaſt have occaſion to boaſt of his knowledge of it. In the midſt of his way he encountred Ambaſſadours, ſent to him from the Cyrenæans, who brought a Crown with other great gifts, amongſt which were three hundred excellent horſes trained up and taught for the War; which receiving in good part, he entred into confederacy with them. Two great dangers eſpecially to be met with in this journey, viz. want of water in ſo dry a place, and of being overwhelmed by heaps of ſand, which the South-wind threw upon fifty thouſand of Cambyſes his army, he eſcaped wonderfully by abundance of rain which is ſaid to have falln, wherby the way was made more firm and paſſable; and two Crows are reported to have been his Guides, and in the night time when they could not be ſeen, by their croaking to have given notice which way they tended. When he arrived at the Temple, the Prieſt, either hired to it, or miſtaking the Greek language as it is thought, ſaluted him by the name of Jupiter's ſon. Hereupon he took the name upon him, and to his Mother Olympias as well as others wrote with that Title. She facetiouſly checked him for ſlandring, and bringing her in danger with Juno, by making her an Whore to Jupiter. By the terrour hereof he hoped to do wonders with the Barbarians, and becauſe Hammon was painted with the upper part like a Ram, and the nether like to a man, he alſo would appear to be horned, for which reaſon amongſt the Arabians he obtained the name of Dulcarnaiin. When he received an anſwer ſatisfactory, as he pretended, he returned into Egypt the ſame way he came, or, as another wrote, by a more direct one towards Memphis.

Goeth to the Temple of Jupiter Hammon.

Gellius lib. 13. cap. 4.

Arrianus. Curtius. Juſtin. Joſephus de bello lib. 2. Antiquit. lib. 11. *cap.*8.

52. Being come to Memphis, he received many Embaſſies from Greece, whence alſo came a new ſupply of Forces, viz. four hundred Greekiſh Mercenaries from Antipater, and five hundred horſe out of Theſſaly. The neighbouring Cities he exhauſted for the peopling his new one, which he ordained ſhould be the Metropolis of Egypt. Amongſt other ſorts of people the Jews alſo whoſe fidelity he approved, were inrolled inhabitants, having equal privilege with Græcians, and obtaining the name not only of Alexandrians, but of Macedonians alſo: and to the Souldiers of Sanballat the Cuthean, who followed him into Egypt, cauſed he Lands to be aſſigned in Thebais, which Province he committed to their defence. He greatly deſired to ſee not onely the remoter parts of Egypt, but Æthiopia alſo: but the War depending yet with Darius, hindred him, and therefore diſpoſing of Egypt, he removed in the Spring to Tyre in Phœnicia. Over Egypt he left Æſchylus the Rhodian, and Peuceſtes the Macedonian, with four thouſand Souldiers; and the care of the River Nile he committed to Polemon, with thirty Gallies. As for the Civil Government, he left it to Dolaſpes the Egyptian, to rule according to the antient Laws.

Curtius.

53. Ere his departure, he underſtood of the death of Andromachus the Governour of Syria, whom the Samaritans had burnt alive. With all expedition he removed to revenge his death, but being on his way, the murderers were delivered up to him, whom he puniſhed according to their deſerts, and placed Memnon in his Room. Taking the City Samaria, he gave it to the Macedonians to inhabit, but the Country about it to the Jews, for their fidelity to him, with immunity from Tribute. Coming to Tyre, he celebrated Games, as he had done at Memphis, and ſacrifized again to Hercules; and nominating ſeveral Governours over the places already Conquered, took his journey towards Euphrates.

Euſebius.

Joſephus contra Apionem lib. 2.

Arrianus, Curtius, &c.

54. Darius having underſtood of his deſign, to find him out whitherſoever he ſhould go, gave out orders for all his Forces to meet at Babylon, whereof ſome conſiſted of ſuch Nations as rather ſeemed to fill up the names of men than to make reſiſtance. This Army being almoſt greater by the half than that which periſhed at Iſſus, many Soldiers wanted Arms, which were ſought for with all diligence. Some have reckoned one Million of Foot, and four hundred thouſand horſe, beſides two hundred Chariots, and fifteen Indian Elephants; whereas Alexander his Forces amounted but to Fourty thouſand Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe. In the moneth Hecatombæon Alexander came to Thapſacus, where he found two bridges on the River Euphrates; but ſuch as reached not quite over to the further ſide. Mazæus was ſent thither to hinder his paſſage, with order alſo if he could not do this, to ſpoyl, and deſtroy all things in his way; but upon his approach he made haſte away, and Alexander then making up the bridges, tranſported over all his Forces, and ſo proceeding through Meſopotamia, having Euphrates and the Armenian Mountains on his left hand, made for Babylon, not the neareſt way, but that which was more convenient for proviſion and moderation of heat. As he went forwards, he was given to underſtand by ſome Scouts which he took, that the King had pitch't his Camp on the further ſide of the River Tigris, with intentions to hinder his paſſage, but coming thither, he neither found him, nor any oppoſition at all. This River was ſo ſwift (being upon that account by the Perſians called the Arrow) that by the violent force of its ſtream it drave many weighty ſtones before it, and thoſe that lay in the bottom were made ſo round, and well poliſhed by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on ſo ſlippery a footing, ſo that the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, were forced to enterlace their Arms, thereby making one weighty body to reſiſt the fury of the ſtream; ſo deep the Channel was on the further ſide, that to keep their Bowes from being wet, as alſo their Arrows, and Darts, they were inforced to lift them above their heads, ſo that Darius might here have eaſily reſiſted the Macedonians, and given a check to the fortune of the Conqueror, had not the fate of the dying Perſian Empire beſotted his mind, and deprived him even of all common prudence.

Alexander paſſeth Euphrates,

And Tigris.

55. Having (though with great danger) paſſed the River without any loſs ſave of a little of the Baggage, he led on through Aſſyria, having on the right hand the River Tigris, and on the left the Gordian Mountains. On the fourth day after his paſſage Mazæus ſent a party of one thouſand horſe to attaque him, which was eaſily repelled by the Pæonian Captain Ariſton, who ſlew their Captain, and bringing his head to Alexander, demanded a Cup of Gold as his fee, according to the cuſtom of their Country, to whom he replied, ſmiling, That an empty one was due, but he would give him one full of good Liquor. Two days he here continued, giving orders for a march the next morning; but it hapned that in the firſt watch the Moon was eclipſed, and ſeemed of a bloody colour, whereat (as all other common people long time after) the Macedonians, not knowing An Eclipſe of the Moon diſcourageth his men.

ing the cauſe, were marvelouſly affrighted. They apprehended it as a certain token or preſage of their overthrow and deſtruction, and began to murmur, that for the ambition of one man that diſdained to own Philip for his father, and would be called the ſon of Jupiter, they ſhould all periſh, being forced to make War, not only againſt Worlds of Enemies, But againſt Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themſelves. He knowing it to be dangerous to lead his Army to fight whileſt it was poſſeſſed with matter of terrour, called the Egyptian Aſtrologers, to aſſure them that this Eclipſe was rather a certain preſage of good ſucceſs: and he made it out onely by this reaſon, that the Græcians were under the Aſpect of the Sun, and the Perſians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being thus darkned, the Perſian glory was to be Eclipſed. Ariſtander the Southſayer affirmed the ſame, promiſed Alexander good ſucceſs, and affirmed a battel was to be fought in that ſame moneth, for the ſacrifices portended victory. Hereby the Souldiers were ſettled, and their courage redoubled, according to the great influence of ſuperſtition upon the common ſort of people.

Statira the wife of Darius dieth.

56. Thinking it wiſdom to make uſe of the preſent diſpoſition of their minds he marched thence, and proceeded, till he heard that Darius was not much above twenty miles diſtant from him, upon notice whereof he reſted there his Army for four days. Here were intercepted Letters written by Darius to the Græcians, to perſwade them to kill, or betray him, which by the advice of Parmenio he ſuppreſſed, and removing thence it hapned that Statira, the Wife and Siſter of Darius, through the tediouſneſs of the journey, and grief, fell into untimely travel, and died; at which diſaſter Alexander ſhed tears, and ſpared no coſt in ſolemnizing her Funerals, grieving that he was thus deprived of ſo fair an occaſion of ſhewing mercy. One of her Chamberlaines, by name Tireos, an Eunuch, ſlipped away, and carried the news of her death unto Darius. He fell of beating his head, and deplored the fortune of the Perſians, which not only ſuffered the Queen to be taken Captive, but dying in that condition to want the Ornament of a Royal Funeral. Being ſatisfied that there was no want of any ſuch Ceremonies, or of tears from his Enemy to bedew her Hearſe, he fell into a jealous conceit that nothing but unchaſte affections had drawn them from Alexander, and lamented his Wife's condition, who had been ſubjected to the luſtful power of the Conqueror. But being with much ado perſwaded of his continency, with hands lifted up to Heaven, he prayed that he himſelf might be able to reſtore the fortune of the Perſians to his poſterity as he found it, that ſo he might be in capacity to requite Alexander for his noble carriage towards his relations: But if the fatal time was come, and it ſo ſeemed good to Nemeſis, and the viciſſitude of worldly things, that the Perſian Empire ſhould receive its period; that none but Alexander might ſit in the Throne of Cyrus.

Vide Plut. in vita Alexand.

5.

Juſtin,Curtius. Diodorus ut ſuprà.

57. He diſpatched away to him then a another Embaſſy of ten of his principal friends, and offered him for his Mother, and two Daughters at Ranſom of thirty thouſand Talents, and in portion with his Daughter Statira all Aſia, betwixt the Helleſpont and the River Euphrates. He anſwered, that ſometimes he endeavoured to corrupt his friends, and otherwhiles his Soldiers to deſtroy him, and that therefore he was to be proſecuted not as a juſt and fair enemy, but as a pernicious murderer: that what he had already got, though now offered to him, was the reward of War, by which the bounds of both their Kingdoms ſhould be limited, and that they ſhould both abide by what the fortune of the next day ſhould aſſign them. Darius had before this come to Arbela a City belonging to Babylon, where leaving the greateſt part of his baggage, he went to the River Lycus, over which laying a Bridge, he tranſported his Army in eight days, and proceeding ten miles pitcht his Camp upon the River Bumelus, near to a Village called Gaugamela, which in the Perſian Language ſignified the houſe of a Camel; for that Darius the Son of Hyſtaſpes gave this place to the maintenance of a certain Camel which had been tired in carrying his proviſions through the Deſarts of Scythia. This was a Champain Country and ſuch grounds as were high he cauſed to be levelled, to be convenient for the fighting of his Horſe, and that he might have a free proſpect round about him.

Strabo lib. 16.

A Pannick fear ſeizeth on the Macedonians.

58. Underſtanding from his Ambaſſadors returning, that he muſt expect nothing but a battel, he ſent Mazæus to defend a paſſage which he never yet dared ſo much as to hazard; the reſt of the Army he cauſed to march above a mile farther in battel-aray, and there to expect the Enemy. Alexander fortifying his Camp which he left with an ordinary Guard, went forwards towards the Enemy, and in his march a pannick fear ſeized on his Army, by reaſon of the Lightning of the Heavens in the Summer-ſeaſon, which they took as proceeding from ſome attempt of Darius; with ſome pains he undeceived them, and thought good to fortifie himſelf in the ſame place that night. Yet in the night he departed thence about the ſecond watch, as thinking to fall on the Enemy by break of day. Upon his approach Mazæus with his Horſe forſook an Hill which he had ſeized, and returned to Darius, and this place Alexander by the advice of Parmenio choſe himſelf, as ſafer than the Plain, and from which one might take a full view of the Perſian Army. Before the Fight his friends came to him and complained of the Soldiers, becauſe in their conſerences they had agreed to take all the profit of the plunder to themſelves, without bringing any thing to his Treaſury; whereat he ſmiled, and ſaid, they told him good news concerning the diſcourſes of ſuch as were reſolved to overcome, and not to flie. Many then of the Soldiers reſorted to him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of the Enemies, which would not endure their very ſhouting for the battel.

Plutarch in Apophthegm.

59. The two Armies lying in the view of each other, in the eleventh night after the Eclipſe of the Moon, Darius kept all his men in Arms, muſt'ring his Forces by torch-light, which made all the Plain betwixt Niphates and the Gordyæan mountains be of a flame. Alexander in the mean time whilſt his Macedonians took their reſt, was buſie in his ſacrifice with Ariſtander. Parmenio and others would have had him fallen upon the Perſians in the dead of the night, thereby to ſtrike more terror into them; but he anſwered, them, that he would not ſteal Victory; which Darius was afraid of, and therefore contained his men in Arms all the night, which not a little injured his affairs the day following. All the night Alexander paſſed without reſt, being careful for the main chance; but about the morning watch fell ſo faſt aſleep, that it being full day he could hardly be awaked, and to his friends demanding the cauſe thereof he replyed, that now he was eaſed by Darius of all his care, ſeeing he had gathered all his Forces into one place, and therefore in one day he hoped to put an end to his daily labours and danger. His whole force conſiſted of about ſeven thouſand Horſe, and fourty thouſand Foot, over which his chiefeſt Captains were Parmenio, with Philotas and Nicanor his Sons, whereof this commanded the Foot-Regiment of the Argyraſpides, or Silver-Shields; Cænus, who commanded the Elimiots; Perdiccas Captain of the Oreſtæ and Lynceſtæ; Meleager; Polyſperchon; Hepheſtion Captain of his Life-guard; Menidas; Philip the Son of Balaccus; Craterus; Erigyus the Mitylenæan; Philip that headed the Theſſalian Troops, and Clytus the black who lead the Kings Regiment. He himſelf commanded the right wing, and in both cauſed the battel to be made ſomething bendingwiſe, leſt they ſhould be incompaſſed with the multitudes of the Perſians.

Idem in Alexand. Curtius. Arrianus Diodorus.

60. Darius having marſhalled his men according to their ſeveral Nations, took the command of the wing oppoſite to Alexander, and led on againſt him. After a ſound to the charge on both ſides, and a great ſhout, the Armies met, and in the firſt place the ſcythed Chariots being driven with great fury upon the Macedonians, ſtruck them with great conſternation, for that Mazæus the General of the Horſe following the Chariots cloſe, made the charge the more terrible. But the Macedonian phalange, according to the King's order, beating their Targets with their Spears, made ſuch a noiſe, that the Horſes ſkared therewith bore backwards, and retreated for the moſt part; and though ſome went ſtill forwards, yet the Macedonians parting aſunder, made a lane and let them paſs through, but with the loſs of many whom the Scythes had caught. After the Arrows and Darts were ſpent, the Armies came to hand-ſtrokes, wherein the Horſe were firſt ingaged. Darius in the left wing was ſtoutly defended by his followers, who fighting under his eye, laboured all they could with their multitudes to oppreſs the Macedonians. And Mazæus in the Right wing charging with great valour, at the firſt onſet did great execution. Then ſent he a Party of two thouſand Caducians, and one thouſand of the choiceſt Scythian Horſe, to fall upon the Enemies Camp, where a great tumult following, ſome of the captive women took their opportunity, and got away to their friends, but Siſygambis Mother to Darius refuſed to ſtir, and kept her ſelf quiet in the ſame place, not thinking it fit to truſt her ſelf to the doubtful fortune of an eſcape, or ſhew any ingrateful diſreſpect to Alexander: the Scythians plundered moſt of the baggage and departed.

The battel of Gaugamela.

Darius flieth.

60. In the mean while, part of the Horſe that fought about Darius, with their multitudes preſſed ſore upon the Macedonians, and forced them back, whereby the ſecond time the Victory ſeemed to incline towards the Perſians. Alexander ſeeing how he was concerned to relieve his men, broke out with his own Regiment upon Darius himſelf, and with a Dart ſlew his Chariot-driver. The Courtiers hereupon crying out, thoſe that were further off ſuppoſed the King himſelf to have been ſlain, and therewith betook themſelves to their Heels, which the next ſeeing fled alſo for company. The Ranks alſo about Darius began to be broken, till at length all one ſide was bared, and then he accounted it time to fly, and therewithal ſuch a Duſt was raiſed, Alexander with his Troops giving the chaſe, that it could not be diſcovered which way he fled, uſing great celerity therein, and for that purpoſe mounting a Mare that had lately foaled, as he had done before at the battel at Iſſus. Whilſt theſe things were thus carried in the left Wing, Mazæus in the right ſore preſſed upon his adverſaries, which Parmenio with the Theſſalian Horſe and others for a time ſuſtained; but being put ſore to it, he ſent to Alexander for ſpeedy relief. But he could not be found; ſo that he was forced to uſe his utmoſt Skill in making the Theſſalians endure the brunt; and at length put the Barbarians to flight, after they were diſheartned with the report of their Princes Fortune.

The number ſlain.

61. Darius with a few in his Company came to the River Lycus, which having paſſed, when ſome adviſed him to break down the Bridge, leſt the Enemy ſhould make uſe thereof in the Purſuit, knowing that if he ſhould do ſo, he muſt leave many thouſands of his Men as a Prey to him, he anſwered, that he had rather give way to the purſuers, than take it from thoſe that fled. Here Alexander immediately purſued him, but not being able to reach him, he returned, and fought a more ſharp encounter than ever with ſome Parthians, Indians, and many of the valianteſt of the Perſians, wherein though he had the better, yet he loſt Sixty of his followers, and Hephæſtion with Cœnus and Mendas were wounded. Of the Barbarians (a) one maketh above ninty thouſand to have been ſlain, of the Macedonians five hundred, and many wounded. Another (b) counteth of the former three hundred thouſand to have been ſlain, and a great number taken, with all the Elephants, and ſuch Chariots as were not broken; Yet of Alexander's men but one hundred at moſt, with one thouſand Horſes, partly killed outright, and partly heart broken in the chaſe. A (c) third reckoneth forty thouſand Perſians, and leſs than three hundred Macedonians to have been loſt. This Battle was fought at Gaugamela a Village ſituate upon the River Bumelus, which being but an obſcure place, the Macedonians to innoble their Victory, gave out that it was at Arbela a Town of good note, ſome fifteen Miles diſtant, beyond the River Lycus. Alexander obtained the Victory on the fifth day of the Moneth Boedromion, in the ſixth year of his Reign, as alſo the ſixth of Darius; Ariſtophanes (not Ariſtophontes his Succeſſor, as ſome miſtook) being Archon at Athens, in the ſecond year of the hundreth and twelvth Olympiad. A. M. 3674.

(a) Diodorus.
(b) Arianus.
(c) Curtius.

A. M. 3674.
Olymp. 112.an. 4. V. C. 423.
Darii 6.
Alexand. 6.

Alexander declared King of Aſia.

62. Darius fled from the River Lycus to Arbela, where he arrived about midnight, and then concluding that Alexander would march to Babylon and Suſa, reſolved to flee to the utmoſt Borders of his Kingdom, there to renew the War; and accordingly withdrew himſelf into Media, beyond the Mountains of Armenia. About midnight Alexander ſet forwards for Arbela, hoping to take him there with all his Treaſure; but arriving the next day, he found not him, but met with much Treaſure, with his Bow and Target. Now ſeemed the Empire of the Perſians to all men to be diſſolved, and thereupon Alexander was declared King of Aſia, and for joy thereof ſacrificed with great magnificence to his Gods, and beſtowed Riches, Houſes, and Countries upon his Friends. Foreſeeing that the Air thereabouts, by reaſon of the corruption of the dead Bodies might be infectious, he removed with all ſpeed from Arbela towards Babylon, being in his way met with Mazæus the Governour, who gave it up into his Hands, and Bagophanes the Keeper of the Caſtle and the King's Treaſures, leſt he ſhould be exceeded by Mazæus, cauſed the way to be ſtrowed with Flowers and Garlands; ſilver Altars heaped with Frankincenſe and other Odours being placed on both ſides. The Towns-men came alſo to meet him, whom he commanded to follow his Rear, and ſo entered the City and Palace in a Chariot, with his armed men about him. Thirty days he ſpent in* looking over Darius his houſholdſtuff, all which time his Army glutted themſelves with the contentments of the Town. Here the Chaldæans ſhewed him the Entereth Babylon.

* Juſtin lib. 11. Curtius. Diodorus.

motions of the Stars, and the appointed viciſſitudes of times: and Caliſthenes the Philoſopher ſent into Greece unto Ariſtotle (whoſe couſin-german his Mother was.) the Cœleſtial obſervations of (a) one thouſand nine hundred and three years. He conſulted theſe men about his affairs, and at their deſire cauſed ſuch Temples to be rebuilt, as Xerxes had out of anger deſtroyed, after his overthrow in Greece. And eſpecially care was taken for that of Belus in the midſt of the City, the Ruines of which were ſo great, that the labour of (a) ten thouſand men for two months was required for the clearing of the ground. He commanded all his Soldiers to lay their hands to the work, amongſt which the Jews only refuſed to do it, who thereupon received great incommodity, till ſuch time as they were diſcharged of this task by the King, as (c) Hecatæus the Abderite wrote in his Book concerning the Jews, who alſo at that time lived with Alexander.

63. He committed the charge of the Caſtle of Babylon to Agathon of Pydna, with a Garriſon of ſeven hundred Macedonians, and three hundered Mercenaries, appointing Mazæus the Satrapa of the Country. To Apollodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetes of Pella, he aſſigned the Government of the Militia of the Satrapies of Babylon, and the other Countries as far as Cilicia, leaving them two thouſand Foot, and ten hundred talents of Silver, to hire as many Soldiers as they could; and to Mithrinas who betrayed the Caſtle of Sardis unto him, he granted Armenia. Of the money which he found at Babylon, to every Macedonian Horſe-man he gave ſeven Minæ (each Attick Mina containing an hundred Drachmes, and about three Pound two Shillings ſix Pence Sterling) and to every ſtranger five; to every Macedonian Foot-man two; and to every ſtranger two moneths pay, for a reward. Then ſet he forwards from Babylon, and in his way met with a ſupply of five hundred Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot, ſent out of Macedonia, with ſix hundred Horſe out of Thrace, and three thouſand five hundred Foot; and out of Peloponneſus four thouſand Foot, and three hundred and eighty, (or according to Diodorus little leſs than one thouſand) Horſe. Theſe were alſo accompanied with fifty of the Noblemen's Sons of Macedonia, for a Guard to the Kings perſon.

Cometh to Suſa.

64. Drawing near to Suſa, he met with the Son of the Satrapa thereof, ſent unto him with a Meſſenger that brought Letters from Philoxenus, whom preſently after the Battle at Gaugamela he had ſent thither. The Letters imported that the Suſians had yielded their City to him, and that all the King's Treaſure was ſafe for him, which Abulites the Satrapa ſent his Son alſo to ſignifie, either for that he thought to obtain favour, or as ſome thought, being underhand ordered by Darius to do ſo; that Alexander being buſied with ſuch Booty, he might have time to conſult the better for his own affairs. On the twentieth day after his departure from Babylon he arrived at Suſa, where he took poſſeſſion of betwixt fourty and fifty thouſand (as is to be gathered from all Authors) Talents of Silver, beſides Gold and Rich Furniture. Many things he there found, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, and amongſt the reſt the brazen Statues of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, which he ſent back unto Athens. He left the Mother and Children of Darius at Suſa, with Maſters to teach them the Greek Tongue, and then committing the City to the care of Archelaus, the Caſtle to Xenophilus, the Treaſury to Callicrates, and the Satrapy of the Countrey of Suſa to Abulites, in four encampings he came to the River Paſitigris, being reſolved to invade Perſia.

Diodorus.
Curtius.
Plutarch.

Arrianus.
Polyænus. Stratagem. lib. 4.

65. Near to the Countrey of Suſa lieth that of the Uxians, running out into the Borders of Perſia, and leaving a ſtraight paſſage betwixt it ſelf and the Suſian Dominions. The inhabitants of the low-land Countrey became without much ado ſubject to Alexander; but the other with ſome ſlaughter he forced to ſubmit; and whereas they demanded money of him which they uſed to receive from the Kings of Perſia for their paſſage, he impoſed a Tribute of one hundred Horſes, five hundred Cattle, and thirty thouſand Sheep yearly to be paid; they living like Shepheards, and uſing no Money. After this he committed the Baggage, with the Theſſalian Horſe, the Mercenaries and Aſſociates, with the reſt of the Army that uſed heavy Armour, to Parmenio, to lead that way into Perſia, that was paſſable with Carriages; and he himſelf taking the Macedonian Foot with the Horſe of the Aſſociates, and others, with all ſpeed marched a nearer one through the hilly Countrey. Being arrived at the Pylæ, or Straights of Perſia, he found Ariobarzanes, a Perſian Satrapa, ſeized thereof, by whom he was repulſed alſo with ſome diſgrace and loſs, being forced to retreat four miles from the Straights; but at length being led

He is oppoſed at the Straights of Perſia by Ariobarzanes.

(a) Porphyrius apud Simplicium de Cœlo l. 2.

(b) Strabo lib. 16. pag. 738.

(c) Apud Joſeph. contr. Apionem lib. 1.

led by a Shepherd another difficult way, he came upon his Enemies on a ſudden, and put them to flight. But Ariobarzanes in the midſt of near forty Horſe and five thouſand Foot, with great Slaughters on both ſides broke through the Army of the Macedonians, which on both ſides had beſet him, and made for Perſepolis, the chief City of that Country; but being ſhut out by thoſe that kept it for the Conqueror, he turned again upon his Enemies, and with great valour renewing the Battel, periſhed with all his followers.

He cometh to Perſepolis.

Which he cauſeth to be plundered.

66. Having private notice from Tiridates the Eunuch, Keeper of the Treaſure at Perſepolis, that they there had an intention to rifle it upon hearing of his coming, he took the Horſe, and all the Night marched thitherwards. Being a quarter of a mile from the Town, about eight hundred Græcians met him in manner of Suppliants, whom the former Perſian Kings had reduced into bondage, and as a token of ſlavery cut off their Feet, Hands, Ears, or Noſes, and having marked them with ſome Barbarian Letters, kept them as laughing ſtocks for deriſion. They beſought Alexander, that as he had done by Greece, ſo he would alſo deliver them from the cruelty of their Enemies. He offered to ſend them back; but they rather choſe to receive ſome grounds to live on, than returning home, to carry greater diſgrace than comfort to their Relations. To each of them he gave three thouſand Drachms and ten Garments, with Cattel, Sheep, and Corn, for the ſtocking of their Grounds. The next day he called a meeting of his Officers, whom he told that there was no City more inveterate againſt the Græcians than that, which had been the Seat of the Perſian Kings, and that therefore by the deſtruction of it they were to make a Parentation to their Anceſtors. The Town, all beſides the Palace, he allowed the Soldiers to plunder, who made a great ſlaughter of Captives, and got ineſtimable Riches in that place, which heretofore of all, they had been moſt ſecure. Entring the Caſtle, he received the Treaſure which there had been heaped up from the time of Cyrus the Great, containing a great quantity of Gold and Silver. Diodorus ſaith, he took thence one hundred and twenty Talents, Gold being reckoned at the reckoning of Silver, part of which he employed in the preſent ſervice of the War, and the reſt ſent to Suſa to be kept.

He harrazeth the Country of Perſia.

Burneth in a Frollick the Palace of Perſepolis.

67. Leaving a Garriſon in Perſepolis, and a great part of the Army with the baggage there, with one thouſand Horſe and a party of Foot, he made an invaſion into Perſia. Much rain fell, and grievous Tempeſts enſued, but he perſevered in his purpoſe, as alſo when they came to ſuch places as were full of Snow and Ice; and though the Inhabitants fled from their Cottages to the Mountains, and killed his Stragglers, yet he brought them to ſubmit; and laying waſt the Territories of Perſia, ſubdued alſo the Mardi, a Warlike Nation, differing much from the Cuſtoms of the other Perſians; and on the thirtieth day returned to Perſepolis. Then did he diſtribute Gifts to his Friends, making no ſpare of Treaſure, and there he wintered four Months, rather enervating than refreſhing his Army with the delicacies of the Place. For the Celebration of his Victories he offered magnificent Sacrifices, and Feaſted his Friends Princely; and to the Feaſt admitted Courtiſans. Amongſt the reſt, was Thais the Athenian, the Miſtreſs of Ptolemy, the Son of Lagus. She gave out, that the King would Atchieve a moſt gallant Enterprize, if, in a Frollick, he would with them ſet on fire the Pallace, and thereby, in one moment, overthrow the Glory of the Perſians by the Hands of Women. This finding acceptance amongſt the younger ſort, now in the midſt of their Cups, one amongſt them deſired that they might Revenge the Injuries offered to the Temples of the Greeks with burning Fire-brands, which was ſeconded by others; but yet they ſaid, that ſo great an Affair did only belong to Alexander. He being moved herewith, was led out by Thais in a Dance with the Minſtrels, and ſhe receiving a Fire-Brand from him, firſt ſet it to the Pallace, after which all the reſt followed; and ſo that Structure was reduced into Aſhes. Thus was the Fury of Xerxes againſt Athens revenged by a Woman, and Native of that City, in the ſame way, though accompanied with deriſion. But Alexander afterward repented too late, alledging that he ſhould more grievouſly have puniſhed the Perſians, by forcing them to behold him ſeated in the Pallace and Throne of Xerxes.

Cometh to Paſargadæ.

68. From Perſepolis he removed to Paſargadæ, a City founded by Cyrus the Great, and the ancient Seat of the Perſian Kings; which being delivered up to him by Gobaſes the Governour, he therein found ſix thouſand Talents. Here he ſaw the Sepulchre of Cyrus in a Garden; into which he Commanded Ari-

Strabo lib. 15. pag. 730.

Sect. 4.

ſtobulus (who wrote the ſtory) to enter, who there found a Golden Bed, a Table, and Cups, with a Golden Basket, and great ſtore of Apparel, and Robes adorned with Pearl. On this place Cyrus overthrew Aſtyages the Mede in his laſt Battel, and thereby obtaining the Soveraignty of Aſia, in memorial of it built this City, and a Palace, which being by Curtius named Perſagadæ, or Paſagada, ſignifieth the Army of the Perſians. Then Alexander either by force or fair means, became Maſter of all the other Cities of Perſia, about the time of the riſing of the ſeven Stars, from which the Antients uſed to begin their Summer. He placed over this Country Phraſaortes a Satrapa, and then being minded to purſue Darius, ſet forwards for Media, where he heard he was; but being within three days Journey of Ecbatane, there met him Biſthanes the Son of Ochus, who reigned before Darius. He aſſured him that the King was gone thence five days before, having taken with him ſeven or eight thouſand Talents, and being accompanied with an Army of ſix thouſand Foot and three thouſand Horſe.

Gad, turma. Stephanus.

Arrianus.

He cometh to Ecbatane.

What Darius did after the battel of Gaugamela.

69. Darius ſtayed at Ecbatane ſome time, to receive ſuch of his Soldiers as had eſcaped the Battel; and for the furniſhing of them with Arms. He raiſed Forces in the Neighbouring Nations, and ſent to the Satrapa of Bactria, and the higher Countries to retain them in obedience. And he determined, if Alexander ſhould ſtay about Babylon or Suſa, to continue in Media in expectation of ſome better change of Fortune: But if he ſhould purſue him, then to betake himſelf into Parthia, or as far as Bactria, and lay all the Country waſt as far as he paſſed, to cut off proviſions from the Purſuer. He ſent therefore the Women with all his Furniture and Carriages to the Caſpian Straights, and ſtayed himſelf with ſuch Forces as he had raiſed at Ecbatane, till ſuch time as Alexander was within leſs than two hundred miles of him. Then thought he of Bactria; but fearing to be overtaken by Alexander (againſt whoſe celerity no diſtance ſeemed to be ſufficient) he changed his purpoſe, and though he fled, yet prepared he himſelf rather for a Fight than Flight. His Army conſiſted now (according to Curtius) of thirty thouſand Foot (whereof four thouſand were Grecians, commanded by Patron, (a man for his conſtant Fidelity to Darius, never enough to be commended) and three thouſand three hundred Bactrian Horſe, under the Command of Beſſus the Satrapa of the Country.

Curtius lib. 5.

70. Alexander being come to Ecbatane, ſent back towards the Sea the Theſſalian Horſe, and other Aſſociates, beſtowing on them, beſides their full pay, two thouſand Talents. To Parmenio he gave in charge to bring all the Treaſure out of Perſia into Ecbatane, to be committed to the truſt of Harpalus, whom he left with a Garriſon of ſix thouſand Macedonians, beſides ſome Horſe, and of the Aſſociates; and then afterwards he ordered him to march through the Country of the Caduſians into Hyrcania. Clitus he Commanded to go with his own Regiment into Parthia, whither he himſelf intended to come; but now with a ſelect party, with incredible ſpeed purſued Darius, and in eleven Encampings came to Rhagæ. Here ſeeing no hope ever to reach him (who before this had paſſed the Caſpian Streights) he ſtayed five days, and then marched for Parthia, and on the firſt day pitched his Camp by the Straights, and on the next having entred them, news was brought to him concerning the Captivity of Darius.

Alexander purſueth him.

71. For, Beſſus the Satrapa of Bactria, and Nabarzanes a Colonel of Horſe, though his own Servants, rebelled againſt him, and drawing their Men to their party, cauſed him to be bound, with an intention if Alexander ſhould overtake them, to curry favour with him by the delivery of ſuch a Priſoner into his hands; but if they ſhould eſcape, then to kill him, ſeiſe upon his Kingdom, and renew the War. They ſeized on his money and ſtuff, and taking into their ſociety Brazus, or Barzaentes, the Satrapa of the Arachoti and Drangi, led him away Captive in a Chariot, bound in Golden Fetters, as beſeemed ſo great a King; but yet, leſt he ſhould be known, they covered the Chariot with baſe Skins, and unknown Men drove it, his Keepers following aloof off, leſt he ſhould be diſcovered to any that asked of him. The Perſians having none now to follow, joyned themſelves to the Bactrians, and with the reſt owned Beſſus for their General. But Artabazus with his Sons and Soldiers, as alſo the Greeks (whoſe Captain was Patron) ſeparated themſelves from them, and taking another way towards the Mountains out of the high Road, departed, and went into Parthiene.

Beſſus and others bind Darius.

72. Upon notice of this Conſpiracy, Alexander concluded that more haſte was to be uſed, and therefore taking along with him a party fit for ſuch Expedition, he left the reſt of the Army to Craterus to come after with more leiſure; and travelling all that Night, and the next day till Noon, gave his men a little time to reſt, and then again ſetting forward, came the next morning to that place where Bagiſtenes the Babylonian (who brought him notice of the condition of Darius) had departed. Then again marching faſt that night, and the day following until noon, he came to the place where Beſſus laid hands on Darius, as * one telleth us; but as * another, where they that conducted him had reſted the day before. Here he met with Melon, Darius his Interpreter, who being ſick and not able to follow, now counterfeited himſelf a Fugitive, and fully acquainted Alexander with the King's Condition. He hereby was further quickened up to uſe all expedition, but his men ſpent with continual travel muſt needs have reſt, and therefore he made five hundred Horſemen to diſmount, and the Officers of Foot, and others moſt valiant amongſt them to take their Horſes, being arrived as before, that ſo they might be both Horſe and Footmen as need ſhould require.

* Curtius.
* Arrianus.

73. Whilſt he was thus buſied, Orſillos and Mithracenes, two Perſians who deteſted the Parricide of Beſſus, came back from him, and acquainted Alexander that he was five hundred Furlongs off, but that they could lead him a nearer way, whereby he might ſoon overtake him. With this Conduct he began his Journey that Night, and being come three hundred Furlongs, Encountred Brocubelus (or Antibelus) the Governor once of Syria under Darius, who told him that Beſſus was but two hundred Furlongs off; that as he thought he made for Hyrcania, and marched out of order as fearing no danger, and therefore might eaſily be ſurpriſed. He then continued his induſtry to overtake him, but he and his Complices had notice of his approach, and coming to Darius, bad him mount on Horſeback, and withdraw himſelf by flight from the Enemy. He refuſing to do this, Satibarzanes and Barzaentes threw darts upon him, and leaving him mortally wounded, wounded alſo the Horſes that drew him, leſt they ſhould follow far; and killed two Slaves which accompanied him, having none now to follow him but a Dog which he had brought up. Having done this, the murtherers with ſix hundred fled with full ſpeed, and that they might not venture altogether, Narbarzanes went towards Hyrcania, and Beſſus with a few Horſemen in his Company kept on the way for Bactria. The reſt of their men ſtragled as they were led either by hope or fear; five hundred Horſemen imbodied themſelves, not knowing whether to flee, or to receive and fight the purſuing Enemies.

And upon Alexander's approaching mortally wounded him.

Ælian. Hiſt. animal. l.6.c.25.

74. But Alexander having notice of the fear and anxiety of the Enemy, ſent Nicanor with part of the Horſe on before to reſtrain their flight, he with the reſt following after; and when they were come up, ſo little courage appeared in the Perſians, that though they reſiſted, yet three thouſand were preſently ſlain, and the reſt ſtraggled about like Sheep, Alexander giving command then to his Soldiers to abſtain from ſlaughters. Now appeared an incredible thing, more Priſoners than they that took them, whilſt the Conquered were ſo ſtupified, that they neither conſidered their own multitude, nor the ſmall number of their Enemies. In the mean while, the Beaſts that drew Darius having none to drive them, wandred out of the way for half a mile, and being wearied both by their wounds and heat, ſtood ſtill in a certain Valley. Not far of was a Spring, to which Polyſtratus a Macedonian being directed, came almoſt ſpent with thirſt, and whilſt he was drinking water in his Helmet, he eſpied the Horſes fainting away, by reaſon of the darts ſticking in their ſides, and drawing near to conſider of the matter, found Darius in the Chariot ſorely wounded, but yet breathing. He deſired ſome water of him to drink, which though none of the beſt, yet he ſaid was the beſt that ever he drank. He prayed him to carry his thanks to Alexander, for his great humanity and courteſie towards his Relations. As for himſelf, he deſired rather a ſeemly than noble Burial, but bad him put him in mind how dangerous it would be to all Princes to ſuffer his death to go unpuniſhed. He wiſhed him the Empire of the whole World, and gave his hand to Polyſtratus as though to be preſented to Alexander; after which, wiſhing him a reward, for his kindneſs, from the Gods; he expired.

Darius diſcovered by Polyſtratus.

Dieth.

75. This was the end of the Life, Reign, and Empire of Darius, a man who, if we look at warlike matters, was fit for nothing leſs, but in other things did nothing unbeſeeming Royal Majeſty. And neither could he, for as ſoon as he began to Reign was he vexed by the Macedonians. Whilſt he lived, one Croſs preſently ſucceeded after another; neither could he enjoy any reſt from the beginning of his Reign: For within a while after, he received that overthrow at the River Granicus; then loſt he Æolia, Ionia, and both the Phrygia's; the Lydians alſo and Carians (all but the Hallicarnaſſians) and not long after Hallicarnaſſus it ſelf, and then all the Maritime Coaſt as far as Cilicia. After this he received a great overthrow at

A view of his Reign.

Iſſus, in which his Mother, Wife, and Children were taken: Phœnicia and Ægypt fell off from him. At Arbela (or Gaugamela) loſing a mighty Army conſiſting of all ſorts of people, he diſgracefully was forced to flee; then driven from his Kingdom, wandring up and down and wanting due Accommodations, at laſt he was betrayed by his own Servants, and at the ſame time both a King and a Captive was ignominiouſly bound in Fetters, and periſhed by the treachery of thoſe, from whom he ſhould have expected ſafety, as Arrianus writeth. This happened in the year that Ariſtophontes was Archon at Athens, in the Month Hecatombæon, when he had lived about fifty years, in the ſeventh year of his Reign, and the two hundred and third of this Empire, in the third year of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, A. M. 3675. three hundred and twenty eight years before the ordinary Æra of Chriſt.

76. We have ſeen the end of Darius, and the Concluſion of the Perſian Dominion; but have not yet done with the Perſian Hiſtory and Antiquities; many of which could not be made out nor diſcovered by the ſeries of thoſe Narrations concerning Cyrus and his Succeſſors, without breaking the order and method thereof; and therefore judging it fit more fully to inform the Reader therein, we ſhall preſent him with a proſpect of the Polity of that Kingdom, with this Caution and Admonition; that it reſpects and hath relation alſo to what followed in after times, when that People ſhook off the Macedonian Yoak, but became ſubject to the Parthians, and when they recovered their Liberty, and gave Laws to the Eaſtern Nations; and therefore we place it here not as an Apparatus to the Perſian Empire, but a general Light to their Affairs.

SECT. V.

The Polity, Cuſtoms, and Manners of the Perſians.

The King called himſelf King of Kings.

1. THe Government we ſee was Monarchical, the Head of which in reſpect to the great extent of his Dominions, had the Title of Great King, and King of Kings; however toward the Period of their power they were ſcoffed at, for challenging it, by Alexander and other Greeks. And after that Arſaces had overthrown Seleucus Callinicus, and brought the Perſians under the Parthian Yoke, his Succeſſors took it as an high Affront if it was not given them by the Roman Emperors; inſomuch that Phraates receiving a Letter from Auguſtus, directed to him as to bare Phraates, in his Anſwer took to himſelf that of King of Kings; and to be even with him, gave him no other than that of Cæſar. When the Perſians afterward recovered their liberty, and the Perſian Kingdom revived, the Kings thereof ſtill challenged it as their due: Particularly Sapor, in a Letter he wrote to Conſtantius the Emperor, aſſumed it together with other lofty Titles, as Ammianus Marcellinus tells us. But this was no more than what Nebuchadonoſor had done before.

Vide libros tres de Regio Perſarum Principatu ex Adverſariis Briſſonii.

Perſice Saanſaan quod Rex Regum ſonat ut Ammianus ſcribit lib. 19. ad initium.

The Kingdom Hereditary.

2. As the Government was Monarchical, ſo was it Hereditary; the Laws forbidding any to be admitted King, but one of the Royal Line if it had not failed. As herein they were conformable to the beſt Rules of Prudence, ſo alſo to the Dictates both of Prudence and Nature, in that the eldeſt Son was to be preferr'd. This was conſtantly and religiouſly obſerved for many Ages, till at length the Kingdom was beſtowed at the diſcretion of the Nobility, yet ever upon one of the Royal Family. Sometimes the Firſt-born after the Father was King, was preferred before the Elder Brother, whoſe Birth happened when his Father was yet but a private man, as we have ſeen in the caſe of Xerxes and his Brother; and long after becauſe Cabades was weak ſighted, Coſroes younger than he was advanced to the Throne, it being unlawful for any one to Reign amongſt them, that was imperfect or deformed in his Body. Generally Baſtards were not regarded when there were any legitimate Sons, and yet ſome will have Darius Nothus to have been preferred before fore Iſogæus the Legitimate Son of Artaxerxes. Though the Throne was not wont to be quitted but by Death, yet ſome Kings have given the Title to their Sons, while yet they lived, and when they went out on any Expedition, they were then wont to declare their Succeſſors. It was the Cuſtome for them to be inaugurated at Paſagarda by the Preiſts of their Nation, in the Temple of a certain Goddeſs like to Pallas. The ſolemnity was performed by putting off their own, and putting on the Garments which Cyrus wore when a private Man; eating a lump of Figgs, taſting a ſort of Turpentine, and drinking a draught of ſowre Milk, having firſt been inſtructed in the diſcipline of the Magi. On the new Kings Head was ſet a Bonet or Diadem called Cidaris. He was placed in a Royal Chair or Throne, and ſometimes would change his Name upon his promotion. Now was he adored by his Subjects as ſome God upon Earth, or rather the living Image of God. And the Adoration they performed by proſtrating themſelves on the Ground, which Alexander, after he grew ſo proud, required of his Macedonians. But Cyrus was the firſt that required and had it paid unto him; and that as ſoon as they came into his ſight, not only when they were near unto him. And it was paid not only by Subjects but alſo by Strangers. For if Ambaſſadors of other Nations refuſed to give this Adoration, they were not admitted to ſpeak to the King, but diſpached their Buſineſs by the Intervention of Meſſengers. This not only the Jewes, but the Greeks abhominated and derided as not due to any mortal Man. But much more reaſon they would have had to refuſe to adore his Image, which being of Gold, all were compelled to do that entred Babylon, in the time of Apollonius.

The manner of the Kings Promotion.

How adored and reſpected.

3. Such as ſaluted or thus adored them, were wont to wiſh them perpetual Life and Empire, agreeable to that we meet in Scripture, O King live for ever. And they were not to forget when they met them to fold their Hands in their ſleeves, the neglect whereof coſt Autoſaces and Mitræus dear, when Cyrus the younger uſurped againſt his Brother. This their Subjects might better do, becauſe they did it but very ſeldom; the Perſian Kings being very rarely ſeen abroad, that by converſation they might not become vile and deſpicable. This gave the greater opportunity to the Magus, who counterfeited Smerdis, to cheat the People, which was wonderfully pleaſed with Statira the Wife of Artaxerxas for uſing ſuch freedom, that ſhe would go abroad and be ſeen in her open litter, and give free acceſs to any of them, and that by order of her Husband, who was more kind in that reſpect alſo than his Predeceſſors. Without leave obtained none could enter the Palace, ſo that moſt tranſacted their Buſineſs at Court by Meſſengers, a greivance from which the Conſpirators agreed to free themſelves, except the King was private with his Wife, which Exception when Intaphernes diſregarded, it coſt him his Life. We know from the Book of Eſter how it was death to come into the inner Court, except the King was graciouſly pleaſed to reach out to the venturing Perſons his golden Sceptre. The Nobility were expected to wait before the Gate till they were called in, neither was it ſafe for them to neglect it. To be ſure it was capital for any Subject to ſit in the Kings Chair; neither was it lawful to weare his Robe. Nay ſuch reſpect they challenged from their Subjects, that Artaxerxes Longimanus, forbade that any in hunting ſhould ſtrike a Deer before he had caſt his Dart at him.

Looſed from the Laws and Abſolute.

4. But not onely by theſe Shadowes and Ceremonies was the Majeſty of the Perſian Kings kept from contempt, as with railes and barriers; they enjoyed not only the Shadow but the ſubſtance of Soveraignty. For they were looſed from the Laws, ſo as they might do whatever they liſted or luſted, as we have ſeen in the caſe of Cambyſes, his marrying his Siſter. As the Turke at this day moſt imitates theſe Patterns of the Perſian haughtineſs, ſo their pride in this particular, that all his Subjects he terms and holds as his Slaves; for ſo did alſo the Kings of whom we write, their Wives excepted; for, Wives they had who were eſteemed of ingenuous and free condition, of which amongſt the Turkes, none could boaſt except Roxolana. As they gave to their Subjects no better terms than that of Slaves, ſo they received from them that of Deſpots and Lords, which as the People owned them to be, ſo they obeyed them as ſuch, patiently and piouſly, as Curtius writes. What Burthens they laid upon them they willingly bore, and eſteemed it an Honour rather than an Injury to be beaten at the command of the King. Letters ſigned with his Seal none dared to contradict; neither was it, or rarely known, that any revealed his Secrets; the reaſon why Alexander was ſtill uncertain concerning the meaſures that Darius took; and Ammianus ſaith they worſhipped the Numen or Divinity of Silence. It's certain that no nation whatſoever ſhowed more dearneſs and affection to their Princes. They prayed for them; and they came not into their preſence without a preſent, which though never ſo mean was wont to be kindly received. As they travelled, Husband-men and others of the meaneſt ſort, preſented them with ſuch things as they had, and beſides with the firſt Fruits of the Grounds through which they paſſed. The ſtory of one who preſented Artaxerxes Mnemon with an Apple of a great bulk, and for it received a great reward; and of another who having nothing elſe, brought him ſome Water in both his Hands from the River, Cyrus, is celebrated both by Plutarch and Ælian.

Their Ornaments.

Κυρβασία

The Tiara.

5. The birth Days of their Kings they kept as Holydays, and not only honoured whilſt alive, but proſecuted them with the ſame reſpect when taken from them. For their death being known, Non-terme, for the ſpace of five Days, was injoyned, in which, Courts were ſhut up and Laws were ſilent. Moreover that Fire which every one kept alive in his Houſe, as ſacred and his Tutelar Deity, upon that occaſion was extinguiſhed. Such Majeſty and Power did even the betrayers of Darius own and acknowledg in him as King, that when they deſigned to give him up, they bound him in golden Chains and Fetters. And truly ſuch eſteem the Majeſty and Soveraignty of their Kings might challenge from them; but the People, the meaner ſort eſpecially, being governed by imagination, which receives Impreſſions from Senſe, is wont to be wrought upon by glorious Objects, the Scarlet Gowns of Judges commanding ſuch regard as would not be had unto them if they ſate in Cuerpo. Therefore to procure Reverence, the Perſian Kings had their Royal Ornaments. Firſt upon their Heads they wore the Tiara, which was common to them with their Subjects, but that of the Kings was ſtraight and upright, whereas theſe of the reſt, fell down upon, or towards the Brow, rolled up or folded. Only to ſeven Conſpirators againſt the Magi, a middle ſort was granted and to their Poſterity, which was prominent in the fore part of the Head, neither upright as that of the Kings, nor falling as the other of the more ordinary ſort; for they were made of Linnen folded, and not of more ſubſtantial or thick Stuff, but as the Turbants of the Eſtern Nations in preſent uſe. And ſo I am wont to interpret that of the three Jews which were caſt into the fiery Furnace, their being bound in their Hats, as we read it in our preſent Tranſlation; for they were Turbants or Caps wreathed together, which might eaſily be unlooſed and become Bandage and Ligaments, not like our ordinary Caps and Hatts. Of the Tiara, we ſhall now only further obſerve that it came down if need were upon the Temples and Cheeks; but this, as we ſaid, was a common wear both of Prince and Subjects.

The cidaris.

The Stole.

The Candys.

Long Hair.

6. The peculiar and proper Royal Ornament for the Head was the Cidaris or Citaris, for, by both theſe Names it was called. This though ſome Writers ſeem to confound with the Tiara, yet was diſtinct from, and added to, it, being no other than the Diadem which others mention as proper to the Perſian Kings, or a Purple Fillet diſtinguiſhed with white Spots, and perfumed. As the Perſian Kings wore this Diadem or Fillet about their Tiara, ſo when Alexander began to take their ſtate upon him, he added it to the Macedonian Cauſia. Long after this Sapor, King of Perſia who lived in the time of Conſtantius, changed it ſeems the Faſhion of this Cap, for Ammianus Marcellinus writes of him, that he wore upon his Head inſtead of a Diadem, a covering made in the ſhape of a Rams Head, adorned with Gemms, which poſſibly was his peculiar Fancy; though the Tiara was alſo formed into wreaths and rounds, and Sidonius Appollinaris writes of its being horned. But, farther as to other Ornaments, the Perſian Kings wore the Stole or a purple Robe which hung down to the Ankles, was exceſſively rich in Gold and precious Stones, and portraied with the Figures of various ſorts of Animals, being in ſhape four ſquare, as the Greek Pallium was, which was plaited and buttoned about the Neck. Beſides this they wore a Tunick called Candys, which was common to other Perſians; but that of the Kings differed from the reſt, not only in value, but in Colour; for it was of the Sea Purple or Phœnician Dye, when their Dominions extended to the Coaſts of that Country, though afterwards in ſtead thereof they were ſupplied out of India. This purple Tunick had a white ſpot in the middle, it hung upon the Shoulders, and had its Sleeves down to the Fingers ends, which the Romans counted effeminate, and ſo did Alexander, who though he took up the Perſian habit refuſed the Candys, it becoming a Man, in their Opinion, to have his Arms free and diſintangled. From that Story we read in Suetonius concerning Veſpaſian his Jeſt about the Comet or Blaſing Star, we may learn that theſe Princes wore their Hair Interea te Suſa tremunt, ac ſupplice cultu. Flectit Achæmenius lunatam Perſa tiaram. In Pangyrico Anthemii ſic Conſtantinopolim allocutus:

Haire ſomething long; for, when he heard it was of that ſort called Criniti or ſtreaming forth like Haire, he ſaid it concerned the King of Perſia and not himſelf. They wore Jewels at their Ears; were girt with rich Girdles or Belts; uſed Bracchæ or cloſe Breeches, which alſo did the reſt of the Nation, by them called Sarabara, from which Alexander abſtained as from the Candys and Tiara. But in Perſia both Men and Women wore theſe Breeches; however the Macedonians and Romans did diſpiſe them. In concluſion beſides theſe Ornaments, The Kings bore golden Scepters in their Hands, as is evident from the Book of Eſther.

'Αναξυρίδες Græci.

Sarabara or cloſe Breeches.

7. The Kings for their Commodious manner of living, had their Royal Palaces in ſeveral Provinces, to which they removed as their Occaſions or the Seaſon of the Year did urge them. For the Seaſons, generally they paſſed the Winter in Babylon, the Spring at Suſa, and the heat of the Summer at Ecbatane. Of Babylon we have ſpoken already. Suſa (in our Tranſlation Shuſhan the Palace) was a City built by Tithonus and his Son Memnon upon the River Choaſpes, and took its name from Lillies wherewith that Region abounds, Suſum in the Perſian Tongue ſignifying that Flour. Cyrus made choiſe of it as a place convenient to inhabit, both for its pleaſantneſs and its neighbourhood to the Nations conquered by him; and afterwards it was repaired and very much beautified by Darius, who is therefore by ſome Writers termed the founder of it. As for Ecbatane, it was the Metropolis of Media; and it ſeems they made choice of it for the coolneſs of the Air; and why might they not do it, notwithſtanding they be laughed at for changing their places and termed Nomades from their flitting from one Region to another; the progreſſes of Princes being very requiſite for the knowing and redreſſing of the Greivances of their People; Beſides theſe three, they had ſeveral other Manſions, and ſeveral retiring places throughout the Country, which were pleſantly incompaſſed with Parks and Trees after the beſt Art and Contrivance, of which were moſt eminent Paſargadæ and Perſepolis. The former Cyrus prized above all others, becauſe there he overthrew Aſtyages (whereupon it had the name of the Troop or Army of the Perſians) and here was part of the Royal Treaſures kept. But in Perſepolis was ineſtimable Wealth heaped up; it being in a manner filled with the Spoils of the (Eaſtern) World. In it was a Caſtle incompaſſed with three Walls wonderful for their height and thickneſs, wherein ſtood the Kings Palace, the Royal Court of Perſia marvailous for its rich Ornaments of Gold and other Materials. Beſides what was beſtowed upon the Houſe it ſelf, here was a golden Throne on which it was capital for any Subject to ſit. The King lay upon a golden Bed, and his Chamber was decked with a Tree of Gold, and moreover a Vine made of Gold, the Grapes wereof were compoſed of precious Stones, being the workmanſhip of Theodorus a Native of Samus.

Their Royal Palaces.

Inde Memnonia etiam dicta.

8. But rather more remarkeable were the Gardens, Groves and Parkes adjoyning to the Kings Palaces, admirable in their contrivance and planting, and for being ſtocked with all ſorts of wild Beaſts; if wild we may call them that are ſhut up betwixt Walls and Pales. Theſe places of Divertiſement they in their own Language called Paradiſes, the Romans Vivaria, and we Parkes; but in them were kept Bears and Bores, fierce beyond Madneſs it ſelf as Ammianus expreſſeth it: They were well furniſhed with Springs of Water, and had Towers built in them for Receptacles to the Hunters, as ſo many Caſtles of Defence againſt the Violence of the inraged Beaſts. With the variety of Trees and the pleaſant Walkes in theſe Paradiſes, the Perſian Princes were wonderfully taken, eſpecially Cyrus the younger, who himſelf contrived one at Sardis, ordered the Walks, framed the Wilderneſſes in them, and ſet many of the Trees with his own Hand: And Alexander after his Conqueſt ſeemed ſo much to be of the ſame mind, that he ſent for ſeveral ſorts of Plants out of Macedonia to increaſe the Perſian Store. But wherever the Kings hunted, if they were thirſty and were pleaſed to drink Water, it was no other than that what was taken out of the River Choaſpes which ran by Suſa; thence it was fetcht in golden Veſſels, and in them, being boiled, was preſerved for their Uſe; being carried along with them whitherſoever they went as the lighteſt in Body, and ſweeteſt of all others. To this Pliny and other Writers joyn the River Eulæus as a Companion, which riſing in Media takes it courſe alſo by Suſa, ſo that we may queſtion whether it was not one and the ſame River; for Solinus alſo writes that theſe Kings would drink of no other Water. If this was ſo ſweet, we may hence perceive the power of Thirſt which cauſed Darius when he was expiring and drank of muddy and ſtinking Water,

They drank only of Water running by Suſa.

ter, to ſay it was the beſt that ever he had drank in his Life; for, as Cicero well obſerves, he had (ſcarce) ever formerly drank thirſting. But as they drank but of one ſort of Water, ſo onely one ſort of Wine would content them, and that was the Chalybonian which grew about Damaſcus in Syria; far ſought and deer bought, being it ſeems, fit for Perſian Kings as well as Engliſh Ladies. With this it was permitted them to be drunk one day of the Year, which they dedicated to the ſervice of Mithra. Otherwiſe, it ſeems that by the Laws they were obliged to this ſort of Temperance.

One ſort of Wine.

9. But if not Drunkards they might be Gluttons; and yet Xerxes by the Story of Herodotus concerning Magagreon one of the Abderites who entertained him, appears to have eaten but once a Day. But it's to be thought this Meal like that of Children, laſted well nigh all the Day long, if he dined betimes; or all the Night if he ſupped; for if he had dined as well as ſupped, his Entertainers had not been able to ſuſtain the Charges. What way ſoever they travelled, their Subjects were wont to entertain them at Supper, all the Cities being obliged to it either by Law or Cuſtom according to their Abilities, for which Money was raiſed no otherwiſe than as Tribute; and ſo great was the expence ſometimes, that it amounted to twenty, thirty, Tallents or more. When at their own charge, their Diet was moſt exquiſite and coſtly. They had of Delicacies which their ſeveral Provinces produced, the firſt Fruits as it were preſented to them. They uſed Oyl made of the Perſian Wallnut, and another ſort made of a Thorne growing in Caramania; but it is obſervable that amongſt all the ſeveral Spices, Sawces and Pickles reckoned up by ſuch as write of this Subject, there is no mention made of Pepper and Vinegar, the beſt of all. Amongſt all their Feaſts thoſe exceeded which they made on their Birthdays, which they beleived to riſe to ſuch exquiſiteneſs, that in their own Language they called them Tycta or Perfect. On thoſe Days they combed and cleanſed their Hair, and were wont to give Gifts to their People; neither could they well deny any Petition, then put up unto them. As their Meals were eminent both for quantity and richneſs of Diſhes, ſo alſo for cleanlyneſs and neatneſs in ſerving thereof. Briſſonius gathers from the Hebrew Copy of Eſther that Artaxerxes was ſerved with ſeaven Eunuches. To be ſure ſuch as waited were as clean and neat as Water and rich Clothes could make them. And becauſe the Lives of Princes are precious and in danger, they had their Taſters who when they had given the Liquor to them, in a Viol, took ſome of it out with a Spoon or Cup, and pouring it into their left Hands, ſupped it up. And probable it is that for fear of Poyſon they uſed the ſame Caution in their Meat as in their Drink, which generally hath been obſerved by other Kings, though theſe of Perſia ſome will have firſt to have introduced the Cuſtome.

Their Diet.

Attendance at Table.

10. But upon this account it was that the Office of Cupbearer (enjoyed by Neemiah the Jew) was as a place of eſpecial truſt, ſo of great eſteem and honour; and ſo it was in the Court of Alexander where Phillip and Jollas the Sons of Antipater prepared and taſted his Drink. Sufficiently known it is what a number of Butchers, Cooks and other Miniſters of the Throat and Palate attended in that of Perſia. To this purpoſe is obſervable what is told by Athenæus concerning thoſe that followed the Waggons and Baggage of Darius, and were taken at Damaſcus by Parmenio. Theſe were two hundred and ſeventy ſeven Cooks; of Scullions who made clean Utenſils belonging to the Kitchens, twenty nine; thirteen Perſons that provided Milk, and ſeventeen who took order for his Drink; of Cellar Men and ſuch as purified his Wines ſeventy: of Oyntment-makers forty; and ſuch as made Garlands and Ornaments for the Head ſixty and ſix. In the Court a Table daily was furniſhed as dedicated to the Genius of the King. The Room where he dined was furniſhed with Women Singers, with which and other ſorts of Muſick thoſe Princes were wonderfully pleaſed, as well as with other Meriments at their Meals. For Parmenio wrote to Alexander that after the taking of Damaſcus he found, beſides what we lately mentioned, no fewer than three hundred and twenty one of thoſe Wenches that were Minſtrells. When the Table was removed they left ſinging; but when the King called for Wine they renewed their Melody, and were wont with their vocal and other ſorts of Muſick all the Night long to lull him on ſleep. No ſort of Luxury was wanting that could be deviſed; for rewards were propoſed to ſuch as could find them out. Moſt commonly the King ſate at meat by himſelf; ſometimes the Queen with him, and ſome of his Children: but of Artaxerxes it is ſaid that he took his Mother to the Table, placing her above him, as his Wife beneath him, and that with his Company at Meals, he ſometimes honoured Oſtaces and Oxates his Brothers.

Gueſts.

Brothers. Moreover they were wont at certain Feaſts, to entertain their Kindred as the Romans did theirs in their Chariſtia; others alſo ſometimes in reſpect to ſome notable ſervice, Strangers though they were, who could not be admitted to the Feaſt of the Kindred; and from the Books of Eſther and Ezra we are informed, that ſometimes they entertained their Captains, Satrapa's, and great Officers.

11. But of ſuch as they admitted, ſome ſupped within and ſome without the Room where the King did eat, and from thoſe that ſupped within, the view of the King was intercepted by an Hanging or Curtain, ſo as he might ſee them but could not be ſeen. The number of his Gueſts exceeded not that of twelve: As for the order of their ſitting, Cyrus placed thoſe he leaſt truſted on his Right Hand, and whom he moſt truſted on his Left; becauſe the Left Side is moſt expoſed and leaſt defenſive: In like manner, as ſtill at this day amongſt the Eaſtern Nations, it's moſt honourable to go on the left hand, becauſe ſuch an one hath the advantage, commanding the Sword of his Companion which hangeth on his left Thigh. The honour was great to be thus entertained, and need there was for it, the freedom they enjoyed with it being ſo little; For look about them they muſt not, but hang down their Heads, leſt any of the Eunuchs ſhould eſpye them to caſt an eye upon ſome of the King's Women: And they muſt alſo forbear all complaints, and take all patiently that was ſaid or done unto them. And yet theſe Kings were not ſo inſolent as by report were thoſe of the Parthians, their Succeſſors; for if they entertained any of their Friends at meat, the Gueſts took their Repaſt on the ground, and fed like Dogs upon what they caſt from their Table, which was placed aloft from the floor; Nay ſometimes upon ſome ſlight account, being taken out of the Room, they were beaten till blood followed; but in that plight were to fall down and worſhip him that beat them, as having conferred on them ſome ſpecial favour. The Kings of the Parthians did eat by themſelves and on an elevated aſcent, and they alone as Earthly Gods were ſerved at a Table furniſhed with foreign meat. Thoſe rather were to be envied to whom the Kings of Perſia ſent diſhes of Meat from their Table, for ſo they were wont to do to their Friends; which cuſtom was begun by Cyrus, as Xenophon writeth of him. To be ſure with great quantities of Meat they were wont to be ſerved, the remainders whereof went to the Waiters and Attendants; for not only their dyet, but alſo that of Slaves and of the very Dogs, as Plutarch obſerves from the late mentioned Writer, was ſerved up to the King's Table.

They had ſeveral Wives.

12. For propagation of the Royal Offspring it was permitted the Kings to have ſeveral, and thoſe Legitimate Wives. Darius had two daughters of Cyrus, Atoſſa the Widow, Ariſtona whom he married a Virgin, Parmys the Neece of Cyrus, and the Daughter of Otanes at one and the ſame time. With what magnificence they Celebrated their Nuptials, we may learn from the Hiſtory of Eſther, how not only that King appointed a Feſtival to be kept by the People, but entertained his Perſian and Median Nobility for a month, and granted Remiſſion of Tributes to the Provincials, tſtat they might with more chearfulneſs attend the ſolemnity. Thence alſo we may perceive, that they ſet Diadems on the heads of ſuch of their Wives as they had the greateſt affection for; as alſo that theſe Queens were gorgeouſly apparelled. And indeed we are told by Cicero, that their Husbands were wont to beſtow on them Cities or Territories for furniſhing them with Cloaths and Ornaments, ſo as the Revenues of one was for the attire of the Head, another for Necklaces, and others for other Trinkets which were moſt in faſhion and of value in thoſe Ages; inſomuch that the Akers prided themſelves in bearing the Names of ſome of them: Particularly Socrates in Plato's Dialogue, which goes under the Name of Alcybiades, tells how he had it from one who went Embaſſador to the Perſian King, that he paſſed through a large and fertile Country, which extended well nigh a days Journey, and by the Inhabitants was called the Queen's Girdle. Athenæus alſo relates, that Antylla a City of Ægypt, not far diſtant from Alexandria, was by the Kings of that Country and thoſe of Perſia, appropriated to the purchaſe of their Wives Girdles. So rich were they in their Cloaths, Oyntments, and other Accoutrements, that well might they ſeem to themſelves too great to be cheap, and accompany with any Subjects. And indeed no Jealouſie poſſeſſed their Husbands in this kind, ſo as they never doubted the Children they bore to be their own, nor ſo much as appointed them any Keepers to watch them, or any other Guardians of their Chaſtity than Love or Fear alone. But ſo much did the Perſian Kings indulge their Carnal Appetites, that to ſeveral legitimate Wives they added Miſtreſſes or Wenches, the number of which was limited only by their own Appetites. But how great it was, we may underſtand by Vaſtly rich in their Ornaments.

Their Concubines.

what we find of Artaxerxes, that by his Wenches he had an hundred and fifteen Sons; and of Darius that three hundred and ſixty furniſhed his Court, and followed him on his Expedition. Nay it was told of a Surenas, who was next in place to the King of Parthia, that even he had no fewer than two hundred following him in the Camp. Some write, that three hundred women daily attended in the Perſian Court, and took their ſleep in the day time, and paſſed all the night in ſinging and Minſtrelſy. But the King's Miſtreſſes had a Gynaceum of their own, wherein they were ſeparately kept and attended by Eunuchs, with all things conducing both to their Health and Cleanlineſs. By times the King took them to his Bed, and they followed him not only in Expeditions, but when he went out to hunt.

Their Eldeſt Sons how educated.

13. Of ſuch Children as they had by their legitimate Wives, they took eſpecial care, and chiefly as to their Education. As ſoon as the eldeſt or Heir to the Kingdom was born, he was committed to the truſt and overſight of the moſt eminent Eunuchs, who made it their buſineſs in the firſt place ſo to order the ſwadling and forming of his Limbs, that he might, if poſſible, become a moſt beautiful Perſon. When he was ſeven years old he learn'd to ride, and to teach him that skill, had the beſt Maſters that could be found; and now by degrees he was taught to take delight in hunting. At fourteen he was delivered to thoſe they termed Royal Pedagogues, four men the moſt wiſe, juſt, temperate and valiant perſons that could be found in the Nation. Of theſe the firſt being moſt eminent for Prudence, taught him the Doctrine of the Magi, ſuch as Zoroaſter the Son of Horomaze taught, which ſhowed the worſhip of their Gods. The ſecond being of high eſteem in Acts of Juſtice, ſtudied to frame his mind to the love of Truth and Sincerity. The third, who was as remarkable for Temperance, endeavoured to make him Lord and Commander over his Carnal Luſts and Appetites: And the fourth and laſt, having a great Name for his Fortitude, laboured to render him void of all Fear and Cowardiſe. When he came to be King, he was awakened in the morning by one of his Bed-chamber, who bad him ariſe, and take order for ſuch Affairs as Meſoromaſdes was pleaſed he ſhould adviſe about; agreeable to which Cuſtom was that particular Injunction of Darius after the burning of Sardis, that one of his Attendants at Dinner ſhould three times ſay aloud, Remember the Athenians. Every day they gave their attendance at Sacrifices, for the performance of which, thouſands of Oxen, Aſſes, and Deer ſometimes fell in one day. But this was not to be done without the preſence of the Magi, who as they aſſiſted in the private Conſultations relating to Civil matters, ſo eſpecially in Religious Concernments: And ſome report, that as the Kings ſacrificed they made diſcourſes concerning Piety, as they were wont to harangue concerning Valour, before their Armies engaged in Fight.

14. Great Attendance and Ceremonies of State, they eſteemed neceſſary for preſervation of Reſpect due to the Majeſty of the Soveraign Power; and indeed upon this account Julian the Emperor was blamed for turning the Eunuchs, Cooks, Barbers, and ſuch like out of the Court upon the death of Conſtantius; Royal Authority being contemptible if there be no Pomp obſerved in the Palace. Out of the Court the King was never ſeen on Foot, but either mounted on Horſeback or in his Chariot, or if he walked it was upon Tapeſtry: The Chariot was drawn by white Horſes, bred in Niſæum a Region of Media, famous for a breed of extraordinary bigneſs. When he alighted he was not to ſtep upon the ground, how near ſoever it was, nor to lean upon any of his Attendants, but to make his ſtep upon a golden Footſtool, with which one of his Servants ever followed and attended the Chariot. As they rode they were not to read or force their minds on any grave or ſerious matter, upon which and other accounts Seneca had reaſon to call them Barbarous, as not being cultivated by any ſort of Literature. When they were to travel into Media, they were wont to make Proclamation three days before their ſetting forward, that the Inhabitants ſhould kill all the Scorpions they could meet with, becauſe that Country abounded with them, and ſuch as diſpatched many they were wont to reward; and they were obliged to make progreſſes into all their Provinces by virtue of an ancient cuſtom founded upon the mutual intereſt both of themſelves and their people; for the neceſſities of the Provincials the grievances and oppreſſions under which they laboured, they could not ſo well underſtand in their own Court. By their preſence in the ſeveral concerned places they might beſt compoſe the differences betwixt ſeveral Cities, reſtrain the turbulent humour of factious Perſons by reaſon and good words, curb the Inſolence and Rapacity of Magiſtrates and null all unjuſt Sentences and Decrees: In concluſion, lend their preſent and helping hand whereever it was wanting. Into ſuch Provinces as they could not go themſelves, they ſent their Deputies to underſtand and report the true ſtate of them: Such Quod remoto faſtu Palatii contemptibile videretur Imperium.

How they travelled.

Such Governors as were found to have by their forecaſt and due Adminiſtration, benefited the Countries committed to their charge, they rewarded and promoted to higher places, and others who had ill managed their affairs, they puniſhed and removed: For if the Fields were not well and duly tilled, Merchandiſe induſtriouſly followed, and mechanick Arts as diligently practiſed, Tributes could not be paid, nor money circulate throughout the Body politick, though it be neceſſary for the preſervation of the whole, that it ſhould ſo do. To make this more effectual, they had two ſorts of ordinary Officers in the Country, viz. the Governors of Forts and Garriſons, who were to defend the Provincials from all force and violence; and the Prefects of Cities, who ſaw that all the Inhabitants thus protected, ſhould follow their buſineſs, for the publick ſecurity and advantage.

They ſate in Judgment.

And had Royal Judges.

Vide Valeſii Notas in Ammian. lib. 27. p. 260.

15. The Kings of Perſia were wont in Perſon to hear Cauſes, and ſit in judgment upon Capital matters, wherein they uſed deliberation, giving no haſty Sentence, nor condemning any for one offence, except the miſdemeanors of his life did overballance his merits: But a Sentence of Condemnation once given by the King, could not by the King be revoked; ſuch Perſons being apprehended by their Girdles, were inſtantly deliver'd to the Serjeants & Officers, and ſo led to Execution. If the King was angry with any, his face was covered, as we learn in the caſe of Haman. But from amongſt the moſt knowing men of the whole Nation, were certain ſelect Perſons choſen, whom they called The Royal Judges, who had their places for life, and decided Controverſies in all caſes; held their Circuits about the Provinces, and attended upon the King in his Journeys. As it highly concerned King and People that they ſhould be juſt and not mercenary, ſo were they very ſeverely puniſhed when any corruption could be diſcovered. The Story is commonly known of Siſamnes, whom for his guilt in this kind, Cambyſes cauſed to be flea'd alive, and his Son to ſit upon the Judgment-Seat covered with his Skin; and though Ammianus Marcellinus doubteth concerning the truth of it, yet little need there was he ſhould ſo do, for beſides this related by Herodotus, there is another, and more ſevere, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus. Tiribazus a Governor, being by Orontes accuſed, for holding ſecret Intelligence with the Lacedæmonians, Artaxerxes referred the hearing of the matter to three Judges; whom finding afterwards to have been corrupted with money, he cauſed their Skins to be pulled over their Ears, and ſpread upon the Bench where he had appointed others to ſucceed them. As for fleaing alive, ſomething like it is alſo related to have been practiſed by Pyrrhus upon a Tarentine, for having a deſign to betray Tarentum; how having put him to death, he cauſed a Chair to be covered with Thongs made of his skin, and delivered it to Milo, to whom he committed the cuſtody of the Caſtle, with the Garriſon.

Seven in number.

How they rewarded deſerving Perſons.

16. By the advice of theſe Judges who ſeem to have been ſeven in number, and to have been their Privy Counſellors, the Kings not only puniſhed Offenders, but rewarded ſuch as well deſerved of the State; a Commonwealth being preſerved in a ſafe conſtitution both by Rewards and Puniſhments. They thought fit amongſt others to reward ſuch as begot many Children, but eſpecially thoſe from whom they had received ſome eſpecial good or advantage, tending to the preſervation of their Government or Perſons, whom they termed their Benefactors: To theſe they were wont to aſſign the next place to themſelves, to honour them with a kiſs, to cloath them with a Veſt of Media, as the Greeks then termed that which afterward was called Serica; and to adorn them with a Chain of Gold, with golden Bracelets and a Scimitre; which Ornaments could be wore by none but ſuch as the Kings deſigned to honour, and took their Original from the Medians and Babylonians. But of all other Ornaments, thoſe of gold belonging to Horſes for Saddle or Chariot, were moſt eſteemed by the Perſians; yet ſometimes to their Friends they were wont to aſſign Lands and Territories for their maintenance: Nay it is ſaid of Themiſtocles, that he received ſeveral Cities from Artaxerxes, particularly Magneſia, (out of which he raiſed a yearly Revenue of fifty Talents) to find him with bread, Lampſacus with wine, and Myus with other proviſions for his Table, to which ſome add two others for his Cloaths and Bedding. Sometimes they would give the honour of Captain over an Army, which was reckoned as an extraordinary favour; but the moſt noble Gift of all was that of a golden Mill, (as Cteſias writes) which among others was given by Xerxes to Megabyzus, by whoſe means he became Maſter of Babylon; and weighed ſix Talents. This was eſteemed the moſt noble gift, although that could not be but moſt acceptable which the Party himſelf did aſk, for ſometimes they gave their Favourites liberty to aſk what they would, as appears by ſeveral examples. And this by the Laws he had liberty to do, who was nominated King by his Father or Anceſtor yet living; yet the Perſian Kings were wont to be very munificent in their Largeſſes and Donatives to deſerving Perſons, without asking.

Their hunting.

17. And eſpecially to Foreign Embaſſadors ſent to them upon occaſion. Ælian reckons up the particulars with which they ſometimes were preſented, viz. A Babylonian Talent of the pureſt Silver, (a Babylonian Talent was in value ſeventy two Attick Minæ) two Viols of ſilver, Bracelets, a Cymitre, and Chain of Gold each worth a thouſand Daricks, beſides a ſtole of Media otherwiſe called Dorophorica by the the Græcians. When they gave their faith to them, they were wont to give them their right hands, which was a ſecurity inviolable; but their ordinary Oath was by the Sun, whom they thought the greateſt Deity, and called by the name of Mithras. What time they could ſpare from publick buſineſs, they uſually ſpent in hunting, in which diverſion, as Noble and moſt reſembling War, they choſe often to Exerciſe themſelves: When they went to hunt they carried along with them one half of their Guards, and were accompanied with the Flower of the Perſian Youth. For the following of their Game they kept ſuch a multitude of Indian Dogs, that in the Plain of Babylon, four large Villages were aſſigned to maintain them, being freed from other Tributes. Not only in open Fields and Champions were they wont to hunt, but in thoſe fenced places they called Paradiſes, did they perſecute and kill poor Beaſts, kept up as in ſo many Coops or Cages, which to deſtroy was no Maſtery. It was not lawful before the King had deſiſted, to let fly againſt any Beaſt, or to offer to Combat with him; which was ſo ſtrictly required; that the ſtory goes how when in this Exerciſe, Artaxerxes was ſet upon by a Lyon, and it was juſtly feared would be worſted by him; Megabyzus ſeeing him in danger, as the Beaſt raiſed himſelf upon his hinder Feet and became Rampant, prevented it by killing him; was condemned to loſe his Head, becauſe he diſpatched him before the King had ſpent one dart upon him.

The Kingdom divided into Satrapies.

The duty of the Satrapæ.

How their behaviour was inquired into.

18. But to come to the ſubordinate Government, the Kingdom of Perſia was divided into Provinces, which were governed by ſo many ſingle Perſons in Chief: The Provinces in their own Language they called Satrapies, and their Governors Satrapæ. How many they were is uncertain, the number being varied according to the pleaſure of Princes as is moſt probable: Some Writers making mention of twenty, and others of above an hundred more than that number, in the Reigns of ſeveral of the Eaſtern Princes. And ſometimes one and the ſame Satrapa governed two or more Provinces, being by Latine Writers, when they would call them by Names of their own, termed Prætors and Præfects; although this ought not to be practiſed; for ſeldom are the employments of Officers the ſame in diverſe Kingdoms or States. By the Greek Hiſtorians, when they alſo are of that humor, they are called Eparchi; the younger Sons of the Kings were wont to be employed in theſe Commands, which were noble and furniſhed with great Authority: For, to their care the Provinces were committed to provide for their Defence and univerſal Emolument; to raiſe the Tributes, pay the ordinary Magiſtrates their Salleries, and give their aſſiſtance in all Emergencies, of which they were to certifie the King by Letters, or elſe by ſpecial Meſſengers. Upon occaſion they were called to Conſult with him about great affairs. They were much honoured by the Provincials, very well attended by young men of good quality at home, and when they went to hunt; and had a Noble Guard for their credit and protection. They had under them Secretaries Royal, who read the Kings Letters and diſpatched other buſineſs; they received allowances from the Publick, and it was not the manner or agreeable to the policy of the Perſians to put them out of their Offices, ſo long as they well diſcharged them: But leſt their long continuance and great Power, which in honeſt men begets experience and opportunity to do good, ſhould give them opportunity to oppreſs the people, or any way evilly to demean themſelves; the Kings were accuſtomed yearly to ſend ſome of their chief Miniſters into the Provinces, with full Authority to make inſpection into their ſtate and condition; to aſſiſt the Satrapa's if need ſhould be; to reſtrain their violence and amend what was amiſs themſelves, or elſe to make report of what they found. The People were overjoyed at their coming, and as if the King himſelf came to bring them relief, called them his Sons, his Brothers, and his Eyes.

The Prefect of a City.

19. Beſides the Satrapæ who governed ſingle Provinces or more, there were other ſubordinate Officers, who preſided ſome over particular Cities and their Towns; others had command in the Caſtles of the ſaid Cities. For one and the ſame Perſon was not ſet over both the City and Cittadel of the ſame, but it was thought beſt policy to divide the Commands; ſo as one might be a ſpy upon the other, to ſuch purpoſes as we have formerly declared. But when the Satrapa came into the Province, it

The Phrurarch.

Chiliarch.

Treaſurer.

it was his duty to overſee both, and as by his care of Artificers and Husbandmen, that they minded their Employments, and that Tributes were duly collected, to diſcharge the duty of the Præfect of the City, ſo by protecting them all to do what was incumbent on the Phrurarch or Commander of the Garriſon. This Phrurarch was choſen by the King and diſplaced by his order alone, as was the Chiliarch who commanded Soldiers diſpoſed and quartered about in ſeveral Regions, for the ſafety of the Provinces, and brideling if need were the extravagant Power of the Satrapæ. Beſides theſe, each Province had its Treaſurer for receiving and keeping all the Royal Revenue belonging to it; which Treaſure or Treaſury in their Language they called Gaza. So great was the Income ariſeing from Tributes, that accounts being caſt up, fourteen thouſand five hundered and ſixty Talents of Eubœa were yearly brought into the Kings Coffers, and Juſtin ſpeaks of a yearly product of three hundered thouſand Talents in this way accruing unto Alexander. But over and above Tributes and Stipends, every Province contributed its ſhare to the maintenance of the King and his Army; the Satrapy of Babylon for four Months of the Year, and the reſt of Aſia for the remainder. The Armenians ſent in Horſes by way of Tribute; for, of this noble Creature beſides what were for War, eight hundered were kept for Stallions, to ſerve ſixteen thouſand Mares; for, twenty Mares were kept for every Horſe. What numbers of Indian Dogs were maintaned for the Chace, we have already ſaid.

The Guard called Immortals.

Other Satellites.

20. Whereever the Kings went, they were attended and garded by ten thouſand Perſian Horſe called Immortals; becauſe though the Perſons miſcaried, the number of them never died, to ſupply which, others were ſtill choſen into the rooms of the deceaſed. They were adorned with golden Chaines, wore Veſts imbroidered with Gold, and Sleeves to their Coats ſparkling with Gemms, being choſen out of the beſt of the Nation, and that Nation alone. Of theſe there were a thouſand ſelect Perſons, who for that they had golden Aples fixed to their Lances, were by the Greeks both called Doryphori and Melophori, the Name and Service of which Alexander kept up after the overthrow of Darius. With a great Number of Satellites beſides theſe, were the Kings protected either in Battle or in their Palace, choſen alſo from amongſt the moſt faithful of the Perſian Nation, till Darius the laſt King broke the Cuſtome. And theſe had their Præfect or peculiar Captain, and one of them followed the Kings Chariot with the golden Footſtool lately mentioned; neither received they any pay, but had allowances, for their maintenance, of neceſſary Proviſions and the Meat which came from the King's Table. Of the Doriphori, there were ſome which being next the Kings Perſon in the greateſt truſt and dangers, were called his Kinſmen, honoured with the liberty of kiſſing him, and a Feaſt, to which no ſtranger was admitted. Beſides there were another ſort who being called Homotimi from their being equal in honour, watched before the Gates of the Palace, till, by the Kings order they were diſmiſſed; although all the Perſian Noblemen were wont alſo, as we ſaid, to give their Attendance at the Gate.

Megiſtanæ.

Surenas.

Several other Names of Dignities.

Vide valeſii Notas in Ammiani Marcellini lib. 23 p. 250.

Sar Dominus ena noſter.

21. By a general Name, the Nobles or principal Courtiers of Perſia were called Megiſtanæ, which is to be met with in Writers as well Sacred as Prophane. But amongſt the Partho-Perſians, the cheif in dignity next to the King had the Title of Surenas; for that a Title it was, Plutarch, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Zozimus aſſure us, and not a proper Name of a Man. He it was that put the Diadem about the Kings Head. Beſides this we meet with ſeveral other Names of Dignity, and may ſooner meet with them than underſtand them. Ammianus mentions the Vitaxa which its uncertain whether it was appropiate to the King or the Title of a Subject. Procopius writes of the Chanarragan as being a Magiſter Militum or Dux of a Limit. He mentions the Ovarizes, but tells not what he was, and makes the Mirranes whom Ammianus calls Merenes of the ſame Office as the Chanarragan. Others will have Cardarigan to be the name of Dignity amongſt the Perſians, to whom they ſay it was ordinary to take Names from Dignities, and receive thoſe that were given them by their Parents. As alſo that the Darigmedun was of higheſt eſteem, and to be compared with the Curopalates at Conſtantinople. They alſo tell us that the Pherochanes injoyned the ſame with the Magiſterian Dignity in the Emperors Court; and others ſay that Zich was a Name of greateſt Dignity amongſt the Perſians. Although none ſeems to ſound higher than Surenas, which ſignifies our Lord. But of theſe let ſuch as are skilled in the Perſian Language conſider.

Dorekeepers and Admiſſionales, with others generally Eunuches.

22. But in or neer to the Kings Perſon, beſides the Guard that watched at the Gate, were the Dore-keepers who forbade paſſage to all intruders, and next them theſe

Scribes who wrote Edicts.

theſe we may call Admiſſionales who ſtood at the Dore to carry all Meſſages in unto him, and to return Anſwers. Theſe moſt commonly were Eunuches, as were alſo their Chamberlains, or thoſe of the Bedchamber and their Cupbearers; for, ſuch Cyrus thought fitteſt to be truſted neareſt to his Perſon, though ſo great were the Inſolences and Abuſes committed too often by them, that they were abominated by ſome Princes in after times. But in the Perſian Court Eunuches waited alſo on the Queens, and had cuſtody of the reſt of the Kings Women. But for matters of State they had their Secretaries attending, which by the Eaſtern Nations were called Scribes; we mean by Names anſwering to the ſignification of this, who wrote their Letters, Edicts and Decrees. Their Edicts and Reſcripts ordinarily began thus; The King ſaith, or the King ſaith thus; and they were ſealed with his Ring. But what Character the Ring had ingraven is uncertain. Some have ſaid the Kings own Image; others the Image of Cyrus the firſt King of the Perſians, and others the Image of Darius his Horſe, which by neighing procured him the Kingdom. The Edicts were ſent by Meſſengers throughout the Provinces, but kept in Memorials, and regiſtred in the Archives of the Kingdom. For beſides two places of Record, or two Treaſuries as they termed them, in one of which Books belonging to Science were kept, and in the other Papers relating to Accounts and the publick Revenue, there were other Paper Offices wherein were preſerved for the uſe of Poſterity, Chronicles or Commentaries of whatſoever happened of any Importance, which others might conſult upon occaſion, and the Kings themſelves ſometimes would have read unto them, as we find in the Hiſtory of Mordecai the Jew.

'Τάδε λέγει.

Phyſitians.

23. The Kings, however Barbarous, had the moſt learned men in the art of Phyſick, that the neighbouring Nations could afford, to attend them, whom according to the Laws of the Roman Emperors, we may term Archiatri. Such they had out of the Ægyptian Nation, and Darius would have put ſome of them to death for being unskillful as to his particular caſe, but they were pardoned at the Interceſſion of Democedes a Greek Phyſitian of Crotone, who did the Cure. Of Greek Phyſicians who then were more learned than any other, its to be preſumed they wanted not ſome. For, Cteſias who ſerved in the Army of Cyrus the younger, being taken priſonner became Phyſitian to Artaxerxes; and from the Epiſtles of great Hippocrates it appears that he was very much courted to come and live with the ſame Monarch. Theſe Monarch's had alſo ſome at hand who ſhould tell them the time of the Night or Day. They had ſuch as bore up their Train. And when they rode, they had a number of Servants who carried Scepters before them. And if we ſhould mention all the Officers belonging to them, and relating to the more private or ordinary ſervices of their Courts, to their Patrimony, or Res privata, as the later Romans called it; if we ſhould diſcourſe of the Officer appointed to relieve Strangers, of the Curators of their publick buildings, and of ſuch as had the charge of Horſes and of Doggs, we might poſſibly ſeem to be too tedious if not impertinent. Of the Curſus publicus, we cannot be ſilent, inſtituted as is reported by Cyrus the great, who obſerving how far one Horſe would run in one day, appointed certain Stages and Manſions for changing of Men and Horſes, and delivering of Letters or other things given in charge from one Poſt to another. This was called Angarion and Angaron, and the Men themſelves Angari and Aſtandæ. If what Plutarch writes concerning Darius the laſt King of Perſia be true, that when he lived a private life, he was one of the Kings Aſtandæ, it was no vile or mean Imployment.

The Poſtage.

A Poyſon they uſed when reſolved to dye.

where buried.

24. Such were the Kings of Perſia, and ſo they lived or deſired to live; if they could not, they made proviſion for the moſt ſpeedie and eaſieſt Death. They were provided of a Poyſon made of the Excrements and inwards of a little Indian Bird called Dicaærus, of which whoſoever took a very little quantity in a draught of Drink, expired ſhortly after without any Pain or Torment. This Poyſon being given them by the Kings of India, was eſteemed as a very choice and extraordinary Preſent, and being kept if need ſhould be, for the uſe of the King and his Mother, it was not lawful for any other Perſian to have it. Being dead, their Funerals were celebrated with all magnificence, and the Sacred Fire as they accounted it, was then put out. Their Mauſoleum or place of Interment, ſome ſay was at Perſepolis, although Cyrus was buried at Paſargadæ, where his ſepulcher was kept by Magi, who for their maintenance had a Sheep every Day, and an Horſe every Month allowed them. And Joſephus makes mention of a Tower built at Ecbatane by Daniel, when he flouriſhed in the favour of Darius, which continued to his time, and remained ſo freſh that it ſeemed to the beholder to have been finiſhed ed but that day. In this Tower, he ſaith, the Kings of the Medes, Perſians, and Parthians were wont to be buried, which cuſtom continued to his very time; and that the cuſtody of the ſaid Tower was intruſted with a Prieſt of the Jewiſh Nation. Their Monuments were wont to have Epitaphs inſcribed upon them, and particularly thoſe of Cyrus and Darius, both the one and the other are related: But this was no new thing in the Eaſt, if the Epitaphs of Ninus and Sardanapalus be not counterfeited, as we have no reaſon to believe they were.

The Perſian way of Education.

25. From the Kings of the Perſians, it's fit we paſs to ſpeak ſomething of the manner of their Government, of their Rites and Cuſtoms; and how their Religion ought to be conſidered in the firſt place; but that it muſt be referred to one more proper. As for their civil Rites and Cuſtoms, they are reported to have been founded upon excellent Laws and Conſtitutions, and ſuch as excelled all others in this reſpect, that they tended to the prevention of Puniſhments, by preventing of the Crimes themſelves. In other Kingdoms and States we find very wholeſom Ordinances indeed for prevention, but ſtill it is of the like for the time to come, and ill manners have produced good Laws; or if they have been made by Legiſlators antecedent to a Society or Common-wealth; yet though not in practice they have been, yet in Theory they have ſuppoſed the Commiſſion of thoſe miſchiefs they endeavoured to redreſs. But the Perſians choſe rather ſo to inſtruct Children and ſo to principle their Youth, that they ſhould abhor Theft, Rapine, Murther, Adultery and the like, by a good Education; and, that ſmart of the Rod might prevent Execution and choaking by the Halter. They left not Children in the hands and power of Parents to diſpoſe of them as ſhould ſuit their humor; neither when come to ripeneſs of Age, permitted them to live as they liſted, but by a ſort of breeding in a publick Forum and other rules, ſo endeavoured to mould and frame the Spirits of all free-born men, that there ſhould be no need of Terror ariſing from pains of death. This inſtitution and theſe Rules are laid down by Xenophon in his Cyropædia, or his Books concerning the Inſtitution of Cyrus the elder. Indeed theſe Books, Cicero was of opinion to have been written, not ſo much by any true Hiſtorical Account, to make an impartial Relation concerning Cyrus his breeding, as in way of a Romance to give an Image and Repreſentation of a juſt and perfect Government. But as for what concerns the Rites and manners of the Perſians, he himſelf profeſſeth, as Briſſonius urgeth, that he feigneth nothing; and not once affirms, that ſuch Ordinances as were made by Cyrus, were obſerved to his own time: Now, an Eye Witneſs, and one who had himſelf travelled through ſo many Provinces of the Perſian Empire, who dare adventure to ſuſpect? Beſides many things written by him are atteſted by Herodotus and others. This plea of Briſſonius may at leaſt prevail for a ſuſpenſion of our misbelief.

The liberal Forum,

Diſtinguiſhed into four Claſſes.

Twelve men ſet over each.

That of Bog's.

Vide Briſſonii de Regno Perſic. lib. 2.

26. However it will not be amiſs to ſay in ſhort, from this information of Xenophon, that for the education of Youth in learning and good manners, the Perſians had a publick School or liberal Forum, as it was termed. Here were the Tribunals or Courts of Juſtice, and places where Wiſe Men ſate both to teach and execute Laws: The Forum was diſtinguiſhed, as it were, into four Claſſes or parts; whereof one was of Boys, or ſuch as were under ſeventeen years old; the ſecond of young men under twenty eight; the third of full grown men under fifty from the former term; and the fourth was the Claſſis of Old Age. All ſorts met in their ſeveral Apartments, and the young men, except married, there lay and took their Refections, and ſhewed themſelves before the Magiſtrates with their weapons fit for the Exerciſes they underwent. The people being divided into twelve Tribes, ſo many men were ſet as Governors over each Claſſis; and moſt care being had of the two former, moſt choice Perſons were appointed from amongſt the Seigniors to inſtruct them. Strabo writes, that Boys came not into the ſight of their Fathers till four years old, which Age Herodotus extends to five and Valerius Maximus to ſeven years; adding this reaſon, that ſo their Parents might more patiently bear the loſs of them, if they chanced to dye within that time. From five years to twenty, as Herodotus, or as Strabo ſaith to twenty five, they eſpecially inſtructed them to ſpeak truth, a lye being eſteemed as a ſervile vice, and moſt opprobrious of all others, by that Nation. And what was highly ſuitable with veracity, in the next place they were taught to be juſt in all their ways, and give to every man his own.

27. That this they might the more readily do by examples ſet before their eyes, as Auguſtus at Rome permitted the Sons of Senators to be preſent in the Court, to teach them the way of Government; ſo the Perſian Youth was admitted to hear Cauſes and Deciſions, although afterwards Xenophon confeſſes and bewails, that from their hearing of ſuch caſes, they learn'd to practiſe more Injuries and Violence than Juſtice and Equity, as Vice and Luxury brake in aud uſhered in the downfal of their Empire. And as amongſt Boys themſelves and young Men, differences continually ariſe, either for things ſtollen, reproachful words, or upon ſome other occaſions; their Maſters were wont to ſpend time in examining theſe complaints, and to puniſh the Offenders, whether ſuch as falſely accuſed, or were proved guilty; and thereby ſhewed them how to become Judges when their time ſhould come. But as without Sobriety and Temperance, which curb and reſtrain immoderate Appetites, no virtue can exert it ſelf, and theſe things are taught more by example than Precepts; their Maſters by their ſpare manner of living and exemplary continency, ſhewed them the way, and gave them incentives to a ſober life; and before them they took their victuals, not with their Mothers,and not till the ſignal was given, their meat being bread, their ſawce Naſturtium, and their drink water taken from the neareſt River. By this courſe of Diet and Abſtinence they enjoyed health; and exerciſe being joyned to it, their Bodies became ſo dry and ſolid, that they ſeldom ſpate or had occaſion to wipe their Noſes: And we cannot let paſs what Ammianus Marcellinus relates concerning the dead Bodies of the Perſians that were killed at the Siege of Amida, how they could eaſily be diſtinguiſhed as they lay, and known whoſe they were by reaſon of their dryneſs, when thoſe of the ſlain Romans ſpeedily putrefied, and could not be diſcerned after two days.

The good Examples their Maſters gave them.

Their way of Inſtruction by Fables.

28. Their manner and courſe of Inſtruction was this, beſides the good example their Maſters gave them in ſubmitting themſelves to the dictates of the Seniors. In Tables and pleaſant Tales they involved wholeſom hints and documents for framing of the lives and manners of their Scholars. They taught them Songs wherein were extolled the praiſes of their Gods, and great and laudable Actions of their Anceſtors; they inſtructed them in the nature and virtue of Plants, that as occaſion ſhould ſerve they might ſhun the hurtful, and furniſh themſelves with Remedies againſt diſtempers, and preſerve their health by proper applications. But the thing which they endeavoured to make odious to them next to lying, as the moſt hainous thing the Nation abhorred,was being in debt:They eſteemed a man in debt no better than a Lyar, as by it ſo made ipſo facto, conſidering what excuſes, evaſions, denyals, and perfidious Anſwers ſuch do make, and that they conceal their Perſons as well as their Intentions. But this is a misfortune rather than a fault, and a burthen to which ingenuous Spirits are conſtrained often to ſubmit;that is rather a crime, wilfully to make deſerving Perſons unfortunate. Therefore nothing more did they abhor than that black and ugly Vice of Ingratitude, as indeed containing in it ſelf all other Vices; inſomuch that by their Laws and cuſtoms an action lay againſt that man who being unmindful of a benefit received would not make a return when it lay in his power. Ammianus ſaith that their Laws made againſt Ingratitude, in ſeverity exceeded all others; as that thoſe were alſo ſevere which were made againſt deſertors, than whom few were more odious amongſt the Perſians.

Next to lying, a fault to be in debt.

Ingratitude.

Diſobedience to Parents.

29. Thoſe ever excepted who were diſobedient to Parents, for whom that Nation had ſuch Reverence, that it was counted worſe than ill breeding to ſit down in preſence of their Mothers, except they had their permiſſion ſo to do. And they gloried in this of old, that amongſt them none was found to have laid violent hands upon them; for if ever any thing like to this happened, upon diligent inquiſition it was found that the wickedneſs had been committed by ſome ſuppoſititious or adulterous brood; neither could they once believe that any but a ſpurious off-ſpring would attempt ſuch a crime, it being contrary to Nature for a true Parent to be murthered by a legitimate Iſſue. The Piety indeed of Artaxerxes Mnemon is very remarkable which he ſhewed toward his Mother, though ſhe had procured the death of his dearly beloved Wife. It's evident from Ariſtotle that Sons were under the Dominion and Power of their Fathers, and this Power in the opinion of the Philoſopher was Tyrannical; for they uſed them, he ſaith, like Slaves. Such, during the Infancy and Youth of the Common-wealth, was that of Sons at Rome, who differed little in their condition from Slaves, their Fathers having power of life and death over them as well as the other. In concluſion as to vices, Herodotus,and not only he, informs us, that ſuch things as were unlawful to be done, were alſo unlawful to be ſpoken.

Sons were in the Dominion of their Fathers.

Education of young Noblemen.

30. But farther as to the Education of Youth,the Sons of Noblemen were educated while Boys, in the City at the entrance into the King's Palace, and in the Provinces at the Gates of the Satrapæ where they learn'd Leſſons of Temperance and Continency, and were Spectators of Puniſhments executed upon ill Livers. As to Exerciſe, they were taught from five to twenty,or five and twenty,to ſhoot in the Bow, to Ride and manage an Horſe, and caſt Darts; and this Exerciſe continued incumbent bent upon the Ephebi, or young men, to fit them the better for War: And a certain War was Hunting eſteemed, wherein theſe young men were exerciſed together with their King, who uſually led out half of them into the Field, and left the other half to watch about the Palace; for the Boys went home from the Forum every Night, but they lay in their Apartment Night and Day to inure them to Temperance, and to have them ready againſt any violence or other neceſſity which might require their help. Beſides this, they were uſed to Run fifty in a Company, a courſe of thirty or forty Furlongs, one of the Kings Sons, or ſome Son of one of the Satrapa's being Captain of the Company: And Dancing alſo they practiſed after their own Country manner, the better to obtain a Command of their Limbs. Being thus employed and rendred fit for ſervice, the Magiſtrates made uſe of them for apprehending Thieves and other Malefactors, and doing other buſineſs wherein Diligence and Agility were required.

The practiſe of men.

31. When arrived at Mans eſtate or ripeneſs of Age, they aſſiſted the Magiſtrates (choſen out of their own Claſſis) if need was, with their Council and Advice, or went to the Wars where now they fought not like velites or with miſſile weapons, but hand to hand, having on a Breaſt-plate of Braſs, bearing in the Right Hand a Basket Target, and in the Left a Sword, as a Perſian in Armour was wont to be painted. When arrived at Fifty they were reckoned amongſt the Seniors, and by benefit of their Age obtained miſſion from warfare, and were not compelled to paſs in ſervice out of their own Country, but ſtaying at home attended the deciding of publick and private Cauſes; for not only did they hear matters relating to Money and Eſtates, but publick Officers and others were accuſed before and ſentenced by them; it being lawful to any of the People to accuſe. As they ſentenced and depoſed, the creation of Magiſtrates belonged alſo to them, and to them alone Offices of Magiſtracy, and afterward the honour of Seniority to ſuch as had paſſed through the publick Diſcipline. Such had, when Boys, been educated in the Forum as we have ſaid, and thence paſſed into the Claſſis of the Ephebi, and after that into the other of perfect Manhood; for it muſt not be imagined that in what we have ſaid of the Perſian Inſtitution and breeding up in theſe Claſſes, all Perſians were indifferently concerned; it was only their Children who had wealth or Eſtates to be at the expence, and could maintain their Sons in the publick Schools of Juſtice. But if ſuch Sons were ſo educated and born Subjects of the King, they were admitted of what Nation ſoever, Hyrcanians as well as Perſians or Medes.

Of thoſe of fifty.

Other Cuſtoms.

32. As to their more general Cuſtoms and demeanour, Laughter was by them very unſeemly, eſpecially when vehement and extraordinary or in publick, neither was it decent to be ſeen to make water or evacuate, but this was done ſecretly and at home. Neither were they wont to do theſe things or to eat and drink in Journeys, but theſe Journeys Xenophon confeſſeth, in his days were wont to be ſo ſhort, that there was no great need of any Refection. And who conſiders their ſort of Diet will not wonder that they had little temptation to eat, or occaſion to evacuate; for beſides Bread they ordinarily eat nothing but Naſturtium, except a Cake made of Flour with water and ſome Oil, and beſides they made uſe of Salt and Cardomum. But this ſort of Diet we may believe to have been in faſhion in old times, in the days of Cyrus, when the Perſians lived with great labour and parſimony by reaſon of poverty and the barrenneſs of the Soil they inhabited. Afterwards when the Median and Lydian Triumphs gave them a taſte of foreign delicacies, they fell like thoſe they conquered into exceſs and riot: Now ordinary food would not content them, Wine now muſt diſcharge the duty of Water and that to intemperance, from the ill example of their Kings. We have ſeen how guilty Cambyſes was of this crime, but Xenophon eſpecially dates the decay of the ancient Diſcipline from Artaxerxes, and thoſe about him their giving up themſelves to intemperance in this kind. But from the Hiſtory of Eſther it's apparent that in the days of Ahaſuerus, they were arrived at that extravagancy as to compel one another to drink, elſe what reaſon could he have to prohibit this practice? when hot with drink they would alſo have women introduced.

After the diſſolution of their Diſcipline.

33. Yet Herodotus writes that in their Cups they were wont to Conſult about as high as State Affairs, but if they debated any thing at Table, they were wont the next Day when more ſober to conſider of it, and then to confirm or reject their former Opinions: though they would alſo call to the Teſt when drinking, what out of their Wine they had conſidered, whether matters of War or others, and ſome ſay their drunken Councils they moſt approved. After the diſſolution of the antient Diſcipline, not only the Kings but Nobility, and all the People according to their Wealth loved to fare after the moſt delicious ſort. Eſpecially on their Birth days whereon ſome would kill and Roſt whole Oxen, Camells, Horſes or Aſſes, and others according to their Ability leſſer Animals. But by the time of Ammianus Marcellinus it appears that the Nation was returned to Frugality again. Herodotus writes that in his Days they uſed ſweet Meats, or ſecond Courſes, but he relates that they ſhunned Curioſity and Luxury of Feaſts as a Plague, and eſpecially greedineſs of Drinking. Neither, the Kings Meals being excepted, had they any ſet or appointed Hour of Dining, but every mans Belly was his Clock or Dial, and when it called upon him he eat what came to Hand; neither after he had enough did any throw in any ſuperfluous Meats. Extraordinarily Cautious they were; ſo that paſſing through the Gardens or Vineyards of their Enemies, they neither deſired nor touched any thing therein, for fear of Poyſon or ſome ſort of Treachery. Beſides what Juſtin long before had written concerning the Parthians being ſparing in Diet, Procopius adds concerning the Perſians that therein they were hard and ſingular. And he interprets what Xenophon writes that their cuſtome was to eat but once a Day; that it was towards Evening.

Ammian.lib.23. p.260.Edit. valeſianæ.

Their ſumptuous Feaſts.

34. However before reduced to their temperate way of Life, or when they purpoſed to be ſumptuous in their Entertainment, they had beautiful Boys to wait at Table; they uſed Ointments, Garlands and Perfumes. The Attendants were not to ſpeak one word, not ſo much as gape or ſpit, it being indeed a cuſtome amongſt them, for all to keep ſilence at the Table, except he that ſung a merry Song, which ſhould be as a condiment to their Meat. They wanted no Bakers, Confectioners, Cooks, nor Butlers upon occaſion; nay they had Artiſts who made it their Trade to finde out Allurements of the Belly. Cupboards and Tables they had ſet forth and adorned with all ſorts of Cups and drinking Veſſels of great value and rarity. When Pauſanius had defeated Mardonius and was become maſter of his Baggage, ſeeing all his Furniture, in Veſſells and Tapeſtry of Gold and Silver, he commanded his Cooks and other Officers to prepare him a Supper after the ſame manner as Mardonius his Cuſtome was to be ſerved. They diligently obeyed his Orders, to the admiration of Pauſanius who was amazed to behold the golden and ſilver Bedds, the rich Furniture and the whole preparation. That they were wont to take their Repaſts upon ſuch Bedds covered with coſtly Carpets is otherwiſe evident, and as curious they were in their Bedds whereon they ſlept, for which they had their peculiar Bedmakers, in the myſtery of whom the Greeks were no whit skilled; ſo that when their King made Preſents of thoſe Bedds to them of that Nation, they preſented alſo the Bedmakers with them. Their Beds were not only furniſhed with coſtly Curtains, but their Rooms hung with curious Hangings of Purple and other Colours, drawn with Images as our modern ſort of Tapeſtry. Theſe Hangings the Greeks called Aulæa, and the Romans from them; but becauſe many ſuch were found in the Palace of Attalus King of Aſia who made the People of Rome his Heire, they imagined them ſo named from his Aula or Court. Indeed Attalus, as Pliny writes, firſt mixed Gold with them, and thence ſuch golden Tapiſtry might well be called Attalica. But the Babylonians invented the variety of Colours interwoven, and their City to that ſort gave a Name. The Phrygians firſt wrought that kind with a Needle, which received the name of Phrygiones. And thoſe that were woven with many Licia called Polymita were wrought at Alexandria. In concluſion the Perſians uſed Carpets not only for hangings on their Wall; but to tread on upon their Floores. Of Ointments they had good ſtore; eſpecially in their Baths, where they had Slaves to attend them, as alſo to carry them on their Shoulders, and what not; being as Ammianus deſcribes them crafty both in Proſperity and Adverſity, Proud, Cruel, and exerciſing the power of Life and Death, both over their Slaves and obſcure Plebeians. But one thing they frequently made uſe of, which afforded no pleaſant ſmell, and that was Garlick wherewith they even filled their Kitchins, thinking that thereby Serpents and other venemous things were driven away. When the Table was uncovered, what remained was by the Server diſtributed amongſt the Slaves and Attendants who were to live upon it as long as it could laſt.

Aulæa or Hangings.

36. Polygamy the Perſians very antiently uſed, but then its thought rather out of deſign to propagate a numerous People, than for Luſt; for they eſteemed the ſtrength of a Nation to conſiſt in its being populous, and their Kings were wont with Gifts to ſupport ſuch as had begot many Children. But afterwards as Luxury broke in upon them, for their Luſt they took many Women, and thoſe under the notion both of Wives and Concubines, even ſo many as they had Wealth to maintain. And though they did not as Ammianns tells us, make uſe of Boyes, yet was there no natural ſhame amongſt them, but they would marry or lye with their own Mothers and Siſters. And that they might lawfully ſo do with their Mothers, was the opinion of their Magi, though Alexander when he had conquered them removed this inceſtuous courſe, allowing them well to reverence but not marry their Mothers. The cuſtom of marrying their Siſters it's ſaid they received from the Aſſyrians, and however that of Mothers was forbidden by Alexander, yet this of Siſters was propagated even to the Macedonian Race of Ptolemies in Ægypt, where it continued the ordinary practice of theſe Kings to marry their Siſters, and to receive the Kingdom with them by the appointment of their Fathers. But however Alexander carried himſelf in this matter, Agathias complains of the Perſians of his time, (after that of Juſtinian) not only for lying with their own Mothers, Couſins, and Siſters, but with their own daughters alſo: The ordinary time of marrying was at the vernal Æquinoctial; before the Bridegroom went to bed, he eat an Apple or ſome marrow of a Camel, neither did he taſt any other food on his wedding day.

Promiſcuous Luſt.

Their Weddings.

37. Though they were pleaſed with Polygamy and a multitude of Wenches, yet were they given to Jealouſie over both, and nothing did they puniſh more than Adultery; yet alſo were they antiently given to Boys, if Herodotus be to be credited; however Ammianus acquits them of that Vice: Nay it's ſaid that Gelding of Boys proceeded from them, as alſo the Name of Spadones from Spada a Village where Caſtration firſt began; though ſome alſo fetch this Extravagance from the Aſſyrians and Medians; Ammianus writing that Semiramis firſt offered this violence and injury to Males. To the cuſtody of theſe Eunuchs they committed not only their Wives and Concubines, but alſo their Male Children. That they might omit nothing of pleaſure they were alſo delighted with Muſick; and the better to conſult their eaſe they rarely went afoot, but either rode on Horſeback or in Chariots. Riding, yet by their Anceſtors as one of their principal Exerciſes for War, was uſed not for lazineſs, but to facilitate great and honourable Atchievements; but they turned it into ſo great a ſort of Luxury, that they burthened the Beaſts they rode on with Saddles and Trappings, laying more Tapeſtry upon them than on their beds, though they alſo were furniſhed ſo as beſt to conduce to the pleaſure of ſoft & delicate lying. Moreover the women were carried up and down in Litters, and a ſort of Chariot they called Armaxa wont to be drawn by Mules; but ſo cloſe ſhut up as not to be ſeen. Theſe alſo were adorn'd with coſtly Carpets and Tapeſtry, and adorn'd with Gold or Silver: For the middle ſort of Perſians flowing with Luxury, their wealth conſiſted rather in coſtly Furniture than in money; they gloried in Gold and Silver Veſſels, and if any was in diſgrace with the King, he was to be ſerved in Earthen ware. In imitation of the Royal Paradiſes they diligently planted and cultivated their Gardens, ſet with Trees both of Fruit and pleaſant ſhade, not only in rows and Walks, but Groves and Wilderneſſes for the Summer ſeaſon. That they planted Vineyards is alſo believed, and at firſt they were generally Artificers and given unto manual labour; but as Luxury crept in, Artificers began to be deſpiſed, when they had applied themſelves (or the better ſort of them) to the practice of Arms. Yet notwithſtanding were not ſuch Arts as were neceſſary for ſubſiſtence and pleaſure laid down and utterly neglected, for that both Husbandry and Handycraft Trades ſhould diligently be exercoiſed, it was the work of Preſidents of Provinces acurately to ſee, as alſo Governors of Cities and Caſtles.

They were Accuſtomed to Riding.

Gardens.

38. The Perſians when they met were not wont in words to ſalute one another, but in room of that they kiſſed, and if they were of equal degree they kiſſed the Mouth, if of unequal he who was chiefeſt in dignity offered his Cheek to be kiſſed by the other: Indeed if one of meaneſt condition had occaſion to accoſt a Perſon of Quality, he fell down and did him reverence. But none they eſteemed ſo much as their Neighbours, and by the diſtance from themſelves they meaſured all the goodneſs of the Inhabitants of the Earth, valuing their next Neighbours moſt, and thoſe leaſt who were moſt removed from them: And yet they abominated all Leprous and ſcabby Perſons, ſuffering them not to abide in their Cities, though they might have an Eagles Noſe as they ſay Cyrus had, whom they prized above all Mortals. All Perſians wore a Tiara, and when they would ſalute to purpoſe, they would take that Cap from their Heads, in reverence of the Perſons whom they ſaluted: They uſed a looſe and large Veſt reaching to their Ankles, and taken from the Medes, the ſtole of whom was uſually of that called Sericum. They wore alſo an inward Tunick which they called Candys, and hanging down from their Shoulders had ſleeves to it; and was, as they pleaſed, of divers colours. To keep them yet more warm, they had another ſort of Garment called Caunaces: they wore not only Sleeves but

Their Cloaths.

Mittens or Gloves; and beſides ſomething to cover their nakedneſs, had their Braccæ to defend their Thighs from cold, at firſt made of plain and ſimple skins, afterward painted to all degrees of Luxury. The women wore large and laced Girdles, and the Nation had a ſort of Shooe peculiar to it ſelf, elegant enough in the times of Luxury; though at firſt, as in all other things, ill accoutred in this particular. They delighted to appear gay in their Necklaces of Pearl, their Bracelets and Chains of Gold adorned with precious ſtones. As this cuſtom they took from the Medians, ſo of the Lydians they learn'd to bore their Ears, and thereat to hang Gems and other things then in faſhion, as the Lybians alſo were wont to do. They not only loved to have their hair long, but to Nature added Art, wearing Periwigs or adventitious hair, which they alſo learn'd of the Medes, as they did to paint their faces and to colour their Eyebrows. In caſe of mourning they rent their hair from their heads, and tore their Clothes; nay we read that they would alſo cauſe their Horſes and Cattel to be like them by making bare their hides. They alſo had their proper mourning weeds, and yet their women eſteemed it the moſt contumelious thing imaginable, to put their hands to the dreſſing, ſpinning, or ordering of Wool.

The ſorts of their Capital Puniſhments.

39. Of their Tribunals and form of Judicature, we have already ſpoken. If the ſentence given againſt a Malefactor was Capital, it was executed either by Beheading, Crucifying, Burning, Burying alive, Fleaing, or Stoning. Beheading was a favour indulged to the Nobler ſort, but it was not done with an Axe after the faſhion of the Romans and the Engliſh, nor with a Sword as moſt Nations of Europe practice, but with a Razor or a Knife as the Spaniards cut the Throats of their Nobility with a crooked Inſtrument; and together with the Head the Right Hand was alſo cut off, and ſometimes fixed to a Gibbet. They were wont alſo to Nail even Great Men to Croſſes, though ſometimes not till after their Heads were off; and this ſort of puniſhment Alexander, after his Conqueſt, inflicted upon ſeveral Satrapæ themſelves. Such as they flea'd alive they ſometimes caſt to the Dogs, and making bottles of their Skins hung them up high. There were yet other ſorts of Puniſhments which we have related in the Hiſtory of Perſia, as the flatting of the Heads of Priſoners between two Stones; and the device of the Boat, and forcing the Party to eat honey and milk by pricking the Eyes with Needles, as the Reader may remember. But theſe Puniſhments were inflicted for thoſe they eſteemed the moſt grievous offences. For ſtill lighter crimes they had lighter cenſures, as Exile, Mutilation of Members, as of Noſe, Ears, Hands, or Feet, which they too ordinarily executed upon their Greek and Roman Priſoners, and branded them in the Body: Sometimes they digged out the eyes of noxious Perſons, and ſo Princes were wont to ſerve their Competitors. Beſides, ſome they noted with Infamy, as by taking from them the trimming of their hair which they eſteemed as the greateſt Ornament. Of others they confiſcated the Eſtates; and for a perfect diſcovery they were wont to examine guilty perſons by torture.

Leſſer Cenſures.

Puniſhment of High Treaſon.

40. But the greateſt puniſhment of all was that which being inflicted for the higheſt offence, extended to the greateſt latitude of Perſons. This was, when for high Treaſon committed againſt the Prince, all the Kindred or Relations ſuffered together with the Malefactor. This the Perſian Kings practiſed though ſo ſevere, and yet ſome of them, particularly Artaxerxes Longimanus, was ſo full of humanity that as Ammianus Marcellinus writes, when delinquents were to be puniſhed, in room of their heads he would cauſe their Tiaræ to be cut off, and inſtead of their Ears the ſtrings that hung down from their Caps upon them. The greateſt affront they eſteemed it to be termed more cowardly and lazy than a woman, and the greateſt indignity to be forced to ride on the bare back of an Aſs. They were to be commended for this, that their faith they uſually kept inviolable. So reſpective were they to their Kings, that they ſtrowed Flowers and Garlands in the ways where they were to paſs, as they did alſo upon occaſion of publick rejoycing. Their ordinary Coin was called Staters: one ſort was ſtamped with the Image of Darius, and thence the pieces had the name of Daricks, though ſome alſo with that of an Archer, according to the jeſt of Ageſilaus, when he departed home out of Aſia. Theſe were probably of Gold; but in after times the Perſian Kings only coined Silver money. In concluſion, they celebrated their Funerals with great pomp, burying them uſually in the Earth, though in latter Ages they and the adjoyning Nations ſuffered the dead to be devoured by Birds and Beaſts, and ſuch as theſe ravenous Creatures did not ſoon eat up, they accounted accurſed.

Their Coin.

Their Burials.

Of old they were very warlike.

41. We cannot diſmiſs the Perſians without conſidering ſomething concerning their Wars, without which they would have afforded little whereby to entitle themſelves to a ſhare in this work. However they were degenerated toward the latter end of their domination, yet were they formerly very conſiderable for the diſcipline and Arts of War; and to be excellent therein, they ſeemed to bend their greateſt endeavours. For that cauſe, when young, they learn'd and practiſed Riding, Shooting, and caſting Darts, and Hunting, which they eſteemed as more than a reſemblance of a Battel. All the hardſhips they underwent, they bore with more patience, becauſe fitting them for the inconveniencies of a Field, having learn'd this prudence and diligence in Scythia; for Ammianus tells us that originally Scythians they were, and thereby became moſt expert in fighting, but by degrees they conquered their Neighbouring Nations, and brought them under their own Name. As if they had ſtill owned their Original out of the North, whilſt Diſcipline ſtill continued amongſt them, they learn'd to Swim, and alſo to endure both cold and heat. In times of peace and greateſt ſecurity they never went without their Swords, not at Feaſts and Solemnities, which was of old the cuſtom of the Greeks alſo, till the Athenians firſt broke it off, and the Romans did not approve it. As ſoon as they were able to bear Arms, they were liſted in the Troops: From twenty years they ſerved till fifty, and then, as we ſaid, obtained an honourable miſſion; but before that time the Kings took it ill, if any deſired to be excuſed when they were going on an expedition, as Darius and Xerxes made it appear by ſad examples.

Vide Briſſonium quo ſuprà. lib. 3.

De Alanis loquens addit paulatimque Nationes conterminas crebritate victoriarum attritas ad gentilitatem ſui vocabuli traxerunt ut Perſæ. p. 437. ——unde etiam Perſæ qui ſunt originitùs Scythæ pugnandi ſunt peritiſſimi. p. 439. Vide ſi placet Notas Valeſii in locum qui per Perſas Ammianum contendit Parthos intellexiſſe at ego quidem hæreo.

42. Wars we know are undertaken, either to defend our ſelves at our own homes or doors, or to invade thoſe we call our Enemies. For their better defence, and to hinder the impreſſion of Foreign Nations, their Kings had their Captains, Satrapaes, and Miniſters, diſpoſed in all places; they had their Scouts both by day and by night, and their Beacons, which being fired ſucceſſively, from all the high places of the Kingdom, in one day ſignified what it concerned them to know. When any Army was to be raiſed, Orders were given out to ſome Satrapa for this purpoſe. Their Soldiers they called in their own Language Cardaces, as ſome ſay from a Country, others from Carda ſignifying a Lot. Herodian writes, that in his time they uſed no mercenary Soldier, neither held their Armies in any conſtant Camp, but that all the multitudes of the People, and ſometimes of women too, were gathered together by the King's Command, which when the War was over, was again diſmiſſed home without any other pay, wages or emolument, than what they had got by booty or plunder. But Ammianus Marcellinus obſerves in his days, that for their Military Methods, Diſcipline and Exerciſes, or Trainings, they were to be feared even by the greateſt Armies; truſting in the valour of their Horſe, wherein all the Nobility and the ſplendor of the Nation was concerned. As for the Foot, they being covered with their Targets like ſo many Mirmillones or Sword-players, obeyed orders rather like ſo many Scullions or the vileſt ſort of men; and always this multitude followed as condemned to perpetual ſlavery, neither ever being ſupported with pay or gifts. Beſides, ſaith he, this Nation over and above thoſe it hath abundantly conquered, had ſent many others under the Yoak, ſo bold and ſkilful it was in Martial Conteſts, if it had not been conſtantly vexed with civil and foreign Wars. What he ſaith of the Perſian Foot is atteſted by others who make the Infantry inconſiderable, and rather thought to ſerve and attend the Horſe, though for this purpoſe they will have the women alſo taken along in expeditions.

Cardaces.

Their Horſe.

Mirmillones cum adverſus retiarium, in arnea pugnabant oblongo ſcuto tegere ſeſe ac genuinflexo ſubſidere ſolebant.

Their Arms.

43. As for their Arms they wore Acinaces or Daggers, hanging at their Girdles upon their Right Thighs: In their hands they carried their Copides, which were Scimiters or Swords made crooked ſomething like Sickles, and otherwiſe called Sagares, which it's ſaid was alſo the weapon of the Amazons: But for defence of his Body, the Perſian Soldier wore a Breaſtplate of Braſs or Iron (or both) made with joynts like fins or ſcales of Fiſhes; and well might Ammianus write that their Foot covered themſelves like ſo many Myrmillones; for the Perſians had their Gerra or Targets made of Wickers ſo large, that they might cover their whole Bodies, like to thoſe uſed by the Romans and Galls. A ſort of miſſile weapon or Dart they had alſo called Paltum, made of the Cornus Tree as were Arrows and other things. Under their Gerra or Targets hung their Quivers at their Shoulders full of Arrows, Herodian reporting, that in his time they came not abroad without their Bows; and their Succeſſors the Parthians herein did ſo ſucceed, that if poſſible they exceeded them in the practice; for not only their Foot but their Horſemen had their Arrows hanging by them; and not only in their purſuit but againſt purſuers themſelves when running away, they were wont to let them fly. They made uſe, moreover of Slings for throwing of Stones, and thoſe of a conſiderable bigneſs. Ordinarily they wore no Helmets, but their own Tiara which was their Ornament for the Head both at home and abroad; and ſo were for their Thighs their Bracca or Breeches, which they uſed in, as well as out, of Fight.

Sect. 5.

Horſes they cheifly uſed.

44. But their chief Refuge as well as Delight (which Ammianus hints) was in their Horſe; and their Delight contributed to their Refuge. For while they were ſober and induſtrious, they ſo uſed themſelves to riding, that never were they to be ſeen on foot, but if feaſted, if they went upon publick or private buſineſs, if to the market, to meet, diſcourſe or talk, if Freemen, they went on Horſeback. But, as all good Inſtitutions are wont to degenerate, this Riding afterwards was only uſed for Pompe and ſhow, when more Trappings and Tapeſtry were laid upon a Horſe than was wont to be put upon a Bed or in a Chariot. And golden Bridles, he who had not, was out of the Faſhion either at home or in the War. In a Word, whereas at firſt the Nobility were they that compoſed the Cavalry, afterwards Cooks, Victuallers, Bath-holders and ſuch like were ſuffered to liſt themſelves in the Troops, after that Luxury and exceſs crept in amongſt them from the Medes. And as from the Medes they received their Luxury and particularly in riding, though poſſibly not riding it ſelf as ſome have written, ſo the beſt Horſes they were wont to ride. For in Media was Niſæum, where the Niſæan Horſes were bred, the goodlieſt of all others that were to be ſeen in the Eaſt; thoſe of India being nothing comparable to them; and though great as they were, yet what is wonderful, they excelled in ſwiftneſs as well as bulke. And ſome bulke it was neceſſary they ſhould have, both to bear the burthen of their Riders ſo armed as they were at all points, and to ſupport their own Armour wherewith they themſelves were alſo covered, framed after the manner of Scales of Fiſhes on their Fronts and Breaſts, if for the Sadle; and their Sides, if they drew at the Chariot. The Horſemen thus accoutred the Greeks called Cataphracti, but the Perſians Clibanarii.

The beſt out of Media.

They fought with Chariots.

45. But not only did they fight from Horſes, but alſo from Chariots, which differed too according to the uſe and imployment they had for them. For ſome were adorned with Gold and Silver; and others were armed with Sythes and ſuch crooked and cutting Irons as faſtened to the Body, Axletree and Wheels, were intended for cutting and tearing all they met in their paſſage, being governed by two Horſemen, who with Ropes faſtened to them, erected and let them fall as they ſaw convenient. By their long uſe of this ſort of armed Chariots, they ſhewed that they were not ineffectual in War, but by reaſon of their careleſſneſs in managing them, and the unskillfulneſs of the Drivers, they often did them more harm than good; and the Romans, however once a Terror, made them no better than a laughing Stock, finding them eaſily overturned by the inequality of the ways, and eſpecially by caſting Loggs and other Impediments before them. But in ſome of them the Perſians were wont to carry their Impediments, viz. their Wives and Children, their Mothers and Concubines, pretending that the ſight of theſe dear Relations would provoke them to Fight for their preſervation. Some write that above all things, the King took care for Forage, and all neceſſaries for their Armies before they ſet forward, which ordinarily were carried upon the Backs of Camells.

The order of their March.

46. The order and method of their March, was this as it is deſcribed by Quintus Curtius. It was their cuſtome to ſet forward when the Sun was firſt riſen. Then warning was given from the Kings Pavilion by a Trumpet, and by an Image of the Sun incloſed in Chryſtal placed ſo on the Top, as it might be ſeen gliſtering by all. The Fire which they termed Sacred and Eternal, was borne before on ſilver Altars, being followed by the Magi, who ſung ſome of the Songs of their Country. And the Magi were followed by three hundred and ſixty five young Men, as equal to the Days of the Year in Number, covered with Purple Veſtments. Then followed the Chariot Sacred to Jupiter drawn by white Horſes, behind which came an Horſe of extraordinary greatneſs, called the Horſe of the Sun, and thoſe that drove or led the Horſes, had in their Hands golden Rods, and were clothed in White. Not far from them marched ten Chariots very rich in Gold and Silver workemanſhip. And next to the Chariots a party of Horſe of twelve Nations, differing in Armes as in other Faſhions. Then were to be ſeen the Troop of them called Immortals conſiſting of ten Thouſand, excelled by no Barbarians in the wealth and ſplendor of their Accoutrements: they were adorned with Chains of Gold, wore Clothes imbroidered with that rich Metal; and their ſleeved Coats gliſtered with Gemms. Behind them, at a little diſtance came thoſe called the Kings Kinſmen, being fifteen thouſand Perſons, who had the Name alſo of Doryphori, or Spearbearers, though accoutred rather like Women than Men, and in their Arms being Effeminate.

47. Next to them went a Troop of Men who were to take up the Kings Robe:

The King how ſet out in it.

They went before the Chariot wherein he ſate aloft; the ſides of which were ſet out with the Images of their Gods, the Yoake was adorned with gliſtering Gemms, and from the Axletree ſtood up two golden Images, each of the length of a Cubit, whereof one bore the reſemblance of Belus. There was the ſhape of an Eagle ſtretching out it's Wings. The Kings Apparrel was throughout notable for Luxury. He had his Purple Tunick with white Spots. Golden Haukes as if falling together with their Beaks, adorned his golden imbroidered Palla. At his golden Girdle, wherewith he was Effeminately girt, hung his Dagger which had a Gemm for its Scabbard, and the royal Ornament of his Head, which they called Cidaris, was compaſſed with a blew Circle ſtudded with white. Ten thouſand Spearemen followed the Chariot, who had their Spears adorned with Silver, and bore Darts headed with Gold. On the right and left hand of him went about two hundred of the moſt Noble of his Relations, behind followed thirty thouſand Foot, and after them were led four hundred of the Kings Horſes. At a furlong diſtance Siſygambis the Mother of Darius was drawn in one Chariot, and in another his Wife. The Troops of Women that attended the Queens, rode on horſeback. Then came fifteen Cariages they called Armamaxæ wherein were the Kings Children with thoſe that brought them up, and a company of Eunuches no ways deſpicable in thoſe Nations; then the Kings Concubines three hundred and ſixty in number, in Royal Apparrel and Furniture. After them ſix hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels carried the Kings Money, being guarded with a party of Archers. Near to them marched the Wives of the Kings Kinſmen and Friends; then rode Flocks of Lacquies and mean Attendants. And the Rear was brought up by ſeveral Troops of light armed men, headed by their ſeveral Leaders.

The manner of their Incamping.

48. The Army in its March having not always Cities Townes or Manſions wherein to lodge, great Care was taken for its Incamping. For ſafety and defence, by the multitudes of Hands, they eaſily caſt up a Trench, and ſometimes fortified it by Wood and Stones, but always incloſed themſelves with their Cariages. In the Camp, to all ſorts of Officers both Military and other, places were aſſigned, and the ſeveral Tents of Command had their Markes and Tokens fixed upon them, whereby they might be diſtinguiſhed, and called out upon occaſion. The Kings Pavilion was as his Court at home, having its ſeveral Rooms and Appartments wonderful for wealth and bravery; and ſo proportionably were the Tents of the Satrapæ and great Men, who had their Sumpter-horſes for conveyance of all ſorts of rich Furniture into the Field. And they delighted to be as Rich and Gay in their Clothes, as in the Furniture of their Tents. They took with them their golden Chaines and Bracelets. The Scabberds of their Swords were adorned with Gemms. Their Trappings and Bridles were of Gold, ſo that as Alexander told his Men they rather bore Booty for the Conquerors, then Armes to Fight; ſo Luxurious they were even in the moſt ſerious Actions of their Life, when degenerated.

How they Muſtred.

49. Ordinarily their Armies were raiſed out of their own Countryes, yet ſometimes they alſo took in Auxiliaries of the Greeks. Their Soldiers were divided into Tenns, Sixes, Twenty foures, Hundreds, Thouſands and ten Thouſand; for, Commanders of all theſe are to be found in Writers; they had alſo beſides their Foot-Officers, Commanders of Horſe, particularly three in the Army of Xerxes. There were Commanders of Chariots and of the Harmamaxæ wherein the Women or Baggage were carried. The Kings were wont carefully to muſter their Men; and to take an account of their Numbers. The laſt Darius followed the device of Xerxes, practiſed at Doriſcus, to make a place which ſhould contain ten thouſand, and by filling the place, meaſure out his Soldiers as Grain or any other ſorts of things are meaſured. When the Perſian Kings propoſed to make War upon or invade any Country, they were wont after the manner of the Babylonians to ſend to demand Earth and Water to be ſent them, as Symbolls or Tokens of ſubjection and ſervitude, thoſe two things compoſing the places of which they challenged the Dominion. With what diſdain the Athenians and Lacedemonians received this Meſſage we have ſeen, and how they treated the Great Kings Ambaſſadors. Such as ſent the Symbolls owned him as their Lord and Soveraign; as the Ilanders, Amyntas of Macedonia and ſome others were forced to do.

50. What number of Animals the Kings were wont to carry along in their Expeditions, we have ſeen ſufficiently in the Hiſtory of their Warrs. Ammianus writes that they themſelves were not obliged to be in Battells; but that Darius in Perſon fought againſt Alexander we read, and that he was armed with his Dagger, Target and Bow. In the midle of the Battle the King ſtood. The Signal was given by Trumpet from his Pavilion. Before they joyned, the Perſians were accuſtomed to make a confuſed and terrible Noiſe. The Word was given by the Commander in Cheif, and Orders as well by other ſignes as word of Mouth; as when Sapor ſet upon a City he erected a red Flagg, as a Token that then his Men ſhould fall on. But the Royal Enſigne or Standerd is reported to have been an Eagle ſitting on a Pelta or a ſhort Target made like an half Moon. Carefully were the wounded provided for by Officers, whoſe peculiar charge and care it was. Such as fought ſtoutly were bountifully rewarded, thoſe that died for their Country honourably remembred, and on the contrary Ammianus tells us they had Laws bitter and ſevere againſt Deſertors. Some of their Kings would be cruel to ſuch Enemies as fell into their Hands; and propoſe Rewards to ſuch as would bring them alive. Of Wiles and Stratagems in War they knew little, as thinking it a diſgraceful thing to ſteal a Victory; Yet did they keep ſuch careful Watch, that they could not be ſurprized, who to preſerve themſelves awake, ſung Songs in the Night concerning the Juſtice and Felicity of their Princes. As for Scouting, the Perſians, in diligence and ſecrecy, ſeem to have excelled all others.

Sect. 5.

Proceeded to Battel.

How they Attacked Towns.

51. So deſirous they appear to have been of War, that in their Paintings and Landskips, ſcarcely any thing but Battles and Slaughters of Men or wild Beaſts were to be obſerved. For taking of Towns they made uſe of Ladders and Engines, and alſo of Mines, not to blow up the Walls as ſince the uſe of Gunpowder hath been practiſed, but to open Paſſages within them, that they might enter the beſieged places. Of the Baliſta, Scorpions and other ſort of Machines uſed by them Ammianus and others make mention. But, inſtead of our Wildfire they had ſeveral Oiles which would do the ſame Execution, one ſort made of an Indian Worm, which as Ælian writes, being ſhot in earthen Veſſels againſt the Gates of a Town, would ſet them on Fire: and another called the Oyl of Media or Naphta, in their own Language, a Bituminous matter, which burning could not be extinguiſhed with any thing but Duſt, as neither the Oyl of the Indian Worm with any thing but Durt and Mud lying in high Ways. In beſieging of Townes they made uſe alſo of Traps to catch the beſieged; and of Murices, or peices of Iron fourſquare with Pricks to hinder the Paſſage of their Horſe.

Their Ships.

52. For defence and Offence at Sea, the Perſians had their long Ships, their ſwift Veſſells, and Veſſels of burthen, for conveyance of Horſes and other Neceſſaries for War. On their Borders they had ſtrong Caſtles on high and ſcarcely acceſſible Hills very Strongly fortified, which had their ſeveral Governours, whoſe ſole work it was to look unto them. But in Winter they abſtained from War, as impatient of Cold. Obſervable it is that when they Adopted, it was not by words or writing, but by arming the Perſons to be adopted. Commendable it was that the Kings took it in diſdain that their Subjects ſhould be Slaves any where, and therefore ſuch as were taken in War, they readily redeemed. In concluſion, after thirty Years of Service performed, when fifty Years old, the Perſians obtained an honourable Miſſion.

How they contracted a League.

53. Peace is the end of War, and this the Perſian Kings might ſometimes be obliged by the badneſs of their Succeſs to admit of. Sometimes with Preſents they would contract Amity and Friendſhip with the Kings their Neighbours, as Cambyſes with him of the Æthiopians. Sometimes they would make a League, and then the Ceremony was performed after this manner: A Goate, a Bull, a Wolfe and a Ram was killed, and the Blood being put into a Target, the Greeks dipped therein a Sword, and the Perſians a Spear. But as we ſaid, had they ſtill had Peace with their Neighbours, we had heard little of them; They would ſcarcely have borne a ſhare in our Hiſtory of the World. For notwithſtanding this Policy of theirs extolled by Xenophon, ſo illiterate were they that we had had little or nothing of their Affaires communicated to us, had not their Actions been with the Greeks; from the Penns of whom we receive what account we have of them; not truſting to other pretended Hiſtories ſaid of late to have been taken out of their Archives.

Several Perſian things came out of Perſia into Europe.

54. But by way of Ægypt and Greece, many things and words of Perſian Original have been communicated to the weſtern World. Some Fruits have thence arrived in Europe: As the Peach, by ſome called Nux Molluſca, but ordinarily in Latin Malum Perſicum, ſaid to have been brought into Greece by thoſe that followed Alexander in his Expedition. That the Walnut, eſpecially the better ſort, allſo came out of Perſia, Pliny believed, from the Greek Names of Perſicum and Baſilicon given to it. The Limon or Citron, alſo grew in that Country, though in Aſſyria and Media in greater abundance,as ſhould appear by its Names of Malum Aſſyrium and Medium. Athenæus alſo writes that the Cocks called by the Latines Gallus Gallinaceus, firſt came out of Perſia, and was diſperſed into other Regions; being by the Greeks called the Perſian Bird. But that learned men interpret Athenæus concerning this Cock,I ſhould rather have thought it to have been the Turky, that Bird which hath ſeveral Names in ſeveral Languages, each Nation calling him by that Country out of which it thinks it firſt received him. For though we call him a Turky (as any man coming out of that vaſt Empire a Turk) yet the French and others a Cock of India. From India to Perſia there was good acceſs. Athenæus alſo relates that out of Media the neighbouring Country, Pheaſants firſt were brought, being kept by Ptolomy King of Alexandria in his Palace. Shall we mention that Perſian Skinns elegantly painted, were much prized in other Countries, and made uſe of by the Perſians themſelves, in their dining Roomes?

And Words.

55. Beſides Things, ſeveral Perſian Words have arrived in Europe, whereof ſome have been uſed even by Greeks and Romans, to ſignify what they could not otherwiſe, it ſeems, ſo well expreſs. For Gaza, though uſed for Treaſure, is a Perſian word, and ſo is Paradiſe, with which even Sacred Writers thought fit to ſerve themſelves. Many other there are ordinarily known, though rarely or ſcarcely uſed for any thing but what they properly ſignified in Perſia. Such were Satrapa, Paraſanga, Tiara, Candys, and many others which it might be tedious here to mention. Cyrus, though the Name of a River as well as a Man, its ſaid ſignified the Sun in the Perſian Language; Xerxes Martial or a Warriour, and Artaxerxes a great Warriour, or, as Ammianus interprets it, a Conqueror of Battells as Achemenes a Commander of Kings, for by both theſe the Perſians in his time ſtiled Sapor their King, when they ecchoed out his Name in the Army. The Generals of their Armies ſome ſay were called Megabyzi. And to terminate our diſcourſe as Countries are wont to be with a River, the Name of Tigris ſignifieth in the Perſian Dialect an Arrow, which that famous one received from the ſwiftneſs of its Stream.

Contemporaries with the Perſian Empire.

CHAP. II.

The Affairs of the Græcians amonſt themſelves during this Empire.

SECT. I.

Of ſuch things as happened from the beginning thereof until the Expedition of Xerxes.

Polycrates.

1. IN the time of Cyrus the Great, and afterwards, lived Polycrates the famous Tyrant of Samus, who from a ſmall beginning arrived at ſuch extraordinary power, as no petty Prince of the Greekiſh Nation was ever accounted equal to him for wordly Felicity.

The word Tyrannus or Tyrant whence derived, and whom it ſignifieth.

Τύραννος.

2 The word Tyrannus (which we Engliſh Tyrant) Suidas thinketh to have been derived from the Tyrrheni, a people of Italy, becauſe they were cruel and given to Robbery. Others thought it was derived of the City Tyre, by means of it's Riches and Glory. Moſt anciently the word was of no ill ſignification, but was uſed in a good ſence, there being no diſcrimination betwixt King and it, as * Servius obſerveth. For, though Homer (who never mentioneth Tyre) either knew it not or would not uſe it, yet the Poets who follow him, call thoſe Kings that lived before the Trojan times by the appellation of Tyranni. Afterwards through the diſſolute and cruel demeanour of ſome Princes, and the antipathy of the Greeks towards Monarchy (after they had generally erected Oligarchical or Democratical Governments) it came to be taken in a bad ſence. Herein it is eſpecially given to thoſe who, being once private perſons, enſlaved their Citizens by invading without any juſt Title the ſupreme power; as to Polycrates, Piſiſtratus, Dionyſius, and Agathocles. It's alſo applied to the Children who ſucceeded their Fathers in the uſurpation; and it is alſo given ſometimes to theſe who governed by the deſire and conſent of the People, as Gelon of Syracuſe, betokening as to this particular, a petty Prince or Regulus: For it is ſeldom or never in ancient Authors, when it is taken in an ill ſence, found applied to any but the uſurping Lords of Cities (not any notable Kingdom) and ſuch Cities as had before been governed in the way of a Commonwealth. And what is ſaid of thoſe Governors called Tyranni, muſt be extended to their Government, in the Greek Language called Tyrannis, which we Engliſh Tyranny, though not in any ill ſence wherein the Athenians uſed it not when they would have Solon to take the Tyrannis or Government upon him, though the word was harſh. This is hinted to take off any thoughts of the ignorant, as if the word reflected upon Monarchy, the beſt of Governments when all ſhall be conſidered.

* Æneiad. l. 7.

Vid. Strabonem l. 14.

Samus called firſt Parthenia, and afterward Dryuſa.

3. Samus is an Iſland in the Mediterranean Sea, lying over againſt Ionia, not far ſevered from it, containing in circuit ſcarce an hundred miles, ſo called from the heighth of it by the Ancients in their language. On the Weſt it looks towards the Iſland Icaria, but on the Eaſt the continent of Aſia, being near to Epheſus, and the promontory of Mycale, from which it is diſtant but five Miles. The moſt antient Inhabitants were Carians differing much from the Greeks both in Language and Manners. But when the Sons of Codrus led out Colonies from Attica, Androclus one of them here ſetled one, by which the City of the ſame name with the Iſland was built; having a very large and commodious Haven. It was preſently much beautified with frequency of Inhabitants, Riches, and multitudes of Buildings, and being very famous for the Temple of Juno, which was eſpecially worſhipped in this place, it was reckoned amongſt the twelve Ionian Cities, being partaker of the great Council of Panionium, and counted not inferior to Miletus, Epheſus, or Chius, the moſt eminent amongſt them. From Herodotus it ſhould appear to have at firſt been governed by Kings, the Inhabitants as he ſaith, in the Reign of Amphicrates, making War upon Ægina which was hurtful to both ſides: and this was the cauſe that in the Age following the Æginetans did as much by the Samian exiles which had retired into Crete. But in what Age Amphicrates lived he doth not mention; yet this is apparent from his words, that the Samians becauſe Iſlanders remained untouched by the King of Lydia and Perſia, when the other Ionian Cities in the Continent were forced by them into ſubjection.

Vid. Heraclid.

Lib. 3.

Herodotus lib. 3. cap. 39.

Polycrates his exploits.

His Felicity.

4. But when Cyrus flouriſhed in Aſia, and Piſiſtrates at Athens, Polycrates the Son of Æaces one of their own Citizens offered violence to their liberty. When firſt he ſeized on the Soveraignty, he made his two Brothers Pantagnotus and Syloſon partners with him, but afterwards he ſlew the one, and ejected the younger, and ſo having all the Power in his own Hands, he contracted amity with Amaſis, who at that time reigned in Ægypt. In a ſhort time his Affairs ſo proſpered, that he became famous through Ionia and all Greece, for whereſoever he made War he proſpered, with his hundred Biremes or Gallies with two ranks of Oares on a ſide, and one thouſand Archers, invading all his Neighbours without any difference, for that he held it for a Rule, that he gratified his Friend more by reſtoring what he had taken from him, than if he had taken nothing away. He ſubdued many Iſlands and many Towns in the Continent. The Lesbians coming to help their Friends of Miletus with all their Force, he overthrew, and took ſo many, as ſerved him to draw a Ditch round about the Walls of Samus. His Affairs being thus proſperous, were not unknown to Amaſis, but being every day more proſperous than other, at length Amaſis ſuſpected that his Friend and Allie, for this proſperous Fortune would have ſome diſaſtrous end, and therefore he wrote to him, and deſired him that to make ſome certain Change therein, he would pick out that which was moſt dear to him, and in the loſs whereof he would be moſt troubled, and make that away, ſo that he ſhould never more enjoy it. He accordingly took ſhip and caſt into the Sea his Signet, which was an Emrald ſet in a gold Ring; but it ſo hapened, that a Fiſher taking a very large fiſh, preſented it to him as only worthy of it, and in the Belly of it his Servants, when they cut it up, found the Signet. Amaſis hearing this, took ſuch aſſurance that an unfortunate end muſt follow ſuch prodigious ſucceſs, that leſt he ſhould be troubled with the miſcariage of a Friend and Allie, he renounced his friendſhip.

5. When Cambyſes was raiſing his Forces for his Expedition into Ægypt, Polycrates ſent to him underhand, to deſire him to ſend for ſome Supplies, who doing ſo, he picked out ſuch as he thought were moſt prone to Rebellion, and with them manned out two Triremes, deſiring of him that he would not ſend them back. Yet they after the War withdrew themſelves from Cambyſes, and went to Lacedæmon to deſire aid of that State againſt the Tyrant, which was granted them, either for that the Lacedæmonians were engaged to the Samians (as theſe pretended) becauſe they had received Supplies from them in the Meſſenian War, or as the Spartans alledged, not out of any kindneſs, but malice to the Samians, becauſe they had in the Age foregoing intercepted certain Preſents ſent by them to Cræſus, and to them from Amaſis. The Corinthians were alſo drawn in, having a particular quarrel of their own; the occaſion was alſo given at the ſame time, the Samiani having taken from the Corinthians certain Boyes which they were carrying from Periander their Tyrant to Alyattes King of Sardis to be made Eunuches.

6. The Lacedemonians coming with a great Fleet to Samus, beſieged the City, but endeavouring the ſtorming of it were repulſed with ſome loſs, and having in vain ſpent forty days in the Siege (ſo valiantly was it defended by Polycrates) they then returned home into Peloponneſus. A Story went, that Polycrates ſtamped ſome Lead, and covering it over with Gold, with it purchaſed the departure of the Lacedæmonians; but this was the firſt Expedition which the Dores made againſt Aſia. Afterwards at ſuch time as Cambyſes fell ſick, that fell upon Polycrates which Amaſis had forewarned him of. At this time one Orætes a Perſian was governour of Sardis, Ionia, Lydia, and the Sea-coaſts, in the place of Harpagus, who either for that he was upbraided that he got not Samus, ſo near to his Province, into the King's hand, or for that Polycrates ſlighted and gave no anſwer to a Meſſenger which he ſent to him (both which are reported) ſought earneſtly to work his deſtruction. Knowing he had an Ambition to become Maſter of Ionia and the Iſlands, he ſent to him to tell him that he heard how excellent things he caſt in his Head, but that he wanted Money to accompliſh them, wherefore he having now heard for certain that Cambyſes determined to kill him, offered to him, that if he would receive him, he ſhould have half of the King's money which he had in his poſſeſſion, whereby he might get the Soveraignty of all Greece. And if he doubted of his faithfulneſs, he deſired him to ſend one of his moſt truſty Servants to whom he would give ſatisfaction.

7. Polycrates with great joy received the Meſſage, being greedy after money, and to make the thing ſure, ſent Mæandrius his Secretary over to Orætes, who knowing him a cunning and circumſpect Man, filled ſeveral Cheſts with Stones, and covering them at the top with Gold, thereby deceived him. Polycrates was yet diſſwaded by all his Friends from going over himſelf, for that the Oracles were againſt it, and his Daughter dreamed that ſhe ſaw him up aloft in the Air, where he was waſhed by Jupiter, and anointed by the Sun; but he was angry with her for her importunity, and notwithſtanding all diſſwaſions went over to Orætes, taking with him amongſt others, Democedes the Son of Calliphon of Crotone in Italy, the moſt famous Phyſician then in his Country. He went over into Magneſia as far as the River Mæander, and then Orates laying hold of him, nailed him to a Croſs. Of thoſe that accompanied him, the Samians he diſmiſſed, telling them that they muſt account it for a great Favour ſo to be uſed by him, but all the Strangers and Slaves he took to himſelf, and reduced them into the State of ſervitude. This end had Polycrates, with whom none of the Syracuſian Tyrants, or any other of Greece for magnificence were to be compared. Him ſucceeded one Mæandrius his Vicegerent or Procurator, of whom Herodotus telleth many Stories, and who by the help of Otanes the Perſian Satrapa, being removed by the approbation of Darius the Son of Hyſtapes, Syloſon the Brother of Polycrates ſucceeded, Samus paying very dearly for it, what by the War, and the enſuing ſeverity of Syloſon. When Syloſon died, Æaces his Son ſucceeded him, by the favour of the Perſians; but was not long after thruſt from his Tyranny, when Ariſtagoras the Mileſian drew all Ionia into rebellion againſt the Perſians; which hapned about the eighteenth year of Darius.

Endeth miſerably.

Mæandrius.

Syloſon.

Æaces.

8. In the ſecond year of Darius, and the firſt of the ſixty fifth Olympiad, the inhabitants inhabitants of Platea in Bœotia, who never well accorded with their Neighbours the Thebans, being now irritated with their continual injuries, that for the future they might free themſelves from ſuch grievances, ſent, and offered themſelves to the Lacedæmonians (who then were of greateſt Authority in Greece) as Allies and Dependents. But they perceiving themſelves to be at too great a diſtance from them to give any Succors when need required, adviſed them to have recourſe to the Athenians as nearer to them, and of ſufficient ability to relieve them. They accordingly did ſo, and contracted a ſtraight League of Alliance with Athens, which became a great eye-ſore to the Thebans, and all their party a long time after.

Eminius de rebus florentis Græciæ.

A League betwixt the Platæans and Athenians.

9. In the third Year of the ſixty ſix Olympiad, and the eighth of the Reign of Darius, fell out great ſtirs at Athens, which never ceaſed till they produced a change in the Government. Piſiſtratus the famous Tyrant at his death left three Sons, Hippias, Hippharcus, and Theſſalus, and the principality (as it ſhould ſeem from * Heraclides) to them all; though Hippias, as the eldeſt, had ſupream Juriſdiction. He had hitherto for the ſpace of thirty years enjoyed his Fathers Kingdom, being loving and affectionate towards his brethren, and moderate towards his Subjects: Hipparchus was accounted a wiſe man, and lover of learning, being ſomething given to be amorous, and Theſſalus bold, and head-ſtrong. It hapned that Hipparcus fell in love with one Harmodius, a young man of the City, and ſorely ſollicited him to unlawful dalliance, who therewith acquainted one Ariſtogiton, a man of a middle rank amongſt the Citizens, and who moſt paſſionately loved him. He fearing he ſhould be deprived of this his dear one, conſulted with himſelf how he might deſtroy, both Hippharcus and the Tyranny. Hipparchus ſtill going on to ſollicite Harmodius, but in vain, at length reſolved to be revenged on him, and executed it on his Siſter, which being on a certain ſolemnity to carry up the Basket that was to be dedicated to Minerva, he put her by as unworthy of the Office; though ſome of late have thought that he raviſhed her.

* De Politia Athen.
Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 2.
Thucydides lib. 6.

Stirs at Athens.

10. Harmodius taking this in very evil part, and Ariſtogiton much worſe, prepared all things neceſſary for their Conſpiracy; but expected the great Feaſt called Panathenaa, on which day only the Citizens might be in Armour without ſuſpition, for diſcharging the Solemnity. They provided not many men before hand, for the more cloſe carrying of the buſineſs, and becauſe they hoped all the reſt would without any heſitation be ready to come in to them. When the day came, they and their party being ready with their Poniards, eſpied a man talking with Hippias; Whereupon they thought they were diſcovered, and therefore reſolved to do that, wherein eſpecially they were concerned, if they could, and ſo ruſhing in violently upon Hippharcus, they ſlew him in the place. Ariſtogiton defended himſelf for ſome time from the Guard; but the multitude flocking in, he was taken, after he had received many Wounds, and his friend Harmodius ſlain outright. Hippias having notice of what had paſſed, came cunningly upon the Citizens that were armed for the Solemnity, and by his Guard picking out ſuch as had Daggers about them, or whom he ſuſpected, thereby prevented at this time all further trouble.

Hippharcus ſlain by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton.

The behaviour of the Piſiſtratidæ, in the Government of Athens.

11. Hitherto he and his brethren had not been diſtruſtful of their own ſafety, and therefore had uſed no great Guards about them; not rendring their Power very burthenſom to the people, but acting according to the Rules of Vertue and Prudence. They exacted only the twentieth part of the publick Revenue, exceedingly beautified the City, waged War, and left the Citizens to their former Laws; only ſome one of them was alwaies Magiſtrate, and other men held of them yearly Offices, Piſiſtratus the Son of Hippias, and Nephew to the founder of this Kingdom, as it appeareth from Thucydides, having ſometimes had the Power in his Hands. But Hippias after this, fearing himſelf, exerciſed his Power very ſeverely againſt the Athenians, putting many of them to death, and to eſtabliſh himſelf by forein alliance he gave his Daughter in marriage to Hippoclus, the Son of Æantedes the Tyrant of Lampſacus, knowing them to be in great grace with Darius King of Perſia. To find out the complices of theſe two young men, he tortured, amongſt others, a woman named Leæna the Paramour of Ariſtogiton, but ſhe was ſo conſtant as to endure all, and biting off her Tongue, ſpit it in the Face of the Tormentors, leſt therewith ſhe ſhould diſcover any one; in memory of which the Athenians afterwards Conſecrated in the Caſtle a Lioneſſe without a Tongue, as alſo Erected Statues to the memory of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, as the liberators of their Countrey. Theſe Statues were taken away by Xerxes into Aſia, and long after ſent back by Alexander, or Antiochus, or Seleucus, as is ſeverally delivered by Hiſtorians. They alſo Decreed that their Names ſhould never be given to any Slaves.

Herodotus lib. 5. Capp. 62. &c.

12. Though theſe two did not actually procure the freedom of Athens, but periſhed in the attempt, yet it was attributed to them, becauſe that in the fourth year after, ſome imitating their Example expelled Hippias, and effectually procured it. At this time the Alcmæonidæ (or thoſe of the Family of Alcmæon, who was great Grand-ſon to Neſtor, and being caſt out of Meſſenia by the Heraclidæ, came and lived at Athens) being driven into exile by the Piſiſtratidæ (or Piſiſtratus his Sons) having ſometimes endeavoured in vain the recovery of their Countreys liberty, ſtill lay in wait for a more convenient opportunity to accompliſh it. Being full of Money, they hired the Amphyctiones to let them build a new Temple at Delphos, which was very magnificent, and corrupted the Pythia (or the woman that received and delivered the Oracles, ſtanding in a Tripos, or three footed Stool) as often as any of Sparta came thither, ſtill to propoſe to them to ſet Athens at liberty. This being conſtantly done, the Lacedæmonians accounted it a piece of their Religion to do it, and ſent Anchimolius, a man of prime Rank amongſt them, with an Army to expell the Piſiſtratidæ, though their Friends, and ſuch as had deſerved no otherwiſe than well of them. They being aware of this, had contracted friendſhip and alliance with the Theſſalians, and now procured from them a ſupply of one thouſand Horſe, which by a common Decree they ſent under the Command of Cixeas their King; which falling in upon the Camp of the Spartans, ſlew amongſt many others Anchimolius the General, and beat the other to their Ships, in which they returned home.

Herodotus ut prius cap. 64. &c.

13. Afterwards the Lacedæmonians ſent another Army by Land, under the Conduct of Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandridas, who invading the Athenian Territories was encountred by the Theſſalian Horſe, which he put to flight, and having killed above forty of them, the reſt ſhifted away, and betook themſelves as they could into Theſſaly. Cleomenes then coming up to the City beſieged the Tyrants, being ſhut up within the Pelaſgick-wall, but being unprovided for a Siege, and they furniſhed ſufficiently with Proviſions, after a few days he was about to depart homeward, had not one thing fallen out. As the Children of the Piſiſtratidæ were privately to be conveyed out of the Countrey, they were intercepted, which overturned the Affairs of their Parents, and forced them to Covenant with the Athenians, for their Ranſom, within five days to depart out of Attica, which accordingly was done, Hippias going ſtraight to Sigeus, and thence to Lampſacus, from which place he went to Darius, and in the twentieth year after returned with his Army, and died (as ſome ſay) in the Battle at Marathon. Sigeus was a Town ſituate upon the Helleſpont, which Piſiſtratus took by force out of the Hands of the Mitylenæans, and made Hegeſiſtratus his baſe ſon, by a woman of Argos, Tyrant there. Hippias was offered from Amyntas the King of Macedonia, either Anthemus, or Iolcos, a City in Macedonia; but he refuſed both, and betook himſelf to Darius, whoſe Army he afterwards conducted into Attica.

The Piſiſtratidæ baniſhed.

Thucydides ut ſuprà.

Herodotus cap. 66.

14. The State of Athens great before, grew greater after this grand mutation, in which two men contended for the chief Authority: Cliſthenes one of the Alcmæonidæ (the Nephew by his Mother of Clyſthenes, the Tyrant of Sicyon) and Iſagoras the Son of Tiſander. Clyſthenes being too weak for the other's faction, that he might engratiate himſelf with the people, whereas they were before divided but into four Tribes, encreaſed them unto ten, and whereas formerly they were named from the four Sons of Ion, viz. Teleon, Ægicor, Argadæus, and Hopletes, now he changed theſe for other Heroes which were, 1. Hippothoon the Son of Neptune, 2. Antiochus of Hercules, 3. Ajax of Telamon, 4. Leon the Athenian, who according to the Oracle devoted his Daughters for the publick ſafety, 5. Erechtheus, who ſlew Immaradus the Son of Eumolpus, 6. Ægæus, 7. Oeneus the baſe Son of Pandion, 8. Acamas the Son of Theſeus, 9. Cecrops, and 10 Pandion.

Clyſthenes changeth the names of the Tribes.

Pauſan. in Atticis.

15. Iſagoras envying Clyſthenes that reſpect, which hereby he obtained, procured Cleomenes the King of Sparta (with whom he had contracted Friendſhip during the War with Hippias) to come once more againſt Athens. He ſent a Meſſenger firſt, and preſently procured him to be baniſhed, and yet came thither with an Army, and beſides many of the Family of Alcmæon formerly caſt out with Clyſthenes, now alſo expelled 700 Families proper for War, under pretence of their being contaminated with them in the buſineſs of the death of Cylon. Then endeavoured he to diſſolve the Senate, and commit their Power to thoſe of Iſagoras his faction; but both Senate and People reſiſting, Iſagoras and he with their men ſeized on the Caſtle wherein they were beſieged two days: On the third the Lacedæmonians

Civil Wars betwixt Iſagoras and Clyſthenes.

dæmonians with Iſagoras had leave to depart, but the reſt were caſt into Priſon, and put to Death. Then was Clyſthenes with the ſeven hundred Families recalled, who reſtored the Democratical Government to the City, as it was founded by the Laws of Solon.

Clyſthenes reſtoreth Solon's Laws.

Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 24. Diodorus lib. 11. Plutarch in vita Ariſtid. & Periclis.

The Oſtraciſm.

16. To Clyſthenes is alſo aſcribed the introducing of the Oſtraciſm into the Athenian State, being generally granted to have been brought in a little after the baniſhment of the Piſiſtratidæ. For, conſidering the Calamities which had hapned in their time, the Athenians for the time to come would have all of equal Power and Authority. By the Oſtraciſm therefore they forced abſence from the City for ten Years upon the moſt powerful amongſt them for Glory, Nobility, or Eloquence, leſt they ſhould grow too great; without any Ignominy,or diſgrace; they being neither deprived of Goods, Lands, or any thing, ſave their preſence at home for that time. The form of it was this. Each of the Citizens wrote the Name of that man in an Oyſter Shell (whence it had the name of Oſtraciſm) who ſeemed to him to be the moſt powerful for the overturning of the Democracy, and then brought the Shell in as a ſuffrage into the place deſigned, and ſo he that was found to have moſt written with his Name, was for ten years ordered to leave the City. But two conditions were required that this Judgement ſhould ſtand in force: That no fewer then ſix thouſand ſhould be at the meeting, and the giving of Suffrages; and that thoſe that gave them ſhould be no younger than ſixty years old. The firſt that was baniſhed by this Law, was (as Ælian tells us) Clyſthenes the Author of it, though (according to another) Hipparchus, and Charmus Kinſman to Piſiſtratus: In after times Ariſtides, becauſe of that great Title Juſt given to him, and Themiſtooles for his Military Glory.

Harpocration. in Ἵππαρχος.

Herodotus lib. 5. cap. 4. &c.

Cleomenes to no purpoſe invadeth the Athenians.

17. But Cleomenes the Lacedæmonian King perceiving himſelf damnified both by Word and Deed from the Athenians, raiſed forces throughout Peloponneſus, intending (though diſſembling the matter) to be revenged upon them, and ſet up Iſagoras as Tyrant over them. He invaded one part, and procured the Bœotians on one ſide, and the Inhabitants of Chalcis on the other, to fall in upon other places. The Athenians thus diſtreſſed on all ſides, yet firſt went againſt the Peloponneſians lying in Eleuſine, and when the Armies were about to joyn, the Corinthians, firſt bethinking themſelves of the injuſtice of their cauſe, withdrew themſelves; and ſo did Demaratus the Son of Ariſton King of Sparta, and the Collegue of Cleomenes, having never diſſented from him formerly. Then the reſt of the aſſociates ſeeing that the Kings agreed not betwixt themſelves,and the Corinthians were gone, drew off alſo in like manner: the Athenians then to be revenged, fell upon the Bœotians, of whom killing many, they took priſoners ſeven hundred, and then paſſing over into Eubœa the ſame day, chaſtized the Inhabitants of Chalcis in like manner. Thus, four times the Dores out of Peloponneſus came into Attica; twice in a hoſtile manner, and twice to the help of the Athenians. Firſt when they brought a Colony into Megare, which was in the time of Codrus, the ſecond and third times to expel the Piſiſtratidæ, and now the fourth, when Cleomenes with the Peloponneſians invaded Eleuſine.

The Iſland Ægina.

18. The Thebans and the reſt of the Bœotians, ſeeing themſelves too weak for the Athenians, deſired help of the Inhabitants of Ægina, an Iſland ſituated in that part of the Sea, which ſevered Attica from Argolis, being five miles diſtant from the former, ſome eight in Circuit, and the Country of Æacus, (whence the Æacidæ) having a City of its own Name. The Æginetans bearing an old grudge to thoſe of Athens, and puffed up with a conceit of their Wealth, eaſily imbraced their Society, and when the Athenians were buſie with the other, paſſed over in their long Ships into Attica, and waſted the Coaſts thereof. The Lacedæmonians at this time underſtanding how they had been deluded by the Alcmeonidæ their corrupting the women that gave out the Oracles, and thereby their loſſe both of their old Friends, and all thanks alſo as to the Athenians; hearing further by the Oracles which Cleomenes had brought out of the Citadel of Athens, that that State ſhould much diſtreſs them, and eſpecially ſeeing how weak it was under Tyrants, but now how it increaſed in ſtrength after the recovery of its liberty, called back Hippias, reſolving to reſtore him. He was ready at their call, but then it happened that Soſicles the Corinthian Ambaſſador and others of their Confederates utterly diſallowed of this practice, and therefore ſeeing there was no hope of recovering his former Condition, he returned into Aſia, and there laboured with all his might to poſſeſs Artaphernes the Satrapa of Lydia againſt the Athenians, that they might be conquered by Darius his Brother. They ſent to Artaphernes, to deſire him not to give credence to their Exiles; but as when two or three years before, when they ſent to enter into ſociety with the Perſians, he told them they muſt give Earth and Water, as ſymbols of ſubjection (which the Ambaſſadors doing, were much blamed at their return) ſo now he told them, if they would be ſafe, they muſt receive Hippias. They refuſed the Condition, and choſe rather to be profeſſed Enemies to the Perſian, and thence preſently after joyned with Ariſtagoras, who withdrew the Ionians from their obedience, which provoked Darius afterwards to invade them, procured the Expedition of Xerxes, and the quarrel of that Empire with Greece. But theſe things concerning Athens and Hippias, hapned in the firſt year of the ſixty nineth Olympaid, the eighteenth of the Reign of Darius, A. M. 3501.

A. M. 3501.
V C. 250.
*Olymp.*69.*an.*1.
Darii. 18.

*Herodotus Lib.*6.*c.*48,&c.

19. After the Ionian War was over, and the Græcians in Aſia were forced once more to undergo the yoke, Darius in the twenty ſeventh year of his reign, and the third after his victory, ſent into Greece to demand Earth and Water as tokens of ſubjection. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians threw the Meſſengers into a well, and bad them thence fetch Earth and Water to carry to their Maſter, but the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Iſlanders, for fear of the Perſians, promiſed obedience. The Athenians preſently took offence thereat, as judging that the Æginetans did it out of a grudge to them, that they might fight under the conduct of the Perſians againſt Athens, and therefore they ſent to Sparta to complain of them as Traitors to Greece. Cleomenes was ſent from that State, and came to Ægina, with an intention to apprehend the principal authors of the revolt; but one Crius there openly oppoſed him, threatning him, in caſe he laid violent hands on any, for that he knew he did it without any publick decree of the Lacedæmonians, who elſe would have ſent the other King with him. This he ſaid at the inſtance of Demaratus the other King of Sparta, who diſagreeing with Cleomenes ever ſince the invaſion of Attica, now alſo grievouſly accuſed him in his abſence. Hereupon Cleomenes returned home, caſt out Demaratus, upon pretence of his illegitimation, from his Office, and put Lutychides his kinſman in his place.

The Æginetans by giving Earth and Water to Darius, incenſe the Græcians againſt them.

Stirs at Sparta betwixt Cleomenes and Demaratus the Kings.

The birth of Demaratus.

Cap. 61, &c.

20. The Father of Demaratus was Ariſton, of the poſterity of Procles, a man as worthy as any of his Anceſtors; who having no children by two wives (for which cauſe he divorced them) to ſatisfie the deſires of the people (which greatly wiſhed for ſome iſſue male from him) married a third, which already was the wife of his friend Agetus, covenanting with him for her, (ſhe being the moſt beautiful woman next after Helena) which by the Laws of Lycurgus he might do. Being married, it hapned juſt after ſeven months, when he was according to the cuſtom ſitting amongſt the Ephori, his houſhold ſervant came and ſignified to him that he had a Son born, with the ſuddainneſs of which thing being diſturbed, he raſhly ſwore that it was not his, coming ſo much within the time. The Ephori then neglected it, and he afterwards repenting of his raſhneſs, brought up the Child as his own, and becauſe he was ſo deſired by the publick wiſhes of the People, gave him the name of Demaratus. After his death Demaratus ſucceeded, a man of great worth, and who obtained a crown in the Olympick Games, which never hapned before to the Kings of Sparta. But that ſpeech of his Father was now objected againſt him, by his Colleague and Emulator Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandridas, who accuſed him alſo for their retreating formerly out of Attica, which occaſioned all the difference betwixt them; and all this was aggravated by Leutychides, who ſought for his place, and had a private quarrel with him about a woman, of which he had hindred him by taking her to himſelf to wife Demaratus depoſed, and Leutychides put in his place.

21. Great contention hence ariſing, the Spartans reſolved to ſend to Delphos, and enquire of the Oracle whether Demaratus was the Son of Ariſton; which being done, Cleomenes procured a friend he had at Delphos, to corrupt Pythia, ſo that being drawn by bribery ſhe gave the anſwer againſt Demaratus. Hereby Cleomenes procured him to be removed from the Kingdom, and Leutychides his kinſman to ſucceed him; yet though thus handled, he ceaſed not to love his Country, and continuing at home, diſdained not to bear inferiour Offices, till further affronted by Leutychides, who to inſult over and deride him, at ſuch a time as he was overſeeing the exerciſes of the Boyes, ſent and demanded of him how he liked of that Office after the Kingdom. He anſwered, that he had tried both, but the other not, and that that queſtion ſhould be the original either of great miſchief or happineſs to the Lacedæmonians, and then getting him home with his head covered he ſacrifized to Jupiter, and ſending for his Mother conjured her to tell him the truth concerning his Father. Being aſſured from her of his Legitimation, he went out of the City, under pretence of going to Delphos; but tooke the way to Elis, and thence to the Iſland Zacynthus, and ſo to Darius King of Perſia, the Zacynthians having refuſed to give him up to his Country-men who purſued him. He was received with great honour by the Perſians, who beſtowed Lands upon him to maintain him in a Princely equipage; and there his poſterity is reported to have endured a long ſeaſon.

Cleomenes his ill end.

22. Not long after Cleomenes received his juſt reward, his own hands being his executioners; for, his treachery againſt Demaratus being come to light, and fearing to be called to an account for it, he firſt fled into Theſſalie, and thence returning into Arcadia ſtirred up the Inhabitants againſt the Spartans, and attempted to ſwear them to be true to him whitherſoever he ſhould lead them. The Lacedæmonians hearing of this, and fearing what he might do to them, recalled and reſtored him to his former dignity; but when he was come home, having not had before this time a very ſetled head, he now fell into a Phrenſie, as he met any one in the City, puſhing their faces with his Scepter. His friends bound him with wooden fetters, in which condition, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats, he got a Sword of his Keeper, wherewith beginning at the calf of his leg, he cut up his fleſh upwards to the thighs, and, when he ripped up his belly, died, leaving no iſſue behind him, but a pattern of Juſtice to all Greece, which being amuſed at his end, moſt attributed it to the corruption of Pythia, and that in juſtice done to Demaratus; the Athenians attributed it to his invaſion of Eleuſine, and his deſtroying the Temple of their gods; but the Argives concluded this Judgment to have fallen upon him, becauſe he had baſely killed ſuch of their Country-men as eſcaped from a battel fought with him, after he had got them out of the Temple of Argos, and had burnt down the grove which he had taken. This paſſage betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives, is to be related though it be in the ſame order Herodotus hath done it, it having hapned long before the death of Cleomenes, and as Pauſanias ſaith, in the beginning of his reign.

In Laconicis.

23. For Conſulting the Oracle at Delphos, it was anſwered, that he ſhould take Argos, and hereupon he raiſed an Army and invaded the Territories of that State. The Argives in their own defence made haſt to meet him, but he ſetting upon them as they were at dinner, put many of them to the Sword, and beſieged the reſt in the grove at Argos, whither they fled. Then learning their names from ſuch fugitives as were with him, he called them man by man out of the Wood to redeem themſelves (which at the Lacedæmonian rate was two Minæ a man) and ſo fifty of them coming out of the grove (in which place they could not ſee beforehand what was done to their Companions) he put to the Sword. At length one of them climbing up a tree diſcovered the matter, after which no man would come out; but then he ſet fire to the grove and burnt it and them together. After this, asking to whom of their gods the grove belonged it was anſwered to Argus, and ſo he found and acknowledged Himſelf deceived by the Oracle. Returning to Sparta, he was accuſed as having been corrupted, for that he might have taken Argos if he would; but the major part were ſatisfied with his excuſe and acquitted him. As for Argos it was rendred by this overthrow ſo deſolate of men, that the Slaves governed all things, till ſuch time as the ſons of the ſlain grew up and recovered their Patrimony; after which the Slaves conquered Tyrinthe, and held it, till perſwaded by Cleander a certain Wizard, they returned, and made War upon their Maſters, which continued long, till ſuch time as the Argives with difficulty remained Conquerours.

Leutychides puniſhed for the injury offered to Demaratus.

24. Cleomenes being dead, the Æginetans ſent and complained of Leutychides for the injury he had done to them, in cauſing together with Cleomenes ten of their principal men to be kept as Hoſtages, at Athens. He was given up to them, but fearing to carry a King of Sparta away priſoner, though for the preſent the State had given him up, they took him onely to Athens to procure them the liberty of their Hoſtages. But the Athenians put them off, as refuſing to deliver them without the authority of two Kings, ſeeing both of them committed them to their cuſtody, and the journey being to no purpoſe Leutychides was diſmiſſed and ſo returned; but yet he alſo paid for the injury offered to Demaratus. * For leading an Army into Theſſalie, of which as of the War he had full and ample power, he was corrupted with money, and betrayed the intereſt of his Country, after which being diſcovered, as he held the money in both his hands ſitting in his tent, he was apprehended and carried to Sparta, where being called to account, he fled to Tegea, and there died in exile, his houſe being razed as a traytor to his Countrey.

* Herodotus Lib. 6. cap. 87.

Idem cap. 87.

25. But the Æginetans, of old, Enemies to thoſe of Athens, were now much more incenſed againſt them for detaining their Hoſtages, and ſet themſelves to ſtudie a revenge. At that time there was at Sunium (the utmoſt promontory of Attica) a Gallie which (according to the cuſtom obſerved every year ſince the time of Theſeus) was then going to Delphos, aboard of which were the principal men of Athens: on this they ſeized, and taking the men priſoners, bound them all. The Athenians hereat inraged, laboured with all might on the other hand to revenge this, and agreed with one Nicomachus to have the City betraied to them; yet for that they could not get their Fleet together ſoon enough, they came a day too late, and miſſed of that enterpriſe. But through the councel of Themiſtocles, having rigged a Fleet of ſeventy Gallies (twenty of which the Corinthians ſold them at an inconſiderable rate, becauſe by the Law they could not give them) they ſet upon the Æginetans, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight. They betook themſelves for aid to the Argives their old friends, but having offended them not long before, they received a publick denial, yet underhand a ſupply of one thouſand Volunteers, moſt of whom fell in Æginia by the hands of the Athenians, againſt whom yet the Æginetans afterwards, reinforcing their power at Sea, in another battel became Victors. But what the iſſue of this War farther was, is not declared by Herodotus, who yet elſewhere affirmeth, that it gave occaſion to the ſafety of all Greece, by putting the Athenians upon the care of Sea-matters, whereby when Xerxes came, they became the bulwark thereof. Probable it is, that this War which was begun before the battel of Marathon, was not compoſed till the time that Xerxes was about to invade Greece, when we read that all the Græcians (and theſe two States amongſt the reſt) reſolved to lay aſide all private quarrels amongſt themſelves, the Æginetans being obſerved by * another to have had the Dominion of the Sea twenty years, untill the paſſage of Xerxes, which thenceforth they were forced to yield to the Athenians.

War betwixt the Athenians and Æginetans.

* Euſeb in Chronico.

26. Whileſt the Athenians were buſie in the War againſt Æginia, Darius ſent his Forces into Greece againſt them, and the Eretrians (inhabitants of the Iſland Euboea) which though they took the Citie of the latter, and made them Captives, yet were they overthrown by the former in the battel at Marathon. After the fight two thouſand Spartans came to Athens (being hindred hitherto by their ſuperſtition, which forbad them from a Law of Lycurgus not to ſtir out till the full Moon) whence they proceeded to Marathon to ſee the number of the ſlain, and then commending the valour of the Athenians returned home. Of theſe were ſlain in this fight Callimachus one of the Polemachs, Cynægirus commended by many Writers, who when the Perſians fled, and betook themſelves to their ſhips, held one of them with his hands till they were cut off, and then with his teeth, till at length he was ſlain; and Hippias the late Tyrant (who now hoping to recover, after twenty years baniſhment, his old power, became the conducter of the Perſian Forces) though neither Herodotus nor Thucydides make mention of his death, yet is reported by later Authors here to have been ſlain. Themiſtocles now a young man behaved himſelf gallantly in the battel; but the ſucceſs is aſcribed to the valour, and conduct of Miltiades, to whom, when Ariſtides one of the Captains had aſſigned his day's Government, the reſt when it came on their turns did the ſame, after that by the ſame help he had carried it into the Councel for a battel. Yet did he not fight till his own day came, and then ingaging, overthrew the Enemy in that memorable battel.

The battel of Marathon.

Juſtin. lib. 2.

Miltiades

Plutarch. in Ariſtide.

Herod. lib. 6.

27. His father was Cimon, who in the Tyranny of Piſiſtratus departed from Athens, and thrice obtained the Garland in the Oylmpick Games; yet being reconciled to Piſiſtratns afterwards returned, but after his death was ſlain by his faction. His eldeſt ſon, was called after his Grand-father Steſagoras, was brought up with their half-Uncle Miltiades in the Cherſoneſus, over which he was Prince. His other ſon was this Miltiades, ſo called after this his Uncle, which dying without Children, Steſagoras ſucceeded him, but not long after was killed by one that connterfeited himſelf a fugitive, and died alſo without iſſue. Then did the Piſiſtratidæ ſend Miltiades to ſucceed his brother in the Principality of the Cherſoneſus, and there he ruled when Darius undertook the expedition into Scythia and he it was that gave the Ionians councel to break the bridge, and leave him there wandring with his Army. Being ſetled, he married Hegeſipyla the daughter of Olorus King of Thrace; but the Scythians provoked by Darius, and making an excurſion as far as the Cherſoneſus, he

His Pedegree and Actions.

Sect. 1.

he daring not to withſtand them fled, and after their retreat was reſtored by the Thracians. After ſome years Darius being angry with him, ſent a Fleet of Phœnicians to ſubdue the Cherſoneſus; whereupon he fled with five Gallies from Cardia, and came to Athens; but as he fled the Phœnicians intercepted one of them, and therein his ſon Metiochus, who being preſented to Darius, received from him houſe, lands, and a Perſian Wife. Being returned home, he was accuſed for poſſeſſing the Tyranny of the Cherſoneſus, but was acquitted, and * having perſwaded the Athenians to caſt Darius his Ambaſſador into the pit, was afterwards declared by the people one of their Captains, and thence had occaſion to obtain this famous Victory at Marathon.

* *Pauſan.lib.*8.

Herod. lib. 6. cap. 132. &c.

His fruitleſs expedition to Paros.

28. Miltiades flouriſhing in great glory, and grace with the people, obtained of them ſeventy Gallies well manned, not making known his intention, but profeſſing that he would much thereby benefit the State. He ſayled to the Iſland Paros (one of the Cyclades in the Ægean-Sea, and famous for the beſt Marble) the inhabitants of which having aſſiſted the Perſians at Marathon, he beſieged, demanding one hundred Talents of them. They would not hear of parting with money, but made proviſion for reſiſtance, whereupon he harraſſed their Territories, and more cloſely beſieged them, and attempted the City for twenty days, but leaping off from a Wall, he hurt his Thigh, and was forced to return home. There, when he was arrived, he was accuſed by Xanthippus (the ſon of Ariphron, and Father to Pericles, his Emulator) of Treaſon, as having voluntarily miſcarried in the Enterpriſe about Paros. He could not be preſent himſelf to anſwer, his Thigh now corrupting, which held him in his bed, but Steſagorus, or Tiſagoras, his brother (according to Cor. Nepos) or rather, other of his friends were there for him, bidding the people remember the battel at Marathon, and the taking of Lemnus, which he, having expelled the Pelaſgians, had ſubdued under the Athenian power. The people ſpared his life, but fined him fifty Talents, which ſum this expedition coſt them. One tells us it was not out of any regard to his Crime ſo much, as having lately been under the Tyranny of Piſiſtratus, they feared now the power of their own Citizens, and him eſpecially, who having been much practiſed in Magiſtracy and Power, and enclined naturally to a love of it, could ſcarcely as they thought bear the condition of a private life; ſo that though being called a Tyrant, he obtained that power not by his own ſeeking, but was ever found to be juſt, moderate, and humble; yet having a great name for Military matters, and thereby great intereſt, they choſe rather to condemn him though innocent, than continually to be in fear; though they might have thought on the Oſtraciſm.

Corn. Nepos in vita Miltiadis.

He dieth in priſon.

29. After this, Miltiades died in priſon of the corruption of his Thigh, as moſt have delivered, his fine being yet upon the ſcore; upon which account the Athenians would not ſuffer his body to be buried, till ſuch time as his Son Cimon offered himſelf to bonds in the room thereof. As his father before him, ſo he was unable to pay the fine, and by the Laws of Athens could not be releaſed until he had done it. He had then to Wife his ſiſter by the Father's ſide (as we are to take it) named Elpinice, * it being lawful for the Athenians to marry ſuch. One Callias there was in the City, a rich man, though of a vulgar caſt, who had gained much by the Mines; he being in love with her, offered Cimon, if he would part with her to him, to diſcharge the fine. Cimon ſleighted the offer, but ſhe vowed that ſhe would not ſuffer any of Miltiades his Children to die in priſon, and that to prevent ſuch a thing, ſhe would marry Callias, if he would perform his offer. Cimon was perſwaded, married her to him, and the fine being diſcharged, was ſet at liberty, which he preſently improved for his own advancement. Theſe things fell out not long after the battel at Marathon.

Valer. Max. lib. 5. *cap.*3. ext. exempl.ult.
Corn. Nepos in vita Cimonis.
Plutarch in Cimone.
* *Vide Janum Rutgerſium Var. Lect.lib.*1. *cap.*9. & Boecleri notas ad Corn. Nepotem.

His ſon Cimon.

Xerxes invadeth Greece.

30. Three years the Græcians had reſt, as from without, ſo within themſelves, till the coming of Xerxes; only the War betwixt the Athenians and Æginetans ſtill depended, until common danger drew them to a compoſure. As the Athenians had given moſt occaſion to the invaſion of Greece, ſo they bore the greateſt burthen thereof, and by the means of Themiſtocles, one of their Citizens, procured the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, in that by his Stratagems the Peloponneſians were brought to fight, and not ſuffered to depart to their ſeveral homes, which would have brought certain deſtruction to them all. Aſſiſtant to Themiſtocles was another of his Country-men, named Ariſtides, who though baniſhed by the Oſtraciſm through his procurement, for that, as they diſagreed in temper, ſo in their way of policy, and Government (Themiſtocles being quick, bold, crafty, and and eaſily changeable, according to the juncture of affairs; but Ariſtides conſtant and grave, only intent upon Juſtice, and who neither in jeſt nor earneſt would give way to lying, ſcurrility, or deceit) yet now with others was recalled by his means for the ſafety of the Country, and voluntarily laid aſide all private quarrels which came into competition with the publick ſafety. The ſirname of Juſt which firſt got this man love, afterward procured him envy, Themiſtocles whiſpering this into the ears of the multitude, that whilſt he took upon him to cenſure all things, he had prepared for himſelf a Throne, in the ruine of the Courts of Judicature, being defended with a ſufficient Guard. The multitude puffed up with their ſucceſs at Marathon, and deſigning great things in their heads, could ill bear any that excelled them in fame and glory, and therefore flocking into the City they baniſhed him by the Oſtraciſm, cloaking their envy at his glory with a ſpecious pretence of fear of Tyranny.

Vide Plutarchum in vita Ariſtidis.

Themiſtocles and Ariſtides.

Idem ibid.

Iliad. α.

31. When they were come together to give their ſuffrages, a Countryman ignorant of Letters, is reported to have given a ſhell to Ariſtides (not knowing him, but to be of the common ſort) and deſired him to write for him therein the name of Ariſtides, at which he wondring, and asking him if ever he had received any injury at his hands, he ſaid no, but that he was troubled to hear him all over go by the name of Juſt. Ariſtides hearing this, anſwered nothing, but wrote his own name, and gave it to the man, and when he departed out of the City, with hands lifted up to heaven prayed (contrary to what Achilles did when he found himſelf ill uſed by Agamemnon) that the eſtate of Athens might never happen to be ſuch as to give them occaſion to think of Ariſtides. But in the third year after, when Xerxes now marched through Theſſaly and Bœotia towards Attica, the Athenians repealing their Decrees, recalled all that were baniſhed, eſpecially for fear of Ariſtides, leſt joyning with the Enemy, he might by his Authority draw many of their Citizens to revolt. They were miſtaken concerning the mans diſpoſition, for before the Decree for his return was made, he had not been wanting to provoke the Græcians as much as he could to defend their liberty; then joyned with Themiſtocles, though one moſt averſe to him, and for the publick good advanced him to the higheſt degree of Dignity. He joyned in endeavours with him for procuring the Græciaus to fight, and underſtanding that Pſyttalia a little Iſland before Salamina was poſſeſſed of the Enemy, he paſſed over thither with a party of ſuch as voluntarily followed him, and put them all to the ſword, except ſome of the chiefeſt, to whom he gave quarter. He diſpoſed Soldiers ſo throughout the Iſland, that on which quarter ſoever any of either party ſhould light, he might ſeize upon them, and ſo preſerve his friends, and provide that none of the enemy ſhould eſcape: upon which account a Trophy was erected in Pſyttalia. And when Themiſtocles to try him after the victory, ſaid, that one brave act was done, viz. the overthrow of Xerxes, but that another remained, which was, by breaking the bridge to take Aſia in Europe, he earneſtly deſired him to reject all ſuch advice, and rather to conſider how ſoon they might expel the Mede out of Greece, leſt being ſhut in with ſuch great Forces, and all opportunity of flight being taken away, he might by neceſſity be egged on to revenge.

Herodotus lib. 8 cap. 111.

The acts of Themiſtocles immediately after the flight of Xerxes.

Idem cap. 122 &c. & Plutarch. in Themiſtocle.

His glory.

32. After the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, Themiſtocles having the greateſt authority in the Fleet, went therewith againſt ſuch Iſlanders as had taken part with the Perſians, demanding money of them. He urged them with two powerful divinities Perſwaſion and Neceſſity, to which the inhabitants of Andros (one of the Cyclades) truſting in the ſtrength of their Fortifications, oppoſed two others as ſtrong as the former, viz. Poverty and Impoſſibility, whereupon they were cloſe beſieged, and it being to no purpoſe, the Fleet returned to Salamine, Themiſtocles without the privity of the reſt, going to other Iſlands, from which by his threats he exacted much money. After they had at Salamine divided the ſpoile, and conſecrated part thereof to their gods, they went to the Iſthmus, there to reward him who ſhould be thought to have beſt in the War deſerved of Greece. When the Captains ſeverally came to deliver their minds in writing at the Altar of Neptune, each one aſcribed to himſelf the firſt place in merit, but to Themiſtocles aſſigned the ſecond, which amounted to as much, as if by a ſilent confeſſion they had acknowledged his merit to be principal. And though by the envy of the Captains his glory was depreſſed, yet was he accounted the moſt prudent man of all Greece, and being invited down to Lacedæmon, by the judgment of that ſevere State, as the praiſe of valour was given to their own Eurybiades, ſo that of prudence and dexterity unto him. They gave him a crown of Olives, and the beſt Chariot they had, as a reward,

Sect. 1. and what before was not done to any mortal man by them, at his departure, to do him honour, they ſent three hundred Horſe to conduct him to the borders of their Dominions. After this, the Græcians overthrew Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left behind him, at the battel of Platæa, and the ſame day the Perſian Fleet at Mycale a Promontory of Ionia, which they hereby reſtored to liberty, Xanthippus being Archon at Athens; in the ſecond year of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, and the ſeventh of the Reign of Xerxes. During which paſſages abroad, little hapned at home but in relation to them; the ſum of which elſewhere hath been related.

Learned Men. 33. As for learned men which flouriſhed during this period; ſome of the ſeven Wiſe men of Greece lived in the time of Cyrus, and about the beginning of the Perſian Empire. Theſe ſeven were, Pittacus of Mitylene, who was born about the thirty ſecond Olympiad; Bias of Priene, Chilon of Lacedæmon, and Cleobulus of Lindus, all who flouriſhed about the fourty ſeventh Olympiad, with Thales of Miletus, who being born about the firſt year of the thirty fifth Olympiad, foretold an Eclypſe of the Sun, which hapned about the third year of the fourty eighth, in the reign of Alyattes, and Aſtyages, and about the beginning of the fifty eighth, having helped Crœſus over the River Halys, by draining it with a ditch, then died. The ſixth was Solon of Athens, who died the ſame year with Thales, and the ſeventh Periander of Corinth. Conſule Diogenem Laertium.

34. Beſides theſe there was Xenophanes the Colophonian, who being born in the fortieth Olympiad, came into Sicily, when Hieron and Epicharmus flouriſhed, about the ſeventieth Olympiad. Epicharmus lived ninety ſeven years as Lucian writeth, and invented the Comedy eight years before the beginning of the Perſian Empire. Phocylides flouriſhed at the ſame time, to whom a Poem yet extant concerning Laws is aſcribed, though Scaliger thinks it made by ſome Helleniſtick Jew. Beſides theſe, Anacreon the Teian Poet, who as * Pliny writeth, was choaked with the ſtone of a raiſin. Simonides a Poet of the Iſland Ceos, where he was born in the City Iulis. Having lived ſome time at Athens with Hipparchus the Son of Piſiſtratus, he went into Sicily unto Hiero, by whom being asked what God was, he demanded a days time to conſider of it, and after that another; ſtill profeſſing that the more he ſtudied the point, the more he was to ſeek in it. Some ſay he found out the Art of Memory, and that being very covetous, he firſt expoſed the Muſes to ſale. In the ſecond year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and eight before the Perſian Empire, died Anaximander the natural Philoſopher of Miletus. Anaximenes his Scholar flouriſhed about that time. Theagenes of Rhegium the moſt antient Chronographer. Democedes of Crotone a Phyſician, being taken Captive with Polycrates by Oetes the Perſian, was carried as a Slave to Darius, with whom he lived in great eſteem, after he had cured his foot and the breaſt of his wife Atoſſa.

Lib. 7. cap. 7.*

35. There flouriſhed alſo in Darius his time, Cadmus of Miletus an Hiſtoriographer, there having been another of this name and place, according to Suidas, who in four Books wrote the Hiſtory of Miletus and all Ionia: and Strabo nameth Cadmus, Phercydes and Hecatæus as thoſe who firſt of all Greeks wrote Proſe. Hecatæus flouriſhed at this time, and gave light to Herodotus. Phrynichus the Athenian, a tragical Poet, who firſt cauſed a woman to be perſonated, and invented the verſe with four feet. Heraclitus the Epheſian, a contemner of Heatheniſh Idols, who out of fear wrote his Book of Nature in ſuch an obſcure manner, that that thence he got the name of Scotivus or Dark. Zeno of Elea, or Velia, in Italy, Scholar to Parmenides, who conſpiring againſt Nearchus the Tyrant, endured torments to death, rather than he would diſcover his complices. Pythagoras the ſon of Mneſarchus the Samian, but born at Sidon in Phœnicia, about the fifty third Olympiad. Being twelve years old he learnt of Thales and Phocilydes, from the latter taking the tranſmigration of Souls. Travelling into Ægypt and to Babylon, he drunk in the learning of both places. About the ſixty eighth Olympiad he went into Italy, where he lived firſt at Crotone, and then at Metapontus. Here he taught and conſtituted the Italian School or Sect, as Thales had done the Ionick. Whereas others ſuffered themſelves to be called Sophoi, he would be called out of modeſty Philoſophus. In the ſixty ſeventh Olympiad he found out the nature and courſe of the Planet Venus. In the fourth year of the ſeventieth he died at Metapontus, where he was ſo admired, that his houſe was made a Temple, and that part of Italy called Magna Græcia. Amongſt his Scholars was Milo the famous Wreſtler; and women through him became famous for learning, their Epiſtles being yet extant.

Diogenes.
Jamblicus.
Juſtin. lib. 20.
Plin. l. 2. c. 8.

UMI

SECT. II.

Of ſuch things as fell out amongſt the Græcians, from their Victories at Platæa and Mycale, until the beginning of the Peloponneſian War.

Containing the ſpace of fourty eight Years.

Thucyd. l. 1.

1. THe Perſians being overthrown in Greece both at Sea and Land, and ſo driven utterly out of Europe; and thoſe that fled into Aſia in Ships being alſo defeated at Mycale, Leutychides the Spartan who there commanded in chief, returned home with his Aſſociates of Peloponneſus. The Athenians with the Ionians, and thoſe that inhabited upon the Helleſpont, beſieged Seſtus, which the Perſians had ſeized on, all Winter, and reduced it; after which they alſo all departed home.

Idem ibid. Plutarch & Corn. Nepos in Themiſtocle.

2. The Athenians having brought home their Wives and Children, after the overthrow of Mardonius, had the popular Government reſtored by Ariſtides, and ſet themſelves to rebuild the Walls of their City in a greater compaſs, and ſtronger than had been formerly, being thereto eſpecially induced through the perſwaſion of Themiſtocles. The Lacedæmonians above all others were hereat exceedingly troubled, as conſidering that having obtained ſo great Glory by the two Victories at Marathon and Salamina, the Athenians would yet contend with them for the Principallity, and upon that account they wiſhed them as weak as might be. They diſſwaded them therefore from going on with their work; alledging that it was dangerous for Greece to have any fortified place without the Peloponneſus, which the Barbarians might ſeize on, and poſſeſs. They ſaid they would ſend anſwer by Ambaſſadors of their own, and Themiſtocles took the buſineſs upon him. He firſt went alone, and ordered that the reſt ſhould follow, but not till the Wall was brought to a reaſonable height; that in the mean time both Bond and Free ſhould ply the work; and ſparing no place, whether Holy or Prophane, Private or Publick, take all ſuch ſtuff for building as they might ſooneſt light on. When he came to Sparta, he demanded no audience, but ſought to protract the time, pretending he expected his Collegues. The Lacedæmonians complaining that nevertheleſs the Work went on, and that he went about to deceive them, the other Ambaſſadors arrived, of whom after he knew that the Fortifications were almoſt finiſhed, he laboured to perſwade the Ephori (who now had the chief Power in that State) that the things were falſe, which they were made to believe, deſired them to ſend Perſons conſiderable whom they might truſt to make inſpection, and keep him as an Hoſtage till their return.

The Athenians rebuild their Walls, which the Lacedæmonians grudge.

3. They ſent accordingly three of their principal men to Athens, and with them Themiſtocles his Collegues, to whom he gave in charge that the Lacedæmonians ſhould not be diſmiſſed till his return. After their departure, he demanded audience of the Magiſtrates and Senate, and then freely and openly profeſſed, that the Athenians by his Advice, and agreeable to the common Law of Nations, had fenced their publick and private Goods with a Wall, that they might more eaſily defend them; and neither could that be to the damage of Greece, of which Athens was the Bulwark againſt the Barbarians, for here the King's Navy had twice ſuffered Shipwrack. He told them, they did ill to regard more their private ambition, than what was profitable for all Greece; and, to conclude, if they expected the return of their Ambaſſadors, they muſt diſmiſs him, or elſe never expect to ſee them again; which accordingly they were forced to do with much private regret, though aſhamed to own the Cauſe. He adviſed his Country-men further to finiſh the work of the Piræus or Port of Athens, which they had begun a long time before, whilſt he was Archon; for he perſwaded them firſt to apply themſelves

But are eluded by Themiſtocles.

ſelves to Sea-matters, as the way to obtain Dominion, and commended to them that Place as moſt convenient for their deſign, having three natural Havens. The Wall he cauſed to be made ſo thick as two Carriages loaded with Stones might paſs by each other; but brought the height of it but to half of that which he had deſigned. And with ſo great a deſire was he carried out for the inlargement of the Dominion of that State, that obſerving the Lacedæmonian Navy to be drawn up at Gytheum, and ſo, eaſie to be ſet on fire, he much deſired to have it done, and told the Pepole he had a thing of great moment in his Head, but ſuch as was not to be divulged. The People appointed Ariſtides to confer with him, and if he approved it, reſolved he might proſecute it; but he making a report that Themiſtocles adviſed a thing, than which nothing was more profitable, and more unjuſt, he was commanded to deſiſt.

Plutarch in Themiſtocle. Val. Max. l. 6. c. 5. ext. exem. 2. Cic. Offic. l. 3.

4. A little after theſe things, Pauſanias the Lacedæmonian, famous for the Victory at Platæa, was ſent with a Fleet of twenty Peloponneſian Gallies, and thirty of Attica, againſt Cyprus, where he took many Towns, and Byzantium afterwards, held by the Perſians. He was very imperious towards the Aſſociates, inſomuch as he carried himſelf more like a Tyrant than a General, and being ſorely complained of to his Superiours, he was by them recalled to give an account of it. He gaped after the Kingdom of Greece, and to that end, entred into conſpiracy with Xerxes, whoſe Daughter he asked to Wife, and being accuſed of much favour ſhewed towards the Perſians, yet for that nothing could be proved, he was diſmiſſed, having the Government of the Fleet only taken from him. Yet returned he to the Helleſpont, under pretence of the War to continue his intelligence with Xerxes; but being expelled from Byzantium by the Athenian Soldiers, he returned not to Sparta, but ſtaied at Troas, and for that was again complained of, as holding clandeſtine Conſultations with the Perſians, and not having any juſt and warrantable Cauſe there to remain. Hereupon he was called home by the Ephori the ſecond time, and caſt into Priſon, but appearing again to his Tryal, he was the ſecond time diſmiſſed.

Thucyd. lib. 1.

Diodorus l. 11. ad Olymp. 75. ann. 4.

Pauſanias holdeth intelligence with Xerxes.

5. The Lacedæmonians ſent Dorcis with others to ſucceed Pauſanias in the Fleet; but the Aſſociates would take no notice of him; for Ariſtides the Juſt, Captain of the Athenians, ſo moderately behaved himſelf, and wrought croſs to the Actions of Pauſanias, that all the Cities of Aſia hating the others pride, joyned themſelves to him, ſo that he became the means of transferring the chief Command at Sea, which (together with that at Land alſo) had hitherto been enjoyed by the Lacedæmonians, unto his own Country-men; the Spartans, at this time not being unwilling, or oppoſing it in the leaſt, ſo aſhamed were they of the carriage of their own Citizens. The Athenians being thus advanced by the Aſſociates for their moderation, under pretence of revenging the States upon Xerxes, obtained alſo liberty to lay a Tax upon them all, how much Money one, and how many Ships another ſhould find. Officers they appointed to receive the Tributes, the ſumm of all which amounted to four hundred and ſixty Talents: Delos was appointed for the Treaſury, and the place to meet in, to deliberate of the Affairs of all the free States. This aſſeſs (as Plutarch writeth) was made by Ariſtides at the deſire of the Græcians, who relied upon his integrity; and his moderation ſo much appeared herein, that afterwards the Athenians inſlaved the States, and drawing the Tributes to their private uſe, firſt doubled, and then tribled the ſum. For now, whereas the whole Tax impoſed by him amounted but to four hundred and ſixty Talents, Pericles added almoſt a third part (as Plutarch reckoneth) and increaſed it to ſix hundred, and after his death it was brought to one thouſand and three hundred Talents.

Thucydid. & Diodorus ut prius. Plutarch & Corn. Nepos in Ariſtide.

The Athenians by the means of Ariſtides draw the chief power to themſelves.

6. The Athenians having ſetled the Tribute, under the conduct of Cimon the Son of Miltiades, took from the Perſians Eione, a Town of Thrace, ſituate upon the River Strymon, which they deprived of its Liberty. Then expelled they the Dolopians out of Scyrus (an Iſland in the Ægean Sea) and therein planted a Colony of their own; then waged they War with the Caryſtians in Eubæa, for denying them Obedience (which was compoſed) and beſieged the Naxians that had revolted from them, whom they forced to ſubmit. This being the firſt of all Greek Cities, which, contrary to the League, was ſubjected to Bondage, after it, others were as occaſion ſerved, which was taken hold of by the Athenians, either for that they ſent not the full Tribute, or Ships, or would not ſerve in the War when Affairs required it. The Athenians alſo ſeverely exacted what had been appointed, and compelled ſuch as refuſed, having forgotten their former mildneſs, now in Power, and carrying it very imperiouſly towards their Aſſociates whom they could order as they pleaſed. And this was alſo effected by the Greeks themſelves: for, to ſhun the labour of it, moſt of them choſe rather to ſend money than ſhips; whereby the Athenians, who had Veſſels enough, and always in readineſs, increaſed their ſtrength, and upon occaſion found them unfit for reſiſtance.

Thucyd.

The Naxians inſlaved.

7. In the mean time Pauſanias, who had been called home to Sparta, gave not over his conſpiracy againſt his Country, though he changed his aſſociates. For he now ſought to draw the Helotes, or publick Slaves, into rebellion with the allurement of liberty, and hereof being detected by one Argilius (whom he had unchaſtly loved, and now being ſent with Letters to Artabanus, ſuſpected he carried a Warrant for his own death, and ſo opening them, diſcovered both his plot againſt himſelf and the State) he took ſanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, and there the door being made up (to which end his own Mother is ſaid to have brought the firſt ſtone) was ſtarved to death. After his death the Spartans ſent to Athens to accuſe Themiſtocles of the ſame Crime, who being before this baniſhed by the Oſtraciſm, lived at Argos in great eſteem, and was much envied by the Lacedæmonians for having done many things in his Countryes behalf, which they looked upon as tending to their prejudice. 'Tis ſaid that certain Letters were found in Pauſanias his Coffers, intimating a correſpondence betwixt them for promoting the affairs of the Perſian King, which though he aſſented not unto, yet diſcovered not the thing, hoping Pauſanias would either be deterred from his deſign, or the thing would come out ſome other way. But the Spartans laying it heavily to his charge, and his own Citizens envying his glory, though he ſought to purge himſelf by Letters, yet was he condemned, and the people perſwaded to ſend ſome to lay hold of him, and bring him up. He pereiving this, fled to Corcyra, and thence to Admetus King of the Moloſſians, with whom, not being able to continue in ſafety, he went to Artaxerxes Longimanus, by whom he was honourably received, and bountifully entertained (having three Cities given him, one for bread, another for wine, and a third for victuals, to which others add two more for Clothes and Linnen) and died at length at Magneſia a natural death, though ſome wrote, that ſeeing he was not able to perform his promiſe to the King of Conquering Greece, which by this time had many expert Captains (amongſt whom of moſt eſpecial note was Cimon) he poyſoned himſelf.

Idem. Plutarch. in Themiſtocl. & Ariſtide. Corn. Nepos in Pauſania. Diodrous ut ſuprà. Plutarch. & Corn. Nepos. Thucid. Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 3. extern. exempl. 3.

The ends of Pauſanias and Themiſtocles.

And of Ariſtides.

8. (a) Four years after the baniſhment of Themiſtocles died Ariſtides, whoſe moderation and abſtinency herein appeared, that having born ſuch Offices, yet he died ſo poor, that he ſcarcely left wherewith to be buried; yet ſo grateful was the State towards his memory, that his Children were provided for at the publick charge. Eight years after the battel of Platæa, Cimon being ſent out by the Athenians, obtained in one day two notable victories at Sea and Land, over the Perſians at Eurymedon, a River in Pamphylia, which brought him and the State no little credit. After this they fell out with the Thaſians, who by their Colonies had taken poſſeſſion of the rich Mines of Silver and Gold, which were in that part of Thrace, lying upon Macedonia, betwixt the two Rivers Strymon and Nyſſus. For theſe Mines the Athenians envied them, and raiſed ſuch a contention, that they withdrew themſelves from the aſſociation; whereupon they preſently commenced War againſt them, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight, and afterwards beſieged them by Land. The Thaſians beſieged, ſent to the Spartans, deſiring them to invade Attica, thereby to divert the Athenians from them; and, having promiſed, they were ready to perform it; but that they were hindred by an Earth-quake, which ſore afflicted them, and whereupon the publick ſlaves (called Helotes) of the poſterity of the Meſſenians, took their opportunity; and rebelling, ſeized upon Ithome in the Territories of Meſſenia, being acted by that impreſſion, which Pauſanias not long before had made upon them.

(a) Corn. Nepos & Plutarch in Ariſtide. Thucyd. lib. 1.

The Thaſians envied by the Athenians for the Mines.

The Lacedæmonians diſtreſſed.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 77. ann. 4. Thucyd.

9. The Spartans much diſtreſſed by this rebellion, having loſt two thouſand men by the Earth-quake, beſides a great loſs in their buildings, after three years the Thaſians were no longer able to hold out, and yielded to ſuch hard conditions as the Athenians laid upon them. The Lacedæmonians proceeding but ſlowly in their War, ſent to the Athenians for aid, which was ſent them, but through ſiniſter ſuſpitions they returned it back again, and this was taken as an affront by the Athenians, who were very much moved at it. This was the beginning of that mutual malice and enmity which thenceforth paſſed betwixt theſe two States, and proved the riſe of a bundance of miſchief. For, the Athenians, preſently after the return of their men, forſook the League, which they had entred into with the Spartans againſt the common Enemy, and made an Alliance with the

The beginning of malice betwixt the Athenians and Lacedemonians.

Argives their Adverſaries, in which they alſo comprehended the Theſſalians. And they that were beſieged in Ithame, at length in the tenth year, being forced to yield, and baniſhed Peloponneſus by the Spartans, the Athenians kindly received them with their Wives and Children, and gave them Naupactus to inhabit, which they had lately taken from the Locrians, called * Ozolæ. A little after this, another great acceſſion was made to the ſtrength of the Athenians, and that with the detriment of the Spartans; for the inhabitants of Megara, Neighbours to the former, being falln upon with War by the Corinthians, betook themſelves to them for aid, though heretofore they had been the Allies of Sparta. This opportunity the Athenians embraced, and thereby got Megara into their hands, with Paga, a Mart-Town adjoyning to it; and fortifying Megara as far as Niſæa upon the Sea, therein placed a Garriſon of their own. And this was alſo the beginning of that inveterate hatred betwixt Corinth and Athens.

* Vide Strab. lib. 9. pag. 427.

The beginning of the hatred betwixt Corinth and Athens.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 78. ann. 1.

10. During the War betwixt the Lacedæmonians and their ſlaves, hapned another in Peloponneſus, betwixt the Argives and the inhabitants of Mycenæ, upon this occaſion. The Mycenæans ſtanding high upon the antient Eminency of their City, would not be ſubject to the Argives, as the other Cities of Argolis were, but would live according to their own Laws and Cuſtoms, having nothing to do with the Commonwealth of Argos. Moreover, they contended with them about the Temple and Rites of Juno, challenged to themſelves the Right of Adminiſtring the Nemæan Games, and whereas during the War with Xerxes, the Argives had made an order not to help the Lacedæmonians at Thermopylæ, except they would yield them part of the Command, the Mycenæans alone joyned themſelves to them. Theſe things made the Argives jealous that their power increaſing with the return of their antient ſpirit, they would contend with them for Empire it ſelf, and therefore of a long time they deſired to deſtroy their City. Now ſeeing they had a good opportunity, whilſt the Spartans being buſied at home could afford them no relief, they raiſed a great Army out of their own, and the Neighbouring Cities, and therewith ſetting upon them, overthrew them, and laid cloſe ſiege to Mycenæ. They ſtoutly reſiſted for ſome time, but being exhauſted by the War, and the Lacedæmonians (being buſied with the Helotes, and lately diſtreſſed by the Earth-quake) not being able to relieve them, the Defendants being moſt ſpent, the City was taken and levelled with the ground, the inhabitants being made ſlaves, and the tenth part of them conſecrated to the god of Argos. So, this City happy in more antient times, a Nurſe of famous men, and renowned for worthy exploits was brought to deſtruction, and continued deſolate to the time wherein our Author lived.

The Mycenæans and Argives fall out.

Mycenæ deſtroyed.

Thucyd. lib. 1.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 80. an. 2. & 3.

11. The difference raiſed betwixt the Athenians and Corinthians, about Megara, proceeded ſo far, as the former invaded Peloponneſus, and joyning battel with the Corinthians and Epidaurians, were worſted; but engaging the ſecond time at the Iſland Cecryphalea, obtained a victory. Not long after, the War betwixt the Athenians and the inhabitants of Ægina was again renewed, wherein the former obtained a great victory at Sea, and took ſeventy Veſſels from the Iſlanders, and then beſieged the City, to the relief of which three hundred men were ſent out of Peloponneſus. Now the Corinthians judging it a fit ſeaſon to be doing ſomething, for that they were both occupied in the War of Ægina and Egypt alſo, (where their Forces were aſſiſting Inarus the ſon of Pſammitichus againſt Artaxerxes) invaded the Territories of Megara. But things hapned otherwiſe than they expected, for the Athenians left not the ſiege at Ægina, but ſent out of the City of Athens ſuch as were both above and under age for the War, to the aid of Megara, which at length carried away the victory, and forced the Corinthians to return home with great loſs. At this time the Athenians began to build their long Walls from the City to the port.

The difference betwixt the Athenians and Corinthians, about Megara renewed.

12. After this aroſe a War betwixt the Phocians and the Dores. The Lacedæmonians being Patrons to the latter, ſent to their aid eleven thouſand and five hundred men, which Army forced the Phocians and brought them to terms, but being about to return home, it dared neither do it by the Criſſæan Sea (or Gulf of Phocis) nor through the Iſthmus, for fear of the Athenians, and ſo ſtaid in Bæotia for an opportunity: eſpecially being deſired by ſome principal men of Athens, who hating the popular Government, hoped by the help of this Army to diſſolve it, and hinder the building of the long Walls, which made much for the intereſt of the people. But the Athenians hearing of this ſtop came out of the City to a man againſt them, having with them one thouſand Argives, and a great number of other Allies, ſo that the whole amounted to fourteen thouſand. Who when the Theſſalian horſe joyned with them gave battel to the Lacedæmonians near Tanagra, a great and famous City of Bœotia, not far from Thebes. The Theſſalian horſe revolting to the Lacedæmonians, they obtained the victory, and then preſently marching into Megaris, waſted it and ſo returned home through the Iſthmus. Yet the Athenians reſolving not to give way to Fortune, ſeventy two days after this defeat marched again into Bœotia to revenge themſelves, which by the overthrow of the inhabitants they reduced, together with Phocis; raſed the Walls about Tanagra, and compelled the Opuntians of Locris to give them one hundred Hoſtages of their richeſt men. At this time they perfected their long Walls; Ægina was yielded to them, the Walls of which they pulled down, took away their ſhipping, and impoſed Tribute upon them for the future. And Tolmides their Captain coaſting Peloponneſus with a Fleet, burnt the Lacedæmonian Arcenal at Gythium, took Chalcis, a Town of the Corinthians, and landing his men, overthrew the Sicyonians in fight.

A War betwixt the Phocians and Dores.

Idem ad ann. 4. & ad Olymp. 81. ann. 1.

13. But in Egypt the Aahenians had bad ſucceſs, Inarus being taken and Crucified, and few of their men after ſix years returning home: fifty Gallies alſo being ſent to their relief were moſt of them taken and ſunk by the Phœnicians. Other Expeditions they made alſo with like ſucceſs, ſave that they overthrew the Sicyonians again in battel; which made them after three years willing to make truce with the Peloponneſians for five years, by the advice of Cimon, whom being baniſhed by the Oſtraciſm they had recalled; during which time they warred in (b) Cyprus under conduct of Cimon, and in Egypt in the ſervice of Amyrteus the King, with good ſucceſs. (c) After this followed the Holy War, as they called it, the Spartans taking the Temple at Delphos from the Phocians, and giving it up to the Delphians, from whom the Athenians again took it and reſtored it to the Phocians. Afterwards the (d) Bœotians revolted from the Athenians; who thereupon in great indignation under conduct of Tolmides invaded them, took Chæronea and other Towns, in which putting a Garriſon, and returning homewards they light upon the Enemy, who killed and took them all, and amongſt others Tolmides was ſlain, who had made this bold attempt, contrary to the advice of Pericles the Son of Xantippus, who now had begun to grow eminent. Hereat the Athenians exceedingly daſhed, to redeem their priſoners parted with all Bœotia, and not long after all Eubœa revolted from them, their credit being now on the decaying hand. To the recovery of this Iſland Pericles was ſent, who ſcarcely being landed, news came that Megara had alſo revolted, and that the Peloponneſians were about to invade Attica.

Thucyd lib. 1.

The Athenians forced by bad ſucceſs to make a Truce with the Peloponneſians,

(b) Diodorus ad Olymp. 82. ann. 3.
(c) Toucyd. ut prius.
(d) Idem. Diodorus ad Olymp. 83. ann. 2.

They part with Bœotia, & Eubœa revolts.

14. This conſtrained him to return, and the Peloponneſians accordingly invaded Attica under the command of Pliſtonax the ſon of Pauſanias the Lacedæmonian King. They waſted all as far as Eleuſine; but Pericles there oppoſing them, corrupted Cleandridas Counſellour to Pliſtonax with gold, whereby they were deterred, and returned home, where Cleandridas was rewarded with death, and Pliſtonax with baniſhment. Pericles having ſo eaſily diſpatched his affairs here, returned into Eubœa; which he wholly reduced, pulled down the Walls of Chalcis, and baniſhed only the Inhabitants of Heſtiæa, which he peopled with a Colony of his own Citizens. This various fortune inclined both ſides to an accommodation, and procured a League to be made for thirty years betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, with their allies on both ſides, whereby Niſæa, Achaia, Pagæ, and Trazene, were ſet free by the Athenians, and it was made lawful for any City that had not been aſſociate with either part, to joyn it ſelf to which it beſt liked; which Article afterwards was urged by them of Corcyra to Athens, whereby they demonſtrated that they ought not to deny them the liberty of aſſociation.

Toucyd. lib. 1. Diodorus ad Olymp. 83. ann. 3, & ann. 4. æ

Pericles reduceth Eubœa, and various fortune inclineth both ſides to an accommodation.

15. Six years after, a War aroſe betwixt the Inhabitants of Miletus and thoſe of Samus, about Priene a Town in Ionia, under the Mountain Mycale. The Mileſian affairs going down the wind they ſent to Athens, where they grievouſly accuſed the other, with whom joyned alſo many of the Samians themſelves, who not being imployed in the Government, deſired to have it changed. The Athenians being perſwaded by them, manned out fourty ſhips againſt Samus, by which power Pericles reſtored the Popular Government, exacted eighty Talents, and taking for Hoſtages fifty Boys, and as many Men, which they kept in cuſtody at Lemnus, put a Garriſon of their own into Samus it ſelf. But ſome of the Citizens who had withdrawn themſelves into the continent, entred into a con-

Toucyd. Diodorus ad Olymp. 84. an. 4.

Stirs in Samus. Pericles victorious there.

a conſpiracy with the greateſt in the Town, and aſſociating to them Piſſuthnes the Governour of Sardis for the Perſians, with ſeven hundred Auxiliaries paſſed over by night into the Iſland, and ſetting upon the People on a ſudain (of which they overthrew the major part, and having their Hoſtages delivered to them by ſtealth out of Lemnus, delivered up the Athenian Garriſon with the Officers into the hands of Piſſuthnes) and brake out into open rebellion, and drawing in the Byzantians to their party, made War upon Miletus.

16. The Athenians, having notice of this preſently diſpatched away ſixty Gallies againſt Samus, with fourty four of which Pericles and his nine Colleagues ſailing for Miletus, ingaged with the Samian Fleet conſiſting of ſeventy Veſſels (whereof twenty were laden with Soldiers) at the Iſland Tragiæ, and obtained the victory, and afterwards with the other part of the Fleet, and a new ſupply of fourty ſhips, ſailing to Samus, overthrew the Inhabitants, and cloſely beſieged them both by Sea and Land. Pericles, whilſt things were thus ordering, heard that the Phœnicians were coming to the relief of the beſieged, to meet whom he took away with him ſixty Gallies, and bent his courſe towards Caria, after whoſe departure the Samians perceiving the Guards thinner than uſual, broke out of the Haven, put to flight the ſhips that lay neareſt, overthrew the next, and ſo recovering the maſtery of the adjoyning Sea, for fourteen days exported and imported what they pleaſed. But Pericles being returned with ſixty other ſhips from Attica (commanded by excellent Captains) beſides thirty others from Chius and Lesbus, they were beſieged cloſer than ever, and being ſpent with the War, in the ninth month of the ſiege yielded up the City. The conditions were hard enough, viz. To demoliſh their Walls, give Hoſtages, deliver up their ſhips, and pay the charge of the War. Byzantium affrighted at this ſucceſs, returned alſo to it's former obedience.

The City yielded to him.

A. M. 3566.
Olymp. 85. an. 2. V. C. 314.
Artax. Longim. 25.

17. Shortly after this, fell out thoſe motions which occaſioned the Corinthian, and ſo by conſequence laid the foundation of the Peloponneſian War, about the ſecond of the eighty fifth Olympiad, and the twenty fifth of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus.

Thucyd. ut ſupra
Diodorus ad. Olymp. 85. an. 2.

18. The Inhabitants of the Iſland Corcyra, who were a Colony of the Corinthians, ſome eighty five years after their plantation in that Iſland (formerly called Phæachus, ſituate one the Illyrian ſhore, and being very populous) ſent out a Colony which built a City called Epidamnus, and afterwards Dyrrachium, but not without the leave of Corinth the Metropolis, which at their requeſt had aſſigned a Citizen of their own (Phalius of the poſterity of Hercules) according to the Law and Cuſtom, to be Prince of the Colony; and out of the number of their own Citizens and other Dores made up the number. This new Colony ſeated in a very convenient place, in a ſhort time flouriſhed exceedingly, and abounding with plenty of all things, as uſually it hapneth, fell out of luxury unto civil diſſentions about the Government, and hereat occaſion being taken by their next neighbours the Taulantians (who made War upon them) ſuffered no little dammage. At length the People incenſed againſt the great ones expelled them the City, who thereupon betaking themſelves to the Taulantians, procured them to diſtreſs Epidamnus both by land and ſea, by which the people being ſtraitned ſent to the Corcyræans their Founders, and Patrons, humbly to beſeech them that by their authority they would make an accommodation betwixt them and their exiles, and bring the Taulantians to ceaſe their Hoſtility. The Corcyræans, whether diſapproving the cauſe, or minding ſomething elſe, rejected their petition, who then by direction from the Oracle at Delphos, betook themſelves to the Corinthians, Founders of them both, and gave up their Colony into their hands. They were glad of this occaſion, and preſently promiſed them all aſſiſtance, being angry with the Corcyræans, who upon their good fortune were grown inſolent, and paid not the reſpect to them which was due from a Colony to the Metropolis; for they were ſo rich and ſtrong, that giving way to no City of Greece in the former reſpect, they had alſo one hundred and twenty Gallies readily furniſhed, which drew envy upon them from the Corinthians, inſomuch that now by the help of their Friends they reſolved to chaſtiſe them, and ſent a Party of Soldiers to defend Epidamnus, together with new planters to be imbodied into the Colony.

Stirs at Epidamnus, a Colony of the Corcyræans.

Procure a falling out betwixt the Corcyræans and the Corinthians their founders.

19. The Corcyræans took this heavily that they ſhould intermeddle with the affairs of their Colony, and being ſollicited by ſuch exiles as had fled to them, ſent a Fleet to Epidamnus, commanding it to receive the exiles without delay, and caſt out the new Planters with the Corinthian Garriſon. But the Epidamnians refuſing

Sect. 2.

Thucyd. Diodorus ad Olymp 85. ann. 3, & 4.

The Corcyræans victorious.

to do it, and the Corinthians making great proviſions for the War, they ſent their Ambaſſadors to Corinth with ſome Spartans and Sicyonians to bear witneſs of the matter, and offered to put it to a reference before equal Judges: But the Corinthians neglecting their Meſſage, as reſolved for War, they alſo made preparation for it. They ſtill continuing the Siege before Epidamnus, the Corinthians ſent a Fleet of ſeventy five Gallies, armed with two thouſand fighting men thither, but leaving fourty for the carrying on of the Siege, with eighty more they ingaged with them in a Sea-Fight near the Promontory of Actium, and got the Victory. The ſame day Epidamnus was yielded to that party they had left at the Siege, and ſo hereby getting the Dominion of the Sea far and wide, and growing proud upon their good Fortune, they invaded the Territories of the Allies of their Enemies, to ſuccour whom the Corinthians manned out another Fleet, and landed an Army at Actium. They pitched alſo there their Tents againſt them, but Winter drawing on, they both departed without any Act of Hoſtility; the Corinthians all that Year, and the Year following, out of hatred to the other, uſing all their endeavours for rigging a new Fleet, and procuring plenty of Rowers out of Peloponneſus and other parts of Greece.

Thucyd. Diodorus ad Olymp. 86. an. 1.

They enter into ſociety with Athens.

The deſign of the Athenians herein.

Plutarch in Pericle.

20. The Corcyræans before this time not joyned in alliance with any other State, now began to look about them how they might ſtrengthen themſelves. They ſent to Athens, deſiring to enter into ſociety with that State, and to have aſſiſtance from it; and the Corinthians having notice hereof, ſent their Ambaſſadors to oppoſe them. The Corcyræans were firſt heard, making a large diſcourſe, and then the Corinthians larger than they. The matter was brought twice before the People, which at length reſolved that a defenſive League ſhould be made with them of Corcyra, that the one ſhould aſſiſt the other in caſe they were aſſaulted by an Enemy: but to make any Invaſion Aſſiſtance was denied, leſt they ſhould break the Leagues formerly made with other States. The Athenians reſolved on this courſe, for that they ſaw plainly they muſt have War with the Peloponneſians, and therefore deſired to have the Corcyræans who were very powerful at Sea, on their ſide; and they thought it would be for their intereſt to have the Corinthians and their Aſſociates to ſpend their Stock upon thoſe of Corcyra, which Iſland they alſo looked upon as very commodious for paſſage either into Sicilie or Italy. Ten Triremes therefore were decreed to aſſiſt the Corcyræans, in caſe they were in any danger, and three Captains ſent, one of which was Lacedæmonius the Son of Cimon, whom Pericles envying for his Fathers ſake, procured that no more Aſſiſtance ſhould be ſent, that ſo the buſineſs might miſcarry under him; but afterwards out of plain Shame he ſent another Squadron of Ships which came too late. Theſe Generals had in charge by all means to decline the Fight with the Corinthians, except they ſet upon the Corcyræans, whom then they were to protect to the utmoſt.

The Corinthians overthrown in a Sea-fight.

21. This Squadron of ten Ships joyning with the Corcyræans, made up their Fleet one hundred and twenty Sail, with which they gave Battel to the Corinthians (who had ninty of their own, and ſixty from their Allies) betwixt the Iſland Corcyra and the continent of Epirus. This Fight (deſcribed moſt accurately by Thucydides) was the moſt valiantly fought, and with the greateſt number of Ships, of any that thoſe times had happened betwixt the Græcians themſelves. The Athenians being mindful of the Charge received from their Superious, at the firſt rather thought to deter, than to fight with the Enemy, ſuccouring the Corcyræans in ſome places; but they being fully worſted and put to flight in that Wing wherein they ſtood, they then with all their might fell upon the Corinthians, and ſpoiled their Victory in that part, and rendred it Ambiguous as to both ſides. On the ſame day both parties rallied for a freſh Ingagement, and they were ſounding to the Charge, when unexpectedly the Corinthians eſpied twenty Athenian Ships, which Pericles had now ſent to aſſiſt with the other ten, at which ſight being utterly diſcouraged (as fearing more might follow them) they fell off again, to the admiration of the Corcyræans, who knew nothing of the coming of theſe Ships. Great Slaughter was made on both ſides; the Corinthians loſt thirty Ships, and Corcyræans ſeventy, beſides one thouſand of their men taken Priſoners, whom as the Corcyræans carried homewards, they took Anactorium (a Town ſituate upon the Bay of Ambracia) in their way, and therein left ſome Planters of their own. This Battel was fought in the twenty ninth year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the tenth of the eighty ſixth Olympiad, and five years almoſt before the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, Lyſimachus being Archon at Athens.

22. Eight

This with other things exaſperate them and the Peloponneſians againſt the Athenians.

22. Eight hundred of the Priſoners which had been formerly Slaves they ſold, and the reſt (many of them being of the chiefeſt Rank of the Corinthians) they kindly entertained. Thus was Corcyra as it were made victorious, and the Athenian Ships diſmiſſed, which proved the firſt cauſe of the Corinthians making War upon the Athenians. Others followed, which not only inraged them, but the other Peloponneſians againſt the Athenians. Potidæa, a Town ſituate in the Iſthmus of Pallene (formerly called Plegra, and afterwards Caſſandrea from Caſſander King of Macedonia) was a Colony of the Corinthians, but aſſociated with the Athenians. The Inhabitants thereof were now commanded by the later to demoliſh that part of their Wall, which was next Pallene, to give Hoſtages, and to caſt out the Magiſtrate which every Year the Corinthians uſed to ſend them, and receive no more from them afterwards. This the Athenians did, for that they perceived the Corinthians to be much exaſperated againſt them, and feared that joyning with Perdiccas King of Macedonia, with whom they were at odds, and upon whoſe Kingdom Potidæa bordered, they would ſollicite the place to revolt, and by its example would entice the reſt of the Towns thereabout from their alliance. But Perdiccas being firſt aware hereof (againſt whom the Athenians had Armed his Brother Philip and Derdas) in great wrath ſent to Lacedæmon to ſtir them up with the other Peloponneſian States to make War upon them, and invited the Potidæans to revolt, with other Towns in Thrace.

Strabo lib. 7. pag. 330. B. Thucyd. Diod. paulo aliter ad Olymp. 86. ann. 2.

23. The Athenians being not ignorant of all this, to prevent the revolt of the Towns, ſent order to the Captains of the thirty Gallies lately ſent into thoſe parts, firſt to ſee the execution of their Commands laid upon Potidæa, and take all poſſible care that the other places ſhould not give ear to any ſiniſter advice. They of Potidæa ſent to Athens, deſiring earneſtly that nothing of extremity might be put upon them; but yet they diſpatched alſo Ambaſſadors (together with ſome from the Corinthians their Founders) to Sparta, to deſire aid thence, that they might provide for the worſt. Having no good Anſwer from Athens, but affrighted with the coming of the Fleet; and on the other hand being promiſed by the Lacedæmonians, that in caſe the Athenians fell upon them, they would ſtraight invade Attica, they took the advice of Perdiccas, and revolted with the Chalſidenſians and Bottiæans. The Athenian Fleet having notice hereof departed from Thrace, where they had arrived, and ſayling to Macedonia, joyned their Power with Philip and Derdas againſt Perdiccas. The Corinthians to help their Friends at Potidæa, ſent one thouſand and ſix hundred men, partly of their own, and partly hired out of Peloponneſus, of heavy Armour; and four hundred beſides light armed, who fourty days after the revolt of the Town came into Thrace, under conduct of Ariſtæus, the Son of Adimantus.

Thucyd. lib. 1. Diodorus ad Olymp. 87. ann. 1.

24. The Athenians hearing of this aid, to give greater ſtrength to their Affairs in Thrace, ſent to their former Forces two thouſand armed men, with a Fleet of fourty Gallies, under the command of Callias, the Son of Calliades, with whom were joyned in Commiſſion four others. Being arrived in Macedonia, they found their Friends who had joyned with Philip to have taken Therma, and now intent upon the Siege of Pydna, and joyned themſelves to them; but ſeeing how their Affairs would be endangered by the Conjunction of Perdiccas with the Corinthian Forces and Potidæa, they made up a Peace with the King, and attempting Berrhæa in their way, made haſt towards Potidæa, and pitched their Tents at Gigonum, whither another Athenian Fleet of ſeventy Gallies alſo came. Perdiccas the Macedonian King again revolted to the Potidæns, and joyned himſelf with the Corinthian Army, betwixt which, and that of the Athenians enſued a Fight, wherein the Athenians were worſted in that Wing wherewith they fought with the Corinthians; but got the better againſt Perdiccas, which Ariſteus the Corinthian General ſeeing, after he returned from the purſute, broke through, and fled into Potidæa. Of the Athenians were ſlain one hundred and fifty, amongſt whom Callias the General, but of the contrary part few leſs than three hundred. The Athenians after this Victory drew a Line againſt the Town, and a ſupply of one thouſand and ſix hundred freſh men being ſent from Athens under the Command of Phormio, cloſely beſieged it both by Sea and Land. Theſe were the mutual cauſes of the Heart-burnings of the Corinthians and Peloponneſians againſt the Athenians, and of the Athenians againſt them, about Corcyra, and Potidæa, both of them Colonies of the Corinthians, of which the Athenians defended the former againſt its founders, whilſt they endeavoured to chaſtiſe it; and they again inticed the later, with other Towns which were Tributaries to Athens, to renounce their allegiance to that State.

The Athenians getting the better,

Cloſely beſiege Potidæa.

25. Po-

Thucyd.

The States of Peloponneſus accuſe the Athenians at Lacedæmon.

25. Potidæa being thus blocked up, the Corinthians were highly concerned, both for the Town it ſelf, and ſuch of their own Citizens as were therein; and reſolving that it was no time now to be idle, ſent to their aſſociates of Peloponneſus to meet them at Lacedæmon, where they grievouſly inveighed againſt the Athenians. Liberty being given to every man to ſpeak, ſeveral others alſo ſharply accuſed them, but eſpecially the Deputies of Megara, for many injuries, and chiefly for that, contrary to the agreement made with them, they had interdicted them the Ports and Market of Athens. The Corinthians cunningly ſuffered the reſt to ſpeak firſt, that by them the Lacedæmonians might be incenſed againſt the Athenians, but then, after all, more fully and earneſtly laid open their Faults, aggravated the injuries received from them, preſſed the great danger which threatned Peloponneſus from their Power, checked the Lacedæmonians for their too much remiſneſs in vindicating the cauſe of their diſtreſſed Friends and Allies, and plainly declared, that if now they would not do it, they muſt ſtrengthen themſelves with other Confederates.

Their Ambaſſadors anſwer in their behalf.

26. It hapned at this time that there were at Lacedæmon ſome Ambaſſadors ſent from Athens upon other buſineſs, who underſtanding how things went, deſired alſo to be heard, and this being obtained, ſought to allay the Stomach of the Peloponneſians by calm and prudent Reaſons. They deſired not to be underſtood, as though they came to plead the cauſe of their State which they neither could acknowledge as guilty, nor own them as their Judges: but deſired, and adviſed them not raſhly to reſolve upon any violent Courſe, nor give credit to all that was objected, untill ſuch time as they could throughly underſtand the caſe; for that things being once confounded could not eaſily again be compoſed. They mentioned the Commodities of Peace, and the Evils that come by War; charged theſe Calumnies upon the Envy of their Accuſers, who could not behold the Power of Athens without prejudice, though it was obtained no otherwiſe than as the Reward of Vertue, as the Aſſociates themſelves could not but witneſs, who knew well enough how the Athenians merited at Marathon of all Greece, as afterwards at Salamine; and they averred, that they had uſed their Power ſo moderately, as none had any reaſon to complain. That they had increaſed their Strength they denied not, which to endeavour was agreeable to the Law of Nature, as alſo that the weaker ſhould obey the more potent; ſo that it was without injury, though not without Force, which was abſolutely neceſſary for the maintenance of any Command, and was practiſed not only by themſelves, but the Lacedæmonians alſo, and would ever ſo be in the like Caſes. Again, they laid before them the uncertainty of the event of War, and concluded with a religious proteſtation, concerning their innocency, and deſire of Peace.

Archidamus King of Lacedæmon his prudent diſcourſe.

27. The Lacedæmonians having heard both Parties, debated the buſineſs amongſt themſelves. They were generally inclined to make War preſently upon the Athenians as the Authors of many Injuries, which Archidamus, one of their Kings, and a very prudent, and moderate man obſerving, by a grave Speech dehorted them, not from undertaking a War for the ſafety of their Allies, but ruſhing into it; for that the ſtrength of Athens, and of their own State (as he ſaid) being compared, there was need of a ſufficient time to make Proviſion for it, in which not only the aſſiſtance of the Græcians, but of the Barbarians alſo was requiſite. He ſhewed that the Athenians could not be ſubdued by the waſting of Attica, having alſo Proviſions in a readineſs, and that it was no policy for them being unprovided to deal with ſuch an Enemy: but that rather the thing was to be deferred till things could be in a readineſs, in which time the Athenians might perhaps be in a better mind, and give ſatisfaction without conſtraint; and this could not turn to the diſgrace of the Lacedæmonians, in that they followed the Example of their Anceſtors: Laſtly, that by how much they took Arms with more advice, they ſhould by ſo much conclude with more happineſs and celerity. But Sthenelaides one of the Ephori, and who ſpake laſt, diſſenting from the Judgment of Archidamus, very ſharply perſwaded the People to take up Arms againſt the Athenians, as violators of the former Leagues, and War was decreed accordingly, not ſo much at the inſtance of their Confederates, as out of fear of the growing Power of Athens. This was done in the fourteenth Year after the ending of the Eubæan War, and the Truce made for thirty years.

which is croſſed by Sthenelaides, and War is decreed.

28. The Lacedæmonians acquainted the Deputies with what was reſolved; but withal told them they would ſignifie it to all their Aſſociates, that if ſo be the

War

Sect. 2.

The Lacedæmonians enquire at Delphos about it.

War ſhould be decreed by the common conſent, it might be carried on with their joynt Force: then departed they to their ſeveral homes to know the minds of their ſuperiours, and the Athenian Ambaſſadors returned. After their departure, the Lacedæmonians, before the matter ſhould any further proceed, ſent to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle concerning the event of the War, whence receiving ſuch anſwer as they wiſhed, they again ſent for their Allies, and propounded the buſineſs to them, who unanimouſly decreed it, and it was exceedingly preſſed by the Corinthians, who, before this meeting, for fear of the loſs of Potidæa had ſent about it. It being not expedient to begin the War unprovided, all were deſired to repair home, and make all Proviſions poſſible (in which was almoſt ſpent a Year) and in the mean time Ambaſſadors were ſent to Athens to make demands, of which, if any were denied, a more ſpecious pretence might be obtained for the War.

They ſend frivolous meſſages to Athens.

29. In the firſt Embaſſie they demanded the expiation of a piacular Offence, in which Pericles was involved by his Mothers Kindred. For, knowing him to be a man of great Counſel and Courage, by all means they endeavoured upon this account to have him baniſhed; but the other objected to the Lacedæmonians, that they had drawn out of the Temple of Neptune ſome of their Helots, and ſlain them, and ſtarved Pauſanias to death in that of Pallas Chalciæca, where he took Sanctuary. After this the Spartans ſent to require them to abſtain from Potidæa, to ſet at liberty Ægina, and eſpecially they preſſed them to let the Inhabitants of Megara have the liberty of their Port and Market, without which they muſt expect nothing but War: but to none of theſe Demands was there given a ſatisfying Anſwer, the Megarians being accuſed for appropriating to their own uſe the Ground which belonged to the Goddeſs of Eleuſine, and receiving ſuch fugitive Slaves as fled from Athens. In the third Meſſage Ramphius and his Collegues added but this to the other demands, that the Lacedæmonians were deſirous of Peace, and would give it, in caſe the Athenians would ſuffer all the Græcians to be free, and live according to their own Laws. Theſe things thus often the Spartans demanded, to amuſe the other party till they themſelves could be provided, and to catch at a ſpecious pretence for a quarrel.

*Thucyd.lib.*1. *Diodorus ex Ephoro ad Olymp.*87. *ann.*2.

The Athenians by the advice of Pericles, gave a poſitive anſwer once for all by way of denial.

30. The Athenians upon the laſt Meſſage called the Aſſembly of the People to deliberate about the matter, that they might ſend a clear and poſſitive Anſwer, once for all. Many ſpeaking pro and con, at length Pericles the moſt excellent of all the Athenians of that Age, both for doing and ſpeaking, with his Eloquence (wherewith he was ſaid by the Poets to Thunder and Lighten) eaſily drew the Multitude to his Mind. After he had inveighed againſt the Lacedæmonians as ſwollen with Envy, he excuſed themſelves, and incouraged the People by agreeents drawn from their Ability to undertake the War. He adviſed that this Anſwer ſhould be returned: That the Decree againſt them of Megara ſhould be reſcinded, in caſe the Lacedæmonians would give ſuch freedom of their City to the Athenians and other of the Aſſociates: that they would ſet all Cities under their Juriſdiction at liberty, which were free before, when the League ſhould be entred into: provided the Spartans would do the ſame, and ſuffer ſuch as were under them to live according to their own Cuſtoms, and not to be tyed to thoſe of Laconia: and laſtly, that they were content to be judged concerning theſe things in controverſie, according to the Leagues; neither would they firſt make War, but effectually defend themſelves. He added, that this was both juſt and honourable, and if they undertook the War chearfully, they ſhould find their Enemies leſs conſiderable: that out of the greateſt Extremities the greateſt Honour was wont to accrue both to their State in general, and to each Citizen in particular, which he made good by inſtancing in the Median War, at which time the City was far leſs conſiderable than at preſent, and whence it arrived to this pitch of greatneſs: He told them it was fit they ſhould imitate their Anceſtors, and leave not the Empire received from them diminiſhed unto poſterity.

31. Why Pericles ſhould be ſo earneſt for the War (a) ſeveral reaſons have been alleged, and this (b) amongſt the reſt, that he was not able to make account for the publick Money he had received to build a Portal in the Caſtle to the Honour of Minerva. He conſumed abundance of Treaſure in this Work, and none looking after him, diverted the publick Money taken up under that pretence to other uſes. Whilſt he conſidered hereof, and ſat ſorrowful at home, Alcibiades a Boy and his Siſters Son (whom after his Brother in Laws death he brought up in his own Houſe, and who afterwards became very eminent) came and asked him why he was ſo ſad, to whom he anſwered, becauſe he knew not how to give an account of his Office, at which the Boy replied, Study therefore rather how thou mayſt not need to give an account of it. This moſt prudent man deſtitute of advice from himſelf, uſed this of a Child, and for this reaſon perſwaded the People to the War, that being intangled therein they might have no leiſure to call him to account for the disburſement of the Money. What ever his Motives were, the People (c) decreed what he propoſed, and anſwered the Lacedæmonians particularly according to what he ſaid, and in general, that they would do nothing they had enjoyned them, but were ready to acquit themſelves of theſe matters laid againſt them, before equal and indifferent Judges; and with this anſwer the Ambaſſadors returned to Lacedæmon, whence no more came. Theſe were the Quarrels which fore-ran the War, being begun about the Affairs of Epidamnus and Corcyra. Notwithſtanding this diſagreement, yet they continued commerce with each other, went to and fro without any publick Officer, or Herauld; but yet not without jealouſy one of another. For theſe things that happened made confuſion in the Leagues, and miniſtred matter for War.

(a) Vide Plutarch in Pericle. (b) Idem ibid. Val. Max. l. 3. c. 1. ext.exempl. Diodorus ut ſupra.

Alcibiades when a Child, his advice to his Uncle Pericles.

(c) Thucyd. in fine. lib. 1.

32. Several learned Men flouriſhed in this ſpace, as (a) Æſchylus the Tragœdian, (b) Iccus a famous Phyſician of Tarentum in Italy, (c) Anaxagoras the Clazomenian Philoſopher, who was defended by his Scholar Pericles, when accuſed of Atheiſm; (d) Panyiaſis a famous Poet; Pericles himſelf, the Son of Xanthippus, accounted by (e) Cicero the firſt Athenian Orator. Beſides theſe, (f) Charondas and Zaleucus both Scholars of Pythagoras, whereof the former gave Laws to the Thurians, and the other to the Locrians; Meliſſus, Protagoras the Atheiſt, and Empedocles, (g) all who flouriſhed about the eighty fourth Olympiad. Herodotus of Halicarnaſſus, who being ſent to Thurium in Italy with ſome new Planters to reſtore the Colony there, lived to the beginning of the Peloponneſian War which he mentioneth; and in the fourty ſecond Year of his Age, about the third of the eighty fourth Olympiad, recited his Book at (h) Athens in the Aſſembly of the Panathenæa, by the emulation of which Thucydides then young was much moved; ſo that afterwards this ſtirred him up to write. (i) Euripides the Tragœdian, the Scholar of Anaxagoras, (k) Sophocles, who was choſen General of the Athenian Forces, (l) Phrynicus the Comœdian, and (m) Pindar a Theban the Prince of Lyrick Poets, who died aged eighty five years, in the ſecond of the eighty ſixth Olympiad. (n) Meton an Athenian in the year before the beginning of the Peloponneſian War (according to the account of Thucydides) Apſeudes entring into his Office of Archon, began his Cycle of the Moon, containing ninteen Years. In this ſpace, though not preciſely, the Lunations do recur; ſo that if the Quadrature of the Moon fall out as at this day this year; the ſame ſhall return the ſame day of the nineteenth year ſucceeding. Either becauſe it was written in Letters of Gold, or for the precious uſe of it, it obtained to be called, as ſtill it is, the Golden Number. It is found by adding an unit unto the Year of our Lord, and dividing the whole by ninteen. The remainder ſhall be the Cycle of the Moon; or if nothing remain, the Cycle is out; that is Nineteen.

(a) Anonymus ad. Ol. 76. an. 4.

(b) Steph. in Τάρας.

(c) Plutarch in Pericle.

(d) Anonym ad Olymp. 78. an. 1.

(e) In Bruto.

(f) Diodorus.

(g) Diog. Laert Anonymus.

(h) Voſſius de ſcript. Græcis.

(i) Euſeb.

(k) Schol. in vita Anonym. Suidas.

(m) Idem.

(n) Cappellus Cenſorinus c. 18. Ælian. var. hiſt. lib. 10. c. 7. & lib. 13. c. 12.

SECT. III.

From the beginning of the Peloponneſian War, to the ending thereof.

Containing the ſpace of twenty ſeven Years.

Thucyd.lib.2. ad ann. 1. Diodorus ad Olymp.87. an.1. Et Xenoph. Hellenic. lib. 2.

1. IN the fifteenth Year after the recovery of Eubœa by the Athenians, and the Truce concluded for thirty years; the ſixth moneth after the Battel fought at Potidæa; in the fourty eighth Year of the Prieſthood of Chryſis the Prieſt of Argos; Æneſias being the principal Ephorus at Sparta, Pythodorus Archon at Athens; in the firſt Year of the eighty ſeventh Olympiad, the thirty third of the Reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, of the World the 3574, began the Peloponneſian War, henceforth there being no Commerce with one another without an Officer at Arms, and Hoſtility exerciſed without intermiſſion.

The Peloponneſian War beginneth with the ſurpriſing of Platæa by the Thebans. which the Towns-men preſently recover.

2. In the ſecond Moneth of Pythodorus his Government, and the beginning of the Spring, three hundred Thebans ſeized upon Platæa, by the Treachery of ſome in the Town, it being aſſociate to the Athenians; for they perceiving a War to be drawing on, and knowing that Town to be always in Peace adverſe to them, thought good to make ſure of it betimes. The Inhabitants thinking more to have got in, than indeed did, at the firſt yielded it, but then again apprehending the Truth, reſolved to reſcue their Liberty, and ſet by Night upon the Thebans, whom they knew to be weary, ignorant of the Town, and would be much troubled with the Dirt, by reaſon of abundance of Rain which fell that Night. The Device proſpered, and they ſlew almoſt half the number, taking the reſt Priſoners, which were one hundred and eighty, and amongſt them Eurymachus the Author of this Expedition. It hapned that from Thebes another Party came too late to the help of their Fellows if need ſhould be, who ſeeing what was done, conſidered whether they ſhould not ſet upon ſuch Platæans as were abroad in the Country, and waſte it round about, thereby to redeem their Friends. The Platæans (as the Thebans ſaid) ſent to them, being afraid of this, and offered them to releaſe the Priſoners if they would forbear to ſpoil their Grounds; but in caſe they did, threatned to put them to Death; whereupon the Thebans withdrew; and yet for all this the Platæans put their Friends to death. The Platæans on the other hand alledged, that they never made any Promiſe to diſmiſs them; but in caſe they ſhould agree in Treaty. But they ſent to Athens to give them notice there of this Attempt made upon their Town.

3. The Meſſage being carried before the Thebans were put to death, the Athenians ſent word to Platæa, that they would do nothing againſt them till they heard further from them; after they had firſt ſeized upon ſuch Bœotians as were in their Dominions. Then after the truth was known, they ſent an Army which victualled the place, and taking out the uſeleſs multitude of both Sexes, put a Garriſon therein. Thus the League being plainly broken on both ſides, both parties prepared themſelves for the War, both ſent away Ambaſſadors to the Perſian, and other Barbarians, and ſet themſelves to obtain new Alliances. Now were old Prophecies and Sayings in all mens Mouths, which they interpreted according to their affection. Moſt were inclined towards the Lacedæmonians, who profeſſed themſelves the vindicators of the Liberty of Greece, and hating the Athenians, either for that they deſired to ſhake off their Yoak, or feared to undergo it. On the Lacedæmonian ſide were the Peloponneſians except the Argives and Achæans, who were Friends to both, all but the Inhabitants of Pellene amongſt the latter, who at the beginning ſided with the Lacedæmonians,

The Lacedæmonians and Athenians heads of the two Parties.

What Greeks ſtand with the Lacedæmonians, demonians, and afterwards the reſt alſo joyned themſelves to them. Without Peloponneſus, the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Bœotians, Ambraciots, Leucadians, Anactorians. The Corinthians, Megarians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Eleans, Ambraciots, and Leucadians, furniſhed them with ſhips; the Bœotians, Phocians, and Locrians, ſent out Horſe-men, and the reſt of the States ſupplied them with Foot.

And who with the Athenians.

4. With the Athenians ſtood the Chians, Lesbians, Platæans Meſſenians inhabiting Naupactus, moſt of the Acarnanians, the Corcyræans, Zacynthians, and the reſt of the tributary Cities all over, the Carians inhabiting the Sea-coaſts, the Dorians their neighbours, Ionia upon the Helleſpont, ſeveral Towns of Thrace, and other places not few, the Iſlands lying betwixt Peloponneſus and Crete towards the Sun-riſing, and all the Cyclades except Melus and Thera. The Chians, Lesbians, and Corcyræans, afforded ſhipping, the reſt, men and money, as Thucydides writeth, who in this Catalogue paſſeth by Eubœa and Samus, though they abounded with ſhipping, and ſided with the Athenians. Preſently after the action about Platæa, the Lacedæmonians ſent abroad to their aſſociates to meet at the Iſthmus, which they did accordingly, two third parts of each of the Cities. Here Archidamus the Spartan King and Captain General, having firſt gravely adviſed them not to truſt too much to their own ſtrength, though they made up ſuch an Army as the eldeſt of them had never ſeen, ſent to Athens to ſee if that City would now remit any of it's former rigor; but the Meſſenger being ſent back without hearing, he marched for Attica, the Bœotians at the ſame time having invaded the Territories of the Platæans.

Archidamus invadeth Attica.

The Proviſion of the Athenians for War.

5. Ere Archidamus invaded Attica, Pericles his friend, who by the Athenians with nine others was appointed General, foreſeeing that if he ſhould ſpare his Villages, either upon the account of their particular friend-ſhip, or by order from the Spartan State, to render him ſuſpected, it would create him abundance of envy and ill will, to avoid all ſuſpition, called the People together, and gave the ſaid Villages to the Commonwealth, and adviſed them to gather all their things out of the Villages, and contain themſelves within the Citie, to take care of their ſhipping, and not to neglect their confederates, from whom they might he ſupplied with money, which together with good councel and advice is the ſinnews of War. He told them that they had ſix hundred Talents of Tribute yearly coming in, beſides other revenues; that they had in the Caſtle left ſix thouſand Talents of Silver readdy coyned, beſides in bullion and plate five hundred Talents more, and money in the Temples, beſides fourty pound of pure Gold about the ſtatue of Pallas, which it was lawful to uſe in extremity, making it up again afterwards. They had ready nineteen thouſand Foot-men, and twelve hundred Horſe, beſides others that uſed bows on Horſe-back, and ſix thouſand Archers on foot: of Gallies fit for ſail three hundred, and he added other things to make them couragiouſly begin the War. They obeyed him in fetching their goods into the City, and ſhutting up themſelves there, though much to their prejudice and trouble; but ſuch authority had he with the people, having firſt, to ingratiate himſelf, inlarged the authority and liberty of the multitude, whereby afterwards in effect he ruled alone. They ſet themſelves alſo with all their might to the rigging of their Fleet, and gathering together the forces of their Confederates.

6. The Peloponneſian Army entred Attica by Oenoe a Caſtle of the Athenians, upon the frontiers of Bœotia, and there Archidamus ſtaid, providing all things for the ſtorm. Being ſomewhat long in his preparations, his adverſaries thence found matter wherewith to accuſe him, as one who affected the Athenians, and one purpoſe before at the Iſthmus, and now alſo protracted the time till they ſhould have removed all their goods out of Attica. He indeed thought they might be inclined to a compoſure for the ſaving of their goods, and therefore did delay his march, but finding no meſſage ſent, and not being able to take the Caſtle, he removed about eighty dayes after the Thebans entred Platæa, in the height of Summer, Corn being now ripe, and invaded Attica, which he waſted as far as Acharnæ, the ſtrongeſt Garriſon of all the Countrey, and but ſeven or eight miles diſtant from Athens. When they in the Citie underſtood this, having not ſuſpected he would have peirced ſo far, and afflicted for the loſs they ſuſtained, they began to be much moved, (eſpecially they of Acharnæ, who ſeemed to themſelves a conſiderable part in the State) and tumultuouſly gathering together, now began to rail at Pericles, that he being General did not lead them out againſt the Enemy. He would not call the aſſembly nor any Company pany together, for fear they ſhould reſolve raſhly upon any thing; but was very careful of the defence of the Citie, and ſent out a party of horſe, of which ſome were Theſſalian Auxiliaries, to reſtrain the excurſions of the Enemy into the parts adjacent, which was beaten back with ſome loſs. At length the Peloponneſians ſeeing the Athenians would not come out to fight, removed from Acharnæ, and waſting other places, departed through Bœotia into Peloponneſus, and went ſeverally to their own homes.

The Athenians ſend a Fleet into Peloponneſus to divert their enemies.

They eject the Inhabitants of Ægina, and plant a Colony of their own in the Iſland.

7. Whileſt they were yet in Attica, the Athenians, to divert them, ſent out a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, on which were aboard one thouſand Souldiers of heavy Armour, and four hundred Archers, with which the Corcyræans joyned fifty Veſſels more, and other aſſociates contributed their numbers. Coaſting the Peloponneſian ſhoar, beſides other harm done, they landed in Laconia, and had taken Methone, then unwalled, and meanly manned, but that Braſidas the Spartan with one hundred men brake through, and getting into the Town, defended it ſo, as they were glad to retreat to their ſhips. Then went they to Elis, where they ſeized on Phia, and ſtaying there two dayes, harraſed the Countrey, and overthrew ſuch as were ſent to reſtrain them: but their ſhips being ſorely toſſed with a Tempeſt, and hardly recovering the Haven of Phia, and underſtanding alſo that greater forces were coming againſt them, they departed thence, and grievouſly diſtreſſed ſuch places as they came to. At the ſame time alſo another Fleet was ſent from Athens to infeſt the Locrians, and defend Eubæa, which did much harm upon the Coaſts of Locris, took Thronium, took Hoſtages with them, and overthrew the Locrians that came out to reſiſt them. In the ſame Summer the Athenians caſt out the Inhabitants of Ægina, for that they imputed to them the eſpecial cauſe of the War, and judged that Iſland convenient for them to place a Colony therein of their own. The Lacedæmonians out of requital for the kindneſs received from them during the Earth-quake, and War with their ſlaves, and out of hatred to the Athenians, gave them Thyrea and its Territories to inhabit (which ſeparate Laconia from the Countrey of Argos, reaching as far as the Sea;) but ſuch of them as this place for its ſtraightneſs could not receive, were diſperſed up and down Greece it ſelf.

An Eclypſe of the Sun on the third of Auguſt.

The manner of burying thoſe who died in the Wars.

8. This ſame Summer, at the change of the Moon, hapned ſuch an Eclypſe of the Sun (at which time ſaith Thucydides, it is judged that it can onely happen) that at Mid-day the Stars were ſeen, which according to the Julian account hapned on the third day of Auguſt, as the aſtronomical Tables demonſtrate. About the ſame time the Athenian Fleet of one hundred Gallies having in Acarnania taken ſeveral Towns, came to Cephallenia, an Iſland lying over againſt Acarnania and Leucas, which being inhabited in four Towns, they reduced without one ſtroak, and ſo returned home. In the beginning of Autumn, the Athenians with a vaſt Army invaded Megaris, which waſting in an Hoſtile manner they returned, and ſo they did once a year, till they got Niſæa into their hands. At this time alſo they placed a Garriſon in Atalante, an Iſland belonging to the Locrians of Opus, which hitherto no body had peopled, leſt it ſhould prove an Harbour for Robbers that from Locris might prey upon Eubæa. In Winter, according to their cuſtom, they ſolemniſed the Funeral for thoſe that firſt died in the War on this manner. Firſt, their bones for three dayes were laid out to be ſeen in a Tent, where it was lawful for their friends to come, and do ſuch duties as was uſual to the dead. Then when they were carried out, each Tribe came, and putting the bones of their fellows into Cypreſſe Coffins, carried them away on Chariots, and one Cheſt was carried empty for ſuch as had not been found; the women of their kindred making lamentation as for them. Then were they buried in a publick Sepulcher, in the moſt famous Suburb of the Citie, called Ceramicus, where all ſlain in War were conſtantly buried, except they that fell at Marathon, who for their greater honour were buried in the place of the fight. After they were buried, ſome one Eminent for prudence and eloquence made a Funeral Oration in commendations of them, which at this time was moſt excellently performed by Pericles. The ſcope of his ſpeech was to ſhew they deſerved immortal glory for ſhedding their bloud in their Countreys behalf, and to excite the living to ſeek after ſuch renown. With this Winter ended the firſt year of the Peloponneſian War, whoſe Hiſtory for its influence into the whole is the more conſiderable.

9. In the Spring the Peloponneſians again under conduct of Archidamus their former General invaded Attica, at which time fell alſo upon it, a moſt fearful plague, as it is deſcribed by Thucydides, who was ſick of it, as ſeldom hapned; during the rage of which they plundered and waſted the Countrey all over. Pericles

Thucyd. lib. 2. ad ann. 2.

returning

Attica the ſecond time invaded, when it was ſeized with a fearful plague.

Diodorus.

returning to his former Counſel, hindred the Citizens who were very deſirous to iſſue out and fight, and provided an hundred ſhips, with which and fifty of the aſſociates of Chius and Lesbus, armed with four thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, he departed to Peloponneſus, the Coaſts of which he ſore waſted, and forced the Army to return home to defend it, which they were willing to do alſo becauſe of the plague, after they had been in Attica fourty days. After the return of Pericles, his Army was ſent under the Command of Agnon and Cleopompus, againſt Chalcis and Potidæa, at the later of which it was ſeized by the peſtilence and greatly diminiſhed, and Agnon with one thouſand and five hundred, which remained of four thouſand, returned home. But the people being ſore afflicted by the plague and War together, were angry now againſt Pericles, as him that moved them to take up Arms, who calling them together ſharply reproved them; and they confeſſed what he ſaid to be true, and that he had adviſed them upon good grounds, but being inraged at their private diſcommodities, they fined him eighty Talents, and baniſhed him the City, and yet preſently after, according to the inconſtant nature of the multitude, recalled, and created him General with full power.

Potidæa delivered up to the Athenians.

10. In the ſame Summer a Navy from Peloponneſus of an hundred Gallies fell upon Zazynthus, an Iſland addicted to the Athenians, which waſting, and being not able to do any more, they returned home. The Peloponneſians alſo in the end of Summer ſent Ambaſſadors to the Perſian King to deſire aid, who were alſo commanded to go to Sitalces King of Thrace, to deſire a League of confederacy with him; but they were taken near the Helleſpont by ſome Athenians, through the aſſiſtance of Sadocus the Kings ſon, and free of Athens, and being brought thither, in revenge for ſome Athenians, Merchants, and others, ſlain in Peloponneſus, they were put to death. In Winter twenty Gallies were ſent from Athens to Naupactus to ſecure the Straights lying betwixt Peloponneſus and Ætolia, and other ſix to Caria and Lycia, to gather money, under Command of Meleſander, who in a fight was there ſlain with part of his forces. Potidæa now alſo being in deſpair of any ſupply from Peloponneſus, and ſore afflicted with famine (which raged ſo far as they ate man's fleſh) yielded to the Athenians. Of the beſieged ſuch as were Males had liberty to depart with one Garment apiece, Females with two, and a little proviſion. The City being thus emptied was repleniſhed with a Colony from Athens, to which ſtate this ſiege ſtood in two thouſand Talents. And ſo the ſecond year of the War ended with this Winter.

Idem lib. 2. ad an. 3.

Archidamus beſiegeth Platæa, which holdeth out.

11. In the next Spring Archidamus the Lacedæmonian King marched againſt Platæa, and beſieged it. The Platæans ſent to him to deſire he would forbear to uſe any extremity againſt them; but he returned them very harſh conditions, requiring them to forſake the Athenians, to give up their City, and all they had, for the time of War, and in the mean time to go and dwell ſomewhere elſe, promiſing that as ſoon as the War ſhould be over, they ſhould have all entirely reſtored to them. They deſired a Truce, till ſuch time as they could ſend to the Athenians, their aſſociates, and know their mind, who being utterly againſt it, they then ſent Archidamus word, that they were reſolved to undergo whatſoever the chance of War ſhould lay upon them, for that they neither could, nor would revolt from the Athenians. He then fell of waſting their grounds, and with all his might attempted the City, which was as valiantly and powerfully defended by the Inhabitants. No way taking, at length the Spartans attempted it by fire, which conſumed moſt part of the Town, leaving but a few houſes for the Platæans to live in. Yet ſtill the matter ſucceeded not, and at length deſpairing to take the place by force, they raiſed a Wall round about it, which they fenced with a double Ditch to ſhut them in, and leaving ſufficient Guards, departed home. Before this the Townſ-men had ſent out to Athens all their uſeleſs Company. This ſame year the Athenians fought with various ſucceſs in Thrace and Acarnania.

Idem in Pericle.

Pericles dieth.

12. In the latter end of this Summer, and the ſixtieth Month of the year died Pericles, of the Epidemical Diſeaſe, or the Plague, as Plutarch reporteth, though not by its ſudden force as others, but in a way of Conſumption, which, if ſo, was extraordinary. As he drew towards his end, ſome of the principal men of Athens that were left alive of his antient friends, as they ſate by him, not thinking that he underſtood any thing, diſcourſed much of his great and many victories and Trophies which he had erected, placing therein the main of his commendation. He underſtanding the diſcourſe, interrupted them, ſaying, that he wondred they ſhould eſpecially take notice of thoſe things, which fortune made common to him with others, and make no mention of that which was moſt worthy and remarkable, for No man, ſaith he, upon mine account hath put on a black Garment. A man he was to be had in conſtant admiration, not only for his equity and mildneſs, which he ſhewed in ſo many buſineſſes of concernment, and ſuch enmities as were exerciſed againſt him; but alſo for his greatneſs of ſpirit, that this he eſpecially charged upon himſelf, not to indulge his anger in ſo great power, or his malice; neither to be implacable towards his greateſt adverſary: and this ſeemeth to be the reaſon that he enjoyned the ſirname of Olympius without envy, becauſe he was of ſo ſweet a diſpoſition, and in the greateſt power preſerved his life unblemiſhed. The great miſs the Athenians had of him made them ſoon perceive what man he was, whoſe power whilſt alive they ill bore, as daſling their eyes; when dead, and they had experience of others, they confeſſed that no man could in that height of place have carried himſelf more moderately, or in that modeſty more gravely, and that height of power which uſed to be branded with the name of Tyranny, appeared in him to have been the wholſom preſervative of the Commonwealth; ſuch depravedneſs of manners, and exceſs of wickedneſs falling upon all things after his death, which he weakning and keeping under as long as he lived, procured that it exceeded not the ſtrength of the remedy.

His commendation.

Thucyd. lib. 3. initio.

Archidamus the third time invadeth Attica.

The Athenians beſiege Mitylene.

13. The Summer following being the fourth year of the Peloponneſian War-riſing, the Peloponneſians and their confederates made the third invaſion of Attica, when Corn was now ripe, under the Conduct of the ſame Archidamus, which they waſted up and down as long as their proviſions laſted. In the mean time all the Iſland Leſbus (except Methymna) revolted from the Athenians, having had a great deſire to do it before the War, but that the Lacedæmonians would not receive them. A Fleet of fourty ſhips were then preſently diſpatched from Athens, and War was denounced to the Inhabitants of Mitylene, except they delivered up their ſhips, and pulled down the walls; which being denied, War was made upon them, their Gallies put to flight, and the Haven blocked up. Hereupon they deſired a Treaty, and obtained truce to ſend an Ambaſſage to Athens about a Peace; but in the mean while they ſent underhand Ambaſſadors to Lacedæmon, to deſire a ſtraight League and alliance, with preſent aid. The Ambaſſadors being ordered by the Spartans to ſtay at Olympia at the time of the ſolemnity of the eighty eighth Olympiad pleaded there their cauſe, and in the name of their City were received into the League, and aſſiſtance out of hand was promiſed to them. Another Expedition was then reſolved on into Attica, but the Spartans being ready, at the Iſthmus, whereas their aſſociates loitered, and the Athenians then with a Fleet of thirty ſhips prey'd upon Peloponneſus, they being advertiſed of the loſs they ſuſtained in Laconia, returned heme.

14. Yet the Peloponneſians in performance of their promiſe made to the Mitylenæans, diſpatched away a Fleet of fourty Gallies, which found another from Athens to oppoſe it, conſiſting of one hundred; for the Athenians now abounded in ſhipping, having ready furniſhed two hundred and fifty Gallies, on which they expended much, ſo as to defray their expences, they now firſt of all were aſſeſſed, exacting yet from their confederates the uſual Tributes, which they paid with much repining. At the ſame time the Mitylenæans and the reſt of the Leſbians, made War upon the Methymnæans, who perſiſted in their obedience to the Athenians. Theſe underſtanding of it, ſent at the latter end of Smmer a band of men into the Iſland, which drew a line round about Mitylene, upon which Guards being ſet, the Inhabitants were ſtraitly beſieged. In Winter the Inhabitants of Platæa being greatly diſtreſſed for want of victuals, and deſpairing of any aid from Athens, reſolved to break through the Enemies Fortifications, though exceeding difficult to be paſſed, and ſave themſelves by flight. Many for the difficulty of the thing changed their minds, but three hundred ſtood firm in their reſolution, and taking advantage of an exceeding dark and tempeſtuous night, two hundred and twelve with remarkable courage and conſtancy brake through, and (the reſt being repulſed into the City) came ſafe unto Athens. Towards the end of Winter Salæthus was ſent from Lacedæmon to Mytilene, to encourage the beſieged to hold out, by promiſe of help; and another Expedition to be made by the confederates into Attica. And ſo the fourth year of the Peloponneſian War ended.

Attica invaded the fifth time, and the Mitylenians yield.

15. In the beginning of the fifth year, the Peloponneſians ſent fourty ſhips to Leſbus to the relief of the Mitylenæans, under the conduct of Alcidas, and they themſelves with an Army, over which Cleomenes (Uncle and Guardian to Pauſanias their young King yet under age) was Captain, invaded Attica the fifth time, which they moſt grievouſly diſtreſſed; but hearing nothing from Lesbus that they liked, and being in ſcarcity of Victuals, they returned the ſooner into Peloponneſus. The Mitylenæans being ſorely diſtreſſed in the ſame nature, whether the Magiſtrate would or not, yielded themſelves to the mercy of the Athenians, which the Peloponneſian Fleet underſtanding before they arrived at Lesbus, went over to the Coaſt of Aſia, and there having caſt many things in their heads, without any thing of note performed, returned, through the perſwaſion of their General, into Peloponneſus, being from Lesbus in vain purſued by Paches the Athenian Captain. He returning from the purſuite, ſettled things in Lesbus according to his own mind, ſent Salæthus the Lacedæmonian Meſſenger (whom he took in the Town) with the authors of the revolt, and ſome whom the Townſ-men ſent to intercede for them, unto Athens, ſtaying there himſelf for further orders. Salæthus was preſently put to death, and the people being called together to conſult about the Mitylenæans, reſolved, at the inſtigation of Cleon, a man of bitter ſeverity, that all thoſe of ripe age ſhould be put to death, as well as they that were ſent to Athens, and all the women and children ſhould be made bondſlaves; and this decree was without delay ſent to Paches to be put into execution. But conſidering of this raſh and cruel ſentence, they repented of what they had done, and the next day met to adviſe further of it, when again Cleon a man in great grace with them, preſſed vehemently the former decree. But Diodotus one of a milder ſpirit oppoſed him, and having endeavoured the day before to no purpoſe to do it, now by very few voices carried it from him.

A ſevere ſentence againſt them.

Reverſed.

16. Then was there diſpatched a ſwift Gally, with order if poſſible to get before that which carried the former Decree, and command Paches to abſtain from putting it in execution. Yet the former arrived at Mitylene firſt, having ſet forth a whole day before it; but whilſt Paches was conſidering of the ſharpneſs of the Decree, and how to perform it, the latter arrived, and ſo the lives of the multitude were ſaved, being ſo near to deſtruction, as ſcarcely any thing nearer. But to puniſh the revolt, above one thouſand of thoſe whom Paches had ſent to Athens as authors of it, the People commanded to be put to death, Mitylene was deprived of it's walls and ſhips, all Lesbus except the Methymnæans had hard conditions impoſed upon them. The fields were taken from all the owners, of which the tenth part being dedicated to the gods, the remainder was diſtributed to the Citizens of Athens, the tillage thereof being left under a vaſt rent to the Lesbians: and all ſuch Towns as were now ſubject to the Mitylenæans, the Athenians reduced under their Dominions. The ſame Summer they ſeized upon Minoas, an Iſland lying before the ſhore of Megaris, and the Port of Niſa, and fortifying it, made the Coaſts more ſafe and convenient to all intents. In the mean time thoſe that were left in Platæa were forced by meer famine to yield themſelves and City to the judgment of the Lacedæmonians, who ſent five men to hear their Orators, and the Thebans their Enemies. Theſe men adjudged them all to death, which accordingly was executed upon them to the number of two hundred, with whom were ſlain twenty five Athenians found in the Town, and the women adjudged to ſlavery. The City for ſome time was given to ſome exiles to inhabit: then, ſcarce a year being paſt, was by the Thebans utterly deſtroyed, an Inn only being built out of the ruines of the Temple of Juno, and the Temple it ſelf inlarged, all the grounds being ſeized on by the Thebans. This was the fortune of the Platæans (who thought they might have had ſome favour ſhewed them for the merits of their Anceſtors in the Median War) after they had continued ninety two years in ſociety with Athens, and no more is to be heard of them till Platæa was rebuilt by Alexander the Great.

Platæa at length yielded and deſtroyed.

A lamentable ſedition at Corcyra.

17. During theſe things, a moſt lamentable ſedition hapned at Corcyra, part of the Citizens being for Popular Government, and the reſt for that of a few of the moſt potent; the former truſting to the aid of the Athenians, as conformable to their policy, and the other to the Peloponneſians. Twice within the City did they fight, and both the Athenians and Peloponneſians ſent their Fleets to the aſſiſtance of their friends; but the Athenians being ſtronger at Sea; and ſending ſixty Gallies more to the help of the former Navy, the Peloponneſians withdrew themſelves, having only lightly skirmiſhed with the Enemy in the ſight of Corcyra, before the latter Fleet arrived. Then thoſe for the Popular Government, ſtrengthned by the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, cruelly raged againſt their Adverſaries, no mercy being ſhewn to ſuch as took Sanctuary, or hung upon the Altars, neither from Parents to their own Children, inſomuch that the City was almoſt ſhaken to pieces and made deſolate, and a grievous Sedition indeed came afterwards proverbially to be termed a Corcyræan. And it was not only fatal to Corcyra, but to all Greece beſides, being drawn into Example by other States which afterwards broke out into factions.

Stirs in Sicilie of which the Athenians make advantage.

18. At the ſame time the Greek Cities in Sicilie fell into Diſſentions, ſome being of the Dorick, and others of the Ionick Faction, the Head of the former Syracuſe, and of the latter Leontium, which two made War upon each other. The Leontines craved aid of the Athenians, for that they were not only of the Ionian Stock, but conjoyned with them in an antient League of confederacy. The Athenians willingly took the opportunity to get ſome footing in Sicile, to hinder the exportation of Corn thence into Peloponneſus, and eſpecially to make way for their Power and Dominion there. At the end of Summer they ſent thither twenty Gallies. In Winter theſe Ships aſſiſted with ten more from Rhegium in Italy, invaded the Æolian Iſlands neer to Sicilie, and waſted ſuch as refuſed to yield. At the ſame Seaſon the Plague began again at Athens, which took away a great number of Soldiers, but much greater of the common People: Earthquakes alſo hapned in ſeveral places. And with this Winter the fifth Year of the Peloponneſian War ended.

The ſixth Summer of the War.

19. In the beginning of the next Summer, the Peloponneſians came the ſixth time to the Iſthmus, with intent to invade Attica, under the conduct of Agis the Spartan King, but being affrighted with the frequent Earthquakes, they returned. In the mean while the War in Sicily variouſly proceeded; Laches the Athenian Captain taking ſome Towns. The Athenians ſent out one Fleet to infeſt Peloponneſus, and another the Iſland Melus, which ſtubbornly withſtood their Commands, both which did nothing of very great concernement. The Spartans planted the Colony of Heraclea, in the platform of old Trachinia a City in Theſſalie, being for the convenience of its ſituation upon the Sea, and the Haven, very fit for carrying on the War againſt the Athenians. Theſe received a great loſs from the Ætolians, but in Winter thrice overthrew the Ambraciots, who were forſaken by their Friends the Peloponneſians, which made them now imbrace a Peace with their Adverſaries the Acarnanians and Amphilochians (who called in the Athenians againſt them) and entred into a League and Society for ten Years with them. The War proceeding all this while in Sicily, a greater Fleet was ſent under conduct of Eurymedon and Sophocles, to oppoſe the Syracuſians, towards the end of Winter, at which time the Hill Ætna belched out great ſtore of Fire into the Territories of Catana, fifty years after it had the laſt time ſo done. Thus the ſixth Year of the Peloponneſian War ended.

Ætna breaketh out into Flames.

Thucyd. lib. 4.

20. In the beginning of the next, the Peloponneſians under the command of Agis the Son of Archidamus the Spartan King, again invaded Attica. The Athenians having furniſhed fourty Ships for Sicilie, gave order to the Captains, in their way to have an eye to the Corcyræans, who were much infeſted by their own exiles, and were in fear of ſixty Peloponneſian Gallies ſent thither: and to Demoſthenes was given the command of ſome Ships wherewith he ſhould infeſt Peloponneſus. As all the Ships ſailed by Laconia, Demoſthenes a man of a prompt and earneſt Diſpoſition, adviſed the other Captains to fortifie Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory joyned to the main by a little neck of Land. Before it lies a ſmall barren Iſland of leſs than two Miles Compaſs, and within that a Creek which is a good Harbour for Ships, the force of Weather being born off by the Head-land and Iſle. The Promontory which had antiently belonged to the Meſſenians, and was now deſolate, he preſſed ſore that they might ſeize upon, and make their own, being very convenient for the waſting of Laconia; but the other Captains diſſented from him, haſting for Corcyra, when in the mean time ſuch a Tempeſt aroſe as forced them to take into the Harbour. Then did he again urge his former advice, and though he nothing more profited with the Captains, yet the Soldiers deſirous to make ſome ſtay there, and ſeeing the commodiouſneſs of the Haven, fell upon fortifying the place, and with wonderful diligence and pains perfected the Wall in ſix days. Then was Demoſthenes left there to keep it with five Ships, and the reſt directed their courſe for Corcyra.

Attica the ſixth time invaded.

Pylus fortified by Demoſthenes the Athenian.

Draweth the Peloponneſians out of Attica, and being ſorely laid at the Peloponneſians are worſted.

21. The news of theſe doings at Pylus drew the Peloponneſians in all haſt thither out of Attica, fifteen days after their arrival, and they brought their whole Force both by Land and Sea to recover this piece of Ground, which they well foreſaw how bad a Neighbour it might prove in time. In the Iſland named Sphacteria, they placed a number of men all Spartans, which were to keep it by their turns, and ſtopped up the Haven on both ſides, that there might be no entrance in for the Athenian Ships: then furiouſly did they aſſault Pylus both by Land and Sea, but it was as valiantly defended by Demoſthenes; So that with ſeveral new onſets the Storm was continued till the next day, and then the Peloponneſians drew off to recruit themſelves, and provide for a new onſet. In the mean time came in fourty Athenian Ships (to which Demoſthenes had before-hand ſent to acquaint them with his condition) and with them ſome belonging to their Allies, which firſt offered fight to the Peloponneſians in the open Sea; but that being refuſed, ſet upon them in the Haven, brake, and ſunk many of their Veſſels, took ſome, and forced the reſt to run themſelves on Ground, about which afterwards enſued a great contention, whileſt the Athenians would become Maſters of them, and the Spartans out of Shame, and Grief for their Friends in the Iſland, laboured with more earneſtneſs to get them off, which they effected by ſome, and the reſt fell as Prize to the Enemy, who now cloſely beſieged the Spartans that were left in the Iſland.

The Lacedæmonians deſire a Truce,

And ſend to Athens about a Peace, which Cleon croſſeth.

22. Pylus being now ſecure, but the Spartans in the Iſland as good as loſt, the Magiſtrates were ſent for from Lacedæmon into the Camp (as the cuſtom was in great Dangers) who perceiving that there was no other way to reſcue their Citizens, than by compoſition with the Enemies, took Truce for a time with the Captains, till they might ſend to Athens about a Peace. The conditions of the Truce were, that the Peloponneſians ſhould deliver up to the other all their Ships, as well ſuch as were upon the Coaſt of Laconia as there, to be reſtored to them if the Peace ſhould not ſucceed, and that they ſhould attempt nothing upon the Fort, nor the Athenians againſt their Camp. That a certain quantity of Victuals ſhould be daily carried into the Iſland, but no Ships ſhould paſs into it ſecretly; that the Truce ſhould end at the return of the Ambaſſadors, and if in the mean time it ſhould be broken in any one point, it ſhould be eſteemed utterly void in all. The Ambaſſadors coming to Athens put the People in mind of that moderation all men ought to ſhew in Proſperity, and with what credit they might now, at their requeſt, make a Peace. But Cleon a man very vehement, and much in requeſt, with-ſtood it, ſo that in ſtead of Peace on equal Terms, and recompence for harm received, the Athenians demanded certain Cities, which had been by the Spartans long before this War taken from them, and refuſed to continue the Treaty, except the Spartans in the Iſle were delivered up to them as Priſoners. The Ambaſſadors returned without ſucceſs, and the Truce being ended, both ſides betook themſelves to their Weapons again about Pylus.

The Spartans in the Iſland Sphacteria yield to mercy.

The Sedition of Corcyra endeth.

23. The Peloponneſians demanding their ſixty Ships which they had given up, and now at the end of the Truce were to be reſtored to them in as good a condition, were put off, under pretence that they had broken the Truce. The Iſland was alſo afreſh beſieged, and the Spartans valiantly ſtanding out, things went on but ſlowly, ſo that Cleon himſelf, who much vaunted what he could do, was by the People, who now began to relent of their not imbracing a Peace, forced, whether he would or not, to command a new ſupply of men thither. He and Demoſthenes (whom he choſe for his Collegue) firſt offered Conditions to the Spartans, and then upon their refuſal forced them, after the loſs of one hundred and twenty eight, to yield themſelves to Mercy. The number of thoſe that yielded were two hundred and ninty two (whereof one hundred and twenty of the Nobility of Sparta) which were carried to Athens, and being cloſely impriſoned, it was reſolved, that when the Peloponneſians next invaded Attica, they ſhould all be ſlain; and then was a Garriſon of Meſſenians (the old Inhabitants and bitter Enemies to the Spartans) ſent into Pylus. The Lacedæmonians ſorely diſcouraged by theſe Events, and fearing worſe things, ſent to Athens again about the liberty of the Priſoners, and delivery of Pylus, but the Ambaſſadors were often rejected, and nothing done, the Athenians being ſtill more puffed up by their good ſucceſs. This Summer they overthrew the Corinthians in the Iſthmus. A Fleet being alſo ſent for Sicily, aſſiſted the Corcyræans in their way againſt their Exiles (who having got footing in the Mountains, annoyed them) and by their help they now utterly ſubdued them, and uſing them with unwonted cruelty, the ſedition here had an end. Anachorium a Town to Corinth, upon the Bay of Ambracia, they alſo took. In Winter Artaphernes a Perſian being ſent from his Prince to Lacedæmon, was intercepted in Thrace, and brought to Athens, where his Letters being opened and read, they contained no ſecret, and he was ſent back with Ambaſſadors to Epheſus to the King of Perſia, Artaxerxes Longimanus, concerning whom they there had intelligence that he was dead, and ſo the Ambaſſadors returned home. The Inhabitants of Chius being ſuſpected by the Athenians, were commanded to demoliſh their new Wall. With theſe things the ſeventh year of the War ended.

A Partial Eclypſe of the Sun on the 21ſt of March.

24. In the beginning of the eighth year hapned a partial Eclypſe of the Sun, which the Aſtronomical Tables ſhew to have fallen out on the twenty firſt day of March after the Julian account, before noon, half of the Diameter or above being obſcured, the fourth year of the eighty eight Olympiad now drawing to an end; and an Earth-quake hapned on the firſt of the Moneth Munichion, which ſome make to fall in with the ſame day. The Athenians this year fell upon the Iſland Cythera, lying near to Laconia, and inhabited by a Spartan Colony, which they took, and putting therein a Garriſon for a time, thence made excurſions into Laconia. Afterwards they removed thence a great part of the Colony, and took, and burnt Thyrea, ſtanding upon the Confines of Laconia and Argolis, given by the Spartans to the Æginetans, whom now they carried away, and plundering the Town ſet it on fire. Conveying their priſoners to Athens, the Æginetans were condemned to death, and the Cytheræans being diſperſed throughout the Iſlands, ſuch as they left in Cytherea were ſubjected to a great Tribute. But in Sicily, at this time, an Univerſal peace was made, and imbraced by all the Cities, through the earneſt perſwaſion of Hermocrates a Syracuſian; ſo that the Athenian Forces were forced to quit the Iſland, for which at their return two of the Generals were unjuſtly baniſhed, and the third underwent a great fine.

An Univerſal peace in Sicily.

25. The Exiles of Mitylene with others of Lesbus, and ſome Mercenaries, ſeizing upon Rhetium in Aſia, took Antandrus; but ſelling the former again to the Inhabitants, they were drawn out of the later to fight, by Ariſtides, and Demodocus, (or Symmachus, as Diodorus calleth him) who overthrew them, and took the Town from them. Theſe two were Captains of the Fleet, and collected Tribute from the Iſlands; their Collegue Lamachus being gone into Pontus againſt the Heracleans, who being in League with the Perſian King denied to pay it. His ſhips, by the vehemency of water which ran down the River, were ſhattered, and he loſt one way or other the greateſt part both of them, and his Forces; ſo that he could not move thence, either by Sea, or Land; whereupon the Heracleans thinking it a more honourable part to do good than to take revenge, furniſhed him with proviſions, and ſent him away with a Convoy, concluding that the waſting of their grounds would be well recompenſed if they ſhould make friends of their Enemies. With this Convoy he paſſed through the Country of the Thracians in Aſia, and ſo came to Chalcedon.

Stirs about Megara.

26. At this time the Inhabitants of Megara were much diſtreſſed, what by the ſeveral inrodes of the Athenians, and their own Exiles whom they had caſt out, who now preyed upon them from the Villages. Wearied with theſe continual diſturbances, they thought of recalling the Exiles; but the Magiſtrates underſtanding that, and preſently apprehending what danger might ariſe to themſelves from thoſe men of whoſe baniſhment they had been the cauſe, conſpired with Hippocrates and Demoſthenes, the two Athenian Captains, to betray the Town to them. The Gates were opened, and the Athenians had been Maſters of the place, but that ſome of the Conſpirators changed their minds, and obſtructed the buſineſs, which the other ſeeing ſeized upon part of the long Walls, and caſting up a croſs work againſt the Town, ſet themſelves with all their might to compaſs about the Niſæa, or Port, hoping, if they could get it, the more eaſily to obtain the Town. And the Garriſon in it being preſently diſcouraged by the ſtopping of victuals, which they were wont dayly to receive out of the Town, yielded; the Spartans to mercy, and the reſt upon condition of liberty to Ranſom themſelves. Then the Athenians prepared for ſetting upon the Town: but were hindred by the coming of Braſidas the Spartan, who hovering about Corinth, upon notice how things paſſed here, haſted, thinking to prevent the taking of Niſæa, and after he had heard of its ſurrender, yet uſed all expedition, hoping to ſave the Town, and to recover it. But when he came the Megarians were divided in their affections, yet both parties feared to let him in, for that they thought it beſt to reſerve themſelves for that party that ſhould have the better, and Govern themſelves according to Emergencies, and therefore he was forced to depart at this time without having done one thing or other.

27. Not long after, the Bœotians came, and joyned themſelves to Braſidas, and thereupon followed an Engagement with the Athenians, which ended with equal ſucceſs to both ſides. That party of the Town which favoured the Exiles, being incouraged with the preſence of their friends, ſent for Braſidas, and other Peloponneſian Officers into the Town, to conſult with them, who confirming them in their reſolutions then departed home: The Athenians alſo following, ſuch as ſided with them for fear betook themſelves to flight. Then were the Exiles recalled, having firſt taken an Oath to forget all things paſt, and not conſult their own paſſion, but the good of their Countrey; but having got the power into their hands, and having the Guards of the Citie at their diſpoſal, they cauſed one hundred of thoſe they ſuſpected to be apprehended, and being condemned by a forced judgement of the people, they put them to death. Then taking all the Government to themſelves, it continued in an Oligarchical way a long time.

The Exiles re-admitted rage againſt their Adverſaries, contrary to their Oath.

Several amongſt the Bœotians attempting to bring in Democracy are diſappointed

28. At the ſame time, ſeveral amongſt the Bœotians attempted to change the frame of their Government, being much deſirous of Democracy as it was eſtabliſhed at Athens; and to this purpoſe held correſpondence with them there, plotting to betray ſeveral places into their hands; but the matter being diſcovered ſucceeded not, but onely to the loſs of the Athenians, who were overthrown in battel. In the mean while the Lacedæmonians being invited by Perdiccas King of Macedonia, and ſome of the Inhabitants of Chalcis (who promiſed them ſome pay for their men) reſolved to ſend ſome Forces into Macedonia, and Thrace, to divert the power, and deſign of the Athenians, who now began to be ill thought of by many in thoſe parts, and feared by reaſon of their growing ſtrength. They made choice of Braſidas for their General, a man of approved valour, and remarkable integrity. They did a thing at this time, which is noted with cruelty and injuſtice. Being ſomething down the wind in their Fortune, they ſuſpected the power and number of their ſlaves the Helotes, leſt in this their weakneſs they ſhould attempt ſomething againſt them, and took occaſion at this expedition, by offering all ſuch of them liberty as would chearfully imbrace the ſervice, to obſerve who amongſt them were moſt active, and when they expected to be manumiſed, inſtead thereof they made away (though how is not known) about two thouſand of them, and ſent ſeven hundred away with Braſidas, together with one thouſand Mercenaries hired out of Peloponneſus.

Braſidas the Spartan ſent into Thrace to give trouble to the Athenians.

29. Braſidas after his arrival, by fair means reduced Acanthus and Stagirus (both Colonies of the Andrians) from the Athenians, and then in Winter ſet upon Amphipolis a famous Colony of theirs, ſituate upon the River Strymon, which almoſt compaſſing it gave an occaſion to the latter name of it, being before called Nine-wayes. In a dark night he ſeized on the bridge, and all but the Citie it ſelf, and 'tis thought had taken it alſo had he led his Souldiers on, but ſuch as had conſpired with him to betray it being overmatched, and ſtiring not, he onely waſted the grounds about it, and attempted nothing further for the preſent. The Inhabitants who affected the Athenians, being more in number, ſent to Thucydides the ſon of Olorus, and the Writer of the Hiſtory of the Peloponneſian War, then the Athenian General, lying in Thaſus, an Iſland inhabited by a Colony of the Parians, half a dayes ſayl diſtant from Amphipolis, who with ſeven ſhips haſted thither to prevent the delivery of it, or however to ſave Eione. But Braſidas being aware hereof, to obtain Amphipolis before his coming offered them moſt large conditions; that all ſhould there remain, and live in the ſame State as formerly, as well Athenians as others; or if they liked better to remove, it ſhould be free for them ſo to do, which they accepted of, hearing nothing from Thucydides, who yet came to Eione that very night, and ſaved it, whereas Braſidas elſe had taken it the next morning. Yet he took three other Towns near to Amphipolis, and left them to be Garriſoned by Perdiccas.

Thucydides the Hiſtorian, the Athenian General.

30. The Athenians were much moved for the loſs of Amphipolis, which had been of great uſe to them in affoarding them Wood for ſhipping, as well as money, and beſides this, how a free paſſage ſeemed to be open to the Lacedæmonians to invade their confederates, who thereupon might be induced to revolt by Braſidas, who being a very moderate, and juſt man of himſelf, gave out, that his deſign was to ſet Greece at liberty. And even ſo it fell out, for the Cities hearing what had hapned, and great commendations of Braſidas, ſent to him to haſten his march towards them with promiſe to revolt, thinking they might ſafely enough do it, for that they falſly perſwaded themſelves, that the power of the Athenians was not ſo great as they found it afterwards, when it was too late to repent them of their raſh and inconſiderate reſolution, into which they were hurried by an earneſt deſire of liberty. The Athenians having intelligence of this, uſed all diligence to ſend Souldiers into all of them, as the ſhortneſs of the time, and the Winter ſeaſon would bear. Braſidas ſent to Lacedæmon for a new ſupply of men, but little heed was given to his meſſage, partly becauſe the great ones there envied his glory, and eſpecially becauſe the people being well wearied now with the War, deſired to have their men that were taken in the Iſland, and to make peace. Yet he having made proviſion for the building of ſhips upon the River Strymon, went on with the War, drew all the Towns upon the Mountain Athos, except two, to ſubmit, and then by ſurpriſe taking Torone, a Town of Chalcis, and tributary to the Athenians, he ſtormed the Caſtle the third day after. The remainder of the Winter he ſpent in fortifying the places taken already, and providing for taking of others which he deſigned. And thus the eighth year of the War ended.

Braſidas envied by his own Countrey men.

31. In the beginning of Spring the Lacedæmonians for the reaſons above-mentioned were deſirous to come to a compoſition, and they hoped that now the Athenians, ſomething diſcouraged by what Braſidas had done in Thrace, might not be averſe to it. And indeed they were inclining to a ceſſation of Arms, that they might ſtop his proceedings till ſuch time as they could recruite themſelves, intending to be governed in reference to the length of the Truce as their affairs ſhould comport, and ſo a Truce was concluded for a year, the Articles of which imported theſe things eſpecially. That what both ſides poſſeſſed at this time they ſhould enjoy; that free acceſs and regreſs ſhould be given to Ambaſſadors and Heralds, and their Confederates, to treat about a peace: that Fugitives ſhould not be received; that all controverſies ſhould be decided by Law, and not by force: and ſomething was added concerning the uſe of the Sea; In this Truce the Confederates on both ſides being compriſed. During this Ceſſation ſeveral Treaties were held about a League, but ſomething hapned which diſturbed ſorely the minds of the Athenians. For Scione a Town of the Peninſula of Pellene of its own accord revolted to Braſidas, and was followed by Menda. Braſidas ignorant of the Truce, after the revolt of the former, laboured ſore with the latter, and Potidæa, to reduce them alſo; but then news came to him of the Ceſſation, and much contention there was about the places; for that the Athenians ſaid that Scione revolted two dayes after the Truce was ſworn to, and concluded. Being not able to recover them by words, they ſent an Army to effect it by deeds, and Menda they recovered, whileſt Braſidas was abſent, aſſiſting Perdiccas the King of Macedonia in his War with Archibæus, where ſuch diſſatisfaction paſſed betwixt the King and him, that thenceforth Perdiccas began to joyn himſelf to the Athenians. Scione was incompaſſed about with a Wall, which being finiſhed in the later end of Summer, and a ſufficient Guard being left, the reſt of the Army was brought home. The Winter following all was quiet betwixt the two States by vertue of the Truce; but the Mantinæans and Tegeatans fought a battel with equal ſucceſs, both parties erecting their trophies. The Spring drawing on, Braſidas attempted by night to ſurpriſe Potidæa, but miſſed of his purpoſe. And with this Winter the ninth year of the War ended, in which the Temple of Juno at Argos was burnt through the negligence of Chryſis the Woman-Prieſt, who flying for it, another was placed in her room, after ſhe had during this War continued eight years and an half therein.

A Truce for a year.

The Temple of Juno at Athens burnt.

32. The Truce being expired on the day of the Pythian Games, the ſeventh of the moneth Thargelion, Cleon having himſelf perſwaded the Athenians to undertake the Expedition was ſent into Thrace with a Fleet of thirty ſhips, aboard of which were one thouſand and two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horſe, beſides Confederates. Hearing that Torone was but manned with a mean Garriſon, he departed from the ſiege of Scione, and ſet upon it with ſuch earneſtneſs, both by Land and Sea, that in the ſame day he took it, and though he attempted Stagirus in vain, yet he effectually did it upon Galopſus, a Colony of the Thaſians, after which he ſtaid at Eione expecting ſome Auxiliaries out of Macedonia, and Thrace. Here he grew very ſecure, being exceedingly puffed up with his late ſucceſs and that at Pylus, which he arrogantly imputed to his own wiſdom; but his men diſdained to lye idle, and pretended to be wearie of his Government, as thinking him unfit to command. Herewith he moved from Eione in a ſecure poſture, thinking of nothing leſs than fighting, which was taken notice of by Braſidas, who having fewer men than he, and leſs experienced, thought it not

Thucyd. lib. 5.

Cleon ſent into Thrace, is quickly puffed up.

wiſdom to try a battel with him, nor at once to let him fight with all his Forces; but pouring them violently upon him by degrees, thereby to confound and overthrow his Army. He had a diſcovery of Braſidas his intents,and began to retreat, but then he fell upon him out of Amphipolis in the manner aforeſaid, and without much ado put his men to the rout. Cleon himſelf flying was ſlain outright, and Braſidas before this was mortally wounded and carried to Amphipolis, where he died, after he had heard how his men had got the Victory, being honoured by the Townſ-men, as an Heroe, by ſacrifice, anniverſary Solemnities,and naming a Colony after him, which they did to ingratiate themſelves with Sparta, becauſe of the fear they ſtood in of the Athenians. Of the Athenians were ſlain ſix hundred; but of the Conquerors but ſeven men; ſuch diſadvantage was there in the battel.

Is ſlain together with Braſidas his adverſary.

33. In the beginning of Winter Ramphias with others in commiſſion with him, was ſent from Lacedæmon with new Forces, and came as far as Pieria an hill of Theſſaly; but there the Theſſalians oppoſed his paſſage, and news of Braſidas his death arriving, other cauſes alſo moving him (whereof this was not the leaſt, that the Spartans before his coming from home were inclined to a peace,) he returned to Lacedæmon. And after that the action at Amphipolis, and his return, came to be known, both ſides for weighty and urgent reaſons were much more enclined to it, Cleon and Braſidas being both ſlain, whereof the one was a man of a turbulent ſpirit, and the other a great Soldier, who ſought after glory in Military matters. The Athenians having received two great blows, at Delium firſt (when the change of the Government was to be made in Bœotia) and now at Amphipolis, had learnt not to truſt too much to the ſmiles of their fortune: therefore they who before would hear of no conditions, as certain of Victory, now were much abated in their confidence, and repented they had not imbraced peace, when it was offered them upon ſuch honourable terms, after the action at Pylus, fearing that their confederates would be incouraged by this change of their fortune to change their affections. On the other ſide the Lacedæmonians who thought they ſhould have ended the War, and brought the Athenians to terms by an invaſion of Attica, now found they were much miſtaken; the defeat in the Iſland they had ever before their eyes, and felt the excurſions from Pylus and Cythera; they feared their ſlaves, leſt they ſhould riſe againſt them; and another danger preſſed them ſore; for the State of Argos which had antient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, would probably take the benefit of their preſent troubles, by joyning with thoſe who alone found them work enough, being ſo powerful at Sea. Above all, the liberty of the Priſoners at Athens, whereof moſt of them were of the greateſt quality, provoked them to a purſuite after peace.

But the Athenians and Lacedæmonians deſire a peace.

34. The buſineſs was much helped on by Pliſtonax the Spartan King, and Nicias the Athenian, the former being weary of thoſe calumnies which were raiſed againſt him upon any miſcarriage in the War, and the other much enamoured of Peace, by the obtaining of which he thought he ſhould be famous to ſucceeding Ages. Several treaties all the Winter were on foot about it, and towards the Spring the Lacedæmonians to make the Athenians the more readily to imbrace it, gave out, that they would with the whole force of all their confederates invade Attica, and fortifie a Caſtel therein. After much ſtickling about it, a peace was concluded for fifty years, upon theſe terms eſpecially: that a reſtitution of places and priſoners ſhould be made on both ſides, except Niſæa, which the Athenians might ſtill keep from the Megarians, and Platæa, which the Thebans refuſed to reſtore to it's Inhabitants. The two States ſwore to the performance of it, and all their allies and confederates (except the Bœotians, Corinthians, and Megarians, who liked it not) and it was concluded at Sparta, upon the the twenty ſixth day of Artemiſius, Pleiſtolas being Ephorus; at Athens, upon the twenty fourth of Elaphebolion, Alcæus being Archon, in the beginning of the Spring, preſently after the Bacchanalia, ten years and a few days being paſt ſince the firſt invaſion of Attica, and the beginning of the War.

Which is concluded.

35. The Lacedæmonians were by lot to make reſtitution firſt; which they preſently did perform, but as to places, Amphipolis was the cauſe that they could not perform it; for neither the Inhabitants, nor the reſt of the Aſſociates would ſuffer it, though the Spartans drew out their Garriſon, and did all that in them lay to reſtore it, they being unwilling to come again under the dominion of their old Lords, and counting it unreaſonable for the Spartans to deſire it.

Several Cities diſſent.

And the Deputies of the Corinthians application to Argos.

The deputies of the diſſenting Cities were at Lacedæmon, and being deſired to ſign the League, flatly refuſed, except ſome things were changed in it. Which the Spartans hearing diſmiſſed them, and very prudently applied themſelves to the Athenians, making an offenſive and defenſive League with them, thereby to retain them from joyning with the Argives and Peloponneſians, which confederacy it behoved them above all things for to hinder. After this ſtraight League, the priſoners taken in the Iſland were ſet at liberty, the eleventh year of the War now riſing, and the peace was obſerved according to agreement; but all the late confederates of Sparta took this exceedingly ill, and let out all their hatred, formerly conceived againſt the Athenians their profeſſed Enemies, upon their unjuſt friends. The Corinthians eſpecially took it in great diſdain, who had been the greateſt incentives to the War, out of envie to the State of Athens, and as their Deputies departed from Lacedæmon they took Argos in their way, where to the principal Citizens they inveighed grievouſly againſt this League, ſaying, it was made with deſign to enſlave Peloponneſus, whoſe vindicators they the Argives mnſt needs be, and that it was incumbent upon them to decree, that all free Cities which would, might enter into an alliance with them for their mutual ſafety, which if they would ſo do, they were ſure that many, out of hatred to the Spartans, would give their names to it.

Thoſe of Peloponneſus apply themſelves to that City.

36. After their departure the thing was firſt referred to the Magiſtrates, and then to the People, who choſe twelve men, to whom they gave power to make a League with any City or State, except the Spartans, and the Athenians, with whom nothing was to be concluded, without the advice and conſent of the whole body of the People. This thy did, becauſe they foreſaw a War to be made with Sparta after the end of the Truce, and hoped by this means to become maſter of Peloponneſus; for as the Lacedæmonians were now contemned for their bad ſucceſs (and the rather more for that all had ſuch vaſt conceits of their courage, that they thought they would have ſubmitted to no conditions, but have cut out all by the Sword) ſo they who had been of neither party in this War, but allied to both, had bettered their condition, and now flouriſhed exceedingly. The Mantineans firſt, who living in Arcadia, ſtood in fear of the Spartans whoſe confederacy they had ſhaken off, entred into an alliance with them, and after them the reſt of the Peloponneſians, who thought they might underſtand more of the matter than themſelves did, and had high thoughts of this great and rich City, conceiving it able to do much, becauſe that of ſo long it had done nothing. They were grievouſly incenſed againſt the Spartans, and this offended them eſpecially, that in the ſtraight League betwixt them and Athens it was provided, that by mutual conſent they might add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleaſures. This proviſo they looked upon as made to enſlave Peloponneſus, by the aſſiſtance of Athens, for that if any thing was to be changed, it were but juſt that it ſhould be done by conſent of all the Confederates who were concerned in it,

The Lacedæmonians vindicate themſelves at Corinth.

37. The Lacedæmonians knowing well how much they were concerned in theſe courſes, ſent Ambaſſadors to ſtop the matter at Corinth, whence they well perceived the miſchief to have proceeded. They expoſtulated with them for what had been done, and laid perjurie to their charge, in caſe they left their ſociety and betook themſelves to Argos, and blamed them for not admitting the League with Athens, becauſe it was formerly agreed, that what the major part ſhould conclude, it ſhould oblige all; except ſome divine impediment interpoſed. The Corinthians replied in the Aſſembly of the Agents of thoſe Ciries which refuſed the League, that in general the Lacedæmonians themſelves had not fully performed the conditions of the League, who had not taken order that the places forced from them ſhould be reſtored, and that for their part they could not deſert their confederates in Thrace, whom they perſwaded to rebel againſt Athens, and taken into protection, and to whom they were obliged by oath taken more than once, which to them appeared to be a ſufficient divine impediment why they could not enter into a League with Athens. And as for their conjunction with Argos, aſter they had adviſed with their friends, they ſhould do what was right and fitting. After their departure, in the next aſſembly they entred into a League with the Argives, and ſo did the Eleans with the Corinthian Colonies, and thoſe of Chalcis in Thrace.

38. All the Summer of the eleventh year, the Athenians and Peloponneſians had commerce with one another, though great conſultations were on foot, and the aſſociates bickered with one another, and both parties wanted not diſſatisfaction.

For

Diſſatisfaction betwixt the parties.

For, the Lacedæmonians reſtored not Amphipolis, neither procured the aſſociates in Thrace, the Bœotians, nor Corinthians, to ſign the League, though they ingaged joyntly to cauſe them to do it, and that if within a certain time they did it not, both were to hold them as Enemies. The Athenians ſeeing that they performed not theſe things, ſuſpected they dealt deceitfully with them, and for this cauſe refuſed to ſurrender Pylus, repented they had diſmiſſed the priſoners, and withheld other places till the Spartans had firſt performed the Covenants. They excuſed themſelves, for that they had done as much as in them lay, having ſet at liberty their priſoners, drawn out their Forces from Thrace, and omitted nothing in their power, in which the reſtitution of Amphipolis was not: and as for what concerned the Bœotians and Corinthians, they would do what they required. They earneſtly deſired that Pylus might be reſtored, or, at leaſt, that the Helotes and Meſſenians might be taken thence, which after much ado was granted, and theſe men were conveyed into the Iſland Cephalenia.

The deſigns of the Bœotarchæ fruſtrated.

39. In Winter the Deputies of the Confederates came to Lacedæmon, and laboured in vain to diſſolve the League betwixt that State and Athens. But now other Ephori having entered into their Office, who had nothing to do in making the ſtraight alliance, and were alſo much averſe unto it, they dealt ſecretly with the Bœotians and Corinthians, to perſwade the former to joyn themſelves to Argos, and then all to enter into a League with Sparta; which they were ſure would purchaſe this willingly, with a breach betwixt them and Athens, for that then the War would be more eaſie out of Peloponneſus; only they deſired much that the Bœotians would deliver up Panactus into their hands, that therewithal making exchange with the Athenians for Pylus, they might with leſs difficulty make War againſt them. As the Ambaſſadors were in their way, two of the principal men of Argos met them, and were very earneſt with the Bœotians to imbrace their ſociety, which, when they came home, they laid open to the Bœotarchæ, and Ambaſſadors followed from Argos to perſwade them to it, who were kindly entertained and diſmiſſed with hope that ſome Ambaſſadors ſhould follow them to conclude the buſineſs. In the mean time the Agents from Corinth, Megara, and Thrace, agreed with the Bœotarchæ, that they ſhould bind themſelves by Oath to aſſiſt him who ſhould want it, and not to begin or finiſh any War without the joynt conſent of all, and upon this condition, that the Treaty ſhould be ſigned. But ere this could be done, the Bœotarchæ were to refer the matter to the four Councils of Bœotia wherein lay the ſupreme power, which not being made acquainted by them what advice the Ephori and others of Sparta had given, for fear they ſhould give that State offence by joyning with Corinth which had revolted, they judged the contrary, and ſo by the means of the Bœotarchæ, who took it for granted that the Councils would act according to their advice, the matter proceeded no farther now, and afterwards was neglected by them.

Panactus diſmantled.

40. This Winter alſo many Treaties were held betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians; about the reſtitution of places; and the Spartans hoped, that if Panactus was but reſtored to the other, they ſhould recover Pylus. But ſuch Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be reſtored without their conſent, and therefore Ambaſſadors were ſent earneſtly to requeſt the Bœotians to deliver up Panactus with the Athenian priſoners. They ſtoutly refuſed to do it, except they would enter into as peculiar and ſtraight a League with them, as they had done with the Athenians. Now this could not be legally done, becauſe in the League with Athens it was provided, that neither ſhould make either League, or War, without mutual conſent. Yet being poſſeſſed with an imflamed deſire of recovering Pylus, and the more, becauſe they were moved by the Ephori, and others that deſired a breach with Athens, they ſtruck up a League with them. Then did the Bœotians utterly demoliſh Panactus inſtead of giving it up, and ſo the eleventh year of the War ended.

41. In Spring the Argives hearing nothing of the Bœotian Ambaſſadors promiſed to be ſent, but great talk of the demoliſhing of Panactus, and the League betwixt them and the Spartans, whom they thought to have drawn them in with the conſent of the Athenians, were much perplexed, thinking they now ſhould be run upon by all, though they formerly promiſed themſelves the Dominion of Peleponneſus by forſaking the alliance of Lacedæmon. They therefore ſent preſently thither, and ſtruck up another League with them for fifty years. In the mean while three were ſent from Sparta to receive from the Bœotians the Athenian priſoners and Panactus, who yielded both perſons and place, but this utterly demoliſhed, pretending for their excuſe, that by an ancient League it was to be held by neither of them in particular, but be common to both. The Athenians received their men, but were much moved that Panactus was demoliſhed (though the Ambaſſadors put it off by telling them they needed not now to fear any thing from it) being ſenſible of a double injury received, both as to the Town, and the League made without their knowledge, and then they called to mind other breaches of the peace, and were jealous that they were circumvented by the Spartans. And occaſion was hence taken by ſuch amongſt them as bare no good will to the peace, to ſeek all manner of ways to break it. Amongſt theſe was Alcibiades the ſon of Clinias by the ſiſter of Pericles, who though a young man, yet eminent for his Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the people, bare a ſecret grudge againſt the Lacedæmonians, for that deſpiſing his youth, and having no regard to the antient friendſhip betwixt them and his family (which his Grand-father having diſſolved, he ſought to reſtore by kindneſs ſhewed to the priſoners taken in the Iſland) they made uſe of Nicias and Laches in the concluſion of the League before him, which he thought was much to the prejudice of his honour.

The Athenians thereat, and otherwiſe offended.

Are incenſed by Alcibiades.

42. He cried out, that their deſign was firſt to ſuppreſs Argos, and then to do as much for Athens, and at this time there being no good agreement betwixt the Argives and Spartans, he ſent to them privately, exhorting them, as they tendered their own ſafety, to enter into a League with Athens. They who were now not conſulting how to become maſters of others, but how to ſave themſelves, were well pleaſed with his meſſage, and though they had Ambaſſadors now reſident at Lacedæmon about the League with that State, yet did they ſend away others to Athens, together with the Eleans and Mantineans, to make one offenſive and defenſive with them there. The Lacedæmonians hereat were at a ſtand, ſeeing well, that ſuch a Combination tended to their hurt. To keep in with the Athenians the Ephori thought that more was done already than ſtood with their honour or profit; others held it the wiſeſt courſe, ſeeing they had done ſo much, not to ſtick at a little more, but rather by giving full ſatisfaction, to retain the friendſhip of that State, which was more to be valued than the reſt of Greece. This reſolution prevailing, ſuch were ſent away to Athens as had moſt affection to peace, who ſaid in the Senate, that they came with full Commiſſion to conclude all, excuſed the League entred into with the Bœotians, as having been done only to pleaſure them in the regaining of Panactus, and aſſured them of the readineſs of their State to give all ſatisfaction, being much grieved that things went otherwiſe than according to their pleaſure. Alcibiades taking notice that they ſaid in the Senate, that they came with full Commiſſion to conclude, feared that thereby the people might be drawn to a peace, and he interpoſed by a notable ſtratagem. He perſwaded the Ambaſſadors of his friendſhip towards their City, and adviſed them to take heed that their abſolute power to conclude might not be known to the Commonalty, leſt the multitude ſhould thereupon grow peremptory, and yield to nothing, except they could draw them to unreaſonable conditions.

Who hindreth the peace by a notable ſtratagem.

43. The Ambaſſadors believed him, and ordered their ſpeech to the people according to his directions. Hereupon he took the advantage which their double dealing afforded, and openly inveighed againſt them as men of no ſincerity, come for no other purpoſe than to draw the people from ſtrengthning themſelves with friends, intending to withdraw the Argives, and their adherents, to their own alliance, as already they had done the Bœotians, though contrary to their Oath. Then he commended the cauſe of the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, to the people, which was much moved, having had before no good opinion of the Lacedæmonians; but an Earth-quake intervening before they came to the queſtion, nothing was done that day. At the next meeting Nicias perſwaded them to let him firſt go to Lacedæmon to know their minds concerning the League with the Bœotians, whether or no they would renounce it, and their friendſhip with Amphipolis, and reſtore Panactus in ſuch a condition as it ought. But Xenares the Ephorus, and his party, was ſo ſtrong, that none of theſe things could be procured; only the peace with Athens was again ſworn to, to gratifie Nicias, who was ſenſible how he ſhould be blamed at his return, being accounted alſo the Author of the League. After his return the Athenians made a League with the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans for one hundred years, at large Nicias laboureth for it.

large deſcribed by Thucydides, but tending to the mutual aſſiſtance of each other. Hereby nothing in terms was done derogatory to the League with Sparta, and the Corinthians, though the Allies of Argos, yet refuſed to be compriſed in it (as in the former betwixt the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans) alleging that the former Convention was ſufficient, which did not oblige them joyntly to make War upon any one, though to defend one another. This they ſaid, for that they ſeemed to find reaſon to forſake theſe Confederates, and to apply their Minds afreſh to the Lacedæmonians.

The Lacedæmonians kept from the Olympick exerciſes.

44. This Summer the nintieth Olympiad was celebrated, from the ſolemnity of which the Lacedæmonians were kept by the Eleans, being forbidden the Temple, and offering Sacrifice, for which a Guard was ſet, becauſe they had not paid a Fine of two thouſand Minæ impoſed upon them by them, according to the Olympian Law, for putting ſome men into the Caſtle Phorycus, and the Town of Leprea, during the Olympian Truce. They ſent their Ambaſſadors to excuſe the matter, but nothing was done, ſo that they ſacrifized at home, which bred very ill Blood betwixt them. After this ſolemnity the Argives and their Confederates ſent to Corinth, to perſwade them there to imbrace their Party; but the Ambaſſadors of Sparta being there, and it being much debated, an Earthquake hapned, and ſo they returned without any ſucceſs. In Winter hapned a Fight betwixt the Heracleots of Trachine (placed there by the Spartans to their loſs) and part of the Theſſalians, with others, wherein they were worſted, and many of them ſlain: amongſt whom Xenares the Lacedæmonian General. With theſe things the twelvth Year of the War ended.

Alcibiades marcheth into Peloponneſus.

45. The next Summer Alcibiades with ſome Forces out of Attica, and the aſſiſtance of Argos, marched into Peloponneſus, which paſſing over he came to Patræ, where he dealt with the Inhabitants about building a Wall thence unto the Sea, intending alſo of himſelf to build another as far as Rhium in Achaia; but the matter was hindred by the Corinthians, Sicyones, and others, who would have been endamaged thereby. The Argives made War againſt Epidaurus upon light occaſion, thinking, that if that Town was but ſubdued, they ſhould be more ſafe from the Corinthians on that ſide, and the Athenians would have a readier way to ſend them aid from Ægina. Whileſt they were buſie about a Peace, Ephamidas the Corinthian threw this in their Diſh, that what they made words of, that they contradicted by their Deeds, and upon that account they drew back their Army. But no concluſion coming of their Treaty, they invaded the Territories of Epidaurus again, and waſted the third part thereof. The Lacedæmonians were twice abroad with their Armies this Summer, but were recalled by their ſuperſtitious Ceremonies. The Athenians alſo ſent the Argives one thouſand men under Conduct of Alcibiades; but they having drawn away their Forces, and having no imployment for them, they returned home. In Winter the Lacedæmonians conveyed three hundred Garriſon Souldiers into Epidaurus, which paſſing through the Borders of the Athenians, the Argives expoſtulated with them for ſuffering it, contrary to the League, and complained that they reſtored not the Helotes and Meſſenians unto Pylus, whence they had taken them upon the deſire of the Spartans. This accordingly was done at the inſtance of Alcibiades. All others were quiet this Winter, except the Argives and Epidaurians, who skirmiſhed ſometimes, and towards Spring the former hearing Epidaurus to be naked, came ſuddenly with their ſcaling Ladders, and endeavoured the taking of it, but in vain. Together with this Winter the thirteenth Year of the Wer ended.

Agis the Spartan King invadeth the Argives.

46. The Summer following, the Spartans ſeeing in how bad a caſe their Friends the Epidaurians were, and that the reſt of Peloponneſus had either already revolted, or was ill affected to them, fearing that if they delayed, all things would go worſe, they armed themſelves, and Slaves, with their Confederates, under the conduct of Agis their King. It hapned that the Argives were compaſſed round about by their Enemies; but when they were about to fall on, two of their Captains ſteped out, and perſwaded Agis to abſtain from Fight, ſaying, that the Argives were willing to do all juſt things, and make Peace with the Lacedæmonians. This they ſpake of their own Heads, without the conſent or knowledg of the Multitude; and Agis, without acquainting any more of the Captains or Confederates, conſented to a Truce for four Moneths, and therewith drew off his Army. The Lacedæmonians and Confederates obeyed him for the rigour of the Law, but grievouſly blamed him for letting ſlip, or rather wilfully loſing ſo great an opprtunity, having the Enemy at ſuch an advantage, and having ſuch a numerous and well-furniſhed Army as had not been ſeen of the Græcians to that day; there being met together beſides the Spartans, the Arcadians, Bœotians, Corinthians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Phliaſians, and Megarians, and the choice of all theſe States, who ſeemed not only able to fight with the Argives, and their Aſſociates, but with any other in Combination with them. The Argives alſo not conſidering what danger they had eſcaped, were ſore inraged againſt their Officers, who had as they thought let the other eſcape out of their Hands, inſomuch that they had ſtoned one of them, had he not taken Sanctuary, and yet they ſold his Goods. Not long after a party of one thouſand Foot, and three hundred Horſe coming from Athens to their aid, the People, by the perſwaſion of Alcibiades, renounced the Truce made with Agis, and the Confederates gathering together, went and beſieged Orchomenus, wherein the Spartans had put the Hoſtages received from the Arcadians, and which was, without much to do, delivered up to them.

Is eaſily put off, and deſervedly blamed.

Severely ſentenced.

47. The Lacedæmonians being grievouſly inraged againſt Agis, eſpecially after the news came about Orchomenus, beyond all precedent decreed his Houſe ſhould be demoliſhed, and fined him one hundred thouſand Drachmes, which he deprecating, and promiſing to redeem his credit by ſome notable exploit, they yet made a new Law, that there ſhould be ten men aſſiſting to him, without whoſe conſent he ſhould not as much as lead the Army from the City. News preſently was brought that Tegea was beſieged, whereupon he took the Field, and came to a ſet Battel with the Argives and their Confederates, wherein though his right Wing was over-borne through the negligence of the Polemarchi (who did not ſoon enough communicate the orders received from him) yet he put to flight the Enemy in the other, and then coming to the help of it, obtained the Victory. This was that noble Fight, as Thucydides extolleth it, betwixt the moſt eminent and powerful States of Greece, than which there was none more remarkeable that hapned amongſt the Græcians themſelves. Yet the number of the ſlain was not great. Of the Argives and their Allies about eleven hundred, of the Confederates of Sparta not many, and of the Lacedæmonians themſelves three hundred were reported to have fallen. The Day after, the Epidamnians, while Argos was naked, fell in upon their Grounds, and killed many of thoſe that came out of the City againſt them. While the Lacedæmonians were buſie in their Carnean Solemnities, the Eleans and Athenians aſſiſting the Mantineans, went and drew a line about Epidaurus, upon which they left a ſufficient Guard, and departed.

According to his promiſe he redeemeth his Credit.

Yet the Lacedæmonians ſent to Argos about a peace.

48. In the beginning of Winter the Lacedæmonians after their Solemnity was over, again took the Field, but thinking now the Argives might be humbled, ſent to feel their Minds about a Peace. At this time ſuch as deſired a change of the Government at Argos became powerful, and hoped if they could conclude with the Spartans, to take it out of the Hands of the Multitude, and bring it to a temper agreeable to the conſtitutions of that State. By the artifices of thoſe men, the Argives were brought to forſake the Mantineans, Eleans, and Athenians, and joyn themſelves in a League with the Lacedæmonians to continue for fifty Years: It was agreed, that no entercourſe ſhould be held with the Athenians, except they would draw out all their Forces from Peloponneſus (The freedom of Epidaurus being eſpecially looked at herein by the Spartans as much concerning them) and that no Treaty or War was to be entred upon without mutual conſent. They then took care for ſeveral other things, and ſent to Perdiccas King of Macedonia, to enter into a League with him, but he did not throughly aſſent to it, though he bore reſpect to Argos, whence he accounted himſelf deſcended: but they renewed the League with them of Chalcis, and obliged others unto them. The Argives ſent alſo to the Athenians, to require them to draw off their Guards from Epidaurus: but they hereupon ſent Demoſthenes thither to get all the Fortification into their own Hands, after which they ſurrendred it to the Towns-men, and renewed their antient League with them. The Mantineans at firſt refuſed to joyn with the Argives in the League with Athens; but after conſidering that they could not ſubſiſt without them, ſubſcribed, and gave up thoſe places they had in their Hands. After this, one thouſand men from Lacedæmon, and as many from Argos, were ſent to Sicyon, where by the endeavours of the Lacedæmonians, the Supreme Power was transferred out of the Hands of the People to few Men, which was after affected at Argos alſo, an Oligarchy being introduced, agreeable to the Government of Sparta. With this Winter the fourteenth year of the War ended.

Which is procured by thoſe who affected an Oligarchy.

An Oligarchy ſet up at Sicyon and Argos.

The Argives recover the Democracy, and renounce the League with Sparta.

49. The Summer following, the People of Argos bearing heavily the change of the Government, took their opportunity when the Lacedæmonians were buſie in the naked exerciſes of their Youth, and killing ſome of their adverſaries, and expelling others, reſtored the popular Government, renounced the League with Sparta, and renewed that with Athens. Then they fell on building of their long Walls from the City to the Sea, thinking, that if they ſhould be blocked up by Land, to have entercourſe with the Athenians by Sea. In Winter the Lacedæmonians knowing that they were buſied (men, women, ſlaves and all) in this work, with their Aſſociates (all but the Corinthians, who ſtirred not) came againſt Argos, hoping to take the City by means of thoſe within that were of their party; but being fruſtrated of their expectations, they demoliſhed the Wall, and taking Hyſias a Caſtle of Argolis, put to the Sword all the Males of free condition, and ſo returned. After this, the Argives waſted the Territories of the Phliaſians, for harbouring their Exiles. This ſame Winter the Athenians renounced the League with Perdiccas, accuſing him of Conſpiracy with the Argives and Laconians, of non-performance of the League betwixt them, and laying the blame upon him that the Expedition miſcarried which they had made, under the conduct of Nicias againſt the Chalcidians and Amphipolis in Thrace. With theſe things the Winter ended, and together with it the fifteenth year of the War.

The Lacedæmonians in vain attempt to take Argos.

50. The Year following, Alcibiades with twenty Ships ſailing to Argos, took thence three hundred men ſuſpected of Laconiſm, who were carried into the Iſlands ſubject to the Athenians, and there committed to cuſtody. After this the Athenians with ſtrong force invaded the Iſland Melus, the Inhabitants of which being a Colony of the Lacedæmonians, denied them obedience. They firſt ſent Commiſſioners to the Town to treat with the Melians, where there was much canvaſſing the caſe; but in concluſion they continuing in their reſolution not to yield, Fortifications were made againſt the City, and ſtrong Guards left upon them. Almoſt at the ſame time, the Argives making excurſions into the Phliaſian Territories, by the lying in wait of the Phliaſians, and their own Exiles, loſt eighty of their men. The Athenians that lay in Pylus now alſo waſted Laconia, notwithſtanding which, the Lacedæmonians would not take ſo much notice as to account the League broken, and thereupon to take Arms; but only cauſed it to be proclaimed by a Cryer, that whoſoever of their Subjects would, might prey upon the Athenians: the Corinthians only about ſome controverſies made War upon them, all Peloponneſus beſides being quiet. The Melians made two Sallies againſt the Beſiegers, with good ſucceſs; but a freſh Army being ſent from Athens by the help of ſome Treachery took it this Winter, upon terms of yielding to Mercy. All the Males of ripe age that could be taken were put to the Sword, the women and children made Slaves, and the Town was repeopled by a Colony of five hundred Athenians.

They will not take notice that the League is broken with Athens.

Melus taken.

The Athenians look after Sicilie.

Thucyd. l. 6.

51. This ſame Winter the Athenians, with greater preparations than ever, reſolved ſeriouſly to look after Sicilie. Their pretence was to give aſſiſtance to their Friends and Allies there, but the true and only cauſe was the deſire of propagating their Empire, by the bringing under of all that whole Iſland. A good occaſion was now given them by the Egeſtans, who upon account of former Alliance, came and ſued to them for Aid againſt the Selinuntians their Enemies, upheld by them of Syracuſe, offering them Money for carrying on the War; whereupon they thought fit firſt to ſend Ambaſſadors to be informed concerning the Money boaſted of, and the ſtate of the War. The Lacedæmonians this Winter made excurſions into Argolis, and carried away much Booty. The Argives cauſed Ornea to be demoliſhed, where their Exiles harboured, by the help of the Athenians, who ſent ſome Forces to Methone a Town bordering upon Macedonia, thence to infeſt the Territories of Perdiccas. The Chalcidians hereupon ſollicited the Lacedæmonians to ſend Aid to the King, but they thinking it not Policy to break quite with Athens, refuſed. Thus the Winter with the ſixteenth Year of the Peloponneſian War ended.

Decree aid to be ſent to the Egeſtans under the command of Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus.

52. In the beginning of Spring the Ambaſſadors ſent from Athens returned out of Sicilie, bringing from the Egeſtans ſixty Talents of Bullion, with a moneths pay for ſixty Ships, as was required. The Ambaſſadors affirming (though falſly) as well as the Egeſtans, that they had much Money in their Temples and publick Treaſury; the People thereupon much elevated decreed Aid to be ſent to them, under the conduct of Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus, to whom they gave in charge, that, if it might be, they ſhould reſtore the Leontines, and do thoſe things which they ſaw to be moſt advantagious to the Commonwealth, according to the comportment of affairs. Nicias laboured with all his might to divert the People from ſuch a ſuddain reſolution, propoſing all the difficulties and dangers of the War, and thought to have excuſed himſelf by magnifying the power that was required to ſuch an undertaking ; but his mouth was ſtopped by a Decree, which gave him as much as he could exact. For one hundred Gallies were ordered for the Expedition, beſides others of their Confederates, which amounted to above thirty, over and above Veſſels of burthen, and others neceſſary for the tranſportation of ſix thouſand and one hundred men, whereof five thouſand and one hundred bore heavy Armour. All things were prepared, with the greateſt care and induſtry imaginable ; the Soldiers were completely furniſhed with Arms, cloths, and all things neceſſary ; and a drachm a day aſſigned for their wages.

Sect. 3.

The Hermæ broken at Athens.

Alcibiades ſuſpected, and deſirous to be tried, is yet by his Enemies ſent away.

Then again recalled.

53. Before the departure of the Fleet, all the Hermæ throughout the City (theſe were the images of Mercury ſet up at every man's gate) in one night were mangled and abuſed, which was taken as an ill omen, and the People was jealous that it was done by ſome that were Enemies to the Popular Government. Great inquiſition was made in vain to find out the Authors, but the ſuſpicion light upon Alcibiades one of the Generals, through the practice of his emulators, who made uſe of his lofty deportment, which ill ſuited with their kind of policy. He offered himſelf to the tryal, being fearful to be condemned abſent ; but his Enemies put it off for the preſent, and got him to be ſent away, intending to make uſe of that which he feared, that being condemned unheard, he might be the ſooner oppreſſed, becauſe now by his own authority and intereſt, he had drawn many to give their names to the Expedition, and therefore they could not eaſily carry any thing againſt him, becauſe of his popularity. As the Fleet ſailed towards Sicily, the Generals ſent ſome before to diſcover further in what conditions the Egeſtans were, who bringing tidings clean contrary to what both they, the Egeſtans themſelves, and the Ambaſſadors ſent to them had aſſerted, the Generals were all divided in their opinions what to do, but Alcibiades hot and youthful, was for their proceeding, to which Lamachus at length aſſenting, his deſire was obtained. They then landed and ſeized upon Catana, attempted Camarina in vain, when Alcibiades received orders to come and plead his cauſe at Athens about the Hermæ, his Enemies having obtained it ſhould be ſo. In truth he was condemned beforehand, but to colour the matter, he was ſent for to plead, and that muſt be with bonds laid upon him. He was aware of the danger, and departed ſtraight to Lacedæmon, with intention to teach the Athenians what perſon they had compelled by unjuſt Judgment to forſake his Countrey, and betake himſelf to their Enemies. After this was known, ſentence of death was publiſhed againſt him of his Partners, many (whether juſtly or no Thucydides much queſtions) being put to death without proof already in the City.

The Syracuſians ſtand on their Guard.

54. The Syracuſians, though not fully perſwaded of the deſign of the Athenians againſt them at firſt, (and thereupon not ſo well provided as they might have been) yet made all poſſible proviſion for reſiſtance. The two Generals, after the departure of Alcibiades, by a ſtratagem drew them out of the City, and in the mean time brought their Forces near unto it, and worſted them when they ſallied out, but without any great loſs ſuſtained on either part, and then drew off to their Winter quarters at Catana and Naxus. The Syracuſians incouraged by Hermocrates one of their new Generals (a wiſe man, who had forwarned them of the deſign of the Athenians) ſent to Sparta and Corinth for aid ; ſtrengthned their Fortifications, made excurſions to Catana, where they waſted the grounds, plundred, and burnt part of the Athenian Camp which was empty. Both ſides laboured to draw the Camarinæans to their ſide, but in vain ; yet many Cities eſpecially in the In-land, imbraced the ſociety of the Athenians, who ſent alſo this Winter to the Carthaginians to procure their amity ; the Cities upon the Tyrrhenian ſhore they alſo drew in, and all Sicily was now divided into theſe two factions. The Corinthians readily reſolved to ſend aid to the Syracuſians, and ſent ſome of their own with their Ambaſſadors to Sparta to procure as much for them from that State. The Spartans made difficulty at firſt to do it, for fear of giving the Athenians offence ; but hearing from Alcibiades what their deſigns were (who was come thither upon the publick faith) at his perſwaſions reſolved alſo upon ſending Forces under the Command of Gylippus they alſo imbraced his Counſel concerning renewing the War, and fortifying Decelea a Caſtle in Attica. At the ſame time, the Athenian Generals ſent to Athens for money and horſ-men, which was readily decreed to be ſent. Herewith the ſeventeenth year of the War ended.

The Corinthians and Spartans ſend them aid.

55. The next year the Argives and Lacedæmonians preyed mutually upon one another in Peloponneſus. In Sicily the Athenians with their whole force, and new ſupply of horſe, ſayled to Syracuſe, about which they ſeized upon many places, and ſeveral skirmiſhes enſued about the Fortifications, wherein the Athenians had the better. Then was the Athenian Fleet conveyed into the Haven of Syracuſe, whence great contention enſued, and Lamachus one of the Generals aſſiſting his friends was ſlain. The Syracuſians endeavouring the recovery of Epipolæ were repelled by Nicias, who thence drew a double work againſt the Town, and ſtrengthned himſelf by the acceſs of Confederates, and ſtore of proviſion. The beſieged receiving no aſſiſtance from Peloponneſus parlied with Nicias; but the matter ſucceeding not, they made choice of new Captains, whilſt Gylippus was not now far off, but deſpiſed by Nicias for the ſmall number of his men. In Greece the Spartans diſtreſſed the Argives, who were aſſiſted by the Athenians with thirty ſhips. Theſe made excurſions into the Territories of Epidaurus, ſo that the League which had ſo long continued betwixt them and Sparta, though in a doubtful condition, was now openly broken, and the War reſumed; and that more by their fault than any blame of the Lacedæmonians, if Thucydides be judge.

Thucyd. lib. 7.

56. Gylippus arriving at Syracuſe diſturbed the work of Nicias about the Wall, and changed the conſtancy of his good fortune, who yet was not diſcouraged thereby, but proceeded in his utmoſt endeavours for the ſervice of thoſe that ſent him, making preparation for Sea-matters, wherein the Athenians ſeemed to excel all others: hereupon enſued ſeveral skirmiſhes with various fortune, and the remaining of Summer was ſpent on both ſides, in increaſing their Forces and procuring aid. Nicias writing [illegible] Athens for ſupplies, new Levies were made, and Demoſthenes, and Eurymedon joyned in Commiſſion with him, whereof the latter was ſent in mid-winter with ten Gallies, and a great ſumm of money into Sicily, and the other ſtaid till Spring to get ready what was remaining: twenty ſhips they alſo ordered to attend the motions of the Peloponneſians. Theſe things being known, the Spartans and Corinthians calling upon their Confederates provided for the invaſion of Attica, accordingly as Alcibiades had adviſed. With theſe things the eighteenth year of the War ended.

Demoſthenes and Eurymedon joyned in Commiſſion with Nicias.

57. In the beginning of the Spring the Peloponneſians under the Command of Agis the Spartan King, invaded Attica, where they fortified Oecalea, a place ſome twelve miles diſtant from Athens, and as much from the Borders of Bœotia. The Athenians ſent thirty ſhips to waſte Peloponneſus, and ſixty (with five of Chius) into Sicily under Demoſthenes his Command. Out of Peloponneſus were ſent to the aid of the Syracuſians, from Sparta ſix hundred men, from Corinth five hundred, Sycion two hundred, and out of Bœotia three hundred, to which the Corinthian Gallies lying at Naupactus were ordered to be a Convoy. At Syracuſe the affairs of the Athenians, through the skill and valour of Gylippus and Hermocrates, went down the wind, who being alſo much diſtreſſed at home by the excurſions out of Decelea, yet kept up their ſpirits to the admiration of all men. After Demoſthenes had arrived in Sicily, and heard of the miſcarriages of their Fleet at Sea, he blamed Nicias, that he had not as ſoon as he came, applied all his endeavour to Syracuſe the head of the War, and cauſed him to agree to ſet upon Epipolæ, a difficult and craggy place, where falling on in the dark night, they could not diſcern betwixt friend and foe, all ſpeaking in the ſame dialect, and thereby great ſlaughter being made of them, partly by themſelves and the Enemy, the Athenians received a great defeat. The Generals hereupon conſulting together, were not of the ſame opinion; Demoſthenes now was for departing away ſpeedily out of the Iſland, ſeeing all things hapned croſs therein, though he had been the cauſe of the fight: on the other ſide Nicias, who had laboured with all his might againſt the War, now preſſed earneſtly that it was for the honour and intereſt of their Country to ſtay and carry on the ſiege, and though Eurymedon was of the ſame opinion with Demoſthenes, yet could not Nicias be removed from his, ſo that their departure was deferred till they underſtood that Gylippus was come with new ſupplies out of Peloponneſus and Sicily. This reſolution he ſtuck to ſo much, for that he knew the multitude rather to look at ſucceſs than the reaſon of things, and was unwilling to hazard his life and reputation in the hands of thoſe who would be ready to condemn before they heard him, as they had done Sophocles and Pthiodorus the former Generals, pretending they had taken money for making peace, when indeed there was not any poſſibility of making War.

The Athenians defeated at Syracuſe.

58. But upon the report of Gylippus his coming, Nicias was content, and order was given for the Army to diſlodge with the greateſt ſecrecy; when in the mean time fell out an Eclypſe of the Moon. By this, which was accounted an ill Omen, was Nicias again ſo terrified, that out of a ſuperſtitious conceit he would not have the Camp break up till twenty ſeven days were paſt. The Syracuſians much rejoyced hereat, and reſolved to hinder their flight, or force them to transfer themſelves to ſome other place. They firſt beat up thir Camp, and the next day provoked them to fight, both at Land and Sea, and in the mouth of the Haven ingaged in a great and bloody battel, wherein Eurymedon one of the Athenian Generals was ſlain, and though the Squadron of Gylippus was worſted, which made the Athenians Erect a Trophy, yet had they the worſt of it, all conſidered. This made them too late repent that they had ſo ambitiouſly and unjuſtly undertaken a War with a City as great as Athens it ſelf, and one of the ſame kind of Government, Enemy to Oligarchy. But the Syracuſians were more and more animated, conceiving now great hopes of obtaining much glory and favour amongſt the Græcians, of whom ſome they might free from ſlavery, and others from the fear of it for the time to come, by chaſtiſing their Tyrants, as they were accounted. As a way hereto they reſolved to block up the mouth of the Haven, that the Athenian Fleet ſhould not paſs out thence by ſtealth.

Again at Sea,

59. The Athenians ſeeing themſelves in this ſtraight, concluded it the beſt for them to make a new, and a more narrow Camp near to their ſhips, and attempt another battel at Sea, in which, if they had the better, then to remove to Catana, but if not, to burn their Veſſels and depart by Land to ſome convenient place. This was attempted with all care and expedition; but the Syracuſians oppoſed them, and in the ſtraight of the Haven was ſuch a diſpute, as ſcarcely ever before had hapned, which was beheld by the land Armies with paſſion ſuitable to the condition of their friends: Notwithſtanding the Syracuſians loſt almoſt as many Veſſels, yet the other were ſo weakned, and the Sea-men ſo diſcouraged, that though the Generals would have attempted to breake out another time, yet they refuſed any more to go aboard; ſo that they concluded of getting away by Land the next night. If this had been done it might have falln out well for the Army, but by the cunning device of Hermocrates they were circumvented, and perſwaded to ſtay till the third day after.

Sorely ſtraightned.

60. Their departure was moſt full of out-cries, ſorrow, and miſery, ſet out to the life by Thucidides, ſo that none can read it without compaſſion. Gylippus ſeized upon their hundred and thirty ſhips left in the Haven, then purſued them, and ſet upon them behind, before, and on all ſides, ſo that diſtreſſed for all neceſſaries, they took another way than that which lead to Catana, otherwiſe than they had intended, and they were divided into two bodies, whereof that with Demoſthenes ſoon yielded upon promiſe of their lives. Nicias required better terms, and refuſed to ſubmit; but at length was forced to it, craving favour for himſelf and men, at the hands of Gylippus and the Spartans; eighteen thouſand in one day were ſlain, ſeven hundred taken and condemned to Mines, were after ſold. The two Generals were (contrary to the utmoſt indeavour of Gylippus, who would fain have had the honour of carrying them to Sparta) put to death, or as Diodorus ſaith, killed themſelves in priſon. This was the end of the Sicilian War, ſo indiſcreetly undertaken by the Athenians, who when they had thoſe already that gave them enough to do, would needs make to themſelves more Enemies, and ſo by labouring to graſp, loſt, all. Meton (a) the Aſtronomer (mentioned before) was ſo certainly perſwaded of the danger of this expedition, that when he was enrolled amongſt thoſe that were to undertake it, to prevent his going, he counterfeited himſelf mad, to confirm the belief of which he ſet fire on his own houſe. But (b) Hippocrates the Coan (Prince of Phyſicians) is ſaid to have ſet out his own ſon at his own charge, as Phyſician to the Athenian Army.

They fly.

Are forced to yield to mercy.

(a) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 12.

(b) Vide Sympſon in Chron. ad ann. M.3590.

61. The Athenians were loath to give credit to the firſt report of the loſs of their Army and Fleet, becauſe of the greatneſs of it, but then knowing it to be ſo indeed, were much incenſed againſt thoſe that perſwaded them to undertake the War, and for that they feared the Sicilians would now come upon them whilſt they they were deſtitute of all things, the City was filled with great conſternation. Yet within a while, they took courage, and making all proviſion for defence, gave Commiſſion to ſome few of the moſt antient and experienced amongſt them, to conſult and provide fit matter for the multitude to decree. In Winter following all Greece was elevated upon this their bad ſucceſs. They who were neuters before, now offered themſelves to joyn in ſuppreſſing thoſe of whom formerly they ſtood in fear: the Confederates of Lacedæmon more vigorouſly provided againſt them, and all thoſe that had been ſubject to them were earneſt to ſhake off the yoak. The Lacedæmonians having ſuch encouragement, ſet themſelves very ſeriouſly to the War. Agis their King went into Theſſaly to raiſe money, and a Fleet of one hundred Gallies was prepared amongſt the Confederates. Pharnabazus one of the Satrapaes of Perſia, and Lieutenant of thoſe parts of Aſia about the Helleſpont, and Tiſſaphernes another of the Satrapaes, ſent to Sparta, and offered them aſſiſtance. Theſe deſigns were carried on as ſecretly as could be, that the Athenians might get no knowledge of them, who laboured alſo at the ſame time about the Rigging of a new Fleet. With theſe preparations the nineteenth year of the War ended.

Thucyd. lib. 8.

Great joy in Greece.

Alcibiades his actings againſt his own Country.

62. The next year the Athenians were at the beginning ſomewhat encouraged by ſome ſucceſs at Sea, and thereby the Lacedæmonians ſo far diſcouraged again, that they thought ſeriouſly of concluding the War, till otherwiſe perſwaded by Alcibiades, who undertook an expedition into Ionia to withdraw it from the obedience of Athens, and did very much effect it. The Athenians hereat abaſhed, and fearing all their Aſſociates would revolt, took out one thouſand Talents, which as yet had been untouched, as forbidden by the Law, and laid them out in this caſe of extremity in proviſions, and eſpecially in preparing a new Fleet. Then by Alcibiades his means was a League of alliance made betwixt Darius Nothus King of Perſia, and the State of Sparta, by virtue of which the King allowed money for the paiment of their Soldiers. The Athenians recovered Lesbus, and Clazomenæ, the Mileſians and Chians (principal in the revolt) were deſtroyed by them, but again they had the worſt of it in a Sea-fight near to Rhodes, which the Peloponneſians then by fair means drew to their ſociety, exacting of the Inhabitans twenty three talents in the name of tribute, which ſucceſs, becauſe of the ſtrength of that City, made them confidently deſpiſe the money, and alliance of Perſia.

He flieth from the Spartans out of fear.

He ſuggeſteth crafty counſel to Tiſſaphernes.

63. For, Tiſſaphernes and they were at ſome difference about the form of the League, which they complained was not rightly drawn, for therein they were tied to give up to the Perſian the Iſlands, Theſſaly, Locri, and Bœotia, which heretofore had been under the power of that Empire: which ſeemed unworthy for the Lacedæmonians to do, who pretended themſelves the vindicators of the liberty of Greece, againſt the incroachments of the Athenians; Herewith Tiſſaphernes was grievouſly netled, and departed in diſcontent from Cnidus, where eleven Spartans had met him to require that the inſtruments ſhould be corrected. At this time it alſo hapned that Alcibiades was envied for his glory, and ſuſpected by the Peloponneſians, and hated by Agis the Spartan King, for that he had corrupted his Wife, inſomuch that order was reported to have been ſent to Aſtyochus the General, to kill him; but he withdrew himſelf to Tiſſaphernes. He laid open to him the full State of the Peloponneſians, perſwaded him to diminiſh the pay that his Maſter allowed them, by changing a Drachm into three Oboli a day, part of which alſo he ſhould ever keep unpaid, to have the Seamen at his devotion. He further ſuggeſted crafty counſel to him: eſpecially that they ſhould not ſuffer the Athenians to be ſuppreſſed by the Lacedæmonians, but to keep thoſe two States ever in an even ballance, and let them weaken one another by their mutual enmities; yet to favour a little more the Athenians, becauſe they would be content with part of the ſoveraignty of the Seas, and would go no further, whereas the Spartans would not reſt here, but contend for the ſole Dominion, and to bring all the Græcians from under the Perſian yoak. Theſe things he preſſed upon him as great myſteries of State for his Maſter's ſervice, and as ſuch he embraced them; wherefore the promiſe he had made of joyning the Phœnician Fleet with that gallant one of the Peloponneſians was not performed, and the power of this was weakened by the with-holding of the Soldiers pay.

He deſireth to return to his Country.

64. Alcibiades had a great deſire to return into his own Country, which would not be to any purpoſe except it were preſerved, and therefore he communicated theſe things to Tiſſaphernes. He wrote to ſome of the chief of the Athenians then Phrynicus ſtandeth in fear of him, and laboureth to deſtroy him,

To no purpoſe.

lying at Samus concerning his deſire, and told them wherein he was dealing with him; and yet he ſignified that he had no mind to return, as long as the Popular Government (under which he was baniſhed) ſhould continue. The Athenians that lay at Samus liked the matter well, and generally inclined to change the Government, for that they were made to believe that Tiſſaphernes by the procurement of Alcibiades would be their friend, and they ſhould have money from him for the payment of their Army. But Phrynicus the General ſtanding in fear of Alcibiades, by reaſon he had ſpoken too freely againſt him, oppoſed it with all his might, and when he could do nothing by words, very boldly acquainted Aſtyochus the Lacedæmonian General with the matter. He who now had not Alcibiades in his power, was no whit eager for his deſtruction, and being withal corrupted by Tiſſaphernes to betray his truſt, went and acquainted him and Alcibiades with what he had received. Hereupon Alcibiades wrote to the Athenians in Samus, and acquainted them with the treachery of Phrynicus, required them to put him to death as a Traitor to his Country, who hereupon was exceedingly troubled, and boyled with anger againſt Aſtyochus; yet in ſo deſperate a caſe adding one raſh act unto another, he wrote again to him, upraided him with unthankfulneſs, and ſignified that he would betray Samus with all the Athenian Army there unto the Lacedæmonians, which he could do, becauſe the Town was unwalled, and would do, foraſmuch as it was lawful in ſo eminent a danger, as he was in, to provide for his own ſecurity.

Commiſſioners ſent to treat with Alcibiades and Tiſſaphernes. but in vain.

65. Aſtyochus without taking this opportunity to ſerve his Country, made this known alſo to Alcibiades, which Phrynicus underſtanding, and knowing that Alcibiades would write hereof to the Army, that he might prevent him, he told the Soldiers that the Enemy intended to ſet upon Samus by Sea and Land, now that the City wanted walls, whereupon he commanded them, having abſolute authority, to raiſe a work about it, and keep diligent watch. This was done accordingly, and then though Alcibiades his letters preſently after arrived, yet no credit was given to the accuſation, as proceeding from his bitter Enemy, but more confidence repoſed in him. Alcibiades then applied himſelf to Tiſſaphernes to reconcile him to the Athenians, but he being unwilling to loſe all his credit, was cool in the buſineſs. But whilſt he dealt with him, the Soldiers in Samus having ſent to Athens to deal with the People about the change of Government, Piſander chief of the meſſengers laboured to convince them of the abſolute neceſſity thereof, for that otherwiſe they could not be freed from imminent deſtruction. The People being circumvented yielded to it, and gave him with ten other Commiſſioners power to treat, and conclude whatſoever they found neceſſary for the State, with Tiſſaphernes and Alcibiades: but the former of theſe ſtanding in fear of utterly loſing the Peloponneſians, and having this always in his mind to keep the two States in an equal ballance, would not give any encouragement, or open his mind fully to Alcibiades, who fearing to loſe his power and credit with him, which he had ſo boaſted of to the Athenians; that he might put them by, demanded ſuch hard Conditions as he knew they could not grant, and ſo the Commiſſioners returned with great ſtomach and diſdain, to have been ſo ill uſed by him.

Tiſſaphernes renueth the War with the Peloponneſians.

66. And Tiſſaphernes to proſecute that deſign of ſetting the Græcians upon each other, and keeping them in equal power; fearing that if he detained any longer the pay from the Peloponneſians, that they would be too much weakned by the Athenians, who now of late had the better of it in ſome engagements, and thereby the King's Provinces ſhould be expoſed to danger, went this Winter into Caria, where he renewed the League on better terms for the Peloponneſians, paid the arrears due to the Army, and promiſed to diſpatch away the Phœnician Fleet. This new alliance was made in the thirteenth year of Darius, (Alexipidas being Ephorus at Sparta) upon the River Mæander, atteſted by the names of Tiſſaphernes, Hieramenes, and the Children of Pharnaces. Towards the end of Winter Oropus a Town ſituate upon the confines of Attica and Bœotia, revolted to the Bœotians, being formerly in the juriſdiction of Athens. Hereupon the Bœotians conceived hopes to alienate all Eubœa from the Athenians, eſpecially for that the Eretrians who were principal in that Iſland, inclined to a revolt, and ſent away to the Peloponneſians to deſire they would come into Eubœa. But their care for Chius which was diſtreſſed by the Athenians ſuffered them not to comply with their deſire; for they ſet out a Fleet to relieve that Iſland, but the Athenians being maſters of the Sea, it durſt not venture further than Miletus; and therefore the Athenian ſhips returned unto Samus. Thus ended the twentieth year of the War.

The Government changed to Oligarchy in Athens, aud the Cities ſubject to it.

67. In the beginning of Spring Dercylidas was ſent from Sparta by Land to the Helleſpont, with no great force, where with eaſe he brought off Abydus (a Colony of the Mileſians) from their obedience to Athens, and after that Lampſacus, but attempted the ſame upon Seſtus to no purpoſe. The Athenians and Chians had a battel at Sea upon equal Terms: but Strombichides the Athenian hearing what was done in the Helleſpont haſted thither, recovered Lampſacus, was repelled by the Inhabitants of Abydus, and then went to Seſtus in Europe, where he placed a ſtrong Garriſon for the ſecurity of thoſe parts. In the mean time Piſander and his Colleagues being returned from Alcibiades to Samus, in conjunction with thoſe therein, reſolved without him to change the Government. They firſt did it in moſt of the Cities which were ſubject to Athens, and found it almoſt effected there, after that Androcles, a man who was moſt earneſt in the defence of Democracy, with ſome others, were ſecretly murdered by ſome Conſpirators, who laboured thereby to gain the good will of Alcibiades and Tiſſaphernes. Theſe deſigned to have the State governed by five thouſand men of the moſt able with Bodies and Eſtates to ſerve it, and the People durſt not contradict them, ſuch factions and jealouſies had riſen, that no man was ſecure of his Neighbour. But Piſander and his Colleagues arriving, obtained of the Multitude, that ten men might be impowred, to conclude and ſet down in writing ſuch things as ſeemed to them requiſite for a ſetlement, which on a certain day were to be referred to the People.

The Model.

Eour hnndred men have the executive Power.

They ſend to Agis about a peace, who ſlighteth them.

68. When the day came, theſe ten men firſt required, that it might be lawful for any one to ſpeak his Opinion without danger of incurring any penalty by the Laws. Then they propoſed, that no Magiſtracy ſhould be undertaken and exerciſed after the uſual manner, nor any receive ſalary for the exerciſing thereof: that five Preſidents ſhould be choſen, who ſhould pick out one hundred men, and each of theſe chuſe three more, that all might make up the number of four hundred. That theſe four hundred men ſhould be inveſted with the ſupreme Power aud Authority; ſhould decree and ordain what ſeemed good unto them; and might call together the five thouſand when they thought it convenient. Theſe Propoſitions, though of ſo great conſequence for the change they were likely to produce, were yet admitted of, not as much as one man gainſaying them, ſuch a change there was made in the minds of the People, which now ſince the baniſhing of the Tyrants, had only been governed by its Laws and Conſtitutions, and not only not ſubject to the Authority of others, but reigning over many, deveſted it ſelf of ſo great Soveraignty and Power. But theſe four hundred men thus authoriſed, were conducted in a ſolemn manner to the Senate-houſe, with Daggers under their Coats, and compaſſed about with armed Men, where the old Senate having their Salaries paid were diſmiſſed. They choſe the Prytanes or Preſidents out of their own Body, and then began to exerciſe their Authority; but not without Blood, Bonds, and Baniſhment. They ſent to Agis the Lacedæmonian King, then lying at Decelea, to treat of Peace, but he not having any Opinion of their Power as long to continue, but thinking the People would ſhortly reſume it, rejected their Ambaſſie, and ſending for more Forces out of Peloponneſus, came to Athens, hoping that in theſe Commotions he might affright the City into a Surrender. But he found the contrary; for all agreeing in this to reſiſt him as the common Enemy, they ſtood notably to their defence, and ſallied out upon him; ſo that having no hopes, he diſmiſſed his new Forces, and with the other returned to Decelea.

Refers their ſecond addreſs to Sparta.

The Army at Samus inraged at them.

69. After his return, the four hundred ſent other Ambaſſadors to him about a Peace, who referred them to Sparta, whither they went, but what ſucceſs they had, doth not appear from Thucydides. They knew the common Soldiers at Samus (though Piſander and his Companions had ſtickled ſo for it) to be Enemies to Oligarchy, and therefore to take them off, they ſent to acquaint them that the Power was not in them only, but in the five thouſand alſo, and laboured to ſatisfie them in this point, that this was equivalent to Democracie, ſeeing that during that Government, when all things were done by the Body of the People, a greater number did not uſe to meet. But they at Samus being impatient of any but Popular Government, after the departure of Piſander and his Colleagues, had reſtored it there, and ſent to Athens to ſignifie ſo much, not knowing what had hapned there, which was very unwelcome news to the four hundred, who caſt ſome of the Meſſengers into Priſon. But Chareas, hiding himſelf for ſome time, eſcaped, and carried back a report how things ſtood, amplifying much the oppreſſion and inſolence of theſe Governours; whereat the Soldiers were grievouſly enraged, and threatned death, not only to the Authors of the Oligarchy, but to all that had been partakers of it; and at ſuch a Seaſon when the Enemy expected ſuch advantages, they had committed ſomething, tending to the ruine of their Countrey, had they not been reſtrained by the interpoſition of more ſtayed and prudent men. Thraſybulus and Thraſyllus, who had been moſt earneſt for reſtoring the Popular Government, that they might do it in a ſafe and honourable way, cauſed all the Soldiers, eſpecially ſuch as they knew to favonr Oligarchy, to take an Oath unanimouſly to act for the reſtitution of the power of the People; to fight reſolutely againſt the Peloponneſians; to take for Enemies the four hundred men at Athens, and to admit of no entercourſe with them by any Officer at Arms; which Oath alſo they cauſed to be taken by all the Samians that were at Age, whoſe conjunction they thought neceſſary for carrying on the Deſign.

Takes an Oath of Combination againſt them.

70. Then did the Soldiers chuſe them new Officers, of whom were Thraſybulus and Thraſyllus, and encouraged one another to the Enterprize, both from the juſtneſs of their undertaking (for that the Army had not revolted from the Citie, but the Citie from it) as alſo from their Strength, far ſuperiour (eſpecially in reſpect of the Fleet) to that of the four hundred, adding alſo, that Alcibiades upon promiſe of ſecurity, and reſtitution, would be aſſiſting to them, and that they might hope well concerning Tiſſaphernes, and the King of Perſia. In the mean while the Peloponneſians ſore mutined againſt Tiſſaphernes, and Aſtyochus, that they had not their pay, and were not lead out to fight with the Athenians, whilſt they were ſo at odds amongſt themſelves, which forced the later to draw both Sea and Land-forces to Mycale for an Ingagement, but the Athenians refuſing to fight, for that they were inferiour to them in number of Ships, when more came from the Helleſpont preſented themſelves; but then the Peloponneſians conceiving themſelves too weak for the encounter, refuſed to ingage. Thraſybulus in the mean while perſwaded the Army to recall Alcibiades. Audience being given him, after he had complained of the injuſtice of his Enemies, he diſcourſed much of the State of Affairs as they then ſtood; Magnified above meaſure his Power with Tiſſaphernes (which he did, both to diſcourage them at Athens, and to render the Satrapa the more odious to the Peloponneſians) who he ſaid would aſſiſt them to the ſelling of the bed he lay on. Hereupon the Soldiers mightily elevated with Hopes, preſently created him one of their Generals, with full power, thinking of nothing but the puniſhment of the four hundred, and reſolving without any regard of the Enemie at hand to ſail directly for the Piræus.

Recalleth Alcibiades.

71. Alcibiades withſtood their Reſolution, ſaying, that nothing was raſhly to be committed, and ſeeing that they had put the Power into his Hands he muſt go to Tiſſaphernes. This he did, not only to tranſact what he pretended, but alſo to boaſt of his new Power, to let the Perſian know he could either pleaſure him, or incommodate his Affairs, and ſo this crafty man procured, that he both made him fear the Athenians, and the Athenians ſtand in Awe of him, whilſt hereby he made up his own Intereſt. That alſo which he intended concerning Tiſſaphernes, and the Peloponneſians, came to paſs; for diſtruſting him before, they were now very bitter againſt him, ſince he hindred the Fight at Miletus, and defrauded them of their pay, and Aſtyochus their own General they had killed in a Mutiny, had he not taken Sanctuary. Preſently upon this came Mindarus, ſent from Sparta to ſucceed him, who then departed home with an Agent from Tiſſaphernes, whom he ſent to excuſe himſelf to that State, and anſwer ſuch Objections as were made againſt him. Alcibiades returned from Tiſſaphernes to Samus, where met him the Ambaſſadors of the four hundred men (who upon hearing how things went here, had all this while out of fear ſtaid at Delus.) The Soldiers would not hear them, and voted they ſhould be put to death; but he cauſed them to have leave to deliver their Meſſage, which they did with all the advantage they could, in excuſe of thoſe that ſent them, accuſing of falſhood what had been reported by Chareas; but ſtill the Army was diſſatisfied, and cried out to ſayl to the Piræus. Alcibiades now timely interpoſed himſelf; for, had the Army then departed for Athens, all Ionia, and the Helleſpont had been preſently loſt; but he put a ſtop to their heat, and checked thoſe that were ſo fierce againſt the Ambaſſadors. He himſelf bad them return this Anſwer, that the five thouſand might retain their Power, but the four hundred were commanded to deſiſt, and reſtore the Senate of five hundred whom they outed; that they ſhould do well at Athens to take care of the Commonwealth, and not to give place to the Enemy: for whilſt the City was ſafe,

The Ambaſſadors of the 400 come to Samus.

Alcibiades giveth them a croſs anſwer.

ſafe, he hoped to make up the breaches; but if either it ſhould be loſt, or the Army at Samus miſcarry, there would want thoſe who ſhould be reconciled to each other.

The Counſels of Tiſſaphernes in the dark.

How men in Athens ſtood affected to the four hundred.

72. With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the Meſſengers in ſafety, as he did alſo with much kindneſs Ambaſſadors ſent from Argos to offer aſſiſtance againſt the four hundred. Tiſſaphernes now upon what deſign is uncertain, went to Aſpendus where the Phœnician Fleet lay, pretending he would purge himſelf to the Lacedæmonians, and give order to Tamus his Officer to pay the Arrears due to the Army. But neither did he remove the Fleet from Aſpendus, according to agreement, pretending frivolous things, nor did Tamus accordingly pay the monies; which raiſed many conjectures and much diſcourſe. Thucydides thinketh his deſign to have been to hold the Græcians in ſuſpence, and ſuffer them to weaken one another, for that if he had joyned himſelf to either party, by the help of his Fleet he might in a ſhort time, and without difficulty have finiſhed the War, and given the victory to which ſide he pleaſed. Alcibiades went to him with thirteen ſhips, promiſing either to induce him to joyn his Fleet with the Athenians, or to procure that he ſhould not aſſiſt them of Peloponneſus; it being likely enough that he knew his intention of not moving to the one part or the other; but this he did, eſpecially by his entercourſe, and familiarity with him, to increaſe the indignation and choler of the Peloponneſians, and thereby to conſtrain him to joyn himſelf with the Athenians. But the return and report of the Ambaſſadors ſent from the four hundred men raiſed great perturbations in the minds of men at Athens, whilſt thoſe, who either out of ſome ambitious deſign (all men being greedy of power over others) or for the publick good, deſired that the Supreme Authority might be in the five thouſand, had the advantage of the other factions. The other were as buſie as concerned, eſpicially Phrynicus, becauſe ſo obnoxious to Alcibiades, Piſander, and others. They ſent to Lacedæmon to make peace with that State upon any terms, and Fortified that part of the Piræus, which commandeth the mouth of the Haven, which made the other party, which affected Democracy, very jealous; Theramenes crying out that they intended to betray the City to the Enemy, who now with fourty two Gallies hovered about the Coaſts.

The Traiterous deſigns of the four hundred.

Tumults at Athens.

73. Neither were theſe mere Calumnies; for theſe four hundred men for the moſt part deſired to retain the Dominion over both Citizens and Allies; but if not that, yet to continue Maſters of the Fleet and Fortifications, and if this could not be obtained, then to call in the Enemy, to redeem their lives, and part of the City, with the ſhips and works; being reſolved never to give way to the Popular Government, from which they could expect nothing but ſudden deſtruction. To this purpoſe they made the Wall upon the Piræus with ſeveral Gates to let in the Enemy if need were. But Phrynicus returning from Sparta whither he was ſent Ambaſſador (though to no purpoſe) was ſtabbed in the Forum by a conſpiracy, after which Theramenes and his party grew more bold, and by the help of the Soldiers ſeized upon ſome of the Chief of the four hundred, whence enſued a very great tumult, all being ready to fall one upon another, and certain miſchief had followed, but that the antient men ſomewhat repreſſed the younger, and Thucidides the Pharſalian, then ſojourning in the City, laboured earneſtly to perſwade them, crying out, that they ſhould not themſelves deſtroy their Country, now that the Enemy was ready to aſſail it, and with much ado he kept them from offering violence to one another. Theramenes alſo checked the Soldiers in the Haven; but he giving way to it, the new Fortifications there were demoliſhed. The next day the four hundred met, though in great fear, and ſent ſome of their number to appeaſe the Soldiers, ſaying, that they would chuſe five thouſand men, who from amongſt themſelves ſhould chuſe the number of four hundred by turns to rule the State, deſiring they would not undo the City by compelling it to yield to the Enemy. Herewith the minds of the Soldiers were ſomewhat quieted, and with much ado they agreed that a general Aſſembly ſhould be had at a certain day for an agreement: but when the day came, and the Aſſembly was ſcarce gathered together, news came that the fourty two ſhips, under Command of Hegeſandrides the Spartan, held their courſe directly from the Coaſt of Megara, to the Iſland Salamine.

74. The Soldiers now concluded of the certainty of what Theramenes had told them, and that theſe ſhips intending for the Piræus, it was good that the Fortifications were demoliſhed; and likely enough it was that Hegeſandrides hovering ſo long about Epidaurus, expected ſome good opportunity to fall on Athens. Hereupon all the Aſſembly haſted to the Piræus, but the Fleet making towards Eubœa at length came to Oropus, which making them very ſollicitous for Eubœa wherein their hope only remained, they ſent Thymochares with ſome ſhips to Eretria, which he joyning to thoſe that were in the Iſland, made up thirty ſix ſail. He was forced to fight ſooner than he intended, by the fraud of the Eretrians, who delayed to bring victuals to ſell as they were wont, and thereby drew the Soldiers further off from the Fleet, and made great diſorder; ſo that the Peloponneſians ſetting upon them, whilſt out of good order, quickly put them to flight. They took twenty two ſhips, killing ſome, and taking the reſt of the men: ſuch as fled to Land, and betook themſelves to Eretria as to friends, were killed by the Inhabitants; then preſently all Eubœa, except Oreus, revolted to the Peloponneſians. When tidings hereof came to Athens, never did ſo great conſternation ſeize upon them there, no not after the overthrow of Sicily. For the Army at Samus diſſented from the City; they had neither ſhips left, nor men to ſerve in them, and were broken into factions, of which they could not foreſee the event; and the loſs of Eubœa was exceeding great, becauſe that Iſland furniſhed the City with more Commodities than Attica it ſelf. And their fear was increaſed by the nearneſs of it, from which the Enemy might preſently come and ſeize upon the Piræus now deſtitute of ſhips, which they did not only think would be, but imagined to be already done.

The Athenians defeated are ſeized with great conſternation.

75. And had the Enemy been a little bolder, he might eaſily have done this, and more. Had he beſieged the City, it would have been more grievouſly broken by ſeditions, and conſtrained to call home the Army at Samus; and thereby he might have reduced with eaſe Ionia, the Helleſpont, all the Iſlands, and all as far as Eubœa; and ſo conſequently all the Athenian Dominion into his power. But well was it for the Athenians that they had ſuch an Enemy to deal with as the Spartans, who were of ſo contrary diſpoſitions: they being ſpeedy and bold in executing all their deſigns; but theſe ſlow, and ſomething fearful, eſpecially in Sea-matters, whereby they afforded many opportunities to the Athenians. Theſe things are confirmed from inſtance in the Syracuſians, who being of the ſame nature as the Athenians, were good enough for them at all aſſays. The Athenians in the midſt of all their fears took yet all care poſſible for their Affairs, furniſhing out twenty ſhips, and meeting together in Pnice, the uſual place for popular Aſſemblies, they abrogated the power of the four hundred, and gave it to five thouſand, amongſt whom ſome were to furniſh the Commonwealth with Arms, ordering that none ſhould receive any wages for his imployment. Many other meetings then ſucceeded, in which certain Law-makers were choſen, and other things decreed for the good of the State, at which time Thucydides thinketh the Athenian Commonwealth to have been better than ever tempered and qualified, a moderate, and equal way being brought in betwixt the power of a few, and that of the whole people. A decree alſo paſſed for the reſtitution of Alcibiades, and thoſe with him. Upon this change Piſander and the reſt that adhered to Oligarchy fled to the Enemy.

The contrary diſpoſitions of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians.

The power of the four hundred abrogated, and the Government moſt equally poiſed.

76. In the mean while the Peloponneſian Fleet lying at Miletus, in vain expected money from Tiſſaphernes, and the coming of the Phœnician Fleet: on the other ſide Pharnabazus, Lieutenant to the King upon the Helleſpont, promiſed them all kindneſs, and in particular uſed his endeavour to draw all the Greek Cities within his Government from the ſociety of the Athenians, which Tiſſaphernes alſo had promiſed, but performed like other things. Mindarus the General of the Fleet moved herewith, went from Miletus towards the Helleſpont, with a Fleet of ſeventy three ſhips, which Thraſyllus the Athenian underſtanding, made after him with fifty five ſayl, labouring to get before him. Some ſtop was made by the way, but nothing very conſiderable done till they came towards an ingagement at Gnoſema. Sixteen Gallies of Athens were firſt met with by the Peloponneſians, who took three of them, and burnt another; and at length both the Fleets joyned battel, being inlarged ſince they came into the Helleſpont by the acceſs of other ſhips. At firſt the Peloponneſians put to flight the middle battel of the Athenians, and driving the ſhips to Land had the better of it there; but being too eager in the purſuite, they brake their ranks, which Thraſybulus and thoſe with him obſerving in his wing, wound about and fell upon them with ſuch violence, as forced them to flie. They took twenty one ſhips, the reſt by reaſon of the ſtraightneſs of the Sea getting into ſome Harbour or other, and though they loſt fifteen of their own, yet obtained they a ſeaſonable Victory, which made them lift up their heads (having been dejected by ſo many diſaſters) and ceaſe to complain of their Fortune.

The Athenians obtained a Victory at Sea.

77. The report of it at Athens, as of an unexpected thing, mightily incouraged the people alſo, ſo that notwithſtanding the revolt of Eubœa, and inteſtine Seditions, they had hopes ſtill, if they proſecuted the War with diligence, to have the better. Four days after the Fleet removed from Seſtus towards Cyzicus, where in their way they took eight Gallies that came from Byzantium, and taking the Town, which then for want of walls could make no reſiſtance, fined the Inhabitants; the Peloponneſians at the ſame time endeavouring to recruit their Navy. In the mean while Alcibiades having been with Tiſſaphernes returned to Samus with thirteen Gallies, bringing word, that he had ſtopped the Phœnician Fleet from joyning with the Peloponneſians, and had rendred the Satrapa more friendly towards the Athenians. Then preſently adding nine ſhips to the former, he conſtrained the Halicarnaſſeans to pay a great ſumm of money, and fortified Cos. Tiſſaphernes, when he heard that the Peloponneſian Fleet was gone towards the Helleſpont, haſted from Aſpendus into Ionia, where underſtanding that the Inhabitants of Antandrus had received a Garriſon from the Peloponneſians of Abydus, becauſe they had been ill dealt withal by Aſtachus, whom he had made his Lieutenant in thoſe parts, as alſo that the Peloponneſians had caſt his Garriſon out of Miletus, and Cnidus (which they did to affront him, laying grievous matters to his charge) leſt they ſhould proceed any further, and grieving that Pharnabazus in a leſs time, and with leſs expence, ſhould make more uſe of them againſt the Athenians, he determined to follow them into the Helleſpont, to expoſtulate with them about Antandrus, and purge himſelf as well as he could of thoſe things laid to his charge about the Phœnician Fleet, and other matters. And when he came to Epheſus he ſacrificed to Diana. Here the hiſtory of Thucydides (a) endeth (with the Summer of the twenty firſt year of the War) which afterwards was continued by Theopompus for ſeventeen years; but by Xenophon for twenty eight. The work of the former is loſt; and that of the latter extant, but without a beginning, in the judgment of a learned man, who, beſides the proeme, will have the hiſtory of two years to be wanting; from the end of that Summer at which Thucydides left, to the concluſion of the Summer of the twenty third year of the War. But Diodorus placing the laſt things of Thucydides in the ſecond year of the ninty ſecond Olympiad, in the very next relateth thoſe which are mentioned in the beginning of the firſt Book of Xenophon, ſo that if the whole was extant in his time, he either miſſed theſe two years, and ſo inverted the Chronology of all his hiſtory ſucceeding; or elſe only the proeme of the firſt Book of Xenophon is loſt (if there was any) and the hiſtory entire.

(a) Diodorus ad Olymp. 91. ann. 2.

(b) *Uſſerius in Annal. Vet. Teſt. pag.*216.

Xenoph. Hellanic. l. 1.

78. Not long after the Athenians and Lacedæmonians engaged thrice in fight at Sea, wherein the Athenians had the better firſt and laſt, the ſecond having been fought to no great purpoſe on either ſide. Tiſſaphernes, after this coming to the Helleſpont, Alcibiades went to viſit him, whom he ſecured, and committed to cloſe cuſtody, pretending he had orders from his Maſter to make War againſt the Athenians; but rather for that he feared he ſhould be accuſed by the Peloponneſians to the King, and therefore thought by this enterprize to redeem his credit. But after he had been ſecured thirty days, he made his eſcape to Clazomenæ, where pretending to have been ſent by Tiſſaphernes, he ſayled thence to the Athenian Army lying at Cardia. Sailing thence to the Helleſpont or Cyzicus, he overthrew Mindarus both at Sea and Land, who died alſo in the fight, taking all the Peloponneſian ſhips, after which he forced from the Town a great ſum of money, and proſecuted the Victory by fining and ſecuring other places. In the mean while letters were intercepted, and ſent to Athens, which were to Sparta, written from Hippocrates Lieutenant to Mindarus, and found to contain the diſtreſs of the Fleet in theſe few words, according to the Lacedæmonian cuſtom: All is loſt; Mindarus is ſlain, the Soldiers are famiſhed: we know not what to do. But Pharnabazus laboured with all his might to encourage the Lacedæmonian Army, telling them they had loſt nothing but wooden ſhips, their men being ſaved, and that new ones ſhould be built at his Maſters coſt (who had wood enough at the Mount Ida) in which work he was very diligent, and relieved the Chalcedonians then diſtreſſed.

Tiſſaphernes ſecureth Alcibiades.

Alcibiades overthroweth Mindarus the Spartan.

A. M. 3594.
Ol. 92. an. 2.
V. C. 343.
Darii Nothi 13. Belli Pelop. 21.

79. The news of the ſucceſs with the letter of Hippocrates coming to Athens, filled the people with exceſſive joy, who offered ſacrifice to their gods, and kept holy day. They choſe then one thouſand of the moſt valiant Foot, and one hundred Horſe for proſecuting the War, and ſent thirty Gallies more to Alcibiades, that he might with greater ſucceſs ſet upon the allies of Sparta now the Sea was in his power.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 92. an. 3.

Sect. 3.

The Lacedæmonians ſend to Athens about Peace.

The Lacedæmonians when they underſtood how things went, diſpatched away Ambaſſadors (the chief of which was Endius, unto Athens) about a Peace. They offered that both States might retain ſuch places as they had already in their Power, that the Garriſons might be diſmiſſed on both ſides, and the Priſoners redeemed man for man; and much in a little was ſaid by Endius, to ſhew that the Athenians were more concerned to be for Peace, though he denied not but that the War was hurtful to Sparta. The moſt moderate men amongſt the Athenians were willing to hear of an accommodation; but ſuch as made their own Markets out of the publick loſs, and gained by the War, withſtood the propoſition. Amongſt theſe as principal was Cleophon, the moſt eminent of the Damagogi (or leaders of the People) at this time, though formerly a maker of Harps, whom many remembred to have been bound with Fetters, but he was ſurreptitiouſly regiſtred amongſt the Citizens. He ſpeaking many things fit for his purpoſe, eſpecially made uſe of the late ſucceſs; which he ſo improved, as if Fortune now had forgot to be inconſtant. The People herewith puffed up, and conceiving great hopes that by the conduct of Alcibiades they ſhould re-obtain their antient Power, refuſed to entertain the Propoſals made by Endius; of which ill advice they were afterwards ſenſible, when it was too late, falling ſo low from this height of Preſumption, that they could never after recover themſelves.

Cleophon hindereth it.

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. 1.

Agis repulſed from Athens.

80. After this, Agis the Spartan King made excurſions from Decelea, as far as the Walls of Athens, at which time it hapned that Thraſybulus was in the City about buſineſs, who leading out his Athenian Soldiers and others that were preſent, offered him Battel; at which he was troubled, and haſted away, loſing a few of his men in ſome light Skirmiſhes. This ſervice got Thraſybulus ſuch credit, that he eaſily obtained what he came for; one thouſand Foot of heavy Armour which he himſelf would pick out, one hundred Horſe, and fifty Gallies, being decreed to him; but Agis ſeeing that it was to no purpoſe to beſiege Athens by Land, as long as they could bring in what Proviſion they pleaſed at the Piræus, ſent away Cleurobus the Son of Ramphius to Byzantium and Chalcedon, to make proviſion for Sea matters, who got through the Helleſpont with much adoe, and with the loſs of three Ships out of his fifteen he had with him, came to Byzantium.

The acts of Thraſybulus the Athenian.

81. The next Year in which the ninty third Olympiad was ſolemnized, wherein Eubotas the Cyrenæan got the Prize in the Courſe, Euarchippus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Euclemon Archon at Athens, Thraſybulus having obtained the Ships decreed to him, with five thouſand Sea-men, ſailed to Samus, whence after three days he departed, and took Colophon, made excurſions into Lydia, where obtaining much booty, he alſo went againſt Epheſus. Tiſſaphernes coming in in good time, he was beaten back from the City with double loſs, whence he ſailed to the Helleſpont, and in his way at Leſbus put to flight a Fleet of twenty five Syracuſian Ships, four whereof he took with the men in them. Then departed he to Seſtus to the other Athenian Forces, and thence removed to Lampſacus with the whole Army in the beginning of Winter, which Town they fortified, and beſieging Abydus overthrew Pharnabazus, who came with a conſiderable Body of Horſe to relieve the Town; which Victory reconciled the Soldiers, who before this were at odds, becauſe thoſe under Alcibiades being hitherto Victorious, would not be joyned with the followers of Thraſybulus who had been beaten. In the ſame Winter the Athenians made frequent depredations in the Territories of the Perſian King. Then alſo the Helots which had fled from Malea to Coriphaſium, were upon agreement diſmiſſed by the Lacedæmonians; and the Plantation of Heraclea, and Trachinia, were by the Acheans the ancient Inhabitants, betrayed into the hands of the Oeteans the common Enemy, and ſeven hundred of them ſlain, together with Labotas the Lacedæmonian Governour. Thus the twenty fourth Year of the War ended, wherein the Medes having rebelled, were reduced to Obedience by Darius Nothus, and the Temple of Pallas at Phocæa was burnt with Thunder and Lightning.

Alcibiades beſiegeth Chalcedon.

82. In the beginning of the next Spring Pantacles being Ephorus at Sparta, and Antigones Archon at Athens, the Athenians with their whole Army and Fleet went into Proconneſus; thence to Chalcedon and Byzantium, and ſate down before Chalcedon. The Chalcedonians aware of their coming, ſent all their Booty to the Bythinæans their Neighbours, which being known to Alcibiades, he went with a ſufficient Force, and by Threats got it delivered up to him, after which returning he compaſſed Chalcedon from Sea to Sea with a Rampire, and to the River, ver. Hippocrates the Lacedæmonian, Governour of the Town, troubled hereat, ſallied out, and fought with that party that was under Thraſyllus, for a long time with ambiguous Fortune, till Alcibiades coming in, Hippocrates was ſlain, and his men repulſed into the Town. Pharnabazus during the Fight came to relieve him, but could not get to them by reaſon of the Athenian Fortifications. He, whilſt Alcibiades was abſent, gathering Money from the Cities, made an agreement with the other Athenian Captains, that he ſhould pay them twenty Talents, that the Chalcedonians ſhould pay all their Arrears, and afterwards as much as they were wont: in the mean time the Athenians ſhould offer them no Violence, till the Athenian Ambaſſadors, which he took upon him to convey, ſhould return from the King. Alcibiades at this time was at Selymbria, which having taken, he returned to Byzantium with a body of Horſe and Foot newly raiſed in Cherroneſus and Thrace, where Pharnabazus expecting him to have his Oath to the agreement. He refuſed to take his Oath except Pharnabazus did the like, who condeſcended to him, and ſo they both ſwore not to hurt each other. Together with the Athenians, others went as Ambaſſadors to the King from the Lacedæmonians; as alſo Hermocrates and his Brother Proxemus now baniſhed from Syracuſe.

83. The Athenians then preſently beſieged Byzantium, which having no hopes to obtain by ſtrong hand, they attempted by Treachery, and had it delivered up to them, whilſt Clearchus the Governour, a Lacedæmonian, was gone to Pharnabazus to ſollicite him about Money to pay the Soldiers, and to gather a Fleet together wherewith if poſſible he might raiſe the Siege. News hereof was carried to Pharnabazus then wintring at Gordium in Phrygia with the Ambaſſadors whom he was carrying to the King. In the beginning of Spring when they were on their Journey, they met with ſome Spartans, who already had been with him, and ſaid they had obtained from him for the Lacedæmonians what they deſired, and how he had appointed his younger Son Cyrus his Lieutenant for the Sea-coaſts, whom he had commanded alſo to aſſiſt the Spartans in the War, bringing a Commiſſion with him whereby he was conſtituted Governour over all that uſed to meet upon the Plains of Caſtolus. The Athenian Ambaſſadors hearing this, deſired firſt to ſee Cyrus, and then to go to the King; but if not, to return home. But Cyrus required Pharnabazus, either to deliver them up into his Hands, or to ſend them back, becauſe he would not have the Athenians privy to what was done. But he neither ſent them to the King, nor diſmiſſed them, but kept them off and on for three Years, after which he obtained leave of Cyrus to diſmiſs them, ſeeing he would not permit them to go to his Father, and ſo procured them by Ariobarzanes to be conveyed through Myſia to Sea: and ſo they ſayled to the Athenian Army.

The Athenian Ambſſadors and others ſent to the Perſian King never come at him.

Xenoph. ibid. Plutarch. in Alcibiade.

84. Alcibiades having a great deſire to return to Athens with the Army, firſt betook himſelf to Samus, whence he went and gathered up one hundred Talents amongſt the Carians, and returned thither. Thraſybulus with thirty Ships going into Thrace, reduced ſeveral places into his Power, and Thaſus amongſt the reſt, ſorely at this time diſtreſſed with Seditions, Famine, and Peſtilence. Thraſybulus with the reſt of the Army ſailed to Athens, before whoſe coming the People had created anew three Generals, Alcibiades, and Thraſybulus, who were abſent, and Conon preſent in the City. Alcibiades encouraged hereby ſailed to the City, where at his landing multitudes of People came to meet him, admiring his perſon, and the preſent poſture of Affairs, which they aſcribed to his good conduct, whom they now acquitted from what was laid formerly to his Charge, and excuſed him for ſiding with the Enemy, ſeeing he was thereunto led by neceſſity. He ſpoke to the Senate and People in his own defence, and gave ſuch ſatisfaction, no body oppoſing, that he was created General with full Power, as able to reſtore the Commonwealth by his own Induſtry to its antient Power. He firſt on Land (which of late had not uſed to be done for fear of the Enemy) celebrated the Eleuſinia, and then in the third Moneth after his Arrival, with a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, aboard of which were one thouſand and one hundred Foot of heavy Armour, and one hundred and fifty Horſe, he ſailed to Andrus, the Inhabitants of which he worſted in Fight, and thence departed to Samus, intending to make uſe of that Iſland as the Seat of War. At this time Liſander was ſent from Sparta to ſucceed Cratiſippidas in the Fleet, who went to Cyrus to deſire him in earneſt to undertake the War, blaming the backwardneſs of Tiſſaphernes. Cyrus promiſed him his utmoſt aſſiſtance; but he deſired that the Saylers might have a Drachm a day aſſigned as their Wages, thereby to entice the Athenian Mariners to forſake Alcibiades returneth to Athens.

Lyſander made Admiral by the Lacedæmonians, obtaineth pay of Cyrus for his Seamen.

ſake their Maſters. He anſwered, he could do nothing againſt his Fathers Order, who had appointed for every Ship thirty Minæ a Moneth, it being in the power of the Lacedæmonians to furniſh out as few, or as many Ships as they pleaſed; but afterwards he condeſcended to increaſe their pay to four Oboli a day: Moreover, he paid them all their Arrears, and gave them a Moneths Pay before-hand, which made them very chearful, and ready for all Duty.

Who refuſeth to meddle with the Athenians.

Alcibiades going to ſpeak with Thraſybulus, leaveth his Fleet with his Pilot, who fighting with Lyſander, contrary to his expreſs command, is defeated & ſlain.

For which Alcibiades is diſcarded.

85. The Athenians were much troubled hereat, and ſent alſo to Cyrus to obtain his Favour, but could not be admitted, though Tiſſaphernes uſed all his intereſt in their behalf, relating, that his deſign had been according to the wiſe Counſel of Alcibiades, not to promote the Affairs of either, but to ſuffer them to deſtroy one another. Alcibiades underſtanding that Thraſybulus being gone from the Helleſpont fortified Phocæa, went thither to ſpeak with him, leaving the Fleet with Antiochus his Pilot, whom he commanded expreſly not to Fight, no, not although he were provoked to it, untill his return. But he being not at all uſed to command any thing except the Helm of a Ship, could not bear his new Power without making trial of it, and with two Gallies went, and provoked Lyſander in the Haven of Epheſus (where he was intent upon mending his Fleet conſiſting of ninty Sayl) who firſt ſent out ſome particular Ships againſt him; but the whole Athenian Fleet coming in to his Aid, he was alſo forced to carry out his, and ſo ingaging with it, there enſued a ſharp Conflict upon uneven Terms. For, the Athenians came on without order, and ſo within a ſhort time were diſcomfited, Antiochus ſlain, and fifteen Ships loſt; the other returning back to Samus. Alcibiades returning within a while, in great chaſe for what had happned, went, and offered Battel again to Lyſander, but he contenting himſelf with his former Victory would not ſtir, and not long after the Lacedæmonians took Delphinium and Eion, two Towns in Thrace. This loſs was at Athens by Thraſybulus imputed to the neglect, and luxury of Alcibiades, who thereupon by the people was outed of his Command, and ten other Captains choſen for the management of the War, amongſt whom was Thraſybulus himſelf, Conon, and Pericles the Son of Pericles the great. He then went and made War upon the Thracians that were not under the Command of that King, and thereby enriched himſelf with great Treaſure, having built a Caſtle for his ſecurity, called Biſanthe, in thoſe parts. Conon who at this time was governour of Antandrus, Phaniſthanes being aſſigned his Succeſſor, according to the decree of the People, went to Samus, took Thuria, and made excurſions into the Territories of the Enemy. So this Year ended, in which the Carthaginians with a Fleet of one hundred and twenty Gallies, and one hundred and twenty thouſand men invading Sicily, overthrew the Agrigentines, whom after a ſeven Moneth's Siege they alſo forced to a ſurrender.

An Eclypſe of the Moon.

Callicratidas ſucceeding Lyſander defeateth, and beſiegeth Conon in Mitylene.

The Athenian Generals overthrew Callicratidas.

86. The Year following wherein the Moon was Eclypſed in an Evening (April the twenty fifth, ſome three hours after Sun-ſet, as the Aſtronomical Table demonſtrates) and the old Temple of Pallas was burnt at Athens, Pitæus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Callias Archon at Athens, the twenty ſixth Year of the War commencing, Callicratidas was ſent from Lacedæmon as Succeſſor to Lyſander, whoſe time was now expired. He having furniſhed himſelf with Money ſubdued Methymna, and charged Conon the Athenian General to depart out of thoſe Coaſts, and when he perceived him putting out to Sea, made after him, intending to ſtop his Paſſage to Samus. He purſued him to the Haven of Mitylene, where he worſted him, took thirty of his Ships, and then beſieged him in the Town, from which he cut off all Proviſions. Conon ſent out two Gallies to carry word hereof at Athens; one of which eſcaping clear from the Enemy, came thither with the News, whereupon relief was preſently decreed to be ſent. Callicratidas in the mean time overthrew Diomedon, who came to relieve Conon with twelve Ships, ten whereof he took, but when he heard that the Athenian Fleet was now come to Samus, conſiſting in all of one hundred and fifty Sayl, he left Eteonicus with fifty Ships to continue the Siege, and with the other one hundred and twenty betook himſelf to Malea, a Promontory of Lesbus over againſt Mitylene, where he ſupped, and it hapned that the Athenian Fleet coming to Arginuſæ (a place alſo over againſt Lesbus) ſupped there the ſame Night. Here they fought the next Morning a long, and earneſt Battel, wherein at length Callicratidas his Ship being Sunk, and he in it, his men began to flie towards Chius and Phocæa. The Peloponneſians loſt ſeventy nine Ships, and the Athenians ninteen, with moſt of the men in them.

87. The Athenian Generals reſolved that Theramenes, Thraſybulus, and others, with

And for that 8 are rewarded with a ſentence of death executed upon ſix of them there preſent, amongſt whom Pericles the ſon of Pericles.

with fourty two Ships, ſhould haſten to ſuch Veſſels as were as good as loſt, to preſerve them and the men, and the reſt ſhould ſayl to Mitylene againſt Eteonicus; but a vehement Tempeſt ariſing they were all hindred, and forced to continue in the ſame place, during which ſtay, Eteonicus having notice by a Pinnace how things went, told his men the clear contrary, with which artifice incouraging them to take the Sea, he eſcaped. It might have been expected that the ten Captains, who joyntly had the Command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, might have received great Honour for ſuch a Victory: But they were inſtead hereof, by the eſpecial endeavour of Theramenes, brought to Judgment, for ſuffering many Citizens to periſh in the broken, and ſunken Ships; whereas, as it was pretended, they might have ſaved them. They alleged juſtly for their excuſe the Tempeſt which followed the Fight; but after much canvaſing, both in the Senate and Aſſembly of the People, the Malice of Theramenes (who ſet perſons on to make great Lamentations for thoſe that were dead) ſo far prevailed, together with the forgery of a certain fellow (who ſaying that he himſelf eſcaping in a Meal-Tub, had been intreated by thoſe that were in peril of drowning, to deſire the people to revenge their death againſt the Captains) that againſt the form of Law (contrary to which Socrates the Philoſopher only refuſed to act as one of the Prytanes) eight of them were condemned, and ſix being preſent were put to death; amongſt whom was Pericles the Son of Pericles. Thoſe that were abſent eſcaped, the heady multitude quickly repenting of their raſhneſs, and the accuſers of them were bound over to anſwer what they had done. Afterwards a Sedition being raiſed, wherein Cleophon was ſlain, they took the opportunity and fled; but Callixenus one of the moſt faulty returning to the City, and hated of all men, was famiſhed to death.

Xenoph lib. 2.

88. The Soldiers of Eteonicus wintring in the Iſland Chius, where they wanted both Victuals and Clothes, moſt of them conſpired together to ſeize upon the City Chius, to which whoſoever agreed was to wear a Reed as a diſtinction. He having notice of it, was ſenſible what ill will, diſgrace, and damage it would bring upon him if it proceeded, and fearing his own Life, he boldly killed one of the Soldiers, whom he met with the Reed upon him, and being asked the reaſon of it, ſaid as boldly, it was for wearing that mark of Sedition, whereat the reſt were ſo daunted that they for fear caſt away their Reeds, and ſo the Plot was broken in pieces: Then received he Money of the Chians, and gave them a Moneths Pay, and taking no further notice of the Plot, encouraged them with fair Words, and promiſes, and ſo ſayled away. After this the Allies met together at Epheſus to conſult about their Affairs, where it was agreed, that ten men ſhould be ſent to Lacedæmon to deſire that Lyſander might be ſent back to the Fleet, of whoſe abilities they had already ſufficient proof. By the Laws of Sparta he could not be twice General, and therefore they found out a middle way, to appoint Aracus to that place, and ſend him as his Lieutenant. Five and twenty Ships were then delivered to Lyſander, at the end of the twenty ſixth Year of the War, wherein Cyrus killed his two Couſins Autobæſaces and Mitreus, becauſe they had not given him the Honour due to Kings of Perſia, by holding their Hands within their Clothes when they came to him. For this he was accuſed to his Father, who upon pretence of Sickneſs ſent for him to come to him.

Lyſander is ſent for by the Allies to reſume the Government of the Fleet.

Idem ibid: Corn. Nepos & in Plutarch. in Lyſand. & in Alcibiad.

89. The Year following wherein Archytas was Ephorus at Sparta, and Alexias Archon at Athens, Lyſander gathering his Navy together, went to Cyrus for Money, which being obtained with ſome difficulty, he paid his Soldiers and Seamen their Arrears. At Samus alſo the Athenians provided for fighting; where in the mean time came a Meſſage to Cyrus from his Father, who now being ſick deſired to ſee him, although at this time the King lay incamped againſt the Thamneri of Media, Neighbours to the Caduſians, who had revolted. Cyrus hereupon ſent for Lyſander, and conſulting with him about the War, deſired him not to Fight the Athenians, except he overmatcht them in number of men, told him his Father and he were able enough to encreaſe the Fleet upon occaſion, and to bind him and the State of Sparta to him, he gave him all the Revenues he had in thoſe parts, with all the ready Money, and ſo took his Journey. Lyſander neither daring to Fight the Enemy with ſo few Ships, nor to be idle with ſo many, ſubdued ſome places, and having given Agis a Viſit in Attica, ſayled unto the Helleſpont, which finding clear, he beſieged Lampſacus, and took it. The Athenian Fleet, which conſiſted of one hundred and eighty Gallies, hearing of this, came from the Cherroneſus to Seſtus, and thence ſayled to Ægoſpotamos,

Sect. 3.

The Athenian Fleet quite defeated at Ægoſpotamos by Lyſander.

a River over againſt Lampſacus, the Helleſpont at this place being not two miles broad. Lyſander contained his men in great order, and refuſed to fight without an advantage, which was at length given him by the Athenians, who braved him, but were in continual diſorder, careleſly running up and down, inſomuch that Alcibiades having notice of it, came and adviſed the Captains to look better to themſelves, but returned with no other recompence than bad words. But Lyſander keeping diligent watch upon them, obſerved his time when they were moſt of them landed, ſome eating and drinking, others looking for victuals, and others wandring up and down, and ſetting upon the Fleet eaſily became Maſter of it all without any oppoſition, except eight, wherewith Conon fled into Cyprus unto Evagoras the King, knowing how bad entertainment he ſhould have at home.

A conſultation what is to be done with the priſoners.

All of them put to death except Adimantus.

90. Such Athenians as had confuſedly got into their ſhips were ſlain or taken, and thoſe that were yet on Land by the Land Forces, which Lyſander had in a readineſs for that purpoſe. He took three thouſand men, with the Captains and all the ſhips, except thoſe eight of Conon, and a Packet-Boat, which tacking to his own ſhips, with the ſound of Pipes and the Pæan ſung, he returned in triumph unto Lampſacus. Then called he the allies together to conſider what was to be done with the priſoners. Many crimes were objected againſt them, as that they had done many unjuſt things, and now had determined, it they had got the Victory, to cut off the right hands of the Peloponneſians (or the thumbs rather, as Plutarch hath it, of their right hands, that they might never be able more to handle ſpears, but row with Oares) and having taken the two Gallies of Andrus and Corinth to caſt headlong all the men into the Sea, the perſwader to this being Philocles. Hereupon it was reſolved, that they ſhould all be put to death, except Adimantus who had withſtood the Decree of cutting off the hands, which ſentence was accordingly executed. Lyſander then ſailing about to the Cities under the Athenian power, diſmiſſed the Garriſon Soldiers and all others he found, with charge to get them to Athens under pain of death, which crafty policy he uſed to fill the City with men, that it might not be able long to endure a Siege for want of Victuals. When they of the City heard the news, they were affected accordingly, bewailing not only the fortune of the ſlain, but their own alſo, expecting now that ſhould be done to themſelves, which heretofore they had done to the Melians, a Colony of Sparta, and to the Hiſtiæans, Scionæans, Toronæans, Æginetans, and many other Greek Cities, not in way of revenge for any injury, but out of indulgence to their own luſt; for that they rejoyced in other mens miſeries. Yet as grief would give way to prudence, they took care for fortifying the City againſt a Siege, in which they could not look for any aſſiſtance from elſewhere, all their Confederates, except the Samians, having forſaken them, and ſuch as they had baniſhed from their dwellings being again reſtored to thoſe places which they had filled with Colonies of their own.

Lyſander beſiegeth Athens both by Sea and Land.

91. Lyſander having taken away Democracy, brought in the power of a few into all the Cities. Herein he dealt with much cruelty and ambition, (putting in ſuch men only as were his creatures, that he might obtain an unlimited power or Tyranny over all Greece) and ſending for Land Forces from Sparta, he beſieged Athens both by Sea and Land. The Athenians continued ſo reſolute for a long time, that till many were already dead of famine, not a word was heard of asking Peace. Then Ambaſſadors were ſent to Agis the Spartan King about it, who referred them to Sparta, having as he ſaid no commiſſion to entertain their overtures. Thither then they went, offering, that they might gain the friendſhip of Lacedæmon, to part with all places beſides the City and Piræus, where they would retain the Fortifications; but they had for anſwer, that if they ſeriouſly deſired peace, they muſt return home, and not return till they had better adviſed of the matter. Hereat the Athenians were much abaſhed, thinking now of nothing but ſervitude; none daring to propoſe the demoliſhing of the walls; for the Lacedæmonians having offered them Peace upon theſe terms, Archeſtratus for adviſing them to imbrace it, was impriſoned, and it was decreed that it ſhould be unlawful to mention it for the time to come. Theramenes then procured to be ſent to Lyſander to get out what his intention was, whether to enſlave them, or to have the walls demoliſhed, and thence he returned not till the fourth moneth, that in this time they might be coſtrained to reſolve of ſomething. At his return, he ſaid he could get no other anſwer, but that they muſt ſend again to Sparta, and thereby he procured himſelf and others to be ſent with full authority for concluding a Peace.

92. The Ambaſſadors of the Confederates being aſſembled at Sparta, many of them, eſpecially the Corinthians and Thebans, urged that no compoſition was to be made with them, but that Athens ſhould be deſtroyed; but the Spartans would not give way to it, ſaying, it was not their intention to deſtroy a City, which in the greateſt dangers of Greece had done the greateſt things for it's deliverance. They then without much delay made peace with them upon theſe terms: That the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus ſhould be demoliſhed; that they ſhould deliver up all their ſhips except twelve, receive their exiles, follow the Lacedæmonians both by Sea and Land in the Wars, and have the ſame Friends and Enemies with them. Some at the return of the Ambaſſadors would have refuſed theſe terms; but the far major part ſiding with Theramenes accepted of them. Lyſander then ſeized upon the ſhips, and the walls, upon the ſixteenth day of the moneth Munichion (on which they had formerly overthrown the Perſians at Salamine) and went about to alter the Government, which the People ſtrongly reſiſted, inſomuch that he ſent back to Sparta to complain of them, ſaying, they had broken the League, in that their walls were not demoliſhed; and though no worſe thing was yet decreed againſt them though preſſed by ſome, yet this made them willing to receive any thing. Then ſent he for all the Pipers out of the City, to whom joyning thoſe in his own Camp, at the noiſe of their inſtruments he cauſed the walls to be demoliſhed, and the Gallies to be burnt, the Confederates making great ſolemnity, as if that day gave beginning to the liberty of Greece. Herewith, the twenty ſeventh year, and the War it ſelf ended, which being carried on for ſo long a time with moſt various fortune, dubious and inconſtant events, with infinite charges, all ſorts of conteſts, and the ruine of ſo many Captains, as had not periſhed in all the Wars of Greece beſides, was finiſhed by the politick induſtry of one man, whom ſome thought thereupon they could not ſufficiently admire, in the ſeven hundred and eightieth year after the end of that of Troy, in the fourth of the ninety third Olympiad, the nineteenth of Darius Nothus (who died preſently after the concluſion of the Peace) A. M. 3600.

Which yieldeth.

The walls demoliſhed, and the Gallies burnt.

A. M. 3600.
Ol. 93. an. 4.
V. C. 349.
Darii Nothi 19.
Belli Pelop. 27.

SECT. IIII.

From the end of the Peloponneſian War to the beginning of the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia.

Containing the ſpace of fourty four Years.

1. THe year following being that wherein the ninty fourth Olympiad was celebrated, in the courſe of which Crocinas the Theſſalian got the prize, Endicus was Ephorus at Sparta, and Pythadorus Archon at Athens, whom yet the Athenians did not ſo account, becauſe that the Oligarchy being brought in this year, they eſteemed it as Anarchical. As ſoon as the long walls and the Piræus were demoliſhed by the command of Lyſander, thirty men were choſen to make Laws, by which the Commonwealth might be governed. After their creation and inveſtiture in the power, they deferred both to publiſh or write the Laws; but conſtituted the Senate and other Magiſtrates at their pleaſure. Then, firſt, they laid hold of all ſuch as had under the Democracy lived by informing, and falſe accuſing of others, which was not diſpleaſing to honeſt men. So that thoſe being condemned by the Senate, they were put to death. But afterwards they began ſeriouſly to lay their heads together, how they might make themſelves Maſters of all. They ſent Æſchines and Ariſtotle two of their company to Sparta to deſire a Garriſon for the better government of the City, till they had taken out of the way all naughty perſons, and had ſetled the Commonwealth, promiſing themſelves to pay the Soldiers. Lyſander being made uſe of procured what they deſired, and Callibius was ſent as Harmoſtes

Xenoph. ut prius.

The thirty Tyrants at Athens.

Sect. 4.

unto Athens, whom they ſo flattered, that they brought him to conſent to whatſoever they ſhould act. Now then they fell upon, not only naughty and diſſolute perſons, but on the beſt, whoſoever they thought ill affected, and would indeavour to ſtop their proceedings. Theramenes one of them proteſted againſt this cruelty, and added, that it was impoſſible their power ſhould continue in that State without a ſufficient company to aſſiſt them. Hereupon they fearing him, leſt he ſhould make himſelf Captain of the diſcontented, which was almoſt the whole City, choſe out of the Citizens three thouſand which they thought meeteſt for their purpoſe, and gave them ſome part of the power, with this priviledge, that none of them ſhould be put to death without the conſent of the Senate; all the reſt of the People being left to the diſcretion of the thirty, whom they alſo diſarmed at a general muſter.

Fill all places with murders and rapine.

2. Now thinking themſelves ſecure enough, they filled all places with murders, not only of their private Enemies, but ſuch whoſe wealth might enrich them, of which they were exceſſive greedy; and to this purpoſe they agreed, that every one ſhould name one man whom he would put to death for to ſeize upon his goods. Theramenes having diſliked the election of the three thouſand, uttered now alſo his deteſtation of this wickedneſs, refuſing himſelf to commit it. For this they were more jealous of him, fearing he might croſs their abhominable practices, and reſolved upon his deſtruction; ſo that having provided a company of young men with daggers to aſſiſt them, they called the Senate together, and therein Critias (his once familiar friend, but now his deadly Enemy, becauſe the moſt cruel Tyrant of the thirty) bitterly accuſed him as a turbulent and unſetled man; being now for the People, and another while againſt them; he objected againſt him the death of the ſix Captains procured by him, and concluded he was not a fit man to live in a Commonwealth, eſpecially ſo conſtituted. Theramenes replyed with undaunted courage, and gave ſatisfaction to the Senate, as Critias perceived by their muttering, who thereupon concluding, that if he eſcaped it would endanger his own life, he conſulted with his Companions, and then returning to the Senate, told them, that having firſt expunged his name out of the Catalogue of the three thouſand, and hereby he being ſubjected to their cenſure, they condemned him to death. Theramenes replied again, that his name was no more eaſie to be blotted out than any other mans, in conſideration whereof, he adviſed them all to make his caſe their own: but none daring to oppoſe, for that they knew the men that were preſent to be privily armed, he was led away, and compelled to drink poyſon, which he did with a reſolute and gallant ſpirit. After this the Tyrants, as being at liberty to do what they pleaſed, forbad all that were not contained in the Catalogue, to come into the City, from which they expelled them and the borders, that they and their Aſſociates might enjoy their Lands. The Citizens betook themſelves to the Piræus, but being thence alſo expelled, they filled Megara and Thebes with their multitudes.

Theramenes one of them, for deteſting their wickedneſs, is put to death.

3. This baniſhment of the Athenians procured their liberty. For, now they entred into conſultation, and reſolved to hazard their lives for the freedom of their Country; ſeeing that now what would have been Treaſon at home, would have no danger abroad, but ſuch as might be found in the execution. Firſt Thraſybulus who was then at Thebes, with but * thirty in his company, ſeized upon Phyla, a Caſtle in the Territories of Athens; which the Tyrants underſtanding, endeavoured to recover, but to no purpoſe; for he having gotten to him within a while ſeven hundred men, put to flight the Garriſon Soldiers of Sparta, whom they had ſet to watch two miles off from the Caſtle, killing of them about one hundred and twenty men. Herewith the Tyrants were ſomething diſcouraged, but thinking it beſt to get Eleuſine into their power, they went thither, and perceiving the Inhabitatants that were able to bear Arms to go out at the gates, that they might only as they pretended take the number of their heads, moſt wickedly murdered them. After this Thraſybulus with one thouſand men ſeized upon the Piræus, againſt whom, though the Tyrants came out with their whole power, yet he obtained the Victory againſt them, killing ſeventy, and what more, Critias the Arch Tyrant, with Hippomachus one of the Collegues, and Charmides one of the ten Captains which had been placed over the Piræus. When the ſlain were delivered up to be buried, and thereupon both parties met, Cleocritus a Cryer belonging to the Prieſts, and a man famous for his loud and audible voice, expoſtulated with thoſe who ſided with the Tyrants for expelling them their fellow Citizens, educated together, partakers heretofore of the ſame things, ſacred and prophane, proſperous and adverſe, and all for to ſatisfie the luſt of thoſe Monſters, who had kindled ſuch a flame as had already conſumed more than the Peloponneſian War did in ten years. His ſpeech produced ſuch effect, that the three thouſand fell at difference amongſt themſelves ; ſuch as had been buſied in the deſtruction of other men, together with the Tyrants, vehemently contended that nothing was to be granted to them in the Piræus ; but thoſe that were confident in their own innocence, crying out there was no reaſon that they ſhould obey the will and pleaſure of the thirty, and ſuffer the City to periſh, prevailed againſt them. Then was the power of the thirty abrogated, and ten choſen in their room, one out of every Tribe, after which they quitted the City, and retired to Eleuſine.

* Corn. Nepos in Thraſybulo.

Thraſybulus oppoſeth the Tyrants.

Their power is abrogated.

4. Notwithſtanding the change of the Government, yet there was no accord betwixt them in the Piræus and thoſe in the Town, but ſeveral acts of Hoſtility they committed againſt one another. At length the three thouſand in the Town, and the Tyrants of Eleuſine, ſent to Sparta to deſire aid againſt the other, ſaying, that the people revolted from the Lacedæmonians ; and Lyſander procured them one hundred Talents to be ſent out of hand, himſelf ordered to go General to aſſiſt them, and his brother Libys General of the Fleet. Then beſieged he the Piræus, both by Land and Sea, and ſorely ſtreightned them ; but Pauſanias the Spartan King thinking much that he ſhould get the glory of Conquering Athens the ſecond time, which he would make as his own, he perſwaded the Ephori to give way, that he ſhould follow him with another Army, under pretence of aſſiſting him ; upon which account the Corinthians and Bœotians amongſt the Confederates refuſed to follow him, alleging they ſhould break their Oaths by fighting againſt them, who had done nothing prejudicial to the peace. This they did, concluding that the Lacedæmonians would lay the Territories of Athens to their own demains. Pauſanias, after his arrival, ſent to them in the Piræus to bid them depart, and they refuſing it, for a colour to his deſigns, he led his Forces againſt them. But returning without any thing performed, he went to view the Walls the next day, at which time they ſallied out upon him, and ſtill freſh ſupplies coming in on both ſides, wrought, and received conſiderable damage.

They ſend for aid from Sparta.

Lyſander is ſent and beſiegeth Thraſybulus, and his fellows in the Piræus,

5. Yet for all this he underhand ſent unto them about a compoſure, and inſtructed them what they ſhould offer. They obeyed him, and he perſwaded alſo thoſe in the City to end the controverſie, that both might become friends to the Lacedæmonians. The two Ephori preſent with him (for two uſed always to accompany the Spartan Kings in their expeditions) inclined to his opinion, rather than to the ſeverity of Lyſander, and ſo accordingly they ſent Ambaſſadors from both parties to Lacedæmon about an agreement. The Lacedæmonians after audience preſently diſpatched ten Commiſſioners with them back to Athens, who, together with Pauſanias, might make an agreement. They preſently compoſed all on theſe terms : That all ſhould return home to their own habitations, except the thirty, and the ten, and eleven men which had commanded in the Piræus ; and if any feared the people they might remove to Eleuſine, Theſe things being done, Pauſanias drew off the Spartan Army, and thoſe that were in the Piræus went up with their Arms into the City, and there ſacrifized to Minerva. Then by the perſwaſion of Thraſybulus the popular Government was reſtored, and all things ordered as in former times. A little after it being heard that they in Eleuſine hired Soldiers abroad, attempting new matters, the whole City roſe againſt them, took their Captains as they came to parley, and ſlew them : the reſt by their friends ſent to them were perſwaded to agree. Then paſſed a general Act of Oblivion for all that was paſt, confirmed by an Oath, to keep which they being very careful, even yet ſaith Xenophon, joyntly mannage the affairs of the Commonwealth. By which wiſe order the City returned to its former quietneſs, upon this Sedition raiſed by the thirty Tyrants, who being created by a Decree of the Senate, as * another ſaith, put to death one thouſand and four hundred Citizens unheard, and forced more than five thouſand to fly into the Piræus.

But Pauſanias the Spartan King emulating Lyſander taketh up the matter.

The popular Government reſtored.

* Iſocrates in Areopagit.

6. But this Tyranny of the thirty, not only poduced the deſtruction of many in the Town, but of Alcibiades alſo then living in Aſia with Pharnabazus, whom he intended to make uſe of to bring him to the King, hoping he might deſerve no worſe of that Prince than Themiſtocles had done of his Predeceſſor. When the Athenians were deprived of their liberty by the means of Lyſander, and the Tyranny of the thirty, they then began again to repent of what they had done to him, judging that if he had been yet at the Helm, they ſhould never have made ſhipwrack of their liberty, and ſtill their confidence was in him, and Plutarch in Alcibiad. & Corn. Nepos.

The thirty Tyrants procured Abcibiades to be made away.

and thought their cauſe was not utterly deſperate as long as he was ſafe. The Tyrants alſo were jealous of him, procuring all the intelligence they could concerning all his actions, and at length Critias remonſtrated to Lyſander, that things could not ſtand as they did long, if he lived, who yet was nothing perſwaded to procure his death, till he received a Scytala from the Magiſtrates at Sparta, who either feared his great abilities, or did it to gratifie Agis, to remove him by ſome means out of the way. He ſent to Pharnabazus, requiring him to diſpatch him, who enjoyned his brother Magæus, and his Uncle Suſamithres to be his Executioners: They coming to the Village in Phrygia where he lived, durſt not enter his houſe, but compaſſing it about ſet it on fire. He perceiving what was done, took ſome Clothes, and caſting them into the fire, which keeping down the flame for ſome ſpace, he brake out, whereupon the Barbarians fled, not daring to ſtand to him, but at a diſtance killed him with Darts, after which his body was burnt (with that matter that was prepared to conſume him alive) by the care of his Paramour Timandra, the Mother of Lais the famous Corinthian Courtiſan. Thus he died in the flow'r of his age, ſcarce exceeding fourty years, a man very beautiful, of moſt excellent parts, fit for any imployment, able to accommodate himſelf to all, both times, and cuſtoms, though never ſo repugnant, and therein yet eſteemed to excell. Socrates upon him excerciſed the true Platonick love, labouring to infuſe ſuch virtue into him as might make him truly lovely; but ſuch were his temptations, and inclination, that counterpoiſing the inſtructions, nature in this man ſeemed to try what ſhe could do; it being agreed by all, ſaith * one who wrote of him, that none was ever more eminent, both for vice and virtue.

* Corn. Nepos.

Xenoph. lib. 3.

7. After theſe things Cyrus made War upon his brother Artaxerxes, as hath been ſaid elſewhere, at what time he ſent to Lacedæmon, demanding a return for his kindneſſes ſhewed to them, who thinking it moſt juſt, ſent their Admiral to keep in play Syenneſis the Satrapa of Cilicia, till he paſſed that Countrey. After his overthrow, Tiſſaphernes his greateſt Enemy, being a moſt inſolent man before, now grew more haughty (after the King had laid the Province of Cyrus to his Satrapy) and began to be more troubleſome to the Greek Cities in Aſia. They ſent to complain hereof at Sparta, which State ſent to their relief Thimbron with an Army of one thouſand new raiſed Soldiers out of Laconia, four thouſand Foot of Peloponneſus, and three hundred Horſe from Athens, which the City willingly parted withal, with no good proſperity wiſhed to their perſons, for that they had been in the ſervice of the thirty Tyrants. What he did in Aſia, and how he returned home after Dercyllidas was ſent to ſucceed him, and was baniſhed upon the complaint of the Confederates, is related in the Affairs of Aſia. At the ſame time as Dercyllidas managed the War beyond the Seas, the Lacedæmonians and Eleans reviving their old grudges and complaints, broke out into another War, which was begun by the Lacedæmonians at the inſtance of the Ephori. They ſent out Agis their King, who led an Army into the Territories of the Eleans; but an Earth-quake hapning at his firſt entrance, which was counted ominous, he returned without any thing at all performed. The year after, he undertook another expedition, the Athenians, and all the other Confederates, except the Corinthians and Bœotians, following him, wherein he ſorely afflicted all the Country, ſparing the City Elis it ſelf, and though he retreated, yet the Garriſon he left behind him, continuing theſe depredations all the next Summer, and the Winter following, the next Summer the Eleans were conſtrained to receive ſuch conditions as their Enemies would give them. The Wall about Patra was demoliſhed, Cyllene relinquiſhed, five Towns delivered into the hands of the Spartans, and three to the Arcadians; the management of the Affairs of the Temple belonging to Jupiter Olympius being only left remaining to them.

Thimbro ſent into Aſia.

Idem. ibid. Corn. Nepos, & Plutarch. in Ageſilao, & Lyſandro. Xenoph. in Orat. de laudibus Ageſil.

8. Not long after theſe things Agis died, having fall'n ſick in his return from Delphos. He had born to him by his wife Timæa, a ſon called Leutychides, but conceived at that time when Alcibiades ſojourned at Sparta, by whom there were great preſumptions that he was begotten. He had not been with his wife of ten moneths before the Child was born; Timæa her ſelf was wont when ſhe would play with it to call it Alcibiades more commonly than Leutychides, as was acknowledged by her maids; and neither did Alcibiades himſelf forbear to acknowledge that he had to do with her, ſaying, it was not out of any carnal affection, but out of a deſire that thoſe who ſhould proceed from him might reign at Lacedæmon; upon theſe grounds Agis owned not Leutychides for his Son, but but told the Ephori he was none of his, divorcing alſo his Mother; but when he lay ſick, having no Children, and moved by his prayers and tears, he owned him for his ſon before many witneſſes. After his death a great contention inſued about the ſucceſſion betwixt Leutychides and Ageſilaus brother to Agis, a man lame of one foot, but of a moſt noble and valiant diſpoſition. Ageſilaus was bred after the ordinary ſtrict way, as not having expected the Kingdom being a younger brother, and yet was in great favour with the people, and preſſing the illegitimation of his adverſary had their ear; but one thing they much ſtuck at, which was an old Prophecy much urged by Diophites their Prophet, that it ſhould go very hard with Sparta when it ſhould have a lame King. Yet Lyſander, who had taken a great affection to him, anſwered, that by a lame King was not meant lame of a foot, which could be no hinderance to virtue, but one of ſpurious extraction; and herewith, and by his private intereſt, procured the ſentence to paſs for Ageſilaus.

A contention betwixt Leutychides and Ageſilaus for the Spartan Kingdoms.

Ageſilaus carrieth it, by the means of Lyſander.

9. Ageſilaus had not been a year in his Office, before that being to ſacrifize for his Countrey according to the cuſtom, the entrails of the beaſt three times did not permit it, which being viewed by the Prophet, he foretold that a grievous conſpiracy was hatched againſt him, and all Magiſtrates, both in Town and Country. Five dayes after this a notable conſpiracy indeed was diſcloſed to the Ephori by one of the Complices, the head of which was Cinadon. They preſently referring it to the Senate, it was thought fit that he ſhould be ſent out of the City, under pretence of ſome employment, and that ſome ſhould go after him to make him reveal his fellows, which accordingly was done, and an ignominious death was executed upon them. After the execution Herodus of Syracuſe came with news out of Phœnicia, that a Fleet of three hundred Gallies was prepared by Tiſſaphernes, and the King, but upon what deſign was not known. The Lacedæmonians moved at this, called the Deputies of their Confederates to Sparta to conſult about it. Now Lyſander had a great mind to return into Aſia, deſirous to relieve thoſe his friends, who being by him placed in the Government of the Cities, ten in a place, were for their violence and great miſdemeanours, either killed, or driven into baniſhment. He therefore perſwaded Ageſilaus to undertake ſo noble and pious an expedition, and wrote to his friends in Aſia, to deſire of the State that he might be ſent. Being perſwaded, he offered his ſervice on condition they would grant him thirty Aſſiſtants, by whoſe directions and advice he might manage the War; with two thouſand choice men newly to be raiſed, and ſix thouſand of the Confederates: Theſe were all decreed to him by the dealing of Lyſander, who procured himſelf to be ſent as chief of the thirty, to which place he might well pretend for the great glory of his atchievements, and his friendſhip to Ageſilaus, whom as he judged he had more obliged by procuring this employment, than by the former courteſie of preferring him to the Kingdom.

He is ſent into Aſia by the ſame means.

A. M. 2608.
Ol. 95. an. 4.
V. C. 357.
Artaxerxis. Mnemon. 8.

10. Having his Army and Proviſions in a readineſs, he marched to Aulis, that thence, after the example of Agamemnon, he might paſs over into Aſia; but going about to ſacrifize a Doe to the Goddeſs, with which he thought ſhe would be better pleaſed than ſhe was with Agamemnon for his daughter, he was hindred by the Bœotians from doing that which was contrary to their cuſtom, and was conſtrained in a great chaſe to paſs over without the Ceremony, the Omiſſion of which he accounted as a bad preſage. When he came to Epheſus, it appeared that he only bore the name, and Lyſander had all the credit and authority, all men making application to him, and obſerving him as a man of whom they had had former experience to exceed all men in earneſtneſs to gratifie his friends, and deſtroy his Enemies. This much moved Ageſilaus, though a man of a moſt mild ſpirit (who was famous for bearing with any thing) and troubled alſo his own Collegues, ſo that the King reſolving to cut off his authority, rejected all the ſutes he made for any, and plainly ſhewed that his deſign was to croſs him in all he attempted. Lyſander hereupon told his friends how the caſe ſtood, that they muſt make no more addreſſes to himſelf, and being ſenſible of the diſgrace expoſtulated with him about it, who let him underſtand that he could not endure to be overtopped by him; He then deſired ſome employment of him, wherein he might both ſave his own credit, and do him ſervice, wherein he promiſed to be faithful. He then ſent him to the Helleſpont, where finding Spithridates the Perſian to be offended by Pharnabazus, he brought him over to him with a great Treaſure, and two hundred Horſe, although hereafter it was found that he took very hainouſly the diminiſhing of his reputation.

Is Eclypſed by Lyſander.

11. Age-

Sect. 4.

11. Ageſilaus in Aſia proſpered in the War to admiration, gaining great glory for his Wiſdom, Valour, and Courteſie, both at home and abroad; inſomuch that the Spartans, in confidence of his abilities, and integrity, committed the Fleet alſo to his command, judging it moſt convenient for expedition, and that both the Armies might joyn the readilier upon occaſion, that they ſhould be in the Hands of one man whom they could truſt. But in this one thing he is accounted to have erred, in that not having reſpect to the publick good, he paſſed by many far more Eminent for prudence and gravity, and pitched upon Piſander, his wives Brother (a man very bold, but meanly practiſed in buſineſs) for his Admiral. As he was going towards the Fleet, and Ageſilaus marching for Phrygia, Tithrauſtes (who having cut off the head of Tiſſaphernes had ſucceeded in his place) conſidering in how great dangers his Maſters affairs ſtood, ſent Timocrates a Rhodian with much Perſian Gold into Greece, wherewith to corrupt the principal men in the Cities, and procure them to make War againſt the Lacedæmonians. This was effected at Thebes and Argos; and the Athenians, though they had no Gold, yet were very ready to imbrace the War, believing that therein they ſhould have the chief Command. Thoſe that were corrupted then grievouſly inveighing againſt the Lacedæmonians, procured that the chief Cities entred into a Combination againſt them. The Thebans knowing that they would not begin the War except firſt provoked, took occaſion to do it by the Locrian Opuntians, whom they procured to quarrel with the Phocians, and their other Neighbours, about ſome grounds in queſtion amongſt them, concluding, that thereupon the Phocians would break into Locris. They did ſo, and did more hurt than they had received; whereupon Audocides, who had received much Gold, procured the Thebans to aſſiſt the Locrians. The Thebans then invaded Phocis, which they waſted, and preſently did the Phocians ſend to Lacedæmon to deſire aid, ſhewing that they had not been the beginners of the War.

Tithrauſtes by Gold ſent into Greece, corrupteth the States to War againſt Lacedæmon.

Xenoph. ut ſupra.

Corn. Nepos & Plutarch in Lyſandro.

Lyſander ſlain.

His character.

12. The Lacedæmonians not unwillingly imbraced this occaſion of falling out with the Thebans, to whom they bore many Grudges. They exacted the tenth part aſſigned to Apollo at Decelea, refuſed to make War againſt the Piræus, perſwading alſo the Corinthians, as they judged, to do the ſame; they remembred alſo how they had forbidden Ageſilaus to ſacrifize, caſting the Sacrifize from off the Altar, and would not follow him into Aſia. They reſolved now that they had no War in Greece, and that their Affairs were in ſo good a condition in Aſia, to curb their inſolence. Lyſander was then diſpatched to Phocis, where he ſhould gather the Forces of the Confederates together, and ſtay for Pauſanias the King, who was to bring the Forces of Sparta and the reſt of the Aſſociates to Haliartus. He marching into Bæotia drew Orchomenus from the League of Thebes, and impatient of delay tarried not for Pauſanias, who hovered about Tegæa, but went with ſuch Forces as he had already to Haliartus, which he ſummoned, but in vain, the Thebans which already were in the City hindring the Surrender. Upon refuſal he led his men to the Walls, and they of Thebes upon notice hereof haſted out of their City to help their Friends, and falling upon Lyſander (whether aware of their coming or not is uncertain) ſlew him in the place, and routed his Forces, of which were ſlain one thouſand men, and of the Thebans three hundred. This was the end of Lyſander, which he partly brought upon himſelf by his eagerneſs to make this Expedition, being in his old age fallen into Melancholly, which rendred him more peeviſh than uſual. He left a great name behind him, but purchaſed rather by his good Succeſs than Virtue. He would neither ſpare for Cruelty nor Falſehood, to compaſs his deſigns, taking no eſtimate of any thing by any balance but that of Profit. He ſcoffed at ſuch as ſaid, that thoſe who were deſcended of Hercules (amongſt which he was reckoned, though not of the Royal Familiſes) ought to manage Wars without deceit, ſaying, that where the Lyon's Skin would not ſerve, the Foxes was to be ſowed to it. A Deſign of his was diſcovered after his Death, whereby he intended to have taken the Regal Power out of the two Families, and have made them common to all in general. To this purpoſe a Writing was found containing a Speech he intended to offer to the People; which Ageſilaus would have publiſhed, that it might have been ſeen what kind of Commonwealths-man he was; but was diſſwaded by Lacratidas chief of the Ephori, who ſaid, that Lyſander was not to be digged up again, but rather that Speech to be buried with him. Notwithſtanding his Ambition, yet he died poor, which rendred him the more famous, ſo that to do Honour to his memory, the Spartans impoſed a mulct upon certain Citizens, who being contracted with his Daughters before his death, afterwards when his Poverty appeared, refuſed to marry them.

13. The Thebans having loſt ſo many men in the late Fight, thought they had but ſmall cauſe to Triumph, counting their loſs equal with that of the Enemy. The Day after, when they underſtood that the Phocians and others had retreated, they took more Courage; but again, when they perceived Pauſanias to draw near, they eſteemed themſelves in no ſmall danger. Yet the day following the Athenians joyning themſelves to them, and Pauſanias not moving forwards, they then had no ſmall confidence in the goodneſs of their Fortune. Pauſanias being doubtful what to do, called a Council of the Confederates to conſult, whether he had beſt by main Force or by Truce recover the Body of Lyſander, who for that it lay near the Town Walls, and it was very dangerous to fetch it off by ſtrong Hand, concluded a Truce was to be deſired; and the rather, for that the Corinthians refuſed to joyn with them, and the Enemy had good ſtore of Horſe, which they wanted. The Thebans refuſed to give up the dead Bodies, except the Lacedæmonians would ingage to depart out of Bœotia, and therefore to their great grief they were conſtrained to do it, and in their Retreat the Thebans grown very inſolent, killed ſuch as ſtaid behind never ſo little in the Villages. The Expedition was unfortunate to the Spartans in general; but eſpecially to Pauſanias, who at his return was accuſed capitally for not meeting Lyſander in convenient time, according to agreement, for that he had not by Fight but Truce recovered the ſlain, and diſmiſſed ſuch Athenians as had been taken in the Piræus; and laſtly, had not appeared at his Tryal. Being condemned he fled to Tegea, where afterwards he fell ſick and died.

Pauſanias ſentenced to die.

Xenoph. lib. 4. Plutarch in Ageſilao, & Apothegmat. Xenoph. in Orat. de laudibus Ageſilai.

14. The Lacedæmonians awakned by their loſs, and now knowing for certain that Money had been ſent out of Aſia to the ſeveral Cities, which had moved them to take Arms, they thought themſelves in ſome danger, and recalled Ageſilaus to defend his Country. He having had ſucceſs in the War ſuitable to his Military Skill and Valour, was now gathering of greater Forces, wherewith he intended to march into the higher Countries againſt the King himſelf; but notwithſtanding this, and that it troubled him to leave Aſia, yet he reſolved to obey, acknowledging in his Letter to the Ephori, that then a General truly and juſtly commands, when he is governed by the Laws and Magiſtrates, upon which account he ſaid, he would follow the Letter, if not prevent it (ſeeing they had ſet him a day, and that he commanded not for himſelf but the City and Confederates) although he had ſubdued a great Part of Aſia, overthrown the Barbarians, and had made great preparations for the War in Ionia. He left Enxenus the Harmoſtes of Aſia with a Guard of four thouſand Soldiers, but making all Proviſion for his Country, drew over many out of the Cities to the Service. Having paſſed the Helleſpont into the Cherroneſus, he held the ſame way that Xerxes formerly had done, when in the mean time the Ephori and Ariſtodemus guardian to Ageſipolis the young King, with an Army of fifteen thouſand men overthrew that of the Leaguers, conſiſting of twenty thouſand (whereof thirteen thouſand bore heavy Armour) making great ſlaughter, though they loſt no more than eight of their number. Care was taken that Ageſilaus ſhould have notice of this ſucceſs (with the Confederates in Aſia) who grieved only that Greece ſhould deſtroy ſo many of its own Worthies. As he paſſed through Thrace, he would not ask any of the Barbarians leave to go through their Countries; but only ſent to know whether he ſhould paſs as a Friend or an Enemy. All friendly received and conducted him, except the Tralles, who having formerly ſold the paſſage to Xerxes, now alſo demanded of him one hundred Talents, and as many Women. He jeered them, asking why they came not to receive what was demanded? and going forwards made great ſlaughter of them. The King of Macedonia, when he asked the queſtion of him, ſaid he would conſider of it; ſo let him, ſaid he; but in the mean time we will proceed in our journey, which boldneſs ſo awed the King, that he ſuffered him to paſs quietly.

Ageſilaus recalled out of Aſia.

The Sun Eclypſed Auguſt 24. and Ageſilaus invadeth Bœotia. Where he obtaineth a Victory againſt the Leaguers.

15. Having paſſed through Theſſalie notwithſtanding all oppoſition, by order of the Ephori he invaded Bœotia, judging alwaies obedience beſt, though he could have wiſhed, and had intended firſt to have been better provided. As he invaded Bœotia the Sun was eclypſed (Auguſt the twenty fourth according to the Aſtronomical Table) and he received the news of the overthrow of Piſander upon the Coaſts of Aſia by Pharnabazus, and Conon the Athenian, who being for his Skill in Sea-matters in great requeſt with the Perſian, improved his intereſt for the reſtitution of the Fortune of his Country. Upon this report he put on a good Countenance, leſt he ſhould diſcourage his men, telling them Piſander the Admiral was ſlain, but that his Fleet had obtained the Victory. But now in Bœotia, when he was come near to Coronea, the Leaguers oppoſed themſelves againſt him, being the Bœotians, Athenians, Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Ænianes, and both the Locrians, with whom was fought ſuch a Battel as had not hapned in that Age. At the firſt onſet Ageſilaus had the better in one Wing, but the Thebans in the other, and being in the Purſute were forced to retire to help their Friends, where he charging upon the Front of the Thebans, and not on the Rear, as he might have done, did great execution and was wounded himſelf, notwithſtanding the Valour of his Guard, conſiſting of fifty ſtout young-men, lately ſent him from Sparta to do him Honour. At length he had the better of it, and diſmiſſed un-hurt eighty of the Enemies, who had taken Sanctuary near hand, after which he went to Delphos, and conſecrated the tenth of his Spoils, which amounted to no leſs than one hundred Talents. In the mean time Gylus the Polemarchus brake out into Locris, where the Soldiers being greedy of Plunder, were fallen upon by the Inhabitants, whom though they repelled at firſt, yet Night coming on they were ſo intangled, that Gylus himſelf and very many others were ſlain, and all of them had been loſt, but that the Alarm being taken by the Camp, relief was thence ſent to them. After this, the Soldiers were diſmiſſed to their ſeveral homes, and Ageſilaus went by Ship to Sparta. Yet notwithſtanding the War continued, the Athenians, Bœotians, Argives and their Confederates, making excurſions from Corinth, which they had made the ſeat of War; and the Lacedæmonians with their Allies from Sicyon.

Sect. 4.

Stirs at Corinth.

16. The Corinthians conſidering that their Grounds were waſted, and many of them ſlain, becauſe of their being ſo near to the Enemy, but their Confederates free from theſe miſchiefs, the moſt and beſt of them deſired Peace, and began to conſider of it amongſt themſelves. This being underſtood by the Argives, Bœotians, Athenians, and eſpecially by ſuch amongſt themſelves as had received the Perſian Gold, and cauſed the War, they fearing Corinth would return again to the Lacedæmonians, to prevent this, they reſolved to Maſſacre all ſuch as were for the Peace. This they performed on a Feſtival, when moſt were got together, ſparing none that took Sanctuary in religious places, ſo that moſt of the elder ſort were killed, and the younger fled out of the City. Many of them, by the intreaty of their Friends, and upon the Oath of the Mgiſtrates, that they ſhould be ſafe, returned home within a ſhort time; but ſeeing plainly the City was in the way to Ruine by the tyranny of thoſe that governed, as that for Corinth it was to be called Argos, the Laws of which City they muſt be forced to receive; moreover being ſenſible that they had no more Power at home than meer ſtrangers, ſome of them reſolved it was better, by attempting the freedom of their Country, to die in the Quarrel, if it ſhould fall out, than to live in that ſlaviſh Condition. In proſecution hereof they let in Praxitas Governour of Sicyon for the Lacedæmonians within the long Walls, who having no great Force with him, fortified himſelf as well as he might, which being underſtood at Argos, they flocked out thence to aſſiſt their Friends, and the Lacedæmonians oppoſing themſelves they came to a Fight, wherein after much difficulty and various Fortune, the Lacedæmonians were Conquerours, making great ſlaughter of their Enemies. This Victory was the more eminent, for that ſo ſmall a number had vanquiſhed ſuch multitudes, after which, they put to the Sword a Garriſon of Bœotians, which held the Haven called Lochæus.

Ageſilaus ſent againſt the Argives.

17. Praxitas purſuing his Victory, brake down part of the Walls to make a paſſage for his men, and then going on in the way towards Megara, took two Towns, wherein he left a Garriſon and departed, after which followed only ſome light bickerings, till at length the Lacedæmonians iſſuing out of Lochæus, with their Friends beſieged Corinth, at which time the Athenians fearing they might paſs the long Walls and invade their Territories, came out of the City with Maſons and Workmen, and repaired that part which was towards them. The Lacedæmonians grudging that the Argives ſhould flouriſh at home, and proſper abroad, ſent Ageſilaus with an Army againſt them, who laying waſt all their Territories, brake through to Corinth, and took the Walls which the Athenians had repaired, his Brother Teleutias Admiral, taking the Ships and Arcenals upon the Gulf. Returning home, he was not long after ſent out again, who when he came to Corinth, thought to have ſurpriſed it, but the Citizens aware of it, called in a Garriſon of the Athenians, under the command of Iphicrates, and thereby prevented him. At this time Ambaſſadors came to him from ſeveral parts, and amongſt the reſt from Bœotia, to know what terms of Peace he would propound; but he carried himſelf ſo high, that he would take no notice of them; though Pharax interceded out of an inveterate grudge he bore towards the Thebans. But before their departure there came news that the party he had left in Lechæus was defeated by Iphicrates, at which unuſual meſſage being much affected he leaped out from his Throne, and in all haſte went to relieve them, but in his way met with three Horſe-men, who acquainted him how late his aſſiſtance would be. Hereupon he returned, and the next day ſent for the Ambaſſadors to hear what they had to ſay; but they ſomething incouraged at what had hapned, and minding to requite him for his diſreſpect, made then no mention of peace, but deſired leave to go to Corinth.

18. He eaſily apprehending them, told them they ſhould the next day ſee their friends in the Town rejoycing, and the defeat of his men, which was the true cauſe of their deſire to go to Corinth, and accordingly waſting all about the City, went to the Walls, and having in vain provoked the Inhabitants to fight, marched to the Lechæus the place of the defeat, after which he diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors, not ſuffering them to go to Corinth. His Army now beholding with their eyes the monument of the late miſchance, were ſorely afflicted, having not at all been accuſtomed to ſuch a ſight, only the Parents, kindred, and relations of the ſlain, according to the Laconian cuſtom ſeemed to rejoyce in the Calamity of their Country. Having re-inforced the Garriſon of Lechæus, he returned home his men, ſhunning the light and ſight of all men, out of ſhame for what had hapned in this expedition contrary to their former fortune. But Iphicrates after his departure, in confidence of his good ſucceſs proceeded, and reduced ſuch places as had been taken by Praxitas and Ageſilaus. After theſe things the Achæans being put to it by the Acarnanians, who endeavoured to wreſt from them Calydone, a Town formerly belonging to the Ætolians, ſent to Lacedæmon, and expoſtulated with them for not aſſiſting them, who always were ready to follow them into all places. The State upon this complaint ſent Ageſilaus to aid them, who invading Acarnania, waſted the Country, made prey of moſt of their Cattel, and being oppoſed by them, was much put to it on the mountainous and precipitous places, by Darts and Arrows; but coming to hand-ſtroaks, they were preſently put to flight, and three hundred of them ſlain. Then conſumed he all things with fire and ſword, and attempted ſome Towns by the perſwaſion of the Achæans; but in vain. Now Autumn growing on, he could not be ſtaid by their intreaties to prevent the Acarnanians from ſowing their Corn, telling them they were not well adviſed in their requeſt; for his intention being to return the next year, how much more Corn they ſhould have upon the ground, by ſo much would they be the more deſirous of peace.

Ageſilaus ſent to relieve the Achæans.

19 And according to his promiſe, the Winter being over, he returned, at the report whereof the Athenians ſeated in a mid-land Country, and thereupon more obnoxious to damage in their Corn, and in great danger of loſing their Towns, made an agreement with the Achæans, and entred into a ſociety of War with the Spartans. This War being over, the Lacedæmonians not thinking it ſafe to contend with the Athenians and Bœotians, whilſt the Argives were at their back, they reſolved to ſend their Forces againſt them. The conduct falling to Ageſipolis, the other King, he would not undertake it, till he had conſulted both the Oracle of Jupiter Olympius, and that of Apollo at Delphos, concerning the lawfulneſs of of the War, becauſe the Argives deſired a Truce, but being ſatisfied therein, he invaded, and waſted their Territories; yet ere long terrified with divers prodigies, he retreated without any conſiderable thing done. In the mean time Pharnabazus and Conon, having overthrown the Lacedæmonians in a Sea-fight at Cnidus, freed the Greek Cities from the Lacedæmonian Governours, which Conon ſuggeſted to the other as the only way to make them his own, and not to attempt to deprive them of liberty, which would force them to combine againſt him, and thereby give him work enough. He attempted Seſtus and Abydus; but Dercyllidas having ſecured them, he loſt his labour, and gave order to Conon to procure a Navy from the Cities upon the Helleſpont againſt the Spring, being much incenſed againſt the Lacedæmonians, and reſolving to invade their Dominions. At Spring he did ſo, and having ſtrengthned the Enemies of Sparta, as much as poſſible, he furniſhed Conon with a Fleet, and money to rebuild the long Walls of the Piræus, than which Conon perſwaded him he could not do any thing more Ageſipolis the other King ſent againſt the Argives.

Pharnabazus and Conon their acts againſt Lacedæmon.

ſuitable to his own intereſt involved in the damage of the Lacedæmonians, and gaining the good will of the Athenians. The Spartans underſtanding that their own affairs muſt neceſſarily decline as much as thoſe of Athens were advanced, (notwithſtanding Teleutias brother to Ageſilaus had recovered the Soveraignty of the Gulf of Corinth) yet thought it neceſſary as much as in them lay to prevent it.

Antalcidas ſent into Aſia by the propoſals of a peace to counter-work them.

20. Leſt Conon ſhould again recover the Iſlands to the Athenian ſtate, they thought good to advertiſe Teribazus, another of the Perſian Satrapaes, hereof, hoping either to draw him to their party, or at leaſt to procure that no more furtherance ſhould be afforded to the deſign of Conon. To this purpoſe they ſent Antalcidas to him, to lay open theſe things, and to try what could be done with him about a peace, who according to his inſtructions, to gain it the more eaſily, fully left to his diſpoſal the Greek Cities in Aſia, provided thoſe without were but left to their own freedom. Teribazus liked well of this, but the Athenians, Bœotians, Corinthians, and Argives, having alſo diſpatched away their Ambaſſadors upon report of his employment, refuſed to aſſent upon their own private intereſts. The Athenians feared, if the Iſlands ſhould be left to their own liberty, leſt they ſhould loſe Lemnus, Imbrus, and Sciras. The Thebans, leſt they ſhould be compelled to ſet at liberty the Cities of Bœotia, and the Argives concluded, that then they muſt lay aſide all thoughts of Corinth, which they had conceived great hopes to make their own. Their diſſention hindred Teribazus from concluding a peace with the Lacedæmonians without the Kings ſpecial Warrant; but underhand he ſupplied them with money to maintain their power at Sea,and committing Conon to cuſtody, went to the King to know his pleaſure.

21. The King upon his giving account how affairs ſtood, ſent Struthas to take care of the maritime affairs, who being ſenſible what damage Ageſilaus had done his maſter, was inclinable towards the Athenians, which being underſtood at Lacedæmon, they ſent Thimbro into Aſia to keep him in action, who at firſt ſorely afflicted the places ſubject to his command, but at length was ſlain, and his Forces defeated. At this time certain Rhodians being baniſhed by the people who had the power in their own hands, came to Sparta, and complained that the Athenians had brought the Iſland under their power by that kind of Government. The Spartans underſtood their intereſt in ſo powerful an Iſland, and ſent Ecdicus with eight Gallies to revive, if poſſible, the Oligarchy which was agreeable to their own model; and in this Fleet they ordered him to convey Diphridas into Aſia, who was to gather up the Reliques of Thimbro's Army, and renew the War againſt Struthas. He ordered his affairs very well, being a man fitter for the purpoſe than Thimbro was. But Ecdicus fearful of the power of the people did nothing at Rhodes, into his room Teleutias was diſpatched, and with a a Fleet of twenty ſeven Gallies did that for which he was ſent. The Athenians hearing of theſe motions ſent out Thraſybulus againſt the Spartans, who deſpairing of Rhodes went into the Helleſpont, where in Thrace he reconciled two Princes, Odryſes and Scuthes, and made them friends of the Athenian State. Departing thence, he recovered ſeveral Cities, and amongſt the reſt Byzantium and Chalcis, whence going to the Iſland Leſbus (all the Towns whereof except Mitylene were joyned to the Lacedæmonians) he had good ſucceſs, taking ſeveral places, and waſting the Territories of the other.

Thraſybulus ſent againſt the Lacedæmonians.

Is ſlain.

22. From Leſbus he ſailed victoriouſly unto Rhodes, where he obtained money from the Inhabitants of Aſpendus; but his men after the receit thereof dealing injuriouſly with them, they iſſued out in great anger, and killed him in his Tent. This is he, who if virtue be to be valued without fortune, one doubts whether he be not to be preferred before all others, ſeeing that for faithfulneſs, conſtancy, greatneſs of mind, and love towards his Countrey, no man is to be preferred before him; and whereas it hapned rarely to any to free his Countrey from the ſlavery of one man, he did it from the Tyranny of thirty. But whereas no man excelled him in worth, many overtopped him in nobility, and hereupon it fell out, that though in the Peloponneſian War he doing many things of himſelf, Alcibiades did nothing without him, yet the eminency of that man eaſily ſwallowed the glory and profit of all atchievements. The Lacedæmonians having notice of what he had done, and fearful of what the friendſhip of Pharnabazus to the Athenians might produce, though they had nothing to ſay againſt Dercyllidas, yet ſent Anaxibius out to reſtore their fortune, who had prevailed with the Ephori for this employment, and promiſed great matters

Corn. Nepos.

if he were but aſſiſted with money and ſhipping. They gave him three Gallies, and pay for one thouſand men. He coming to Abydus skirmiſhed with Pharnabazus, and then getting three ſhips more, infeſted the Athenians. But the Athenians being ſollicitous for keeping what Thraſybulus had recovered, though they had nominated Argyrius to his place, yet now ſent Iphicrates with eight Gallies and twelve hundred men, who was lately returned from the Corinthian War. He ſetting upon Anaxibius whilſt he careleſly went abroad, ſlew him as he was going to Abydus, and with him twelve more Governours of Towns, and thence betook himſelf into the Cherroneſus.

Xenoph. lib. 5.
Diod.

23. At this time Ægina was withdrawn by Eteonicus from the Athenians, who thereupon beſieged it, but to no effect. At Sea both ſides as it were played the Pyrats with each other for ſome time: But Teleutias being made General of the Lacedæmonian Fleet, fell in upon the Haven at Athens, where he took ſome Veſſels laden, with the men, and putting the Citizens into a great fright, in his return preyed upon the Coaſts, whence he took many Fiſher-boats with other booty, the places being not aware of any ſuch things. In the mean while Antalcidas the Spartan returned with Teribazus from the Perſian King, having concluded a League offenſive and defenſive with him, in caſe the Athenians and others would not conſent to their propoſals for a general peace. He coming to Sea took eight Athenian Gallies which came from Thrace, under the Command of one Thraſybulus, and making up the Fleet to the number of eighty ſail, with twenty Syracuſian Gallies, and others which he procured of Teribazus, obtained the Soveraignty of the Seas. The Athenians were ſtartled hereat, fearing the iſſue of this War might be the ſame with that of the Peloponneſian, eſpecially the Perſian being now Confederate with the Lacedæmonians, and the Inhabitants of Ægina infeſting their Borders; upon all which accounts they were very deſirous of peace. The Lacedæmonians alſo being much ſtraightned in maintaining Garriſons in ſo many places, both affected to them, and weary of them, began to have enough of War, having moreover much trouble about Corinth. The Argives not ignorant that War was decreed againſt them, and that their old ſhifts and pretences would ſtand them in no ſtead, were alſo ready to imbrace peace. They all then ſent their Agents to Teribazus to know what was propoſed by Artaxerxes Mnemon.

The parties deſire peace.

24. Teribazus ſhewing them the Kings Seals, read the Contents of the writing, which imported, that he thought it juſt that the Cities in Aſia, the Iſlands Clazomenæ and Cyprus, ſhould be under his Juriſdiction: and all the reſt, little and great, ſhould be left to their own freedom, except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scirus, which having been time out of mind ſubject to the Athenians, he thought it fitting they ſhould ſo continue. And ſuch as would not admit of theſe conditions, he with the reſt of the Confederates would proſecute with War, both at Sea and Land, to the utmoſt ability. The Agents returning home, all the States imbraced the conditions, except the Thebans, who were unwilling to ſet at liberty the Cities of Bœotia; but Ageſilaus making preparations to invade them, they were ſo far awed thereby as to receive them. He conſtrained alſo the Argives to leave Corinth, from which the Authors of the late Maſſacre then flying, the Exiles returned home. Theſe things being done, and the League ſworn to by all parties, this firſt peace was made betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Athenians with their followers, after the ending of the Peloponneſian War, and caſting down of their Walls, being called the peace of Antalcidas; for ſo it was termed, from the procurer, being indeed the ſhameful betraying of thoſe Cities into the hands of Artaxerxes, for which Ageſilaus had proſecuted the War in Aſia.

The peace of Antalcidas.

A. M. 3518.
Ol. 98. an. 2.
V. C. 367.
Artax. Mnem. 18.

25. The Lacedæmonians were they who had the benefit thereof, being the Protectors and Patrons of it; and grew ſo high upon the ſucceſs, that now they reſolved to chaſtize ſuch of the Aſſociates as had in the late War born greater affection to their adverſaries than themſelves. Firſt they fell upon the Mantineans as guilty of this Crime, whom by their King Ageſipolis (for Ageſilaus, becauſe of the friendſhip that paſſed betwixt his father and them, deſired to be excuſed) they forced firſt to break down their Walls by turning the River upon them, which ran through the City, and then to divide themſelves into Villages. After this they forced the Phliatians to receive their Exiles, and made War upon the Olynthians in Thrace, at the requeſt of the Acanthians and Appollonians, who accuſed them of clandeſtine practices with the Athenians and Thebans. By theſe courſes they hoped that all the ſmall Towns in Greece, upon occaſion, would willingly follow them in their Wars as Authors of their

The Spartans hereupon grew high.

The practices of the Olynthians.

liberty; and the great Cities,having loſt their Dependents,would be unable to make oppoſition. And in particular they had conceived an emulation againſt Olynthus, now grown ſo mighty, that not only ſhe commanded her neighbour Towns, but was become terrible to places far remote, and to Sparta her ſelf. The Olynthians had taken a great part of Macedonia, together with Pella the Metropolis of that Kingdom, and now imitating the old pretence of the Lacedæmonians to ſet at liberty the places over which Amyntas did Tyranniſe, had almoſt driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themſelves. They of Acanthus and Apollonia further adding, that either they muſt War upon Olynthus, or become ſubject to it, and fight ſhortly in its defence, Eudamidas was ſent before with two thouſand men. He arriving in Thrace, fortified the Cities, and recovered Potidæa, which had aſſociated it ſelf to the Olynthians, and managed his Affairs with ſucceſs anſwerable to ſuch force. In the mean time his Brother Phœbidas, according as he had requeſted of the Ephori, was employed in raiſing the main Body of the Army, and having compleated the leavy marched away for Thrace to joyn with him.

Xenoph. ut ſupra, Plutarch. in Ageſilao.

Cadmæa the Citadel of Thebes betrayed.

The fact is unjuſtly excuſed by Ageſilaus.

Iſmenias put to death.

26. At this time the Thebans were much divided amongſt themſelves, being headed by two Polemarchi, Iſmenias, and Leontidas. When Phœbidas was come on his journey as far as Thebes, Iſmenias out of his hatred to the Lacedæmonians would not ſee him, but his Collegue betrayed Cadmæa the Citadel of Thebes into his Hands, ſeized on Iſmenias, and got the Command of the whole City, whereat thoſe of the contrary Faction to the number of four hundred fled to Athens. Then another being choſen into the place of Iſmenias, Leontidas went to Sparta, where he found the Ephori and People much diſpleaſed with what Phœbidas had done, being both againſt the League, and without any Commiſion from them; and ſuch as were Enemies to Ageſilaus, eſpecially aggravated the matter, labouring to draw him into ſuſpition about it. He otherwiſe as great both a Commender and practiſer of Juſtice as any, yet took upon him to defend the Fact, ſaying, that Phœbidas was worthy to be puniſhed if he had done any thing that was hurtful to the Commonwealth; but if it was profitable, then according to the antient cuſtom he was not bound, in ſuch caſes where haſt is required, to ſtay for a Warrant. Following herein his Ambition, or giving way to his Paſſion (which moſt ſhewed it ſelf againſt the Thebans) he not only indemnified Phœbidas, but perſwaded the City to own what he had done, to keep the Caſtle, and prefer Archias and Leontidas, who had betrayed it, to the chief command of Thebes. The reſt of the Græcians were ſo aggrieved at what was done; but the Confederates durſt not contradict it, and each City joyned one Commiſſioner to three ſent from Sparta, who all together ſhould take Cogniſance of, and judge the cauſe of Iſmenias. He was accuſed before them of having favoured the Barbarians, and held intelligence with the Perſian; that he had received part of the Money ſent from him to corrupt the Græcians, and together with Andocides, had been the great incendiary who kindled and fomented their inteſtine Broils. He anſwered ſeverally and apart to all; but being believed to have attempted great and pernicious things, was condemned and put to death. Then was the Power eſtabliſhed in Leontides and his Complices, who did more in favour of the Lacedæmonians than was deſired of them.

Teleutias ſent by the Spartans againſt the Olynthians.

Is ſlain.

Ageſipolis ſent after him, dieth of a Feaver.

27. Things thus proſpering, the Lacedæmonians more chearfully purſued the War againſt Olynthus. They ſent General thither Teleutias, who with the help of Amyntas the Macedonian, and Derdas Prince of Elimea, overthrew the Olynthians under their Walls, and waſting their Grounds, for that Summer was ended, withdrew to their winter Quarters. But the next Year when he returned, the Olynthians ſallied out againſt him, whom to repel, he ſending a party which drave them back beyond a River which ran by the Town, and followed them over, they then thinking they had his men at an advantage, turned back upon them, and ſlew to the number of one hundred. He being in a great chaſe hereat, went in to the reſcue with all his Forces, and following them within bow-ſhot from the Walls, his men were ſore galled by thoſe that ſtood on the Turrets, and forced to give back, and then being hotly charged he loſt his Life, with many others, ſo that the reſt clearly put to the rout, and ſhifting for themſelves to ſeveral places, the ſtrength of this Army was broken, which defeat Xenophon chargeth upon the Paſſion of Teleutias, ſhewing how dangerous it is in the Leader of an Army. The Lacedæmonians having notice of what had hapned, diſpatched away Ageſipolis their King with all convenient ſpeed into Thrace, who upon better advantages invading the Olynthians,took Torone one of their confederate Towns, and harrazed the Country, but at Mid-ſummer by extremity of heat got a Fever, of which he died the ſeventh day, being much lamented by Ageſilaus his Colleague, for their long familiarity, though emulated by him. Being put into Honey and brought home, there he was interred with Royal Rites, and Polybiades was ſent to command the Army, who beſieging the Olynthians, at length forced them by Famine to yield on theſe terms: To have the ſame Friends and Enemies with the Lacedæmonians, and to follow them as Aſſociates whitherſoever they ſhould lead them in their Wars.

Olynthus taken by Olybiades.

28. In the mean time the Phliaſians grown confident upon the abſence of Ageſipolis, began to act very inſolently and unjuſtly againſt the Exiles which of late they were made to re-admit. The Exiles complained of them at Lacedæmon, and they thereupon in their abſence put a Mulct upon them, which underſtanding, they ſtill continued and pray'd juſtice from that State. At length the Ephori reſolved upon War, and Ageſilaus was ſent againſt the Phliaſians, who thereupon offering largely to do all things fitting, he refuſed them, ſaying, he muſt have Deeds and not Words, to which now without further confirmation he could give no credit. They asking what he would demand, he required their Caſtle to be delivered up to him, which being utterly refuſed, he beſieged the City. They held out longer than he expected, becauſe the Magiſtrate ſuffered them not to eat above half of the ordinary proportion, and by means of one Delphion, who with three hundred aſſiſtants, impriſoned ſuch as ſpake of a Surrender. But at length conſumed with Famine, they deſired a Truce, to ſend Commiſſioners to Sparta to treat of Peace. Ageſilaus ſtomached that they ſhould paſs him by, and therefore ſending his Friends to the City, he obtained that the matter ſhould be referred back to him. He ordered that fifty ſhould be choſen of the Exiles, and as many others, who ſhould determine which Citizens ſhould be ſuffered to live, and which put to death, and that then Power ſhould be given them to make Laws for the Government of the City. Whilſt theſe things ſhould be done he left a Garriſon in the Town, and ſo departed, having ſpent twenty Moneths in this buſineſs.

The Phliaſians ſubdued by Ageſilaus.

Xenoph. ut prius. Diodorus ad Olymp. 100. an. 3. Plutarch & Corn. Nepos in Pelopida.

29. All things thus falling out to the Spartans according to their wiſh, they judged their Empire ſufficiently eſtabliſhed; but another event (as Xenophon gravely diſcourſeth of divine Vengeance) taught the contrary, it being clear, both from the Hiſtories of Greeks and Barbarians, that God ſuffereth not to eſcape unpuniſhed wicked and ungodly Actions. They had ſworn not long before to leave the Cities to their own liberty, and yet they kept in their Hands the Citadel at Thebes, and therefore being formerly invincible, were now ſufficiently plagued by thoſe alone whom they had injured. There was one Phillidas Secretary to the preſent Polemarchi of Thebes, who being not at all ſuſpected by his Maſters, went to Athens where the Exiles lay, and there entred into a Conſpiracy with Mello one of them, for the killing of the Polemarchi, and recovery of their Countries liberty. Mello and ſix others being let in by Phillidas, were in womens apparrel brought in to the Polemarchi as Courtezans, whilſt they were drinking and celebrating the Feaſt of Venus at the end of their Office, whom they ſtabbed with Daggers hid under their Clothes; after which they did as much to Leontides the chief revolter, as he lay in his Bed, Mello being eaſily admitted to him without ſuſpition. Then went they to the common Priſon, and killing the Keeper ſet at liberty their Friends, when now they called the People together, and exhorted them to ſtand in defence of their native liberty. They preſently beſieged the Caſtle, wherein the Lacedæmonian Governour ſeeing the alacrity of the aſſailants, was forced to yield upon this condition, to go out with his Army, and for that was put to death at his return to Sparta. The Thebans then ſlew ſuch as they could come by, who ſided with Leontides, and, too rigorouſly, extended the ſame puniſhment to their Children.

Thebes recovered by the Exiles.

Xenoph. & Plutarch.

30. The Ephori ſollicited by the Exiles that fled to Sparta, and moved by the authority of Ageſilaus (who pretended a ſufficient quarrel, for that Archias and Leontides were ſlain) ſent Cleombrotus their King againſt the Thebans now in the depth of Winter. He in his paſſage ſlew thoſe whom Phillidas had let out of Priſon, to the number of one hundred and fifty, who kept watch upon the Mountains, but did nothing farther conſiderable, only he left Sphodrias Governour of Theſpæ to raiſe new Forces, and be a refuge to the diſcontented party amongſt the Thebans, and ſo returned. Yet herewith were the Athenians exceedingly affrighted, inſomuch that one they put to death, who had conſpired with the Theban Exiles, and condemned another who fled upon it. The Thebans alſo deſpaired of being able to graple with the Lacedæmonians, and therefore betook themſelves to a politick device, which was invented by Pelopidas and Gorſidas principal of the late Conſpirators. A Merchant was ſent to Sphodrias, then lying at Theſpæ, a raſh and ambitious man, to perſwade him to fall upon the Piræus or Haven of Athens, as a work very grateful to his ſuperiours, for thereby he ſhould cut off the Athenian power at Sea, and he might be ſure the Thebans would not aſſiſt them being already too much incenſed. He pricked forwards by theſe conceits, invaded Attica as far as Eleuſine; but there his Deſign being known, and his Soldiers unwilling to proceed any further, as not ſufficiently prepared for ſuch an enterprize, he was forced to return.

Sphodrias invadeth Attica by the cunning of ſome Thebans.

Xenoph. Plutarch.

Ageſilaus moved by his ſon Archidamus, procureth him indemnity, whence the Athenians joyn with the Thebans.

31. The Athenians caſt into Priſon the Spartan Ambaſſadors as conſcious of ſuch an unlawful act; but they utterly renounced the leaſt knowledg of it, and promiſing Sphodrias ſhould anſwer it with his Life, they were content to expect the Juſtice of the State upon him. The Ephori called him to account indeed, and yet though he appeared not, was he acquitted, to the great admiration of all men, eſpecially becauſe of the Author of his acquitment, which was Ageſilaus. For the King, though at firſt he refuſed ſeveral times to hear any thing in his behalf; yet Cleonymus the Son of Sphodrias beloved by Archidamus, made ſuch means to him, that at length being very indulgent to his Children, he excuſed the matter, and ſaying, he held Sphodrias to be an honeſt man, and that the Commonwealth ſtood in need of ſuch Soldiers, he got him acquitted, to his great diſhonour. The Athenians hereupon out of indignation joyned themſelves to the Thebans, and the Bœotians and they ſent to the Cities under the command of Sparta, to draw them to their party, which they effected with moſt, they groaning under the Yoak of Lacedæmon. They appointed a Common-Councel to be held at Athens, for carrying on the War, made up of one out of every confederate City, by which courſe and other ways of ſelf-denial, the Athenians recovered much Authority, having conſtituted their Captains, Timotheus the Son of Conon, Chabrias, and Calliſtratus.

Diodorus ad Ol. 101 an. 1. Xenoph. Plutarch.

32. The Lacedæmonians to counterwork them, took off their ſeverity from their Subjects which had not yet revolted, whereby they kept them faſt to them, and renewing military Diſcipline, ſent Ageſilaus into Bœotia with a great Army; for Cleombrotus liked not the cauſe ſo well as to ingage in it; and thereupon he was forced to lay aſide his excuſe of ſuperannuation (being above fourty years older than one of ripe age) and ſubmitted to the employment. The Thebans oppoſing themſelves againſt him with the Athenians and others, took an Hill, where by direction of Chabrias, they received him careleſly, with their Shields let down to their Knees, and their Lances advanced, which Courage of theirs as it ſeemed made him to retreat, and ſo having done great damage to their Country, and loſt many of his men, he returned, leaving the Horſe ſtill to make excurſions, under the command of Phœbidas. Several Skirmiſhes then hapned after his departure, in one of which Phœbidas himſelf was ſlain, with three hundred of his Followers. This made the Thebans take more Courage, and many then revolted to them. The Spartans ſent a party to reinforce the Garriſon of Theſpæ, and in the beginning of Spring prevailed with Ageſilaus to undertake another Expedition, which was performed to little purpoſe. He broke a Vein in his ſound Thigh, and the Blood cauſed ſuch an Inflammation, that though opening another at his Ancle gave him ſome eaſe, yet at his return he was forced to keep his Bed for a long time, the Blood at the Orifice having ran Night and Day, till at length he ſwooned, which ſtopped the Flux. The Year after Cleombrotus was again ſent out; but the Thebans and Athenians diſputing the paſſage with him in his way, after he had loſt fourty men he returned. By theſe Conflicts the Thebans were ſo exerciſed, that they became excellent Soldiers, as Antalcidas ſaid jeeringly to Ageſilaus at his return, that he was very well rewarded by them, whom without either will or knowledg he had taught to fight.

Ageſilaus undertaketh another fruitleſs Expedition againſt the Bœotians.

33. The Confederates being met at Lacedæmon, accuſed themſelves of idleneſs, for that they had not ſtroven with the Athenians at Sea, and being now confident they could ſtarve them in the City, they rigged a Fleet of ſeventy Ships for that purpoſe. And hereby they for ſome time as it were beſieged Athens, ſo that the Corn-Ships durſt not approach, till Chabrias overthrew them in Fight, and brought in plenty of Proviſions. The Lacedæmonians preparing to ſend new Forces into Bœotia, the Thebans deſired of their Friends at Athens to invade Peloponneſus by Sea, to divert them; which they readily did, under the conduct of Timotheus, the Thebans at the ſame time taking ſeveral Towns upon their Borders. The Spartans

Xenoph. lib. 6

Diodorus.

The Lacedæmonians beaten.

tans ſent out one Nicolochus to Sea againſt Timotheus, who not ſtaying for ſix Gallies of Ambracia, which he expected, with fifty five Sail ſet upon the Athenian Fleet conſiſting of ſixty, and was worſted. Hereupon Timotheus erected a Trophy, but Nicolochus getting the ſix Ships of Ambracia, went and offered Battel again, and Timotheus not ſtirring erected another Trophy as a Conquerour. But Timotheus mending his Ships, made up his Fleet above ſeventy Veſſels, and prevailed at Sea. The Thebans having got all the Bœotian Cities into their power invaded Phocis, to the Succour of which Cleombrotus was ſent from Sparta, and there the Aſſociates both of the one ſide and the other met; but the Athenians thinking now that the Thebans became too potent by their aſſiſtance, were deſirous of a Peace. The Thebans with five hundred men went againſt Orchomenus, held by a Garriſon of the Lacedæmonians, which ſallying out againſt them, a hot diſpute enſued, wherein, although the Spartans were double the number, yet they were beaten, which thing had not happened in former Ages. This added courage to the Thebans, and their military Glory daily increaſing, it now became evident that they ſtrove for the Soveraignty of Greece. With this Year Hermeas of Methymna concluded his Hiſtory of Sicily, which conſiſted of ten, or, according to ſome, of twelve Books.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 101. ann. 2.

The Thebans left out of the general peace.

The peace continueth but a ſhort time.

34. The next being the ſecond of the one hundred and firſt Olympiad, the thirtieth of the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Hippodamus being Archon; Artaxerxes having a deſign to make War upon Egypt, and to uſe the Græcians therein, ſent to perſwade them to agreement. They being weary of War conſented to it, all the Cities being to be ſet at liberty, and the Garriſons drawn out; only the Thebans refuſing to quit the Cities of Bœotia were not compriſed in the League, being very confident in their good Fortune, and much incouraged by ſeveral excellent good Soldiers amongſt them, the principal of which were Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, who from a poor Philoſopher became the moſt renowned for martial affairs of all Greece. This change produced great Commotions in the ſeveral Cities, but eſpecially in thoſe of Peloponneſus, which by the Lacedæmonians had been ſubjected to Oligarchy, and now having the popular Government reſtored, knew not how to uſe it moderately, but by unjuſt Decrees oppreſſed many worthy men, driving ſome into Exile, and ſelling their Goods. Great ſtirs eſpecially hapned amongſt the Corinthians, Megarians, and Phliaſians, whilſt thoſe that were unjuſtly baniſhed endeavoured by Force or Policy to reſtore themſelves. Thoſe that were for Democracy were maintained by the Athenians, and the Spartans aſſiſting the Oligarchical faction, the Peace was but for a ſmall time obſerved by theſe two States, whilſt both favoured ſuch as bare moſt affection to their form of Government, and ſo they renewed the War: Such was the fruit of Antimonarchical Government, viz. Nothing but Sedition, Confuſion, and diſorder.

(a) Xenophon. Diodorus ad Olymp. 101. ann. 3.

Platæa and Theſpis demoliſhed.

(b) In Bœoticis.
(c) Diodorus ad Olymp. 101. ann. 4.
Strabo lib. 9. p. 385.
Pauſan. in Achaicis.

Ælianus Hiſt. Anim. lib. 11. cap. 19.

35. They (a) conteſted firſt about the Zacynthians, and afterwards in Corcyra, where the Spartans beſieging the City, the Inhabitants almoſt all famiſhed, yet ſallied out, and killing Mnaſippus their General, with many others, the reſt hearing of the coming of Iphicrates the Athenian with a great Fleet, with ſuch Plunder as they had got, diſgracefully raiſed their Siege and departed. At this time the Platæans having a deſign to commit themſelves to the Protection and Alliance of Athens, the Thebans thereupon demoliſhed the Town, and not long after did the ſame by Theſpæ. The ruine of Platæa is by (b) Pauſanias referred to the next Year when Aſteus was Archon, in which alſo (being the fourth of the one hundred and firſt Olympiad) hapned (c) ſuch Earth quakes, and Inundations of the Sea in Peloponneſus, that Helice and Buræ, two Towns of the Achæans, were together with the Inhabitants ſwallowed up. Hereof Diodorus aſſigneth ſeveral cauſes, laying the ſtreſs upon an injury formerly offered by them to Neptune, in refuſing to lend the Ionians their Statues, to which they ſhould have ſacrifized. Five days before the ruine of theſe Cities, all the Mice, Weaſils, Serpents, and ſuch like Creatures came out of Helice in great numbers, and took the way which leads to Coria. The Inhabitants admiring ſo ſtrange a Sight, had the next Night their Thoughts diverted by the Earth-quake, which made way for that Inundation wherein they periſhed, and with them ten Ships of the Lacedæmonians then lying in the Haven.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 102. ann. 1.

36. The next Year being the firſt of the one hundred and ſecond Olympiad, wherein Damon the Thurian got the prize, Alciſthenes being Archon, Artaxerxes ſent his Ambaſſadors into Greece again to perſwade the States to an agreement. The Athenians were now grievouſly diſpleaſed with the Thebans for deſtroying Platæa and

Sect. 4.

Xenoph. ut prius.

Theſpæ, two Cities which had ſo well deſerved of Greece in the Median War and thereupon would no more joyn with them. They ſent Ambaſſadors to Lacedæmon about a Peace, who uſed ſuch Rhetorick to that State, ſpecially Calliſtratus, that they brought the Spartans to aſſent upon theſe Terms: that the Cities ſhould be ſet at liberty, the Armies diſbanded, and whoſoever would not acquieſce in theſe conditions, it ſhould be lawful for any of the Confederates, if they pleaſed (not being conſtrained to it) to help the diſtreſſed. All others except the Thebans ſubſcribed the League, for they were unwilling as before to quit the Cities of Bœotia. Hereupon the Spartans jealous of them, reſolved to make War in the behalf of all Greece, and gave order to Cleombrotus their King (who now lay in Phocis, expecting what they would command him) to invade Bœotia. The Lacedæmonians having great Forces of their own, beſides their Allies, and none being willing to aſſiſt the Thebans, every one gave them for loſt, who yet upon Cleombrotus his Summons refuſed to ſet free the Cities of Bœotia, except the Spartans would reſtore Meſſene, and permit the Laconians to enjoy their liberty. In ſumm, they deſired they would no more meddle with what they did in Bœotia, than they were concerned in any thing done in Laconia.

Cleombrotus the Spartan King invadeth Bœotia.

Diodorus ad ann. 2.

Xenoph. Plutarch. in Pelopida. Pauſan. in Bœoticis.

37. They created Epaminondas General, of whoſe rare skill and valour they had had abundant proof, joyning with him the other Bœotarchæ. He levying twelve thouſand men marched away, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the Straights of Coronea, which Cleombrotus hearing, marched through Phocis another way, and came into Bœotia by the Sea's-ſide. Advancing to Leuctra, he there reſted himſelf, which the Bœotians underſtanding, paſſed over the Mountains, and came near to him, but ſeeing ſuch Multitudes overſpread the Plain, were not a little diſcouraged. The Bœotarchæ then deliberating what to do, were divided in their opinions, three being for fighting, amongſt whom was Epaminondas, and as many for departing; but whilſt they were ſtill in doubt came in the ſeventh, and through the perſwaſion of Epaminondas caſt the ballance on his ſide. Plutarch ſaith, that Pelopidas firſt approved of his advice, being Captain of the Sacred Company, which was made up (as is moſt probable amongſt many opinions) of intimate Friends and Lovers, who fighting earneſtly for one another, when in danger, did great harm thereby to the Enemy. Whileſt Epaminondas was ſeveral ways incouraging his men to the Fight, came in Jaſon the Pheræan, the moſt eminent leading man of Theſſaly, with one thouſand horſe and fifteen hundred foot, in ſhew to help the Thebans, but with intention to take up the quarrel; and he perſwaded both parties to accept of a Truce.

ab Ἐπαμένων Patronymice fit Ἐπαμεινονίδας per Syncopen Ἐπαμενώνδας.

38. Cleombrotus was then departing out of Bœotia, when a new Army met him from Sparta, under the Command of Archidamus; for the Lacedæmonians ſeeing the courage and reſolution of the Thebans, whereas otherwiſe they could not do it, reſolved to oppreſs them by their numbers. The General then thinking it diſgraceful at all to fear the Theban Valour, marched back to Leuctra without any regard of the Truce, where they found the Bœotians ready to receive them. Cleombrotus and Archidamus (both deſcended from Hercules) lead the Wings of their Battel. Epaminondas gave leave to all that would to depart, which was accepted by the Theſpians and others, who bore no good will to the Thebans. His prime men he placed in one Wing, and the other by themſelves, whom he ordered to give back, as though they fled. Making then an oblique battalion, he with the ſtouteſt men began the Fight, and whilſt the other retired from the Enemy he followed him cloſe, who now brake order to get into it. The ſucceſs remained doubtful as long as Cleombrotus lived; but he being ſlain whilſt he moſt valiantly demeaned himſelf, a great and bloody conteſt hapned about his Body, which at length his men recovered, and gave back in order, and by degrees. But Epaminondas ſtill preſſing upon them, and doing great execution, at length they fled, having no body to govern them. About four thouſand of them were ſlain, and three hundred of the other party. This Battel hapned in the thirty fourth year after the end of the Peloponneſian War, the ſecond of the one hundred and ſecond Olympiad, the thirty fourth of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Phraſiclides being Archon. A. M. 3634.

Epaminondas overthroweth him in the battel of Leuctra, wherein he is ſlain.

A. M. 3634. Olymp. 102. ann. 2. Urbis cond. 383. Artax. Mnem. 34.

Xenoph. & Plutarch. ut ſuprà.

39. The Meſſage of this overthrow came to Sparta the laſt day of their Gymnick Solemnities, wherewith, though the Ephori were ſo affected, as thoſe that ſaw now a concluſion of that Principallity they had almoſt enjoyed five hundred years, yet ſuffered they not the exerciſes to be broken off; but ſending the names of the ſlain to their relations, finiſhed the Feſtival. The day after when it was known who were ſlain, and who eſcaped, one might ſee the Parents and Kindred of the dead to meet together in the Forum with cheerful looks and minds, ſhaking one another by the hands; but on the other ſide the friends of ſuch as were living, as in ſome ſolemn time of mourning to keep themſelves at home, or if they came abroad, to ſignifie their ſadneſs in their habit, ſpeech and countenance: and this was eſpecially remarkable amongſt the women. But when their aſſociates had revolted, and Epaminondas was thought to be about to invade Peloponneſus, they then called to mind the Oracles, concerning what ſhould happen to them under a Lame King; yet reverencing the valour, power, and glory of Ageſilaus, they not only retained him in his ſeveral places of King and General, but made uſe of him as a Phyſician in this ſad diſtemper. Now whereas by the Laws of Sparta, ſuch as had fled from a battel were not only made incapable of Magiſtracy, and of marriage with others, who thereupon were noted with ignominy, but were to be ſtrucken by every one that met them, walking in a dejected poſture, in Fools Coats, with their beards half ſhaved; there being many and powerful who fled from Leuctra; leſt any inconvenience might follow upon their diſcontent, Ageſilaus procured that the Law for his time ſhould be ſilent, and (without repealing) obtain its antient vigour for the time to come. Then to recreate the minds of the Soldiers he lead them out into Arcadia, where induſtriouſly abſtaining from fight, he took a little Town of the Mantineans, and made excurſions in their Territories, to give his Citizens a little hope, and ſhew that the fortune of Sparta was not altogether deſperate.

The behaviour of the Spartans after the battel of Leuctra.

40. The Ephori made new Levies, liſting thoſe now that were above ſixty, the Tegeatans, Mantineans, Corinthians, Phliaſians, Achæans, and other Cities ſent their numbers, the Conduct of all which was committed to Archidamus, becauſe his father was not yet recovered. The Thebans preſently after the victory ſent a Meſſenger Crowned to Athens, to let them know their ſucceſs, and demanded aid; but the Athenians being not a little troubled at what had hapned gave him no audience. Then ſent they to Jaſon the Pheræan Prince of Theſſaly, who though he was otherwiſe employed with the Phocians, yet came, and when Archidamus had now invaded Bœotia, procured a Truce betwixt them, and thereupon the Spartan Army returned home. This by Xenophon is related as done after the battel at Leuctra, and becauſe he maketh no mention of any Truce made by Jaſon betwixt them, before the fight, we may ſuſpect a miſtake in the time, either of him, or Diodorus, who relateth the ſtory as before. Jaſon returning home was murdered by ſeven young men, having great deſigns in his head, after he had, partly by perſwaſion, and partly by awe, cauſed all Theſſaly to receive him as General, the Lacedæmonians having refuſed to ſend them aid to defend themſelves from his power. After his death his two brothers Polydorus and Polyphron, Authors of his death, were made Generals, of whom the former was ſlain within a while by the later, who turning his Principality into Tyranny, held it but one year, being then ſlain by his brother Alexander, under pretence of revenging the death of Polydorus, and overthrowing the Tyranny. But he proved ten times more Tyrannical, * burying men alive, covering them in beaſts skins, and ſo ſetting them before the Dogs to be devoured, and killing others with Darts, to make himſelf ſport. At length having a plot againſt his Wives brothers, he was ſlain by them by her means, and Tiſiphonus the eldeſt of all the brothers ſucceeded, who continued in the Government when Xenophon wrote his Hiſtory.

Archidamus invadeth Bœotia.

A Truce is procured by Jaſon Prince of Theſſaly, who is preſently after murdered by his brothers.

* Plutarch. in Pelopida.

41. The Athenians conſidering that the Lacedæmonians ſtill expected they ſhould follow them in the Wars as formerly and would compel them thereto if they could, thought it beſt for ſaving their credit to revive the peace formerly made with Artaxerxes. They therefore ſent fifty men about it, to the Cities, to take an Oath of them to this purpoſe: That they would obſerve the Truce eſtabliſhed by the King, and confirmed by the Athenians and their Aſſociates; and if any injury ſhould be offered to any that took the Oath, to aſſiſt them with their full power. All the States willingly admitted of it, and received the Oath, except the Eleans, who after the example of the Thebans, pretended that the Marganians, Scilluntians, and Triphyllians ought not to be ſet at liberty, becauſe they belonged unto them. All Cities both little and great being by virtue of this peace to be ſet at liberty, the Mantineans taking occaſion thereat, made a Decree to build their City again, and to fence it with walls, which formerly had been demoliſhed by the Lacedæmonians. They were agrieved that this ſhould be done without their conſent, and ſent Ageſilaus to them to ſtop their proceedings; but the Magiſtrates refuſed to call the people together to give him audience, though a friend upon his fathers account, telling him what was once decreed by the people could not be altered.

Xenoph.

Sect. 4.

A Sedition at Tegea.

Some of the Arcadians ſent and promiſed them aſſiſtance, and the Eleans helped them with thirty Talents of Silver. At this time the Inhabitans of Tegea fell out amongſt themſelves, whilſt ſome would have all the Arcadians meet together and chooſe ſome one man to be their Prince, but others were for living under their own Laws only, and the maintenance of their liberty. Theſe at the firſt had the better of it; but by the help of the Mantineans, at length the other prevailed, and killing ſome, drove the reſt of their Enemies to Lacedæmon, to the number of eighty.

Alias Diodorus. vide.

42. The Lacedæmonians thought they were bound by Oath to revenge the cauſe of the Exiles upon the Mantineans, who by falling on them had broken theirs, and gave order to Ageſilaus to invade them. They by the advice of their friends the Arcadians contained themſelves within their walls newly built, and ſuffered him to ſpoil their Country, which doing with great caution and warineſs, yet without any loſs of honour, he returned home. At this time it muſt be, according to * Pauſanias (who placeth it in the ſame year with the battel at Leuctra) that by the perſwaſion of Epaminondas the Arcadians built them one City to inhabit (deſtroying there many little Towns) which thence had the name of Megalopolis. The fame of Plato being now ſpread abroad, the Thebans and Arcadians ſent to him to deſire his help, not only for the inſtruction of their youth, and to teach Philoſophy, but alſo to preſcribe them Laws for their Commonwealth. At firſt he intended to go, but asking the Ambaſſadors how their Superiours ſtood affected to an equal diſtribution of goods and honours, and hearing they were utterly averſe to ſuch a conſtitution, he thereupon refuſed to go to them. At this ſame time alſo Epaminondas ſent into Sicily, Italy, as far as the Iſlands Eueſperites, and all over where the old Meſſenians, dwelt; to invite them home into their antient Country, which was reſtored to them, and called after the old name Meſſene. Which reſtauration hapned two hundred and ninty eight years (reckoned from the firſt of the twenty eighth Olympiad) after the taking of Ira, and their baniſhment; in the third year of the hundred and ſecond Olympiad, Dyſcinetas being Archon. During all this time of their Exile they preſerved entirely their antient Rites, and the Dorick dialect unchanged, which in our Age (ſaith Pauſanias) by them, and only by them, is alſo preſerved uncorrupt and natural.

* In Arcadicis.

Ælian var. hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 42.

Megalopolis built.

Pauſanias in Meſſenicis.

The Meſſenians recalled and re-eſtabliſht.

43. The ſame year hapned ſuch a Sedition and Maſſacre at Argos, as could never be parallel'd in Greece. That City was then Governed in a Democratical way; but the Orators ſo ſtirred up the People againſt the Nobility, that ſome being accuſed, for fear conſpired againſt the Popular Government, to prevent their own ruine. Being hereupon ſuſpected and examined, ſome fearing to be tortured made away themſelves, and one in the midſt of his pains accuſed thirty of the moſt eminent in the City. The common ſort giving credit to this accuſation, put all thoſe to death unheard, and confiſcated their goods, and then many others being accuſed who were wealthy, they put them all to death, and in this manner made an end of ſixteen hundred. The Orators themſelves now were afraid, leſt in this ſo general a Maſſacre they themſelves alſo might unexpectedly miſcarry, and therefore ceaſed from their calumniations; which being underſtood by the multitude, as though they now forſook them, they put as many of them to death as they could find in the City, the vengeance of God thus repaying them.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 102. an. 3.

An unparalelled Sedition at Argos, the fruit of Antimonarchical Government.

44. The next year, the Lacedæmonians ſent one thouſand of their Citizens, and five hundred Argives and Bœotian Exiles, under the command of Polytropus into Arcadia, who there fortified Orchomenus, but meeting with Lycomedes the Mantinean, General of the Arcadians, he was ſlain in battel with two hundred men. The Arcadians after this deſiring help of the Athenians in vain, procured it of the Bœotians, who diſpatched into Peloponneſus Epaminondas and Gelopidas, to whom the other Bœotarchæ of their own accord left the command of the Army. When they were come into Arcadia, all the Confederates made up the number of fifty thouſand men; but yet the Thebans were very unwilling to invade Laconia. They conſidered that the Countrey was well fortified, and that the Lacedæmonians terrible every where would fight more deſperatley at their own doors. But the other preſſing them much to it, and ſome bringing word how the borders were deſolate of defence, and offering to conduct them into it, at length they invaded it in four ſeveral bodies, and bearing down all oppoſition, met together at Sallaſia, whence they marched for Sparta it ſelf, burning and conſuming all things in their paſſage. Six hundred years had the Dores now inhabited Laconia, Idem ad ann. 4 Xenoph.

Epaminondas invadeth Laconia.

Sect. 4.

Plutarch. & Corn. Nepos in Ageſilao.

nia, and for all this time not an Enemy had dared to appear in it, ſo that this unuſual ſight cauſed great tumults in the City, the women having never before ſeen as much as the ſmoak of War, nor the men able to endure a Siege. Ageſilaus contained them within, beſtowing them as he found convenient in ſeveral places, for the defence of the City, which had no other walls than the bodies of it's Inhabitants. He was much moved at the arrogance of the Enemy, who challenged him by name, as the cauſe of theſe diſſentions, to come out and fight; yet ſo contained himſelf, as taking great pains for the preſervation of his Country, he ſhewed clearly, that if he had not been, the City could not have continued.

Iphicrates ſent to aſſiſt the Spartans.

His conduct is cenſured by Xenophon.

45. The Bœotians laboured to provoke the Spartans to fight, bidding them either do it, or confeſs themſelves to be inferior to their Enemies; to which they anſwered, that when they ſaw occaſion, they would not fear to try a battel with them. They left then the City, and making great waſte of all Laconia, returned into Arcadia. The Spartans in the time of this their extremity, had promiſed liberty to ſuch of their Slaves as would fight for them, and ſent to Athens to procure aſſiſtance from that State, which the Ambaſſadors procured to be decreed, eſpecially by this motive, that the Lacedæmonians had ſaved that City, at the end of the Peloponneſian War, when the Thebans were earneſt for its utter deſtruction. They made choice of Iphicrates for the General in this Expedition, who otherwiſe a man of excellent conduct, yet is judged by Xenophon to have been far overſeen in the management of this employment. For having loitered at Corinth, and the Thebans being about to return home, he ought to have fortified Cenchrea, where they had the moſt convenient paſſage, and when he ſent to ſpie whether they had paſſed Oneus, he ſent both all his own and the Corinthian Horſe, whereas few had been ſufficient to ſpie, and better for a ſpeedy retreat; and hereby he loſt no fewer than twenty men, and the Thebans returned without any great moleſtation. The Lacedæmonians having got four thouſand Auxiliaries, beſides one thouſand Slaves newly manumitted, and many men out of the neighbouring Towns, thought themſelves then able to try a battel; yet convenient for them firſt to ſend to the Thebans about a peace. They offered it might one theſe terms; that Meſſene ſhould be reſtored by them, and the Laconians left to their liberty. Moſt enclined to receive theſe terms, till Archidamus riſing up, ſaid, that peace was not to be received upon ſuch unequal conditions by them, who were wont to give and not to receive it; that Meſſene was juſtly deſtroyed three hundred years before, and could not be reſtored, but to the great diſtreſs and dammage of the Lacedæmonians.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 102. ann. 4.

Epaminondas returning queſtioned for his life.

46. But Epaminondas having to his great honour reſtored Meſſene fully (the grounds being divided, and all things done) after eighty five days ſpent in this Expedition, returned home, and being in his way moleſted by Iphicrates, purſued him to the walls of Athens. But there was a Law at Thebes, which made it capital for any one to retain the chief command longer than was in that caſe provided by the conſtitutions of the City, new Magiſtrates being to be choſen the beginning of the new moneth Bacatius. This Epaminondas knowing to have been made for the good of the City, would not keep it to the dammage thereof, but continued his command four moneths longer than his Commiſſion warranted. After his return, he and his Colleagues were accuſed, and he permitted them to lay all the blame upon himſelf. They being hereby freed, no man expected any defence from him, as having nothing to ſay for himſelf. He appearing, denied nothing that his adverſaries objected, confeſſed what his Colleagues ſaid to be true, and refuſed not to undergo what the Law inflicted, only he made one requeſt to them: that this might be written upon his Tomb: Epaminondas was puniſhed with death by the Thebans, becauſe he conſtrained them at Leuctra to vanquiſh the Lacedæmonians, whom, before he was General, none of the Bœotians durſt once look in the face; and for that in one battel he not only ſaved the Thebans from ruine, but alſo reſtored liberty to all Greece; and brought matters to that paſs, that the Thebans fell upon Sparta, and the Lacedæmonians had enough to do to preſerve themſelves; and left not off till Meſſene being reſtored, he beſieged their City. Having ſaid this, the People affected with joy ſet up a laughter, and none of the Judges dared to paſs ſentence.

Plutarch in Pelopida & Corn. Nepos in Epaminonda.

Ælian. var. hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 42.

Pauſan. in Bœoticis.

Xenoph. lib. 7. Diodorus.

47. In the ſame year, according to Diodorus, but the next, according to Xenophon, Epaminondas was ſent again into Peloponneſus to the aſſiſtance of the Arcadians, Argives, and Eleans, who afreſh had made War upon the Lacedæmonians. The Lacedæmonians and Athenians had lately eſtabliſhed a League betwixt themſelves

Epaminondas again invadeth Peloponneſus.

ſelves on theſe Terms: That each ſhould command the Army five days in their courſe, which before was ſolely left to the Spartans. The Athenians hearing of the coming of Epaminondas, ſent Chabrias with an Army to ſtop his paſſage. He coming to Corinth, with the Lacedæmonians and other Allies, made up an Army of twenty thouſand, and then all joyning together fortified the paſſage into Peloponneſus, making a Ditch and a Wall croſs the Iſthmus from Cenchrea to Lachæus. But Epaminondas obſerving at what place the Guards were weakeſt, there with ſome difficulty brake through, harazed the Country, had Sicyon and other places delivered up to him, but coming to Corinth was gallantly repulſed by Chabrias, who ſallying out of the City, and getting advantageous ground, not only ſuſtained his charge, but did good execution upon the Aſſailants. At this time two thouſand Gaules and Spaniards were ſent by Dionyſius Tyrant of Sicilie to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, who arriving at Corinth, the Græcians to try their Valour led them out againſt the Enemy. They behaved themſelves very well, did good ſervice againſt the Bœotians, many of whom and their Allies they ſlew, for which receiving great commendations and rewards beſides, they returned in the latter end of Summer into Sicilie.

Xenoph. Diodorus ad Olymp. 103. ann. 1.

The Arcadians fall out with the Thebans.

48. The Thebans being returned home, the Athenians conceived indignation againſt them, through the complaints of Lycomedes the Mantinean, who urged it was an unworthy thing for the Arcadians, being more noble (as the only antient Inhabitants of their Country) and more deſerving, to be commanded by the other, and follow them in the War. Being much puffed up with ſuch conceits, the Thebans began to be alienated from them, and the Eleans bore them Malice, becauſe they could not obtain of them the Towns which the Lacedæmonians had taken from them. Things being at this paſs, came Phyliſcus of Abydus, ſent from Ariobarzanes the Perſian Satrapa, with much Money, to perſwade the States to Peace. The Thebans yet would not come to any concluſion, alleging that Meſſene ought to be exempted from the juriſdiction of the Spartans, with which he being offended, not enduring that old pretences ſhould be again revived, he left two thouſand men already paid to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, and returned into Aſia. The Arcadians having choſen Lycomedes their General, ſent him into Laconia with an Army, where he took by ſtorm Pallene, and therein put to the Sword three hundred of the Lacedæmonian Garriſon Soldiers. To return the like unto them the year following (the firſt of the one hundred and third Olympiad, wherein Pythroſtratus the Athenian was Victor) Archidamus was ſent into Arcadia with the Confederates, and a new ſupply of men ſent from Dionyſius. He took Caryæ, and put all therein to the Sword, and going on in his attempts, Ciſſidas the General of the Sicilian Forces, pretending he had ſtaid his full time ſet him by Dionyſius, would needs be gone; but in his way was circumvented by the Meſſenians, and was forced to crave aid of Archidamus.

49. He haſtned to relieve him, and in his march the Arcadians and Argives oppoſed themſelves, whom charging with great reſolution, he got a moſt famous Victory, killing ten thouſand of his Enemies without the loſs of one man; ſo that as the Prieſts of Dodona had ſung (that it ſhould be a Fight without Tears to the Lacedæmonians) yet the Meſſage being come to Sparta, Ageſilaus, the Senators, and the Ephori, are all ſaid to have wept for joy. As this ſucceſs revived the Spirits of the Spartans, which had been almoſt extinct by the Battel at Leuctra, ſo, as Diodorus telleth us, the Arcadians now fearing their in-roads, for their better ſecurity built them one great City, twenty of the Menalian and Parrhaſian Villages being taken in for the ſite thereof, though Pauſanias will have Megalopolis built two years before. The Thebans and Eleans only rejoyced in the misfortune of their Friends the Arcadians, as tending to the humbling of them. The Thebans caſting much in their Heads how to obtain the principallity of all Greece, reſolved upon ſending an Ambaſſage to the Perſian King to contract a ſtraight League and Alliance with him, and aſſembling the Confederates they pretended a neceſſity thereof, becauſe Euthycles the Lacedæmonian was now with the King in behalf of that State. They ſent Pelopidas, with others for the Arcadians, Eleans, and Argives: The Athenians alſo underſtanding hereof ſent Timagoras and Leon. Pelopidas being very famous even in Aſia for his Valour, by his demeanour got all the favour from the reſt. He urged the King with the merits of the Thebans, who had never of all Greece born Arms againſt him, or his Anceſtors, either of old in the Median War, or of late in aſſiſtance to Ageſilaus, and he extolled their Valour, ſhewing that the reaſon why the Arcadians were of late overthrown by the Lacedæmonians, Megalopolis now built according to Diodorus.

Pelopidas ſent by the Thebans to the Perſian King.

was becauſe of their abſence. For the truth hereof he appealed to Timagoras the Athenian, whom being at odds with his Collegue, he drew off to his party. He obtained of Artaxerxes what he demanded, viz. that Meſſene ſhould be exempted from the Juriſdiction of the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians ſhould abſtain from the Sea, and all the other Cities be left to their own Laws. Laſtly, that the Thebans ſhould be eſteemed the near Friends and Allies of the Empire.

Getteth much credit by his Ambaſſie.

50. This employment got Pelopidas abundance of Credit (who not long after was ſlain in a victorious Battel, fought in the behalf of the Theſſalians againſt Alexander the Tyrant) but Timagoras returning home received a great preſent from the Perſian, and being accuſed by his Collegue of ſiding with Pelopidas was put to death. The Thebans, though they had got what they deſired of the King, yet their deſign came to nothing, for the Commiſſioners of the Cities firſt refuſed to take the Oath of this new League, and then moſt of the Cities themſelves after the example of Corinth, the anſwer of which was, that there was no need of this new Engagement. This Plot then of Pelopidas having not taken good effect, Epaminondas thought of another to reduce the Arcadians and Allies to Obedience; and that was, firſt by ſubduing the Achæans, to which purpoſe he went again into Peloponneſus. He eaſily effected this, and receiving an engagement from them to continue faithful to the Thebans, returned, for which being much blamed by the Arcadians, and the reſt of that faction, Governours were ſent from Thebes into the ſeveral Cities, who bringing in the popular Government, thereupon drove away many of the principal men, who uniting themſelves, ſeized again upon their ſeveral Cities, and then ſtood no more Neuters, but openly declared for the Lacedæmonians. So this ſecond device of the Thebans came to nothing; and the Arcadians were preſſed both by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. At this time Euphron the Sicyonian, a man of great power in his Countrey, perſwaded the People to bring in the popular Government, which done, and he with others being choſen Prætors, he murdered ſome of his Collegues, expelled the reſt, and openly eſtabliſhed a Tyranny. The Aſſociates he put off by doing them pleaſures, through which the Argives being incouraged, together with him fell upon the Phliaſians, and brought them to great ſtraights, becauſe of their faithfulneſs to the Lacedæmonians, wherein they excelled beyond Precedent, no adverſity nor any advantage being able to affright or allure them from it, as is largely diſcourſed by Xenophon. The Athenians ſent Chares with relief to them, who overcame the Argives in two Fights, and reſtrained their violent attempts againſt them.

Xenoph. ut ſuprà Diodorus ad Olymp. 103. ann. 2.

Stirs about Sicyon.

51. But Æneas the Symphalian, General of the Arcadians, judging things not to be at Sicyon as they ſhould, ſeized upon the Caſtle there, and forced Euphron to leave the Town, and give up the Haven to the Lacedæmonians. Yet a Sedition following in the Town he took occaſion thereat, and repoſſeſſed himſelf, joyning with the people againſt the Nobility, but the Caſtle being held by a Garriſon of Thebans, he thought there was no long continuing without their leave, and ſo taking money with him, went to Thebes, to procure the good will of the people there. Thither ſeveral of his adverſaries followed him, to withſtand his deſign, and finding that he wan upon the Magiſtrates and Senate, to hinder the progreſs of the buiſneſs, killed him in the Caſtle, at ſuch time as the Senate was ſitting there. One of them taking all the fault upon himſelf, made ſuch a diſcourſe in his own defence, by telling what the Thebans themſelves had lately done in the like caſe, and by other arguments, that Euphron was pronounced juſtly ſlain, and he was abſolved. Yet being carried to Sicyon he was honorably buried in the Forum, and worſhiped by the people as one of their greateſt Benefactors. The Phliaſians now had by the aſſiſtance of Chares taken Thymia, which was fortified againſt them by the Sicyonians, but their Exiles had ſeized upon Oropus; the Sicyonians and Arcadians recovered the Haven at Sicyon, and no body aſſiſted the Athenians at Oropus, but all forſook them, ſo that it was committed to the truſt of the Thebans till the controverſie about it ſhould be decided. Lycomedes ſeeing them diſſatisfied with their Allies, drew the Athenians to enter into ſociety with the Arcadians. The Conditions were, that the Athenians, in caſe Arcadia was invaded, ſhould ſend Succours of Horſe, without being conſtrained to invade Laconia.

The Athenians enter into ſociety with the Arcadians.

And conſult how to become maſters of Corinth.

52. The Athenians as ſoon as this was done, caſt in their Heads how they might make Corinth their own, through the perſwaſion of Demotion; which being known there, their Soldiers were diſmiſſed, and the Alliance broken betwixt them.

This made the Corinthians, who now had gotten ſo new and potent Enemies, look about them for their own ſecurity; and to this end levying all the force they could, they made alſo their peace with Thebes, in which they would have the Lacedæmonians concluded, ſaying, they were conſtrained to this accommodation; but the Lacedæmonians giving them, and all other their Confederates leave to provide for themſelves (which was accepted by the Phliaſians and others) ſaid they would perſiſt in the War, and commit the Iſſue to God, being reſolved never to conſent that Meſſene, which they had received from their Anceſtors, ſhould be taken from them. The condition of this Peace was only that each City ſhould enjoy its own; for the Corinthians flatly refuſed to enter into a ſociety of Arms, becauſe they would not offend thoſe that had well deſerved of them, but preſently a contention was revived betwixt the Phliaſians and Argives about Thymia, which was ſeized on, and held by the later, notwithſtanding all that could be objected. At the ſame time were twelve ſhips, under the Command of Timocrates, ſent to the aid of the Lacedæmonians by Dionyſius the younger (who now had ſucceeded his dead father) which they uſed in the ſtorming of Sellaſia, and then the Fleet returned back into Sicily. At this time Artaxerxes ſent once more to mediate about a peace, which was ſubmitted to by the Cities, and ſo the Laconian, or (as it is alſo called) the Bœotian War ended, after it had continued above five years.

Artaxerxes procureth another peace.

Xenophon, Diodorus ad Olymp. 104. an. 1.

53. But in the very next year ſuch ſparks were kindled, (firſt betwixt the Eleans and Arcadians) as brake out at length into a mighty flame. Laſion a Caſtle of Triphylia firſt belonged to the Eleans, but being in the poſſeſſion now of them, and another while of the Arcadians, continual controverſies were moved about it. The latter now having it in their hands, the Eleans, by means of the Arcadian Exiles with them, ſeized upon it. This being taken in great diſdain by the Arcadians, they procured help from Athens, and recovered it by force; after which they overthrew the Eleans, and waſted their Territories to the City Gates. This put them upon craving aid of the Lacedæmonians, and deſiring them to invade Arcadia, who accordingly ſent Archidamus the year after the firſt action at Laſion. He took Cromnus, and therin leaving a Garriſon returned; but after his departure the Arcadians recovering the place, and going into Elis, gave the management of the ſolemnities of the one hundred and fourth Olympiad now drawing on, to the Piſæans, who by old and fabulous arguments pretended it once to have belonged unto them. For this purpoſe they ſeized on Olympia before-hand, and going on when the time was come in the management of the exerciſes, the Eleans with all their ſtrength fell in upon them, and with incredible boldneſs ſo laid about them, that they put the Arcadians to flight, and though they could not keep the place, yet with great honour retreated to their City, having never before been at all accounted of for valour. This Olympiad, becauſe the Piſæans managed it by force, was not regiſtred in the Annals of the Eleans, neither is it certain who overcame in the courſe, Phocides the Athenian being named by Diodorus, but Eubotus the Cyrenæan by Pauſanias, in the ſecond of his Eliacks.

The Eleans and Arcadians at odds.

The Piſæans put in poſſeſſion of Olympia are fall'n upon by the Eleans at the time of the ſolemnities.

Diodorus ibid.

54. At this time Epaminondas labouring all manner of ways to get the Soveraignty of Greece for his Country-men; perſwaded them as a means hereto firſt to obtain the Dominion of the Seas. He ſhewed it was an eaſie thing for thoſe who were ſtrongeſt at land, to obtain, by inſtancing in the Lacedæmonians, who though in the War with Xerxes they furniſhed out but ten ſhips for two hundred of the Athenians, yet for their power on land were obeyed by them. By this, and other arguments, he got them to ordain that one hundred Gallies ſhould be provided, and that the Rhodians, Chians, and Byzantians ſhould be invited to joyn with them in theſe preparations. He himſelf going with a little Force to theſe Cities, induced them to ſide with the Thebans, and ſo terrified Laches the Athenian, who indeavoured to croſs his deſign, that though he commanded a ſtrong Fleet, yet did he quit theſe parts. During his abſence, ſome of the Theban Exiles having a great deſire to change the Government into an Ariſtocracy, drew into their plot three hundred horſ-men of the Orchomenians, who when they were about to execute their deſign, it was revealed by ſome principal contrivers to the Bœotarchæ. The Thebans had conceived a grudge againſt the Orchomenians of a very long date, ever ſince that City having paid Tribute to them formerly, was exempted from it by Hercules. Having now then an opportunity to vent their malice, they firſt put to death the three hundred horſ men, then taking the Town, they put to the ſword all the men, ſold the Woman and Children, and ſo utterly deſtroyed Orchomenus. This cruelty was utterly deteſted by Epaminondas, who ſaid, if he had Epaminondas perſwadeth the Thebans to look after Sea matters.

The Thebans deſtroy Orchomenus.

been preſent, he would have in no caſe ſuffered ſuch wickedneſs to be committed by the Thebans.

Pauſanias in Bœoticis.

Xenoph lib. 7.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 104. *ann.*2.

Stirs betwixt the Arcadians and Mantineans.

55. The Arcadians having the Olympian Temple in their power, the Magiſtrates converted the money thereof to the paying of their Epariti, being the ſtrength of their Army. This the Mantineans firſt proteſted againſt as Sacrilege, and ſent the money which was due from them for the payment of the Soldiers, which being taken as an affront from the other, they called the Mantinean Magiſtrates before the Council of the ten thouſand, who refuſing to appear, they ſent to fetch them by force, but being repulſed, at length others in the Council appeared for them, being of their opinion, that the money was not to be touched, which would brand them for ever with a note of infamy. This was decreed by the Council, which the great ones ſeeing, and apprehending in what danger they were, ſent to the Thebans to tell them, that except they would come in time Arcadia would wholly revolt to the Lacedæmonians. The moſt ſober men amongſt the Arcadians hereupon perſwaded the Council to ſend to the Thebans, to proteſt againſt the coming down of their Army un-ſent for; and by reſtoring to the Eleans the Temple, to make peace with them. All took the oath of the League, and amongſt the reſt the Governour of Tegea, who lay in Garriſon with three hundred Thebans; but the great ones who feared to be called to account for the money, prevailed with him to lay hold upon the Mantineans and other Arcadians, who at Tegea were making merry for the peace. But the Mantineans making demand of their Citizens, promiſing if they had done amiſs they ſhould appear before the Council, the Theban General was at a ſtand, knowing not what to do, and at length diſmiſſed the priſoners, purging himſelf by ſaying, he heard the Lacedæmonians were about to invade Arcadia, and that ſome of the Arcadians had deſigned to betray Tegea into their hands.

Iidem & paulo aliter Polybius lib. 9.

Epaminondas again invadeth Peloponneſus.

56. Though they believed him not, as knowing the contrary, yet they diſmiſſed him, but ſent to Thebes to accuſe him as worthy of death, for attempting a matter ſo contrary to the good underſtanding betwixt the States. But Epaminondas excuſed him, laying the blame upon the Arcadians, who having drawn the Thebans into the War, would offer to make peace without their conſent, and thereby were guilty of Treachery: and he plainly declared, that the Thebans would march into Arcadia, and there aſſiſt their Friends. The Mantineans and others underſtanding this, ſent to Athens and Sparta to deſire aid, laying open the deſign of the Thebans plainly to be this: To weaken Peloponneſus, and bring it all into ſubjection to themſelves. They jealous of this, entred into a League with them, wherein it was provided, that each State ſhould have the command over the Army in their own dominions. Whilſt this was a doing, Epaminondas marched from Thebes, leading with him, beſides the Bœotians, ſome Theſſalian Horſe, and Soldiers out of Eubœa. When he came to Nemea there he ſtaied a little, having a great deſire to meet with the Athenians; but underſtanding that they paſſed by Sea into Peloponneſus, he aroſe and moved towards Tegea. Having notice in his way that Ageſilaus with the whole power of Lacedæmon was come into Arcadia, and that the City muſt needs thereupon be deſolate, he marched in all haſte thither, and had become abſolute Maſter of it, but that by meer divine Providence (as Xenophon himſelf acknowledgeth) a certain Græcian gave notice of his intention to Ageſilaus, who ſent word in all haſte to Sparta, willing them to ſtand upon their guard, with promiſe to be with them as ſpeedily as poſſible.

Sets upon Sparta and returneth to Mantinea.

His Horſe put to flight.

57. Archidamus his ſon being there left, ſet the old men and boys upon the Houſes to annoy the Thebans with ſtones, and diſpoſed ſo of thoſe that were fit to fight, in the ſeveral places of the City, that though Epaminondas had continued his march all night, yet found he that his deſign was betrayed, and ſuch was the oppoſition he found, that although he choſe the ſteepeſt deſcent into the Town, to have the upper ground, yet was he repelled, the Lacedæmonians loſing the moſt in their too long purſuites. Then underſtanding the Lacedæmonian and Arcadian Forces to be all coming to relieve Sparta, he thought it not wiſdom to hazard a battel with them all; but judging that Mantinea would be left naked, and at this time of the year the Inhabitants would be much abroad in the fields about their Corn and their Cattel at paſture, he thought it fit to try if he could ſurpriſe them all, and ſent before the Horſe for that purpoſe. At this time it hapned well for the Mantineans, that ſix thouſand Athenians under the command of Hagelochus were come through the Iſthmus into the City, who upon their deſire, notwithſtanding they ſhould have to do with ſuch Horſe as exceeded theirs in number, and the beſt eſteemed of in all Greece, reſolved to do their utmoſt in their behalf. In the engagement they had the better of it, and thereby preſerved all that the Mantineans had without their walls. Epaminondas after this thinking with himſelf that he muſt be gone within a few days, the term of his commiſſion being almoſt expired, was full of various thoughts. If he ſhould leave thoſe, for the aid of whom he was ſent, to be beſieged by the Enemy, he ſaw he ſhould loſe the honour he formerly had obtained, eſpecially ſeeing he had been repulſed at Sparta by ſo ſmall a number, and now alſo had miſcarried at Mantinea: and he conſidered that by this Expedition of which himſelf was author, he had given occaſion to the Lacedæmonians, Arcadians, Achæans, Eleans, and Athenians, to enter into a ſtraight League of offence and defence. From theſe reaſons he concluded he could not in honour depart without a battel, in which if he overcame, he ſhould make amends for all, and if he ſhould die, ſuch a death could not but be glorious, which ſhould be undergone in an endeavour to make his Country Miſtreſs of Peloponneſus.

His caſe how it ſtood in reference to his return or ſtay.

58. Ere long the Armies of the Lacedæmonians and Mantineans appeared, conſiſting, with their allies, of twenty thouſand Foot, and about two thouſand Horſe. To the Bœotians were aſſiſtants the Tegeatans, and ſuch other Arcadians as were moſt powerful and wealthy, the Argives, Eubœans, the Theſſalian Horſe which the Thebans brought, the Meſſenians, Sicyonians, and other Peloponneſians; the number of all which amounted to thirty thouſand Foot, and little fewer than three thouſand Horſe. This is much admired by Xenophon, that Epaminondas ſhould ſo diſcipline his Soldiers, that neither night nor day they ſhould ſhun any labour, refuſe to undergo any danger, to be contented with any kind of proviſion, and very ready to obey all orders. When he had ranged his men in order of battel, he led them not ſtraight on againſt the Enemy, but fetching a compaſs towards the Mountains of Tegea, and made as though he would there pitch his Tents. This rendred the Enemy ſecure, which he well underſtanding, formed his Battalia like a wedge, thereby to break them ſooner, and led with ſpeed againſt them, who now were all to ſeek, and in a confuſion, ſome haſting to bridle their Horſes, others to buckle on their harneſs, and all in a condition rather to ſuffer than act any thing. And leſt the Athenians ſhould relieve their Companions from the left wing, he placed a Party of Horſe and Foot in the hills to keep them in awe, by being continually ready to fall upon their reer.

The battel at Mantinea wherein Epaminondas was mortally wounded.

59. His expectation was not croſſed, for on what part he fell he carried all before him, the Enemy not daring to ſtand; but ruſhing more violently amongſt them, the Lacedæmonians taking notice of him, flocked to him, and laid at him amain with Darts, ſome of which declining, and fencing himſelf from others, thoſe that ſtuck in his body he took thence and retorted. Whilſt he heroickly thus contended for the Victory, he received a wound from one Anticiates a Spartan, who gave him ſo mortal a ſtroak with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and a piece of the tronchion in his breaſt. By the vehemency of the wound he ſank down, and then enſued a moſt bitter conteſt about him: but the Thebans inflamed with wrathful indignation at this ſad miſchance, with great ſlaughter compelled their Enemies to give back, but knew not how to improve the Victory. For neither Foot nor Horſe purſued them flying, but continued ſtill in the ſame place, and at length went off careleſly, inſomuch that many of the Foot came into the hands of the Athenians. Which ſo falling out, another thing hapned than men generally had expected. For almoſt all Greece being here gathered together, one State againſt another, in two factions, every one ſuppoſed, that when they ſhould once come to fight, they that overcame would obtain the Dominion over the reſt who ſhould be forced to ſubmit to their yoak: But God ſo poyſed the affairs, ſaith Xenophon, that both ſides, as if they had overcome, erected a Trophy, not being hindred by each other. Both ſides alſo as Conquerours gave up the ſlain, and as Conquered received their dead by compoſition. And whereas both ſides ſaid they had the better of it, neither obtained thereby either Countrey, City, or Dominion, other than they before enjoyed; but a greater diſturbance thereupon followed in Greece. So much for theſe matters ſaith our Author; as for what is behind, perhaps ſome other will take care to commit them to writing, and ſo he endeth his Hiſtory with this battel; though he lived almoſt three years after it, as we have it from Laertius. Anaximenes alſo of Lampſacus, who began his Hiſtory with the beginning of the gods and mankind (and therein in twelve Books almoſt comprehended all the affairs of the Greeks and Barbarians,)

A. M. 3642.
Ol. 104. an. 2.
V. C. 390.
Ante Æram Chriſti 362.
Artax. Mnem. 41.

Xenophon with it endeth his Hiſtory.
As alſo Anaximenes and Philiſtus.

Barbarians,) finiſheth it with the Battel at Mantinea, and the death of Epaminondas. So did Philiſtus his Hiſtory which he wrote of Dionyſius the younger in two Books.

60. Epaminondas being carried alive into his Tent, the Phiſicians affirmed that as ſoon as the Dart ſhould be drawn out of his body he would die. He then called for Diaphantus to declare him General of the Army; but it being anſwered he was ſlain, he bade them ſend for Iolaidas, but it being anſwered that he was dead alſo, he adviſed the Thebans to make peace, whilſt with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the Office of a General. Underſtanding of his approaching end, he inquired of his Armour-bearer if his Shield was ſafe; (which to have loſt was a great diſhonour) It being anſwered it was, he asked which ſide had the Victory; anſwer being made the Bœotians, then ſaid he, It's time for me to die, and comforting his friends who mourned that he ſhould die childleſs with this anſwer, that he left behind him two daughters, the battel of Leuctra and Mantinea, which ſhould propagate his fame to all poſterity) he thereupon cauſed the Dart to be drawn out, and ſo expired. This was the end of the worthieſt Soldier that ever Greece brought forth, and hardly to be parallel'd in any other Country, all the Virtues which in others were but ſingular having concentred and united themſelves in him. In ſtrength both of body and mind; in Eloquence, Juſtice, Temperance, Wiſdom, Magnanimity, and Sincerity, he excelled all men, and ſo far in Military skill, the art of a General, and in valour, that he could not adequately be called a Valiant, Politick, Wary, Bountiful, Induſtrious, or Prudent Captain; all theſe Titles and many more being due unto him. His modeſty was incredible, ſhewing it ſelf eſpecially in this, that after the Victory of Leuctra, and many other rare atchievements, he refuſed not to go in the Expedition into Theſſaly, in quality of a private Soldier. He was grave, yet affable and courteous, as a means to all thoſe virtues, having great inſight into all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, being therein inſtructed by Lycis the Tarentine, a Pythagorean. But * enough will be ſaid in his commendation, if this be added, that the City Thebes before the birth and after the death of Epaminondas was ever ſubject to the command of others; but as long as he had to do in the management of the affairs thereof, was the head of all Greece; from which may be gathered, that this man was of more conſequence than the whole City.

Vide Diodorum ut ſupra. Juſtin lib. 6.

Valerius Max. lib. 3. cap. 2. ext. exemp. 5.

Ælian. var. hiſt. l. 12. cap. 3.

Pauſan. in Aridicis.

Ciceron. Epiſt. lib. 5. cap. 12.

Epaminondas his character.

* Corn. Nepos in vita Epamin.

Juſtin.

Diodorus.

Corn. Nepos: Plutarch in Ageſilao.

Ageſilaus blamed.

His death.

61. For with Epaminondas all the ſtrength of the Theban Commonwealth was extinct, as if he had not only died, but all the reſt of the Citizens with him, who as before him they did nothing memorable, ſo now after were famous for nothing but their overthrows and diſaſters. After this battel of Mantinea, all the Græcians being tired out with War, entred into a League offenſive and defenſive together, out of which Ageſilaus would have excluded the Meſſenians. But Artaxerxes ſtood for them, as having Territories as large and fruitful as the Laconians, whereupon the Lacedæmonians burning with an implacable grudge againſt them, would not ſubſcribe, and alone by themſelves refuſed to be comprehended in the League, hoping ſtill to recover Meſſenia. This reflected ſomething upon Ageſilaus, who out of an inſatiable thirſt after War, had by his utmoſt endeavour hindred the union of Greece, and the burying of publick quarrels. And he ſeemed to increaſe the infamy, by undertaking an Expedition ſhortly after into Ægypt, though it was by his ſervice in his decrepit old age, to get ſome money for the ſupply of the now very poor and exhauſted State. For it appeared a thing unſeemly, for the beſt man in Greece, and one who had filled the world with his fame, to go ſerve a mean man, and a Traytor, and venture his life, credit and all, for a little gain, when becauſe of his old age, he had refuſed the Office of General at home, and in his own Country, though for the liberty of Greece. But he thought nothing too much wherein he might ſerve the Commonwealth, and in this reſpect undervalued his own honour, and having ſerved in Ægypt in a condition far unworthy of him, after he had received two hundred and thirty talents of Silver as a reward from Nectanebus, died in his return, when he had lived eighty four and reigned fourty one years. A moſt excellent Captain, in whom Nature inwardly made amends for that wherein outwardly ſhe had been deficient, moſt ambitious of glory, and yet of exceeding great humility, which he ſhewed in his houſe, and in his conſtant converſation. Though his juſtice was overruled by his paſſion in the buſineſs of the Theban War, yet generally he held it moſt ſacred, and as a puniſhment for his default therein, that great Glory whereby he even reigned over Greece till then, was afterwards (together with the ſplendor of the Lacedæmonian greatneſs) much eclipſed by the riſing Fortune of Epaminondas.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 104. an. 3.

62. Artaxerxes King of Perſia, and Ageſilaus of Sparta, died both in the ſame year, and the next after the death of Epaminondas. And the ſame year the Peace of Greece was again broken by ſome Arcadians, who having been tranſlated out of the neighbouring places into Megalopolis, took occaſion at ſome words of the League (which gave leave to all to return home) to quit the City and return to their old Habitations. The other Megalopolitans endeavoured to reduce them by force, and thence inſued a great controverſie, they calling in to their help the Mantineans and the reſt alſo of the Arcadians and Eleans. The Megalopolitans that ſent to the Athenians for aid, who ſent them three thouſand Foot, and three hundred Horſe, under the command of Pammenes. He with this Force took ſome of the Towns, and terrified others into compoſition, and ſo reduced them all to Megalopolis. The Year following Alexander the Phærean Tyrant ſubdued ſeveral of the Cyclades and took thence abundance of Captives. The Athenian Garriſon commanded by Leoſthenes oppoſed him in Peparethus, whereupon he attacqued the Athenian Gallies, and took them, together with one belonging to Peparethus, and ſix hundred Priſoners. The Athenians enraged hereat, condemned Leoſthenes, and ſent Chares with a Fleet into thoſe parts, who ſpending his time in ſcaring the Enemies, but oppreſſing the Confederates, thereby contracted an ill name. For going to Corcyra he there cauſed ſuch a Sedition, as could not be ended but in the ruine of many, and committed other things which much tended to the diſgrace of thoſe that ſent him. With this Year Diodorus concludeth his fifteenth Book, having, according to his promiſe, related ſuch things as hapned before the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia, and ſuch, as together with other affairs of the Greeks related by others, ſhew that peace, ſecurity, and order, were things little akin to Antimonarchical Government.

Stirs amongſt the Megalopolitans.

Learned Men during this period.

Hippocrates.

Soranus.

63. Of Learned Men Contemporary with this Period, in the firſt place is to be remembred Hippocrates native of the Iſland Cous, Prince of all Phyſicians. He was the Son of Heraclidas and Phænarete, the twentieth in deſcent from Hercules, and the ninteenth from Æſculapius. Some have written that he was born in the firſt Year of the eightieth Olympiad. But a certain paſſage mentioned in his life of his curing Perdiccas of an Erotick Feaver, argueth him at this time to have been famous. This Perdiccas King of Macedonia (who having reigned twenty eight Years according to Euſebius, or according to others fifty three, died about the third of the ninty third Olympiad) fell in love with Phila his Father Alexander's Concubine, but Modeſty forced him to conceal his Grief, till he fell into a Conſumption and languiſhed. Hippocrates by the motion of his Eyes found out the cauſe of the Diſtemper, and told Phyla it was in her power to ſave the King's life, whereupon ſhe was willing though with the impairment of her own credit to redeem it. The like Story is told of Eraſiſtratus the Phyſician, who diſcovered that Antiochus the Son of Seleucus was in love with his Fathers Concubine, which Galen * mentioneth, adding that he had made the ſame diſcovery in a certain Woman.

Lib. περὶ τοῦ προγινώσκειν.

64. Hippocrates grew ſo famous in his Art, that Artaxerxes Longimanus hearing of him, ſent for him, with large offers to come and cure his Army, then ſeized on by the Plague. But he ſaid it was not fit for him to touch any Perſian Gold, or cure the Barbarians who were Enemies to the Greeks. The Letters of entercourſe betwixt the Perſians and him, are amongſt others yet extant. Having lived as ſome ſaid eighty five Years, but as others ninty, or one hundred and four, or one hundred and nine, he died amongſt the Lariſſeans, in the firſt of the ninty fourth Olympiad. He left two Sons, Theſſalus and Draco; but the Fruit of his Brain hath been far more effectual for the propagating of his name to all poſterity, wherein he hath not only been a benefactor to the myſtery of Medicine by his writings, but alſo by his religious care of the Integrity of thoſe who ſhould profeſs it. For he framed an Oath to be taken by all that entred into his School, which for his honour, and the ſhame of thoſe who have more reaſon to be convinced of their Duty, together with the information of the ignorant, it is convenient to exemplifie.

His Oath.

65. I ſwear by Apollo the Phyſician, and Æſculapius, and Hygia; and call all the Gods and Goddeſſes to witneſs, that to the utmoſt of my ſtrength and judgment I ſhall obſerve what now I ſwear and covenant by writing. Nomely that I will eſteem as my Parents my Maſter who taught me this Art, and thankfully communicate to, and ſupply him with all things neceſſary both for ſuſtenance and convenience, as alſo account of his Iſſue as mine own brethren, and if they deſire to learn the Art, teach them without any Wages or Contract. That I will communicate the Precepts, and what I have heard, and the whole diſcipline to mine own Children, to his who taught me, and my Scholars who have given their Names and Faith in this Oath, and none elſe whatſoever. That I ſhall alſo to my utmoſt Power and Judgment preſcribe an wholeſom courſe to the Sick, and defend them from all harm and Injury. Neither through the procurement of any will I give, or cauſe to be given, any deadly Medicament. Neither in like manner will I procure any Woman to miſcarry of her burthen; but preſerve my Life and Age alwaies chaſt and pure from all Wickedneſs. Neither will I cut any of the Stone, but leave this Work to be done by thoſe Chirurgions who are skilful in it. If I come into any Houſe I will do it for the Health of the Sick, ſhuning all ſuſpicion of injury, or Corruption, eſpecially as to the filthineſs of Venery both towards Women and Men, free Perſons and Slaves. Whatſoever things I ſhall ſee or hear, either in adminiſtring Phyſick or otherwiſe in common entercourſe, which I think ought not to be told abroad, I will conceal them. Now if I ſhall religiouſly obſerve this Oath, and in no caſe break it, let me live in great eſteem alwaies an happy Life amongſt all Men, and reap ample Fruit from mine Art. But if I break it and forſwear myſelf, may the contrary happen to me.* Much skill in Phyſick therefore corrupteth not the converſation; for though a little Philoſophy may occaſion Atheiſm, yet a great deal is an Antidote againſt it, not ſuffering a man to reſt in ſecond cauſes; but diſcovering a neceſſity of looking higher. But more concerning this, as alſo to the praiſe of this excellent perſon, may be ſaid in a particular account of the original, cauſe, profeſſors, ſucceſſion, progreſs and matter of the art of Medicine.

66. Beſides Hippocrates, there lived at this time (a) Democritus of Abdera the Philoſopher, who died in the ſame Year, and was well known to him, having alwaies laughed at the folly of men. Four Years after, (b) Socrates the Athenian, the Father of Ethicks, was made drink Poyſon for ſpeaking againſt plurality of Gods and the Superſtition of his Country-men; Anytus having firſt procured Ariſtophanes the Poet, and then Melitus to accuſe him. But afterwards the Athenians repenting of what they had done, in way of mourning forbad all publick Exerciſes, and then animadverting upon his accuſers, condemned Melitus to death, and the reſt to Exile. (c) Plato at this time being twenty eight years old, and having heard Socrates eight Years, went to Megara to learn the Mathematicks of Euclide, who now alſo flouriſhed. The Year after, (d) Sophocles died; ſix years after, Euripides the Prince of Tragick Poets. At this time alſo flouriſhed (e) Cteſias the Phyſician often mentioned before, who concluded his Hiſtory in the third year of the ninty ſixth Olympiad, (f) Ariſtotle Father of Peripatetick Philoſophy was born at Stagira a City of Macedonia, in the firſt year of the ninty ninth Olympiad. In the third year after, (g) Demoſthenes the famous Orator. (h) Eudoxus of Cnidus, a famous Aſtrologer and Geometrician, flouriſhed about the one hundred and third Olympiad, who (i) found out the ſuppoſed motion of the Stars from Weſt to Eaſt, unknown to the Greeks in the time of Democritus. Zeno the Citiean, Father of the Stoicks, was born in the third year of the one hundred and fourth Olympiad. And we muſt not forget Thucydides, nor Xenophon the Scholar of Socrates, and equal to Plato, with whom he exerciſed ſome emulation. He was a great Philoſopher; the greateſt maſter of eloquence in his time, inſomuch that for the ſweetneſs of his ſtile he got the name of Attick Muſe; and ſo great a Soldier, that his retreat with the Greeks out of Perſia after the death of Cyrus, to one who duly weigheth all circumſtances, will appear to have ſurpaſſed the exploits of Alexander the Great.

(a) Anonymus.
(b) Diodorus, Laertius.
(c) Laertius.
(d) Suidas.
(e) Diodorus.
(f) Laertius.
(g) Anonymus.
(h) Laertius.
(i) Seneca natural. queſt. l. 7. c. 3.

SECT.

SECT. V.

From the beginning of the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia, to the Monarchy of Alexander his Son.

Containing the ſpace of thirtyone Years.

1. M*Acedonia* having been formerly called Emathonia from Emathon a certain King, and afterwards Macedonia from Macedon the Son of Oſiris, or as others ſay of Jupiter and Æthra, was bounded on the North and Northweſt by the Thracians and Illyrians, on the South and Southweſt by Theſſaly and Epirus, and on the Eaſt with the Ægean Sea.

2. The people were firſt called Pelaſgi, ſaith Juſtin, and the Countrey Bæotia. In Pæonia, which afterwards became part of Macedonia, Telegonus reigned, the father of Aſtriopæus an eminent Warrier and friend to Priamus in the ſiege of Troy. On another ſide Europus reigned. But Caranus an Argive, the ſixteenth in deſcent from Hercules, ſome five years after the fall of Sardanapalus, by the command of an Oracle led a Colony into theſe parts, and having ſetled himſelf by force reigned twenty eight years. Cœnus ſucceeded him and reigned twelve, then Tyrimas twenty eight, Perdiccas a Prince much renowned fifty one, after him Argæus twenty eight, Philip the firſt as many, Euripus twenty ſix; in whoſe infancy the Illyrians invading his Kingdom, his ſubjects carried him in his Cradle into the field, thinking he being preſent could not but be victorious, or that his people durſt not forſake him, who was unable to defend himſelf. Alcetas after him reigned twenty nine years, Amyntas the firſt fifty years, to whom Darius Hyſtaſpis ſent for earth and water as tokens of ſubjection. Alexander his ſon who ſlew the Ambaſſadors ſent to his father, reigned fourty three years, and by marrying his ſiſter Gygæa to Bubares the Perſian, grew into ſuch grace with Xerxes, that he obtained all the Region between Olympus and Hermus to be united to his Kingdom, and yet during the War held ſecret intelligence with the Græcians, diſcovering to them all his intents and purpoſes. He left three Sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip, the eldeſt of which ſucceeded him, whoſe ſtory is ſometimes by pieces related by Thucydides. Perdiccas left behind him Perdiccas and Archelaus his baſe ſon. Perdiccas was drowned in a Well by Archelaus his Guardian at ſeven years of age, the murtherer to excuſe himſelf alledging to his mother that he fell in by chance as he haſtily followed a Gooſe that way.

Euſeb. in Chronico. Juſtin. l. 7. Velleius lib. 1. Solinus cap. 15.

Euripus.

Alcetas.

Amyntas.

Alexander.

Perdiccas.

3. Archelaus having diſpatched his brother out of the way, did the ſame by Alcetas his Uncle, and Alexander his Couſin, ſon to Alcetas; and yet though he came in this way, is ſaid to have done many things to the advantage of the Nation, which is uſual with Uſurpers. He ſought by all means to draw Socrates to him, and greatly loved and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two ſons, Archelaus and Oreſtes, Archelaus ſucceeded him, and reigned ſeven years, ſome confounding father and ſon together, and making this, who reigned but ſeven years, to have ſucceeded Perdiccas. Archelaus at the end of ſeven years was ſlain in hunting, either by chance or on purpoſe by Craterus, called by Ælian Cratenas, who relateth the cauſe to have been for that having married his daughter to him, he took her away and gave her to another. Cratenas had enjoyed the Kingdom ſcarce two or three days when he was alſo ſlain by others. Oreſtes then a Child ſucceeded, who was ſerved by his Guardian as his father had ſerved his Pupil, being killed by Æropus one of the blood Royal, who held the Kingdom ſix years: the ſame who at firſt denied paſſage to Ageſilaus when he returned out of Aſia. He left three ſons, Pauſanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pauſanias when Ariſtotl. Politic. lib. 5.

Vide Raleium lib. 4. cap. 1.

Archelaus.

Var. Hiſt: lib. 8. cap. 9.

when he had reigned one year was ſlain by Perdiccas the ſon of Tharcileus or of Philip, who being ſon of Perdiccas, and Grand-ſon to Alexander the Rich, was preſerved when Archelaus the Baſtard ſlew his brother Perdiccas, his Uncle Arcetas, and Alexander his Couſin German.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 96. ann. 3.

Amyntas.

(a) Idem ad ann. 4.

(b) Ad Olymp. 99. ann. 2. Xenoph.

4. (a) Amyntas was by the Illyrians driven out of his Kingdom, but reſtored by the Theſſalians, held it (though very unquietly) twenty four years. Some wrote how after his expulſion Argæus obtained the Kingdom for two years, till again he recovered it. (b) When he was overcome by the Illyrians, having little hope to recover his Kingdom, he gave the Olynthians a great part of the grounds adjacent; but after his reſtitution required it again. They refuſed to reſtore what was freely given them. He hereupon gathered an Army, and ſent to the Lacedæmonians for aid, who ſent Phæbidas to him with ten thouſand men at ſuch time as he ſurpriſed Cadmea, the Citadel of Thebes, having ſent before his brother; but the Olynthians had taken much of his Kingdom, and made themſelves Maſters of Pella the Metropolis of Macedon. He had iſſue by his wife Eurydice, three ſons; Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip; beſides one daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had alſo by his ſecond wife Gygæa three ſons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterwards ſlain by their brother Philip. Alexander reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pauſanias the ſon of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, who declared his fidelity in this as well as other things, towards the Children of Amyntas, that Eurydice flying to him with her two Children, Perdiccas and Philip, he defended, and ſuſtained her. Againſt him Ptolomy Alorites made War, and both called Pelopidas the Theban to judge betwixt them, who having decided the controverſie (as Plutarch ſaith) took Philip the Kings brother, and thirty other of the ſons of the chief Nobility, as Hoſtages to Thebes. But within a year after Ptolomy murdred him, not being his baſe brother as ſome ſuppoſe, ſaith Scaliger. Juſtin telleth us he was ſlain at the procurement of his mother Eurydice, who having agreed to marry her ſon-in-law (which muſt be this Ptolomy Alorites, and thence cometh he to be called the brother of Alexander) Conſulted in her husbands life time how ſhe might kill him, and transfer the Kingdom to the Adulterer, which being betrayed by their daughter, Amyntas for his Childrens ſake would not uſe any ſeverity towards her, little thinking ſhe would really accompliſh her wicked deſign upon any of them at length.

Alexander.

Ptolomy Alorites.

Philip educated at Thebes.

Diod. ad Olymp. 103. ann. 4.

5. Ptolomy Alorites held the Kingdom of Macedonia for three years, and then was ſlain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander, who ſucceeded him and reigned five. He was then ſlain in battel againſt the Illyrians according to Diodorus; but Juſtin ſaith he periſhed by the wicked practices of his mother, as Alexander did. Perdiccas left behind him a young ſon, of whom Philip his brother was conſtituted Guardian in the ſecond year of Ochus King of Perſia, in the firſt year of the one hundred and fifth Olympiad, Callimedes being Archon. Plutarch maketh Philip to have been carried as an Hoſtage to Thebes by Pelopidas. Diodorus writeth that his father gave him as an Hoſtage to the Illyrians, and that they committed him to the Thebans to be kept, who delivered him to the cuſtody of Polymnis the father of Epaminondas, with whom he was brought up, though Plutarch ſaith he lived with Pammenes, and thence became an emulator of Epaminondas. Juſtin ſaith he was twice given as an Hoſtage by his brother; once to the Illyrians, and another time to the Thebans, which mightily conduced to his education; for being three years at Thebes, he laid the foundation thereof in a City full of antient ſeverity, and in the houſe of Epaminondas a great Scholar and General. If he there continued but three years, he ſeemeth to have returned home at the beginning of the reign of his brother Perdiccas, but Diodorus ſaith, it was after his death that he made an eſcape from Thebes. At firſt, as it ſeemeth from Juſtin, he bore but the Office of a Tutor, or Guardian to his Nephew; but afterwards great Wars hapning, in which the expectation of the Child could nothing avail, he was conſtrained to take upon him the Dignity of King by the people.

First Guardian of his Nephew,

Then King.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 105. ann. 1.

A.M. 3645. Olymp. 105. ann. 1. V.C. 394. Ochi, 2.

6. For the Macedonians having lately received an overthrow from the Illyrians, were much dejected thereat. The Pæones their neighbours made incurſions, and the Illyrians prepared for another terrible invaſion. The King of Thrace was minded to ſet up Pauſanias, and the Athenians Argæus (both ſons of the late Uſurper Æropus) having ſent Mantias with three thouſand men, and a Fleet readily furniſhed for that purpoſe. But Philip ſeeming nothing to be diſcouraged at theſe things, by his good language wherein (he was very able) and his courteous

Sect. 5.

He Conquereth all difficulties.

courteous deportment, bare up the Spirits of his People. He amended military Diſcipline, and inſtituted the Macedonian Phalange. Underſtanding the Athenians to have a great deſire to recover Amphipolis, and to have Argæus eſtabliſhed King, he left that City to its own Liberty. The Pæonians and the King of Thrace he bought off with money, and overthrew Argæus at Methone aſſiſted by Mantias the Athenian, by which Victory he mightily incouraged his men.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 105. ann. 2.

7. The year after he made Peace with the Athenians, who readily accepted of it, becauſe he was content to quit Amphipolis, giving him great commendations alſo for his clemency, in that he had ſuffered the Remainders of their Army at Methone to depart with their Lives and Liberty into Attica when he had them at his mercy. Being thus freed from the Athenian War, hearing that Agis King of the Pæonians was dead, he invaded, and brought them into Subjection to himſelf. Then entred he the Country of the Illyrians with about ten thouſand Foot, and ſix hundred Horſe, whoſe King Bardylis ſent to treat with him, offering that each ſhould retain ſuch places as they already held; but he returned anſwer, that though he was alſo deſirous of Peace, yet would he admit of no terms, except the Illyrians would quit all the Cities which belonged to his Kingdom. Bardylis then met him with a ſtrong Army, and a great and bloody Battel was with great animoſity on both ſides fought, wherein at length Philip had the Victory, and the Illyrians having loſt above ſeven thouſand men, were forced to relinquiſh all places belonging to Macedonia.

Idem ad ann. 3.

8. After he had brought under all the Illyrians as far as the Lake Lychnitis, and made an honourable Peace with them, he returned into Macedonia with great Fame. The year after, for that the Inhabitants of Amphipolis had ſeveral ways provoked him, and miniſtred occaſion of Quarrels, he went againſt them with a great Force, and having caſt down the Wall with his battering Rams, entred the City, whence baniſhing all his Enemies he granted indemnity to the reſt. This place being very conveniently ſited for his occaſions in Thrace, much conduced to the progreſs of his affairs. For hereupon he preſently took Pydna, and to ingratiate himſelf with the Olynthians (the friendſhip of whom was very neceſſary for ſuch as would grow great) having taken Potidæa, he gave up Pydna with the Grounds belonging to it into their hands. Then going to Crenidæ, he inlarged this Town with an acceſſion of new Inhabitants, and called it after himſelf Philippi. Here were rich Mines of Gold, which having been formerly neglected he now ſo far advanced as to bring him in yearly a Revenue of one thouſand Talents, which mightily tended to the advancement of his Affairs, and the Majeſty of his Kingdom, for now ſtamped he that piece of Golden Coyn, called the Philipick, raiſed great Forces, and afterwards with Bribes drew many Græcians to betray their Countrey. But he proceeded in his Affairs with more confidence and freedom, for that now the Athenians were buſied in the Social War begun this year, and thereupon could not take ſuch care as was neceſſary, for the preſervation of Amphipolis.

Crenidæ changed into Philippi.

The Social War.

9. The Social War, which continued three years, had its original from the revolt of the Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantians, from the State of Athens. The Athenians ſent againſt them two Generals, Chares and Chabrias, who when they came to Chius, found there Succors ſent from other Cities, and from Mauſolus the Prince of Caria. They fell upon the City; Chares by Land, and Chabrias by Sea, but the later whilſt too boldly he ventured by himſelf into the Haven, was ſlain, and then the reſt retreated without any thing done. One * in his Life telleth us, that in this Expedition he was a private man, but excelling the Commanders in Military Skill and Fame, was more regarded by the Soldiers; which thing proved his deſtruction. For endeavouring firſt of all to enter the Haven, when he had broken in none followed him, ſo that being compaſſed with Enemies his Gally was ſunk, out of which caſting himſelf, he might eaſily, as the reſt did, have ſwom to his Friends and eſcaped; but preferring an honourable death before an ignominious Life, fighting alone was ſlain, in all Fights having been daring, though otherwiſe he was accounted ſlow and heavy.

* Corn. Nepos.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 106. an. 1.

10. The year following, for any thing we underſtand, was ſpent altogether, or for the moſt part, in preparations on both ſides to decide the controverſie in a Sea fight. The Athenians having diſpatched before under the Command of Chares a Fleet of ſixty Ships, ſent other ſixty after, which they committed to the truſt of Iphicrates and Timotheus, two of the moſt noble in the City, who were to joyn with Chares, and in equal Authority to manage the War. On the other part the Confederates with one hundred Gallies waſted the Iſlands Imbrus and Lembus, and coming

Sect. 5.

coming into Samus, after they had haraſed the Country, beſieged the City both by Sea and Land, and making depredations upon many other Iſlands under the juriſdiction of Athens, got much money thereby. But the Athenian Generals uniting their Forces reſolved to beſiege Byzantium, which the Confederates underſtanding, raiſed the Siege at Samus to come and relieve it. They were about to joyn in Battel, when ſuddainly aroſe a mighty Tempeſt, which made Iphicrates and Timotheus decline the Fight, but Chares would not acquieſce in their opinion, but ſent to Athens and accuſed them to the People, as wilfully having neglected a good opportunity of doing their Countrey Service, which ſo incenſed the heady Multitude, that they condemned them in many Talents. Corn. Nepos relateth, that Meneſtheus the Son of Iphicrates, and Son-in-Law to Timotheus, was ſent as General, and they two as his Adviſers. That the action was about Samus wherein Chares miſcarried, and whereupon he accuſed them to the People. That Iphicrates being quitted, Timotheus was fined ten Talents, which he being unable to pay departed to Chelus, where dying, the Multitude repented of their raſh Judgment, and remitting nine parts of the Fine, cauſed his Son Conon to pay the other, towards repairing of the Wall. So that the Walls which Conon the Grandfather built with Spoils, Conon the Grand-ſon was forced to repair at his own coſt and diſgrace of his Family. This was the laſt Age of the famous Athenian Captains, which concluded with the lives of Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, thoſe that followed being not at all worthy the reckoning.

In vitis Timothei & Iphicratis.

11. Chares having got all the Power into his own Hands, aſſiſted Pharnabazus the Perſian Satrapa, who had revolted from his Prince, and was ſo rewarded for his Service after the Victory, that he was enabled to pay his Army. This was very acceptable to the Athenians at firſt; but when the King had once ſent to expoſtulate the matter with them, and a rumour was abroad that he intended with three hundred Ships to aſſiſt the Enemies in the Social War, they were far otherwiſe affected, inſomuch that they reſolved to make Peace with the Revolters, which was eaſily done, they being no leſs deſirous of it. Philip having the year before married Olympias the daughter ef Neoptolemus late King of the Moloſſians, and Niece (not Siſter as Plutarch hath it) to Arymbas or Aribbas the preſent, was much envied for his good ſucceſs by the three Kings of the Thracians, Illyrians, and Pæonians. Since they had been overthrown and ſubdued by him, they had no ſtrength ſeverally to incourage them to a Revolt; Yet joyning their Forces together they were confident of good Succeſs. But before they had compleated their Army, and whilſt they were as yet incompoſed, he ſet upon them ſuddainly, and eaſily reduced them to obedience.

Diodorus.

Alexander the Great is born.

12. The ſame year being the firſt of the one hundred and ſixth Olympiad, the ſixth of Artaxerxes Ochus, Elpinices being Archon, Alexander the Son of Philip and Olympias was born at Pella in Macedonia, in the Attick moneth Boedromion, if that be true which Ariſtobulus relateth in Arrianus, that being thirty two years and eight moneths old at his death, he died on the laſt day, but one, of the moneth Thargelion. If this be true, (and Ariſtobulus, if any, might have occaſion to know it) then could it not be on the ſixth day of the moneth Hecatombæon, as Plutarch relateth, whoſe error (into which others alſo fell) aroſe from thence, becauſe antiently the Macedonian moneth Lous fell in with the Attick Hecatombæon. The ſame Author telleth us in the life of Alexander, that Philip received at the ſame time three ſeveral meſſages: One, that the Illyrians had received a great overthrow from Parmenio his General: Another that he had got the Prize at Olympia with his ſwift-footed Horſe: And the third concerning the Birth of Alexander: and this was a little after he had taken Potidæa. But Potidæa was taken two years before, as appeareth not only from Diodorus, but alſo from Demoſthenes; and ſtrange it is, that Philip ſhould not know of his Sons Birth a good while before he could have intelligence of the Olympian Solemnities, concerning which Judgment was given on the ſixteenth day of the moneth: So that the relation of Trogus is more true, that he received two meſſages at the ſame time: viz. one of his Victory over the Illyrians, and another of his Prize at Olympia. The ſame day that Alexander was born, was the (a) Temple of Diana at Epheſus ſet on fire by (b) one who deſired by ſuch an act to be rendred famous to all poſterity, as he confeſſed upon the Rack. But the Council of Aſia decreed that none ſhould dare to name him; and for any thing we certainly know, his name is buried in Oblivion, or at leaſt, there is incertainty in it; for though Theopompus in his Hiſtory recorded it, and ſome (c) tell us it was Heroſtratus; yet by another he is called Lygdamis. (d) This being deſtroyed by this means

A. M. 3649.
Ol. 106. an. 1.
V. C. 348.
Ochi, 6.
Philippi. 5.

Vide Uſſerum in Annal. Vet. Teſtam. p. 271.

Juſtin lib. 12. cap. 16.
(a) Plutarch in Alexandro.
(b) Val. Max. l. 8. c. 14. ext. exemp. 5.
Gell. l. 2. c. 6.
(c) Val. ibid.
Strabo l. 14. p. 640.
Solin. cap. 40.
(d) Strabo idem.

Sect. 5.

means a more excellent Structure was raiſed, the women contributing their Ornaments, and the men their Goods; to this purpoſe money being alſo made of the old Pillars. Timæus as (e) one, or Hegeſias the Magneſian as (f) another, ſaid the reaſon of the burning to have been, becauſe Diana that night being buſied in Midwives work at the travel of Olympias, had no leiſure to look to her Temple, which Jeſt Plutarch counteth ſo frigid, as to have been able to have quenched the Flame. Perhaps both conceits put together might have done it.

(e) Cicero. l. 1. de Divinat. & 2 de natura Deorum.

(f) Plutarch.

The Phocian or Sacred War.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 106. an. 2.

13. The year after wherein Calliſtratus was Archon, began the Phocian or Sacred War (as it was called) in Greece, which aroſe upon this occaſion. The Lacedæmonians after their overthrow in the Battel of Leuctra, had been fined much money by the Council of the Amphyctiones, to the uſe of the Thebans, for ſeizing upon Cadmea their Citadel, which was exacted of them. The Phocians alſo having plowed up a great piece of the Ground belonging to the Temple at Delphos and called Cyrrhæa, were alſo fined by the ſame Common-council of Greece, many Talents. This Decree being confirmed by all the Græcians, and about to be executed by ſeizing on their Grounds, Philomelus a man of principal note amongſt them told them the Decree was unjuſt, and perſwaded them by force to reſcind it, for that they had advantage enough ſo to do, becauſe the Oracle it ſelf was once in their poſſeſſion, and tuition, citing to that purpoſe two Verſes out of the ſecond Book of the Iliads of Homer. He perſwaded them therefore to get it again into their Hands, promiſing, if they would give him power, to do it, and all other things for their profit and honour. They made him General, with full power according to his deſire, who ſtraight went to Sparta, where he preſſed alſo the injuſtice of the Amphyctiones toward that State about their Fine, and ſhewing how it alſo concerned them to have the Sentence of the Council nulled, he perſwaded Archidamus the King to joyn with him. He ſupplied him with money, wherewith raiſing Soldiers he invaded the Temple, and beating back the Locrians that came to oppoſe him, with great Slaughter, pulled the Decrees of the Council from the Pillars, and brake in pieces the Tables wherein were regiſtred the Names of the condemned. He cauſed it to be told abroad, that he neither intended to rob the Temple, nor to have any other diſhoneſt intention; but the Bœotians not believing him, in their general Council decreed, that the Temple was to be recovered, and gave order for Levies for the ſame purpoſe. Philomelus in the mean time fortified the place, and made all poſſible proviſion for defence. He invaded the Locrians, who killing ſome of his men, refuſed to reſtore the Bodies, alleging the Law, that all ſacrilegious perſons ought to be caſt out unburied: but he on purpoſe ingaged with them in another Skirmiſh, and with ſome of theirs redeemed them formerly denied. Then forced he the Propheteſs to aſcend the Tripos to give him advice concerning the War. She out of fear, told him he might do whatſoever he pleaſed.

A.M. 3650.
Ol. 106. an. 2.
V. C. 399.
Ochi, 7.
Philippi, 6.

The original of the Oracle at Delphos.

14. The Temple of Apollo Pythius, and the Oracle at Delphos, one of the two chief Cities of Phocis (Elatea being reckoned with it) till made a Commonwealth of it ſelf by the Lacedæmonians, was of antient Original, as appeareth by the (a) Poets making Agamemnon before his Expedition to Troy, to have received anſwer from it. The place thereof was accounted the middle of all Greece, and alſo the navil of the whole World, a Fable being invented (related by Pindar) that two Eagles (ſome ſay Crows) being ſent out, the one from the Eaſt, and the other from the Weſt by Jupiter, met here. The (b) Original of the Oracle is to be fetched from Goats, which feeding about that Cave or Hole (where afterwards the Temple was built) were ſeen to skip and utter Voices unuſual to others and themſelves at other times, which the Herdſman perceiving, went thither himſelf, and was affected in like manner, withal foretelling things to come. This being blazed abroad, and many who flocked thither experiencing the ſame thing themſelves, it came to be judged an Oracle. For a time one gave anſwer to another indifferently; but many were tranſported with the fury, and leaping down into the Hole were utterly loſt, ſo that it was judged beſt, to ſet apart one woman, who ſhould attend conſtantly, and a certain Engine to be made, wherein ſtanding ſafely over the place, ſhe might give out the Oracle. This Engine having three feet, came thence to be called Tripos; the woman was named Pythia, from asking, ſaith Strabo, and the firſt of all others was called Phemonoe. Virgins at firſt were only deſtinated to this work, till one of them being raviſhed by Echecrates the Theſſalian, women of about fifty years, but in the habit of Virgins were only allowed of. The Temple in more antient times was (a) Odyſſ. θ. 75. vide Strabo. lib. 9. p. 417. D.

(b) Diodorus. ad Olym. 106. an. 1.

was very famous for the Oracle; for the ſitting of the Amphictiones, the Pythian Games, and the riches thereof; but in the time of Strabo it was decayed in reputation, being nothing ſo much accounted of, which we may gather from it's poverty, ſeeing by gifts it was not able to recover the wealth taken out of it in after times, as it did that which it enjoyed in the time of Homer, having been rifled before it was recruited again by the preſent of Crœſus, his Father Alyattes, the Italians, Sicilians, and others.

15. Philomelus ſent to Athens, Lacedæmon, and the other eminent Cities of Greece, to excuſe himſelf, profeſſing he only intended the recovery of the Temple into the poſſeſſion of his Country-men, and not with any deſire or deſign to pillage the treaſures, adding, that he ſhould be always ready to account for the money or gifts belonging thereto. He deſired that if any out of ill will to the Phocians bare Arms againſt them, that they would enter into a League with them, or at leaſt to forbear all Hoſtility. The meſſengers effectually ſolliciting according to their inſtructions, brought the Athenians and Lacedæmonians to enter into ſociety, and to promiſe aid; but the Bœotians, with the Locrians and ſome others, thought the contrary, and reſolved that the Temple was to be reſcued. Philomelus ſeeing what kind of a brunt he muſt undergo, laboured always to ſtrengthen himſelf, for which purpoſe abſtaining yet from the Treaſures of the Temple, he took a great ſumme of money from the Citizens of Delphi, wherewith he hired Soldiers. Having got together a conſiderable force, he took the field, and overthrew the Locrians who made head againſt him. They then ſent to Thebes requiring aid for Apollo and themſelves, and the Bœotians thinking their demand to be juſt, deſirous to ſhew their Devotion, and conceiving it to concern them that the Decrees of the Amphyctiones ſhould not be nulled, ſent to the Theſſalians, and the reſt of the Amphyctiones to joyn with them in this War againſt the Phocians. The Council meeting together, then Decreed, that War was to be made upon them, which cauſed great motions and factions throughout all Greece.

Idem ad an. 3

The Council of Amphyctiones decreeth War againſt the Phocians.

16. Some thought Religion bound them to relieve the God, and puniſh the Phocians as ſacrilegious perſons; but others inclined to defend them, according to their particular intereſts. The Bœotians, Locrians, Perrhæbæans, Dorians, Dolopians, Athamanians, Achæans, they of Pthiotis, the Magnetes, Ænianes, and ſome others were for reſcuing the Temple. With the Phocians ſtood the Athenians, Lacedæmonians, and ſome others of Peloponneſus, whereof the Lacedæmonians were now more than before concerned, for not having paid their Fine impoſed on them by the Amphyctiones within the time limited, at the laſt ſitting they were Fined one thouſand Talents more. This made them deſire that the Decrees of the Council ſhould be invalid, as well as the Phocians, and being unwilling to contract the Odium of making War in their own name upon that account, they were glad to do it as it were in the name of the other, endeavouring withal to get the Temple into their own hands. Philomelus, when there came certain intelligence that the Thebans would invade them with a ſtrong Army, to furniſh himſelf with mercenaries, ſeized upon the Treaſury of the Temple: then offering half as much more wages as formerly, he had multitudes offered themſelves to the ſervice. With ten thouſand he invaded the Locrians, who being aſſiſted with the Bœotians oppoſed him, and having the worſt of it, afterwards taking ſome of his men as they were gathering forage, put them to death as ſacrilegious perſons condemned by the Amphyctiones. This the Phocians complaining of, procured of their General, that to ſtop ſuch proceedings for the time to come, he ſhould puniſh ſuch priſoners as he took in the ſame kind. After this the Armies removed into other parts of the Countrey, where ingaging in Woody and difficult places of paſſage, the Phocians were overmatched by the number of their Enemies, and being put to flight, Philomelus, after he had omitted nothing worthy of a Captain, for fear he ſhould come into the power of his Enemies, leaped down a Rock, and periſhed with the fall. With Diodorus conſenteth (a) Pauſanias as to the kind of his death, though (b) Juſtin writeth him to have been ſlain in the beginning of the fight.

Philomelus ſlain.

(a) In Phocicis.
(b) lib. 8.

17. Onomarchus his Collegue taking upon him the Office of General after his death, gathering up the reliques of the Army, therewith retreated home, and the Bœotians rejoycing they had wrought the deſtruction of ſo infamous a man, returned into their own Countrey, hoping his hap would deter others from the like Enterprize. But the Phocians (being perſwaded by Onomarchus, who himſelf had alſo been Fined by the Ampyctiones, and therefore for his own ends ſtirred them up Onomarchus ſucceedeth him.

Diodorus ad ann. 4.

up to continue the War) reſolved to perfect if poſſible what was begun, and to that purpoſe created him General. He as his Prodeceſſor had done, with large pay allured many unto him, corrupted the Theſſalians to quit the ſociety of the Bœotians, and invading the Territories of the Enemy took Thronium, forced the Amphiſſians to ſubmit, and waſted the grounds of the Dorians; he took Orchomenus in Bœotia; but beſieging Chæronea was worſted by the Thebans, and forced to retreat. At this time the Thebans, though deſerted by the Theſſalians, ſent over forces into Aſia to Artabazus, who had revolted from the King, and now began to decline after Chares the Athenian had left him. The War was renewed betwixt the Argives and the Lacedæmonians who had the better in a battel fought at Orneæ. Chares going into the Helleſpont took Seſtus, and Kerſobleptes the ſon of Cotys King of the Thracians, bearing ill will to Philip of Macedonia, drew all the Cities of the Cherroneſus to the party of the Athenians, except Cardia, into which the people were about to ſend Colonies. Philip conſidering that the Methymnæans ſuffered his Enemies to uſe their City ſeated in Magneſia for a refuge, and as a place convenient for carrying on the War, beſieged it. They held out againſt him for ſome time, and in the ſiege he loſt one of his Eyes with a ſtroak of an Arrow; but at length they deſired to be diſmiſſed with one ſute of Apparel apiece, and this being granted, he deſtroyed the City, and divided the grounds amongſt the Macedonians.

Philip beſiegeth Methymna, a Town ſituate in Magneſia.

18. After this he was called into Theſſaly by the Inhabitants againſt Lycophron Tyrant of the Pheræans, who in like manner deſiring aid of the Phocians, Phayllus the brother of Onomarchus was ſent to aſſiſt him with ſeven thouſand men. Him Philip worſted, and expelled out of Theſſaly. Onomarchus then, who had already attained the Dominion of all that Countrey in his mind, with all his ſtrength marched to the aid of Lycophron, and overmatching Philip, and the Theſſalians, in number of men, overthrew them twice with great ſlaughter, and ſorely diſtreſſed Philip, inſomuch that hardly containing his Soldiers in obedience, he preſently retreated into Macedonia. Onomarchus improving the credit this victory had got him, overthrew the Bœotians, and got Chæronea. Philip recruited himſelf, and returned into Theſſaly againſt the Tyrant, who being ſtraightn'd ſent again to Onomarchus, promiſing if his affairs ſucceded, to do his work in the Cities of Theſſaly. Onomarchus with twenty thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe was ready at his call, but ingaging in battel with Philip, and the Theſſalians, was utterly defeated by the power and courage of the Theſſalian Horſe, and fled amain with ſuch as could get away towards the Sea. It hapned that Chares the Athenian hovering then about the Coaſts with a fleet, ſaved many that took the Sea, and ſwom to his ſhips. But of the Phocians and their aſſiſtants ſix thouſand were ſlain, and as many taken, amongſt whom was Onomarchus, whom Philip cauſed to be hanged, and the reſt to be drowned in the Sea as ſacrilegious perſons. This battel hapned in the year wherein Mauſolus the famous Prince of Caria died, and Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclea a City in Pontus, was ſlain, to whom ſucceeded his ſon Timotheus, and reigned fifteen years. Clearchus having obtained the Tyranny, and his deſigns proſpering imitated in all things Dionyſius of Syracuſe, and inſlaved his fellow Citizens very magnificently twelve years.

Is twice defeated by Onomarchus.

Who getteth Chæronea, but is again utterly defeated by Philip, and is hanged.

Vide Juſtin. lib. 16.

19. The year after, being the firſt of the one hundred and ſeventh Olympiad, wherein Smicrinus of Tarentum was Victor, and Ariſtodemus Archon, Phayllus was made General in the room of Onomarchus his brother. He having plenty of money, therewith not only allured obſcure men, but the principal Cities of Greece to joyn with him in the War. The Lacedæmonians ſent him one thouſand Foot, the Achæans two thouſand, and the Athenians five thouſand, beſides four hundred Horſe. Lycrophon and Pitholaus the Phærean Tyrants, after the death of Onomarchus being deſtitute of ſuccour, were forced to quit their power by Philip and gathering together two thouſand men, lead them to the ſervice of Phayllus. With ſuch forces and thoſe of his own he invaded Bœotia, but was worſted ſeveral times, firſt at Orchomenus where he loſt many men, then at the River Cephiſus, and again at Chæronea. After this he invaded the Locrians, called Epicnemidii, ſeveral of whoſe Towns he took, and received ſome loſs from the Bœotians, who invading Phocis he came ſuddenly upon them and revenged himſelf. But having conflicted long with a Conſumption, not long after in great pain, as his impiety (ſaith Diodorus) had deſerved, he ended his life. He left for his Succeſſor Phalæchus the ſon of Onomarchus, who being but young, he joyned as Counſellour to him, one Mnaſeas his familiar friend. The Bœotians falling by night

Diodorus ad Olymp. 107. ann. 1.

Phayllus ſucceedeth Onomarchus.

And dieth of a Conſumption.

Sect. 5.

night upon them, ſlew two hundred of the Phocians with their Captain Mnaſeas, and within a while in a fight at Chæronea, Phalæus himſelf was alſo worſted, and many of his followers were ſlain. Philip of Macedon having reſtored the Theſſalians to liberty by taking away the yoak of the Pheræan Tyrants (which bound them ever after very faſt to him and his ſon) went towards the Pilæ, or Streights, to make War upon the Phocians; but the Athenians hindring his paſſage, thence he returned with great honour into his own Kingdom.

Stirs betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Megalopolitans.

20. Whilſt theſe things were adoing, the Lacedæmonians being at Enmity with the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, ſent Archidamus their King to invade them, who being too weak for them of themſelves, deſired aid of their friends. The Argives, Sicyonians, and Meſſenians helped them with their whole ſtrength, and the Thebans ſent them four thouſand Foot and five hundred Horſe. The Lacedæmonians had three thouſand Foot from the Phocians, and one hundred and fifty Horſe from Lycophron and Pitholaus, by the aſſiſtance of which forces they took Orneæ, a City of Argolis, before their Enemies could come to relieve it. The Thebans afterwards coming down, a battel was fought with equal ſucceſs, after which the Argives departed to their ſeveral homes, and the Lacedæmonians invading Arcadia, took and plundred Eliſſus, and returned unto Sparta. After ſome time the Thebans had the better of it at Telphuſſa, and after that in two battels more, wherein they killed many of their Enemies; but then again the Lacedæmonians by a notable victory recovered their credit, and the Armies returning home, a Truce was made betwixt them and the Megalopolitans. This was done whilſt Phalæchus in Bœotia took Cheroieda, and preſently loſt it again to the Thebans, who then with a numerous Army entred, and waſted Phocis, and then having taken ſome inconſiderable places with much booty they returned into Bœotia.

Idem ad ann. 2.

21. The next year the Thebans being ſpent with the Phocian War, ſent to Ochus the Perſian King to deſire a ſupply of money from him; who without any difficulty, or delay, beſtowed on them three hundred Talents. No memorable thing paſſed betwixt the Phocians and them this year, which was ſpent in skirmiſhes and mutual depredation. Two years after (a) Philip caſt out again Pitholaus the Tyrant, who had ſeized upon Pheræ, and ſetting upon the Cities of Thrace which belonged to Chalcis, took by ſtorm the Caſtle Zeira, which he demoliſhed, and forced other Towns to ſubmit to his yoak, (b) though upon the deſire of the Chalcidians, Charidemus had been ſent from the Athenians to help them, then lying in the Helleſpont. The (c) year following wherein was ſolemnized the one hundred and eighth Olympiad, whereof Polycles the Cyrenæan was Victor, having great deſigns in his mind, he haſted to get into his hands the Cities of the Helleſpont, and without any ſtroaks got Micylerne and Torone by treachery to be delivered up to him. Now he quarrelled with the Olynthians (becauſe his affairs were improved by ſucceſs) whom before he courted as fearing their power, which had been ever too much for his predeceſſors. 'Tis ſaid he pretended a quarrel becauſe they received his two half brothers, whom after he had taken in the Town he murdered; all things being lawful to him now that might any way ſerve his turn, all his affections and paſſions being ſwallowed up in his ambition, which made him not ſtick to break faith himſelf, and by his Gold to attempt others to do it. He thought it to no purpoſe to practiſe the winning of Olynthus, till he had firſt incloſed all their power within the Walls, and therefore he firſt overthrew them in two battels, and then beſieged the City, which attempting with many aſſaults and great loſs of men, at length it was betrayed into his hands by Euthycrates and Laſthenes the chief Magiſtrates, whom he had corrupted with money. He ſackt it, and ſold the Inhabitants with the reſt of the plunder, whereby he much enriched himſelf, and was enabled to buy in Cities which he daily did, having been adviſed by the Oracle at the beginning of his undertaking, to make his aſſaults with ſilver ſpears; inſomuch that he boaſted that his Kingdom was more increaſed by Gold than Arms.

(a) Idem ad ann. 4.

(b) Anagraphe Olympiadum.

(c) Diodorus ad Olymp. 108. ann. 1. Juſtin. lib. 8.

Philip getteth Olynthus.

Diodorus ibid.

22. The Athenians being ſenſible of his incroachments, jealous of his growing power, and warily providing for the liberty of Greece, ſupplied, as they might, ſuch as he fell upon with war, and now ſent up and down to the Cities to deſire them to value their liberty, and puniſh capitally ſuch as were treacherous amongſt them, promiſing them their alliance and utmoſt aſiſtance, in this work. And now at length by the ſpecial advice of Demoſthenes (the greateſt Wit and Orator of Greece) they openly declared themſelves his Enemies, and undertook the quarrel. But ſo far were the ſpirits of the Greeks degenerated, that this

The Athenians began to look to themſelves.

endeavour

Sect. 5.

endeavour of theirs could not counterwork the efficacy of his Gold, ſo that having a mind to take a Town that was ſtrongly fortified, and one of the place telling him it could not be done, he asked him if he thought it not poſſible for his Gold to get over the walls. He had in all the Cities up and down his inſtruments and ſecret workers, who ſought for a little gain to undermine the fortune of their own Country. After the taking of Olynthus, he celebrated the Olympick Games, and feaſted all Comers; and entertaining them with great magnificence, by this cunning ingaged many to betray their Faith.

Idem ad an. 1.

The Bœotians crave aid of Philip.

A remarkable accident.

23. The following year the Bœotians and Phocians mutually preyed upon each other, and ſeveral skirmiſhes hapned betwixt them, which produced no great loſs on either ſide. But Phalæcus the Phocian General, being accuſed to have ſtollen the ſacred money, was put out of his place, and three Generals ſubſtituted in his room, Democrates, Callias, and Sophanes, who were to make inquiſition about the money which was ſtollen, and call the Truſtees who had the management thereof, to account. The Chief of the Truſtees was Philo, who being not able to give an account, was racked, and confeſſed many of his fellow thieves. They had taken out of the Temple four thouſand Talents of gold after the rate of ſilver, and above ſix thouſand Talents of ſilver of ſuch preſents as Crœſus and others had ſent: and there wanted not ſome who affirmed as much to have been rifled out of this Temple, as Alexander afterwards found in the treaſures of the Perſians. Phalæcus was about to ſearch in the pavement for treaſure, hinted at by Homer; but when the Soldiers came to dig near to the Tripos, ſuch Earthquakes hapned, as deterred them from proceeding any further. The Phocians aſſiſted with theſe riches carried on the War, and by this time had got into their hand three ſtrong places in Bœotia; Orchomenus, Cheronea, and Corſias. The Bœotians being much preſſed herewith, having loſt very many men, and wanting money, ſent Ambaſſadors to the King of Macedonia for aid. Philip was very glad to find them in ſo weak a condition, deſiring to abate that Spirit which they had got at the battel at Leuctra, yet he ſent them a conſiderable number of men, becauſe he would not ſeem to be wanting to ſo religious a cauſe, as vindicating the right of the Oracle. At this time the Phocians building a Caſtle near Abæ, were fallen upon by the Bœotians, and ſhifting for themſelves into the neighbouring Towns, five hundred of them ſtepped by into a Chappel of Apollo near Abæ. Fire being left in their Tents, ſeized upon ſome Straw there, whence a great flame ariſing, caught hold at length of the Chappel, and therein burnt alive thoſe that had fled thither, for an example (as Diodorus accounteth it) to all ſacrilegious perſons.

(a) Orat. contra Cteſiphont.
(b) Orat. περὶ Στεφάνȣ.
(c) Idem ibid. Juſtin. lib. 8.

Philip lulleth the Athenians aſleep.

24. Philip being now imployed in the War of Thrace, which was to the great damage of the Athenians, to lull them aſleep, promiſed he would enter into a ſtraight league and alliance with them, and pretending fair things, ſo corrupted ſome of the chief Orators, (a) (Æſchines accuſeth Demoſthenes, and (b) Demoſthenes layeth the load upon Æſchines) that a peace was made up which continued ſeven years. (c) Demoſthenes adviſed them to ſend away their Ambaſſadors to Philip with all ſpeed, to ratifie the League, leſt he delaying the matter according to his cuſtom, ſhould ſtill proceed to incommodate their affairs. Accordingly five Ambaſſadors were diſpatched away, whereof one was Æſchines; but coming into Macedonia, they were there forced to ſtay till Philip had ſettled all things in Thrace, according to his own pleaſure, and paſſed through the Pylæ or Straights into Phocis. The Athenians hearing of his coming, notwithſtanding the place, were in great fear, and cauſed all their goods to be brought into the City. The Theſſalians and Bœotians earneſtly now deſired of him that he would undertake the conduct of all Greece againſt the Phocians; and on the other ſide the Ambaſſadors of the Phocians, Lacedæmonians, and Athenians, earneſtly dehorted him from the War. He hearing both ſides, being accuſtomed to double dealing, promiſed them he would do as all had deſired, and ſo making them ſecure hereby, ſeized upon the Straights of Thermopylæ.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 108. an. 3.

25. The Phocians having ſent to Lacedæmon for aid, procured one thouſand Foot-men of heavy Armour, which were commanded by Archidamus. Philip in conjunction with the Theſſalians with a ſtrong Army went down into Locris, where finding Phalæcus reſtored to his Generalſhip, he haſted to decide the controverſie by action, but the other lying at Nice, and perceiving himſelf too weak to fight, ſent to treat with him, and they agreed that he ſhould have freedom to depart with his men whither he pleaſed. Faith being given and received, he departed

He endeth the Phocian War.

departed with his Mercenaries to the number of eight thouſand into Peloponneſus, and the Phocians being thus deſerted, were forced to yield. So the War was ended by Philip without a ſtroak, in the tenth year after the beginning thereof, in the third year of the hundred and eigth Olympiad, according to Diodorus, when Archias was Archon: but as * Pauſanias writeth, in the firſt of this Olympiad, and in the government of Theophilus.

* in Phocicis.

Diodorus ibid.

Pauſan. ut prius.

26. Philip calling a Council of the Bœotians and Theſſalians, it was reſolved to remit the matter of the Phocians wholly to the judgment and ſentence of the Amphyctiones. They decreed that Philip as a reward for his good ſervice ſhould be inrolled in the number of themſelves, and have the double voice which the Phocians formerly had. That the Phocians ſhould be debarred from the Temple. That they ſhould have neither Horſe nor Arms till ſuch time as they had repayed the money which they had ſtollen from Apollo. All their Exiles and as many as were guilty of Sacrilege in their own perſons ſhould be accounted piacular, and it might be lawful to take them out of any place. All their Cities were to be levelled with the ground, and they reduced into Villages, not exceeding the number of fifty little Families apiece, and diſtant a furlong one from another. They were to pay to the Temple a yearly tribute of ſixty Talents, till the money ſtollen was made up. But from this puniſhment, Pauſanias telleth us the Abæans were excepted, who alone had not contaminated themſelves. The Council then took order for reſtoring of the Oracle, and for the eſtabliſhment of peace in Greece; and Philip having confirmed their Decrees, imbracing them all with ſingular kindneſs, returned into his own Kingdom, flouriſhing with great glory both upon the account of Piety and Martial matters. This Expedition made not a little for the enlargement of his Empire, and the improvement of his deſign already laid, to procure himſelf to be choſen Captain General of Greece, and to make War upon the Perſians.

The Phocians how puniſhed by the Amphyctiones.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 109. an. 1.

27. Two years after, and in the ſeventeenth of his reign, he invaded the Illyrians his old Enemies with a potent Army, took therein many Towns, waſted the Country, and with rich booty returned into Macedonia. Then went he into Theſſaly, where caſting out the Tyrants out of the Cities, he much won upon the People, having a deſign hereby to make uſe of their favour, as a decoy to bring in the affections of the reſt. And it failed not; for their neighbours led by their example, very readily entred into League with him. The year after he proſecuted this deſign to a further advantage, for Kerſobleptes the King of the Thracians much diſtreſſing the Greek Cities in Thrace, he exhorted them to joyn together, and with a ſtrong force going againſt him overthrew the Thracians in ſeveral battels, and forced them to pay the tenths of their Lands to the Kingdom of Macedonia. He built Forts in ſuch places as were convenient for the bridling of their power, whereby the Cities being delivered now from their fear, moſt gladly imbraced his alliance and ſociety. The year after this, Arymbas King of the Moloſſians died, who left a Son named Æacides, the Father of Pyrrhus, but Philip deprived him of the Kingdom, and gave it to Alexander the brother of his wife Olympias. * Another ſaith, that he deprived Arymbas yet alive, and expelling him the Kingdom ſetled Alexander therein.

Idem ad an. 2.

Philip overthroweth the Thracians.

Idem ad an 3.

* Juſtin. l. 7. & 8.

Diodorus ad an. 4.

28. The next Expedition Philip undertook, was againſt Perinthus a ſtrong City, ſituate upon the ſhore of the Propontis, the Inhabitants whereof in favour of the Athenians croſſed his deſigns. With his utmoſt might, he fell upon it, continuing the ſtorm without intermiſſion, by freſh men ſent in the place of the dead or wounded: he built Turrets higher than theirs, and with battering rams and mines brake down a part of the wall. But the defendants being relieved from Byzantium, manfully reſiſted, and built a ſtronger wall in the room of that which was thrown down. By this means the Siege being drawn on in length, and great talk being in Aſia of the power of the Macedonian, Ochus the Perſian King being now jealous of his power, thought it wiſdom to ballance him, and for that purpoſe gave order to his Satrapaes upon the Sea Coaſts to aſſiſt the Perinthians. They uniting their Forces together, gave them their utmoſt aſſiſtance, which with the natural ſtrength of the place inabled them to ſtand it out. For it was ſeated upon the cliff of a Peninſula about a furlong in length, the houſes were thick and high, riſing one rank above another, according to the aſcent of the hill, ſo that the whole Town repreſented the form of a Theatre. Hereby, though the wall was battered down, yet ſtopping the ends of the ſtreets, their defence was little diminiſhed, which Philip perceiving, and how all things neceſſary fer the War were abundantly ſupplied Beſiegeth Perinthus.

from

Marcheth thence to Byzantium.

from Byzantium, he left a ſtrong party under expert Captains to carry on the Siege, and with the reſt of the Army haſted againſt that City, the inhabitants whereof having ſent their men and arms to the Perinthians, were thereby much ſtraightned.

29. By this time the grudges betwixt Philip and the Athenians were ſo heightned, that now the Peace was held as broken on both ſides. Phocion the Athenian was ſent againſt Clitarchus the Tyrant of Eretria, who was made by Philip, and caſt him out, being by (a) Plutarch called Plutarch. (b) They ſent Aid alſo to the Byzantians, at the perſwaſion of (c) Demoſthenes, contained in the fourth Oration of his Philipicks. With them joyned the Chians, Coans, Rhodians, and other Greeks, which ſo terrified Philip, as he was glad for the preſent to yield to neceſſity, and made a Peace with them. For Demoſthenes having perſwaded his Citizens forgetting all committed in the Social War, to ſend relief to the Byzantians and Perinthians, and he himſelf being ſent Ambaſſador to the Cities, wrought ſo effectually with them, that beſides their ordinary Militia, they raiſed fifteen thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, and liberally contributed Money for their pay; at which time the Aſſociates deſiring that the ſum of the Tax might be ſet, Crobylus the Orator ſaid, that War had no ſet rate of allowance. At this time (d) Ateas King of Scythia being invaded by the Iſtrians, ſent to Philip for aid, promiſing him ſucceſſion in his Kingdom; which being ſent when as the Iſtrians retreated, he alſo ſent back the Macedonians, and recalled his Promiſe concerning the ſucceſſion. Philip hereupon demanded money to pay the men, but he alſo refuſing it upon pretence of Poverty, raiſed his Siege from Byzantium to go againſt him, and ſent Meſſengers before to let the Scythians know he had vowed to ſet up to Hercules a Statue upon the Bank of Iſter, and to deſire peaceable acceſs and receſs for that purpoſe. He anſwered, that if he pleaſed to ſend the Statue it ſhould be erected, but refuſed to give leave for him to enter his Borders with an Army, ſaying, that if he ſet it up by force, he would pull it down after his departure, and turn the Braſs thereof into Heads of Arrows. Philip entering Scythia, a Battel was fought, wherein he overcame them by Craft, who in courage exceeded, and took twenty thouſand women and children, with multitudes of Cattel, but neither Gold nor Silver. Twenty thouſand Mares of the choiceſt were ſent into Macedonia to breed, As Philip returned, the Triballi oppoſed themſelves, refuſing to give him paſſage except he would part with ſome of his Booty. He diſdaining the thing, forced his paſſage, but received ſuch a wound in his Thigh, that through it his Horſe was killed under him, and being taken up for dead, ſo little care was had for the Prey, that it was left. Iſocrates the Orator taking occaſion at this diſaſter, ſought by his ſecond Epiſtle to draw his mind to a peaceable inclination; but to no purpoſe.

He invadeth the Scythians.

At his return wounded and diſtreſſed by the Triballi.

(a) In Phocion.
(b) Diodorus ad Olymp. 110. an. 1.
(c) Plutarch in Demoſthen.
(d) Juſtin l. 9.

30. Two years after, having drawn moſt of the Græcians into Society with him, he longed after the Empire of all Greece, in his way to which the Athenians only ſeemed the main Obſtacle. He reſolved now to daunt them, and obtain his purpoſe, and for that end ſeized firſt upon Elatea a City of Phocis, and calling his Forces thither reſolved ſpeedily to make War upon them, hoping his work would be the leſs, becauſe he ſhould take them altogether unprepared, and ſecure upon the account of the Peace. The Athenians exceedingly ſtruck hereat for ſome time ſtood mute, after they were met together, being come of their own accord, for that the Magiſtrates cauſed an Allarm to be ſounded all the night after they received the news. At length all their Eyes were turned upon Demoſthenes, who perſwaded them to ſend to the Bœotians to deſire their aſſiſtance in the vindication of the liberty of Greece, and being ſent himſelf by his Oratory perſwaded them to it, though they held themſelves upon the account of the Phocian War obliged to Philip. The Athenians were incouraged by this acceſſion of the Bœotians, which doubled their force, and diſpatched their Army under the conduct of Chares and Lyſicles towards Chæronea in Bœotia, all of flouriſhing age willingly giving their Names to the expedition, and the Bœotians admiring their readineſs haſted alſo themſelves, and joyning to them expected the coming of the Enemy. He ſent his Ambaſſadors to the Council, one whereof was Python an eloquent man, to withdraw them from the Athenians, but prevailing not, he notwithſtanding reſolved to fight them both, and with an Army of thirty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe invaded Bœotia. He overmatched his Enemies as well in skill as numbers, all the Athenian Captains of note being now dead, and Chares Chief, who was nothing better for conduct than an ordinary Soldier. A cruel and bloody Diodorus ad Olymp. 110. ann. 3. Plutarch. in Demoſthene.

Fight

He obtaineth a Victory over the Athenians, &c. at Chæronea.

A. M. 3667
Ol. 110. ann. 3.
V. C. 416.
Arſis. 1.
Philippi 23.

Fight was fought with great animoſity on both ſides, and with equal ſucceſs, till Alexander, Philip's Son, firſt made his Enemies give ground in his wing, and then his Father had the ſame ſucceſs in the other, and obtained the Victory. Of the Athenians above one thouſand fell, two thouſand were taken, and of the Bœotians a great number. Demoſthenes being in the Battel made his actions far diſagreeable to his words, and cowardly with the firſt caſting away his Arms (though good Fortune was ingraven upon his Shield) ran away.

31. Together with this Battel was loſt the liberty of Greece, and in effect the antient Glory thereof here had its Period, being never able to recover its Power, but firſt enſlaved by one, and then by another for ever after. (a) Iſocrates the Athenian Orator was ſo ſenſible of the advantage Philip had got, that being ignorant how he would improve the opportunity, and reſolved not to ſee Athens beſieged the fourth time, he killed himſelf by abſtaining from all ſuſtenance four days, aged ninty eight years. (b) Preſently after the Victory, Philip carouzed for joy, and walking amongſt the Captives upbraided the badneſs of their condition, when Demades the Athenian Orator took him ſhort, asking him, if he who had obtained the Fortune of Agamemnon ſhamed not to act the part of Therſites? with the wit of which caſtigation he was ſo ſtruck, that he caſt off the former countenance, imbraced the Author of it with ſingular kindneſs, with him gave liberty to all the Athenian Priſoners, and forgetting his pride, made a League and Alliance with that Commonwealth. (c) He is alſo reported to have appointed a Boy every morning to beat this into his Ear, that He was a man. He was a great Maſter of his affections indeed. He was never paſſionate to his diſadvantage, and upon this account, to procure that with more eaſe which he had long deſigned, he might thus gratifie the Athenians, whoſe intereſt in the other Eſtates being the ſame with the common of all Greece, he might be unwilling to force them to the utmoſt. But he placed a Garriſon of his own in Thebes; and Juſtin writeth, how he ſold for Slaves all the Priſoners of that City, and the Bodies of ſuch as had been ſlain, to their Friends for burial: that of the chiefeſt of the Citizens ſome he put to death, and confiſcated the Goods of the reſt, being ſufficiently ſenſible of their ingratitude. After the Fight, when the Athenians fortified their City as expecting a Siege, (d) Demoſthenes at his own charge re-edified part of the Wall, for which Service Cteſiphon thought he was to be honoured with a Garland at the publick meeting of Greece; but Æſchines contended it was againſt the Law: and ſo his Oration againſt Cteſiphon concerning the Crown, or Garland, was written this year, Charonides (or Charondas) being Archon, the third of the one hundred and tenth Olympiad, and the firſt of the reign of Arſes the Perſian King.

(c) Plutarch in vitis Rhetorum & Dionyſius in Iſocrate.

(b) Diodorus.

(c) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 15.

(d) Plutarch. in Demoſthene.

Obtaineth to be named General at Sea for all Greece againſt the Perſian.

Differences in his houſe by a new marriage.

32. (a) Philip by his ſucceſs having utterly broken the courage of the principal Cities of Greece, now gave out that he would undertake a War againſt the Perſian for the general commodity of all the eſtates, and thereby, and with his great courteſie, gained much upon ſome ſorts of People. At length he called them together at Corinth, and largely diſcourſing of the War, ſhewed the certain hope of ſucceſs, and earneſtly exhorted them to undertake it; to which all either out of Love or Fear aſſented. He was choſen Captain General for the expedition, allowance of men and money were appointed to the ſeveral Cities, the (b) Lacedæmonians alone ſcorning both him, and the conditions of his Peace, as accounting that Slavery, and not Peace, which was impoſed by the Conquerour. The Auxiliaries of Greece amounted to two hundred thouſand Foot, and fifteen thouſand Horſe, over and above the Forces of Macedonia, and the barbarous Nations thereto adjoyning. Whilſt he thus proſpered in his affairs abroad, (c) great differences aroſe in his own Houſe by his putting away Olympias upon pretence of incontinency, and marrying Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus. Olympias a Woman of an high Spirit, and melancholick Nature, took it exceedingly to heart, and incenſed all ſhe could her Son Alexander, who at the Wedding hearing Attalus in his Cups to exhort the Macedonians to pray for a lawful Heir of the Kingdom from Philip and Cleopatra, calling him naughty fellow, asked him if he counted him a Baſtard, and therewith threw a Cup at him. Philip thereupon with his drawn Sword made at Alexander, but to the good of both, being light headed with Wine, and mad with Anger, ſtumbled and fell. After this Alexander carried his Mother into Epirus, and went himſelf into Illyricum, whence his Father ſhortly recalled him by the procurement of Demaratus the Corinthian. Not long after Pexodarus the Governour of Caria ſent to offer his eldeſt Daughter in Marriage to Aridæus the baſe Son of Philip, whence great talk being raiſed that Philip did it on purpoſe to devolve the Crown upon Aridæus, Alexander ſent one Theſſalus a Player to Pexodarus, to perſwade him to neglect a Baſtard and a Fool, and transfer his affinity upon himſelf, which was very well liked by Pexodarus. Philip ſmelling out the matter, checked Alexander grievouſly, as degenerate, and unworthy of the hope of a Kingdom, being ambitious to become ſon-in-law to a Carian, who was no better than a Slave to a barbarian King.

(a) Diodorus ad ann. 4.

(b) Juſtin lib. 9.

(c) Plutarch. in Alexandro.

33. The next Spring having enquired of the Oracle concerning the ſucceſs of the Perſian War (which gave him anſwer as ambiguous, and to the ſame purpoſe as formerly to Crœſus) he ſent three Captains over into Aſia under pretence of ſetting the Greek Cities at liberty; Attalus, Parmenio, and Amyntas. He himſelf, whilſt his Forces were gathering together, made a magnificent Sacrifice to the Gods, and celebrated the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with her Uncle Alexander of Epirus, to which he invited all that would, and gave large entertainment, being willing to ſhew to the Græcians how thankfully he took their making him General of all Greece. Feaſting and Muſick there was in abundance, and the Feaſt being done for that day (but all the Solemnity to be renewed on the next) whilſt it was yet night all the People ran together into the Theatre. Thither were carried twelve Images of his Gods in ſolemn proceſſion, and his own next after in a Divine habit, as arrogating to himſelf a place in the Council of the Gods. Then followed he himſelf apparelled in a white Robe in the midſt of the two Alexanders, his Son, and Son-in-law. As he thus proceeded in the ruff of his Pride, the People ſending up loud acclamations to the Skies, and Ecchoing his Felicity, one Pauſanias met him in the ſtraighteſt place of his paſſage, and ſtabbed him into the Side, the wound being ſo mortal that he fell down dead. This Pauſanias having been invited to a Feaſt by Attalus, had been carnally abuſed by him after he was drunk, and then proſtituted to the filthy luſt of baſe Fellows, for which having complained to the King, partly becauſe of their affinity, and becauſe Philip intended to uſe him in the War, he could have no ſatisfaction, and for this cauſe took this revenge upon his unjuſt Judge; yet Alexander objected to Darius that his Father was made away by his procurement.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. ann. 1. Pauſan. in Arcadicis. Juſtin.

He is ſtabbed.

A. M. 3668. Ol. 110. ann. 4. V. C. 417. Arſis 2. Philippi 24.

34. The murderer having mounted on Horſe-back had got away whilſt the Tumult was about the Body, but that his Shooe catching hold on a Vine he was thereby pulled down, and then ſlain by Perdiccas and others. This end had Philip after he had reigned twenty four years, and lived fourty ſix, to which Olympias is reported by ſome to have contributed, by incouraging Pauſanias to commit the fact, and neither know they how to clear Alexander of the matter. She put a Golden Crown upon Pauſanias his Head as he hung on the Croſs, and a few days after burnt his Body upon the Reliques of her Husband, built him a Monument in the ſame place, and cauſed a yearly parentation to be made to him. After this having killed Cleopatra's young Son in her Boſom, ſhe then hanged her, or as one ſaith, fried them both to death in a brazen Veſſel, and conſecrated the Sword wherewith Philip was ſlain, to Apollo, under the name of Myrtalis, by which ſhe was called when young. The foundation of a great Empire was laid by Philip, and a great pattern left unto his Son, which to make, was far more hard than what with greater Glory was atchieved by Alexander. The recovery of Macedon when there were two Competitors that had ſuch aſſiſtants, was a work of much prudence and dexterity. The regaining of ſuch places as were loſt to the Illyrians and Olynthians, with the overthrow of the neighbouring Kings, and the State of Olynthus, were ſuch things as would have ſeemed too difficult for many ages to his predeceſſors. The matters atchieved by him required both Mars and Mercury for aſſiſtants, and therein he bred ſo many choice Commanders, as for their Skill and Valour being worthy to wear Crowns; He ſeemeth moſt to deſerve that Glory which his Son by the influence of his abilities afterwards attained.

His great atchievements.

35. Alexander his Son ſucceeded him, aged about twenty years, in the firſt of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, wherein Cleomantes was Victor, Pithodorus being Archon, in the firſt of the Reign of Darius Codomannus, and the year of the World 3669. being by the Father's ſide deſcended of Hercules, and the mother's from Achilles, neither of which lines he diſgraced by the courſe of his Fortunes. Of a great and lofty Spirit he was from a Child, eaſie to be perſwaded, but hard to be compelled. His Father apprehending his wit, procured Ariſtotle to be his School-maſter, offering him very large rewards, whoſe Native

Diodorus ibid.

Alexander ſucceedeth him.

Plutarch in Alexandro.

City Stageira being before by him demoliſhed, he re-edified for his ſake. By ſuch a Maſter he was not only inſtructed in morality, but had ſome inſight into the more abſtruſe Sciences, and ſeemed to have ſome skill in Phyſick, being wont to give directions to his Friends about their health. Being ſixteen years old, Philip undertaking an expedition againſt the Byzantians, left him his Deputy in Macedonia, where improving his time, he ſubdued the Medæans who had revolted, and taking that City, planted it with new Inhabitants, and called it after himſelf Alexandropolis. At the Battel of Chæronea he behaved himſelf very ſtoutly, which with other his good parts drew great love upon him from his Father (inſomuch that he willingly ſuffered the Macedonians to call him King, and himſelf General) but Philips mind towards his latter end being withdrawn from his Mother and faſtned upon Cleopatra; thereupon enſued great diſſatisfaction on both ſides, whilſt his mother ſtirred him to great indignation, inſomuch as he eſcaped not ſuſpition of being privy to her deſigns againſt his Father's life.

Idem ibid. Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. ann. 2.

He beginneth his reign well.

36. Yet began he his Reign with Juſtice againſt ſuch as had an hand in the murther, killing them upon his Grave, and blamed his mother that in his abſence ſhe had dealt ſo cruelly with Cleopatra. Then celebrating the Funerals of his Father with royal Rites and Ceremonies, he began to take care of his publick affairs, and being contemned for his youth and little experience, above expectation explicated himſelf out of all difficulties, by imitating his Fathers courteſie, and overcoming many by the invincibleneſs of his Spirit, which through the courſe of his life bore down all oppoſition. He renewed the diſcipline of War, and gained the affections of the Army; knowing alſo that Attalus upon the account of his Niece Cleopatra, lay at all advantages to do him miſchief, he ſent Hecatæus with a band of men, with order to attack him and ſend him over alive if poſſible, or elſe to kill him one way or other, which was at length effected. In the mean time Demoſthenes having had ſecret intelligence of Philip's death, went to the people, and pretending to have dreamt it, ſtirred up the Athenians all ways poſſible to contemn the youth of Alexander, and not to ſuffer him to obtain the Principallity of Greece, and to this purpoſe they ſent unto Attalus, and entred into conſpiracy with him, how they might beſt effect it. The Ætolians intended to reſtore the Exiles of the Acarnanians baniſhed by Philip. The Ambraciots expelled the Garriſon there, and the Thebans decreed to do the ſame by that in Cadmea. As the Aracdians had refuſed to conſent that the Father ſhould be General of Greece, ſo were they now nothing better inclined towards the Son, and the reſt of the Peloponneſians, as the Argives, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians were ready to do any thing for the aſſerting of their own Liberty and Power. The Nations about Macedonia began to ſtir, being altogether inclining to renounce their obedience.

His difficulties in Greece,

Which he overcometh.

37. Alexander as an earneſt of his future ſucceſs eaſily removed thoſe obſtacles, overpowring ſome by entreaty and good words, others by awe, and ſome by force of Arms. He firſt obtained of the Theſſalians by a publick Decree to be owned as his Fathers Succeſſor in the Generalſhip, and then eaſily bringing the neighbouring People to do the ſame, paſſing the Pylæ, he called the Council of the Amphyctiones, and procured by their ſuffrages to be elected the Captain General of all Greece. Having done this, to bring over the reſt by fear, he led down his Army into Bœotia, where pitching his Tents by Cadmea he affrighted the Thebans and the Athenians alſo ſo much, that theſe getting in all their Goods to the City, and fortifying it as well as they might, ſent to beg his Pardon, that they had owned him no ſooner. One of the Ambaſſadors was Demoſthenes, who came not with the reſt to Alexander, but returned back when he was on his way, either for that he ſtood in fear of him for the Orations made againſt his Father, or becauſe he would not crack his Credit with the Perſian King, from whom Æſchines accuſed him to have received much money. He anſwered the Ambaſſadors to their ſatisfaction, and then ſent for the Deputies of the Eſtates to meet him at Corinth, where ſpeaking very courteouſly to them, he was again declared General againſt the Perſian, and aid decreed to him for carrying on the War; after which he returned into Macedonia. Whilſt he here was in the Iſthmus, many Philoſophers came to ſalute him; * only Diogenes the Sinopian made no reckoning of him. The King underſtanding this, went to viſit him then at Athens, and finding him ſuning himſelf in his Tub, ſaluted him kindly, and deſired him, to ask any thing of him whatſoever he pleaſed. He only deſired him to ſtand out of the Sun; which greatneſs of mind Alexander ſo much admired, that when his followers laughed and jeered at the man, he anſwered, that If he were not Alexander, he would be Diogenes.

*Diogenes Laertius & Plutarch, alii.

Diodorus & Plutarch.

38. In the beginning of the Spring he made an Expedition into Thrace, where he ſubdued ſeveral People, and afterwards proſpered in the ſame manner in Pæonia and Illyria. In the mean time came intelligence, that many of the Greeks had a deſign to revolt, and not a few Cities, amongſt which Thebes was moſt eminent, and had renounced his authority. Hereupon he returned into Macedonia; the Thebans in the mean while beſieging his Garriſon in Cadmea, which, being ſupplied with Arms by Demoſthenes, they fell upon and ſlew many. They implored the aſſiſtance of the Argives, Eleans, Arcadians, and Athenians. The Athenians were perſwaded by Demoſthenes to ſend them aid, who reigning in the Aſſemblies by the Power of his Tongue, wrote alſo to the Kings Captains in Aſia, thence to oppoſe Alexander, whom he called a boy and a fool. But Alexander marching with ſpeed into Bœotia, the Valour of the Athenians well abated, and Demoſthenes himſelf grew very cool. The Thebans uncertain what their Allies would do, and ſurpriſed with the Kings coming, called a Council of Officers to conſult what ſhould be done, where it was reſolved to fight for their liberty, and this was confirmed by the People, which with great alacrity prepared for reſiſtance, though they might have had good Terms of Alexander. Who delayed alſo to do any thing, that they might have time to adviſe; for his mind being fully intent upon the Perſian War, he would gladly have been rid of all trouble on this ſide of the Seas. But when he ſaw their wilfulneſs, he fully reſolved to make this City a Terror to the reſt. Yet he firſt offered indemnity to all ſuch as would come over to him, which they to croſs, out of emulation, cauſed to be proclaimed from an high Tower, that if there were any who had a deſire to joyn with the great King and the Thebans in vindicating the liberty of Greece, and ſuppreſſing the Tyrant thereof, they ſhould repair unto them.

But the Thebans fall upon his Garriſon in Cadmea.

Whereupon he beſiegeth Thebes.

39. Then fell he with all his might and skill upon the City, which they as ſtoutly defended, knowing elſe what would follow, and encouraging themſelves with their former ſucceſs at Leuctra and Mantinea, they made reſiſtance to the wonder and diſcouragement of their Enemies; till at length Alexander perceiving a little Door to be left unguarded, ſent Perdiccas thither with a party, who breaking into the City made way for the reſt of the Macedonians. Now were the Thebans on one ſide by them, and the other by the Garriſon in Cadmea (which like a Tempeſt fell upon them) cut in pieces, the Law of War not being allowed them, becauſe of that Proclamation they had made from the Tower. The Græcians alſo that ſerved under Alexander, as the Phocians, Theſpians, Platæans, Orchomenians, and others, bearing them malice, ſpared them no more, ſo that great ſlaughter was made, they fighting it out to the laſt, having no other regard to their lives than this, to ſell them at as dear a rate as poſſible. There were ſlain ſix thouſand (Ælian * by ſome miſtake hath ninty thouſand) and thirty thouſand were taken Captives. Alexander having buried all his Slain (to the number of five hundred) aſſembled a Council of the Græcians, to which he referred what ſhould be done with the Thebans. There their Enemies urged againſt them, that they had conſpired with the Barbarians againſt the Græcians, in the time of Xerxes, had fought amongſt other Allies of Perſia againſt Greece, and ſince that being acknowleged and rewarded by his Succeſſors as well deſerving of them. By theſe things they ſo incenced the Council, as to decree the City to be levelled with the Ground, the Captives to be kill'd, and ſuch as had fled to be ſought for and brought to puniſhment. The King acquieſcing in this ſevere Sentence, executed it accordingly, ſelling all he had taken, except the Prieſts and thoſe that had entertained his Father when he was young, and their kindred, with the poſterity of Pindar the Poet, whoſe Houſe alone he left ſtanding. This Famous City then was demoliſhed the laſt day of the Eleuſinian Solemnities then celebrated by the Athenians, the twentieth day of the moneth Boedromion, after it had continued in a ſetled condition almoſt eight hundred years.

He taketh

And demoliſheth it.

* Var.hiſt.lib. 13. cap. 7.

40. Alexander publiſhing an Edict, whereby all Græcians were forbidden to receive the Theban Exiles, the Athenians alone refuſed to obey it, ſetting open their Gates to them, being then celebrating the myſteries of Ceres. Hereat he was inraged, and when they had ſent to deprecate his indignation the ſecond time, forgave them only on this condition: to give up to him the ten (Plutarch nameth but eight) Orators who had ſtirred them up againſt him, and the principal whereof

The Athenians receive the Theban Exiles which maketh a quarrel betwixt him and them.

whereof were Demoſthenes and Lycurgus. The People hereupon not knowing how to demean themſelves, Phocion the Good, who went ever croſs to Demoſthenes in managing State Affairs, made a Speech, wherein he would have perſwaded the Orators to kill themſelves like good Citizens, rather than to bring their Country into danger; but the People ill reſenting this, expelled him in a tumult. At length Demades the Orator being hired by Demoſthenes for five Talents, perſwaded the People to mercy, and ſo framed an anſwer to the King, that it ſhould ſignifie their readineſs to puniſh them if they ſhould find them worthy thereof. They ſent him then to Alexander, with order, not only to take up this matter, but alſo to intercede for the Theban Exiles, and obtain leave for them to receive them. This he did by the power of his perſwaſions, ſaith Diodorus, although Plutarch ſaith it was done by Phocion, who after Alexander had caſt away from him the former Decree, and rejected the Meſſengers, was kindly received by him, after the King had underſtood that his Father reſpected him. He not only admitted of his requeſt but his counſel alſo: that if be loved an idle life he ſhould lay aſide all thoughts of War, but if he thirſted after glory he ſhould transfer his Armies from the Greeks to the Barbarians. Juſtin writeth, that he gave them leave to keep their Orators, but forced them to baniſh their Captains, who going over to Darius much incommodated his affairs beyond the Seas. Arrianus only mentioneth Charidemus to have fled to the Perſians.

In Phocione.

41. Alexander returned into Macedonia with his Army, where conſulting about the Perſian War, Antipater and Parmenio his choiceſt Warriours adviſed him firſt to marry, and beget Children, and then to undertake the Expedition after he was provided of Heirs. But he being of a moſt quick and active ſpirit, and impatient of delay, would not hear of any ſuch thing, ſeeing as he ſaid, he was now created General of Greece, and had ſuch Forces left him by his Father. After then he had by propoſing the commodities of ſuch an undertaking, inflamed the minds of his Soldiers with a deſire thereof, he ſacrifized to his gods, and ſolemnized the plays to Jupiter, formerly inſtituted by Archelaus his Predeceſſor. The ſolemnity continued nine days, one being allotted to each of the Muſes, during which in his Royal Pavilion which had twenty beds to eat on, he feaſted the Officers of his Army, and the Ambaſſadors of the Cities. In the Spring, all things being now ready, he marched with his Forces towards the Helleſpont. They who account the leaſt, ſaith Plutarch, reckon thirty thouſand Foot, and five thouſand Horſe, and who the moſt thirty four thouſand of them and four thouſand of theſe. For the maintenance of ſuch an Army Ariſtobulus wrote that he had no more than ſeventy Talents. Daris ſaid he had proviſion but for thirty days, and Oneſicritus delivered, that he owed beſides this two hundred Talents. And though he was thus ſlenderly furniſhed, yet before his journey making inſpection into the eſtates of his friends, to one he aſſigned a Village, to another a piece of ground, to this a certain rent, and to that the Cuſtoms of ſuch a Port. When he had almoſt diſtributed all he had, Perdiccas asked him what he left for himſelf, and he anſwered Hope; then replyed the other, That ſhall be common to us with thee, and refuſed to receive any thing, which was followed by many; but ſuch as would he willingly gratified, and thereby paſſed away moſt of the Revenues of Macedonia. He paſſed over his men in ſixty ſhips to Troas, and firſt of all caſt his Spear upon the ſhore, and skipping out, as it were, took poſſeſſion of Aſia, in the ſecond year of his reign, and the ſecond of Darius Codormannus, the third of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, Euænetus being Archon, and in the third moneth before his leaving of the Office, and the ſucceſſion of Cteſicles, under whoſe Government Diodorus placeth this Expedition, A. M. 3670.

He paſſeth over into Aſia.

A. M. 3671.
Ol. 111. an. 3.
V. C. 420.
Darii Codomani. 3.
Alexand. 3.

42. To Antipater he committed the Government of his affairs in Europe, with whom he left twelve thouſand Foot, and eleven thouſand and five hundred Horſe, as Diodorus hath it, if * fifteen hundred be not rather to be read. The Lacedæmonians after his departure grudged his ſucceſs, and lay watching for an advantage how to begin a War, and if poſſible divert the courſe of his good fortune, which after the battel of Arbela they ſuppoſed to be fitly preſented. For the iſſue of that battel being reported in Greece, many of the Cities who were jealous of his power reſolved to contend for their antient liberty, before the ſtrength of the Perſians ſhould be utterly ſpent, which they might have to their aſſiſtance. They were incouraged to revolt from tumults now raiſed in Thrace. For Memnon being ſent General thither, having Soldiers at his devotion, ſtirred up the Barbarians to rebel * μυριοι being crept in. Diodorus ad Olymp. 111. an. 3.

The Lacedæmonians make ſtirs in his abſence.

rebel, and got together a great Army. Antipater hereupon was forced to march againſt him and leave Macedonia; the abſence of whom the Lacedæmonians thinking a ſufficient occaſion of working ſome notable feat, excited the Grecians to agree together with united Force to recover their Liberty. The Athenians conceiving themſelves ingaged to Alexander, who had reſpected them above all others, refuſed to ſtir, but moſt of the Peloponneſians, and ſome others, gave their Names willingly, and raiſed amongſt them twenty thouſand Foot, and two thouſand Horſe, which were commanded by Agis the Spartan King. Antipater hearing this compoſed the matters of Thrace as he might, and with an Army of fourty thouſand men raiſed out of the Confederates of Greece marched againſt them, and joyning Battel, after much oppoſition ſlew five thouſand and three hundred with the loſs of three thouſand and five hundred of his own men; Agis himſelf fighting moſt valiantly, after he had received many wounds was to be carried out of the Fight and ſo to be conveyed home. But being incompaſſed with Enemies, and ſeeing there was no hope to eſcape, he bade his men ſhift for themſelves, and reſerve their lives for the future ſervice of their Countrey: he on his knees received his Enemies as well as he could, till having firſt killed ſome of them, at length he was ſlain, after he had been King nine years.

But are vanquiſhed by Antipater his Lieutenant,

43. Antipater having obtained this Victory, was willing to put an end to the War out of fear of Envy, by ſeeming to proceed further than the modeſty of a Subject ſhould require. For he knew the high Spirit of Alexander, who rejoyced in the Victory, but not in him being Victor, which he not obſcurely grudged at, thinking ſo much to be detracted from his own Glory as was added to that of another. The Lacedæmonians therefore being conſtrained to ſend to him, he remitted them for anſwer to the Council of Greece, which having heard what could be ſaid on both ſides, referred the whole matter to the Cogniſance of Alexander. They then gave up to Antipater fifty Hoſtages, and ſent into Aſia to Alexander to beg Pardon. Moſt of ſuch learned men as were eminent during this Period have already, upon occaſion, been ſpoken of.

And ſend to him into Aſia to beg pardon.

CHAP. III.

The Affairs of Sicilie during this Empire.

SECT. I.

The firſt Names and Inhabitants of this Iſland, with a relation of ſuch things as preceded the Perſian Empire.

1. SICILIE is an Iſland of the Mediterranean Sea, lying over againſt Italy at five miles diſtance; from which it is thought to have been ſevered by ſome Earth-quake, or the violence of the Sea, being joyned formerly by an Iſthmus, or neck of Land, to the Continent.

2. It was firſt, from the Triangular Figure, called Trinacria, then Sicania, and afterwards obtained the name of Sicilie. The moſt antient Inhabitants were Cyclopes, or Gyants with one only Eye in their foreheads (as the Poets fancied) and the Læſtrygones of the ſame Original. After them ſucceeded the Sicani, by ſome ſaid to be indigenæ, or naturals of the place, but by others a People of Iberia, or Spain, and ſo named from Sicanus, a River in that Countrey, whence they were expelled by the Ligyes, and coming into the Iſland Trinacria changed its name into Sicania. After theſe, the Siculi a people of Italie (ſo named ſaith Thucydides from Italus a King of Arcadia) being expelled by the Opici, paſſed into this Iſland, and overthrowing the Sicani ſeized upon the beſt parts of it, and gave it the name of Sicilie, almoſt three hundred years before the Greeks found it out. When Ilium was taken, ſome Troians fled by Ship from the Achæans into this Countrey, and fixing themſelves near to the Sicani, were called Elymi, whoſe principal Seats were Eryx and Egeſta. To theſe were added ſome of the Phocenſians, of thoſe who in their return from Troy being driven by Tempeſt into Libya, or Africk, thence paſſed into Sicilie. The Phœnicians alſo inhabited all over the Iſland in the Maritime parts, and the little Iſlands near adjoyning, for the benefit of Traffick with the Siculi; But after that many Greeks arrived, they removed, and joyned themſelves to the Elymi, and inhabited Motya, Soluns, and Panormus, becauſe thence was but a little paſſage unto Carthage. So many Barbarians, and after this manner, inhabited Sicilie ſaith Thucydides, with whom in the main of their relations, conſent Diodorus, Strabo, Dionyſius of Halycarnaſſus, Pauſanias, Conſtantinus Porphyrogenneta, and others.

The old Inhabitants of Sicilie.

A. M. 2821.

Lib. 6. ad initium.

A. M. 3271.
V. C. 20.
Achazi 10.

Greek Colonies.

3. The firſt Greeks that came into Sicilie (as Thucydides proceedeth) were ſome from Chalcis in Eubœa, who under conduct of Theocles planted Naxus. The year following Archias the Corinthian, deſcended from Hercules, drove the Siculi from that place where ſtood the City afterward called Syracuſe. About the ſame time Lamis brought a Colony from Megara, which he firſt placed upon the River Pantacius, in a place called Trotilus. In the fourty fifth year after Syracuſe began to be inhabited, Antiphemus from Rhodes, and Eutimus out of Crete, with their ſeveral Colonies planted Gela, ſo named from the River by which it ſtood, the Inhabitants whereof one hundred and eight years after erected the great and magnificent City Agrigentum, or Agragas, ſo called alſo from a River of the ſame name. Zancla was firſt inhabited by ſome Pyrates of Cuma, a City belonging to Chalcis; but afterwards by a multitude that came promiſcuouſly from Chalcis and other parts of Eubœa, under the Conduct of Perieres of Cuma, and Cratamenes of Chalcis, and were hence caſt out again by the Samians and other Ionians, who fled from the Medes into Sicilie. Zancle was ſo named by the Siculi, from a Sicle, in their language Zancla, which it reſembled. Not long after Anaxilas Tyrant of Rhegium baniſhing the Samians, filled it with a mixt multitude, and called it Meſſana, after the name of his own Countrey. Himera was planted by the Zanclæans, and many Chalcidians amongſt them, with whom alſo joyned certain Syracuſians being expelled by the contrary faction, and called Myletidæ. Their language was mixed betwixt the Chalcidian and Dorick Tongues. Theſe were the Colonies which from ſeveral parts of Greece planted Sicilie. As for other Towns that were Colonies of theſe Colonies, they ſhall be told whoſe they were upon occaſion.

Gyants in Sicilie.

4. That Gyants inhabited Sicilie (although to ſome it hath ſeemed no other than the invention of Poets, who uſually ſpeak monſtrouſly of antient things) the diſcovery of the laſt age hath made moſt manifeſt; at what time were in ſeveral places of the Iſland found the Bones of ſuch kind of men, and the perfect proportion of one or more within the Earth, which upon touch mouldred all into duſt. Cluverius in his Deſcription of Sicilie, and Fazellus, herein give abundant ſatisfaction, which might be further ſtrengthned from what the diſcoverers of America relate concerning men of ſuch ſtature; but that the Teſtimony of Scripture alone ſufficeth to make evident the being of Gyants. That they were Indigenæ, or firſt Inhabitants of Sicilie, is probable, and the very ſame with the Læſtrygones. As for the Sicani, no credit is to be given to the Teſtimony of Thucydides in this point that they came out of Spain, for that Diodorus being this Countrey-man, and certainly rather more concerned in the delivery of the Antiquities of it, than other Nations, averreth the moſt accurate Hiſtorians to have affirmed them Indigenæ, which Timæus, who lived under Agathocles the Tyrant, did fully demonſtrate. Thucydides, who firſt obtruded this Fable upon the Greeks, confeſſeth that they themſelves were of a contrary opinion, and though they in a matter concerning their Honour might not be heard, yet this may ſatisfie, that in Spain there is no ſuch River to be found as ever had the name of Sicanus, which ſome of thoſe who follow the opinion of Thucydides change into Sicoris (at this day Segre) and others ſpeak of a City called Sicania, and one Sicanus Captain of the Colony,

The Sicani came not out of Spain.

all which are as true as any. Neither could theſe Sicani be driven from their ſeats by the Ligures, whoſe habitation was not in Spain beyond the Pyrenæan Hills, but in Gaul near the River Rhodanus and the Alps. Laſtly, that difficult journey which thoſe obſcure people muſt have taken by Land (for the uſe of ſhipping was much later in Spain) through the Countreys of the Tyrrhenians, Umbri, Ligures, Auſonæ, Opici, Oenotrians, and other fierce and warlike Nations, after the paſſage of the Pyrenæans, Alps, and Gaul, may juſtly induce us to give credit rather to the opinion of Diodorus, and of Demetrius Calatianus a moſt antient Writer; who, as the Scholiaſt of Theocritus telleth us, derived the Sicani from the Cyclopes or Gyants.

Neither the Siculi out of Italy.

5. That the Siculi came out of Italy ſeveral grave Authors relate, as amongſt others Diodorus and Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus from the credit of Hellanicus the Lesbian, Philiſtus, and Antiochus, both of Syracuſe; but they ſo diverſly relate the ſtory, that it appeareth to be no other than dubious, and ſo intricate as nothing certainly can be pitched on. In Thucydides the Opici, in Antiochus the Oenotrians and Opici drove out the Siculi: But in Hellanicus inſtead of Siculi the Elymi and Auſonæ were expelled, with Siculus their King, by the Oenotrians and Fapiges. Again, according to the mind of Philiſtus, neither any Siculi, Auſonæ, nor Elymi tranſported themſelves out of Italy; but the Ligures under conduct of Siculus. Solinus and Martianus make this Siculus the Son of Neptune, Iſiodorus the brother of Italus, Servius Captain of the Sicani, and Antiochus will have him a Roman Exile, whom Morges the Succeſſor of Italus entertained. Further, Dionyſius writeth, that the Siculi were Native Inhabitants of Latium, and thence beaten by the Aborigines, which is plainly out of the road of hiſtory, the Siculi never having been maſters of Rome. It would be too tedious to recite the ſeveral opinions concerning the time when the Siculi ſhould make their paſſage out of Italy into this Iſland. And what Thucydides bringeth for a confirmation of his opinion, viz. that in his time ſome of the Siculi remained in Italy, cannot but be falſe, no foot-ſteps of them being to be found out in that Countrey by the diſcovery of any Geography; ſo that others, on the contrary, grant that the whole Nation paſſed over. Theſe arguments drawn from the uncertainty of reports conſtrain us rather to acquieſce in the opinion of Bochartus, who concludeth that no other ſtranger came from other parts to inhabit Sicily, but all were Indigenæ, except the Greeks and Phœnicians, the Siculi and Sicani not being diſtinguiſhed in Nation but only in place. From the Phœnicians (who eſpecially lived about the Promontory of Lilybæum, though they were diſperſed throughout the Maritime Coaſts) he ſheweth the Iſland it ſelf, and every notable Town and River to have been named, in the firſt book of that admirable work intituled Canaan.

Lib. 4.

Cocalus.

A. M. 2773.

Dædalus.

6. Sicily, ſaith Fuſtin out of Trogus, was from the beginning the Countrey of the Cyclopes, which being extinct Cocalus made himſelf King of the Iſland. To him fled Dædalus for protection, from the preſence of Minos King of Crete. This Dædalus was an Athenian, of the family of the Erechthidæ, and a famous Artiſt in all manner of Graven and Carved works. It hapned that he had a Scholar, his own Nephew by his Siſter, named Talos, who going beyond him in Skill, he privately murd'red him, and the matter coming out, was forced to fly for his life, and went into Crete. There being courteouſly entertained by Minos, he wrought many rare pieces of Architecture, but at length ſo diſpleaſed the King in ſome thing which concerned Paſiphae his wife, that he alſo fled thence into Sicily, where he was entertained by Cocalus King of the Sicani, then reigning at Inycus, called alſo Camicus. Some thought that by the means of Paſiphae he eſcaped by Boat, his Son Icarus accompanying him in another, and that having invented ſails, (whereas before Oars only were in uſe) Icarus not managing his with skill enough, his Veſſel ſunk, and thereupon aroſe the fable that they eſcaped with wings made of feathers waxed together, and of the young man's ſoaring ſo high, till the Sun melting the wax, he thereupon fell headlong into that part of the Sea which afterwards bare his name. Others thought Icarus was drowned as he took water. But Minos getting notice whither Dædalus was fled, purſued him with an Army, and required Cocalus to deliver him up. Cocalus returned him a ſatisfactory anſwer, and invited him unto his houſe, where he ſtifled him in a Bath, or elſe his daughters, for the love they bore to Dædalus, when they came to waſh him (which was the cuſtom for women and maids to do unto gueſts, according to Athenæus) inſtead of warm water, poured on him ſcalding Pitch. He gave up his body to his men, pretending he had ſlipped by chance into hot water, and perſwaded them to ſtay and plant in the Iſland, where they built Minoa and Engyum, now Gange, the two firſt Greek Cities founded in Sicily, as ſome note. The Cretans afterwards in revenge for their King's death, came and beſieged Camicus five years to no purpoſe, and were ſhipwrackt in their return upon the Coaſts of Italy, where then reſolving to ſtay and hide their diſgrace, they built Hyria, betwixt Tarentum and Brunduſium, and from them deſcended the Iapyges and Meſſapii. This paſſage concerning Minos the younger, happened in the days of Hercules the Græcian, an Age before the Trojan War.

7. After Cocalus the ſeveral Cities (becauſe they wanted rightful and ſucceſſive Kings, as it ſeemeth, and lived under looſe Democracy) became the prey of Tyranni, whereof no Country was ever more fertil than this Iſland, ſaith Juſtin. Of theſe, Anaxilaus his Juſtice vied with the Cruelty of the reſt, and was not unrewarded. For at his death leaving his Children young, whom he committed to the truſt of Micythus his faithful ſlave, his Subjects ſo prized his memory, as they choſe rather to obey him, and ſuffer the Majeſty of a Kingdom to be managed by a ſlave, than deſert his Sons. But if by theſe Tyranni be to be meant, ſuch as after the ſettlement of the Greek Colonies, made themſelves Maſters of the Cities (as we have no other ground than to believe; the name of Anaxilaus ſufficiently declaring its original) then Cocalus living an Age before the Trojan War, and the firſt Greek Colony mentioned by Thucydides being planted in the * eleventh Olympiad, this after Cocalus is with great liberty uſed by Trogus or Juſtin; ſeveral hundreds of years, (viz. five or ſix) intervening betwixt Cocalus and thoſe Tyrants. For the Cities were many years after their founding governed by the People, according to the cuſtom of Greece, till Phalaris uſurped in the State of Agrigentum, which Suidas writeth to have happened in the fifty ſecond Olympiad, and Euſebius in the fifty fourth. This difference betwixt them may well be reconciled, if, with Cappellus, we believe that Phalaris coming to Agrigentum, there was kindly entertained for eight years, at the end whereof took occaſion from a gueſt, and perhaps a Judge of Controverſies, to make himſelf Tyrant, and the People ſlaves.

ut ſupra.

* A.M.2723.

A. M. 3441.
Olymp.54.an.1.
V. C. 190.
Evilmerodachi, 2.

Phalaris the Tyrant.

8. Phalaris was born at Aſtypalea a City in Crete; his Fathers name was Laodamus, who died whilſt this his Son was an infant. He married Erythia, and on her begat Paurolas, a little before whoſe birth being baniſhed, and deprived of the greateſt part of his Eſtate, he continued long in a deſolate condition, not knowing what to do, till at length a Sedition being raiſed in the State of Agrigentum, he was ſent for by the weakeſt faction, and in concluſion got all the power into his hands. He kept the Tyranny by the ſame arts he firſt obtained it, viz, fraud and cruelty, for which cauſe he was grievouſly hated by many, and his life laid at by thoſe of whom he had well deſerved. Erythia continued all her life with her Son Paurolas at Aſtypalea, where though ſhe was much importuned by many Suters, yet ſhe remained ſtedfaſt in fidelity to her husband. The Citizens of Aſtypalea when they ſaw Phalaris had ſo advanced himſelf, either for that now their hatred was allaied, or out of fear of revenge, ſent to him to intimate that they had revoked what had been formerly done againſt him, as unjuſt. He deſpiſed not this late repentance, but ſent them his hearty thanks, and rewarded them. Having obtained a victory over the Leontines, his Son Paurolas ſent him a Crown of Gold, which he returned back unto his wife Erythia. She was at length poyſoned by Python one of the Suters, inraged at a repulſe; which thing Phalaris took moſt impatiently.

Perillus and his brazen Bull.

9. It hapned that one Perillus an Athenian, and an excellent Statuary, came to Agrigentum, where ſhewing his rare skill, he was kindly entertained by Phalaris. He taking notice of Phalaris his cruelty, framed a braſen Bull, which being heated and a man put in his belly, would by the roaring of him that was thus tormented, imitate the voice of a natural one. Preſenting him with this exquiſite piece, as incomparable for the torturing of men, he admired his skill, but deteſting his wickedneſs, cauſed him firſt to make a tryal of it, and excuſed himſelf to the Athenians, who took it ill, as having done nothing but what was juſt and meet. If Perillus had only made experiment, Phalaris had ſatiſfied all reaſonable men; but threatning his Enemies with this Engine, and making good his word upon them as often as he could have occaſion, he thereby incurred, and ſlighted the hatred of mankind. At the ſame time flouriſhed one Steſichorus a Poet of Himera, who died eight years before Phalaris. He wrote verſes againſt the Tyrant, and raiſed an Army, animating the Inhabitants of Himera againſt him, with whom joyned Conon a moſt leud and naughty man, and divers others, all which, together with the Poet, at length fell into his hands. Conon was preſently condemned to the Bull. He doubted at firſt what to do with Steſichorus, but at length beholding his worth, he not only diſmiſſed him unpuniſhed, but with large gifts; and ever after mightily reverenced him both alive and dead; inſomuch as he deſired the Himerians to build him a Temple, and Altars (offering for that purpoſe men, money, and all neceſſaries) and moſt lovingly comforted his daughters.

10. He was ſo great a contemner of Popularity, and ſo conſcious of his wickedneſs and publick infamy, that he refuſed the honours offered him by them of Melita, not for any pride, but with a friendly admonition, that it would be to them infamous, and to him not at all advantagious. So when Tteſichorus, Cleaneta, Theanæ, and others, thought of writing in his praiſe, he ſeriouſly deſired they would forbear, wiſhing rather that his name might be buried in oblivion, than celebrated in the Writings of Learned men, and, to no purpoſe, adorned with falſe commendations. Being grievouſly provoked by the affronts of the Meſſenians, Catanians, Leontines, Zanclæans, and Tauromenites, he proſecuted them to the utmoſt, often ſaying, that he moſt certainly knew they would fall into his hands, which accordingly came to paſs. He confeſſed that he had tortured in the brazen Engine thirty ſeven men, ſeriouſly wiſhing they might be the laſt, but he foreſaw that Lamachus and Epiterſes, though abſent, would increaſe the number. Theſe things are related in the Epiſtles that go under his name, which ſome Learned Men think written by Lucian. But whoever ſo drew to the life another's diſpoſition as he there doth his own, inſomuch as Suidas accounteth them * very admirable. If one conſider their ſtyle, accuteneſs, and invention, there are no Epiſtles of any Tyrant, no not of any Orator or Philoſopher to be compared with them. But if one look at the diſpoſition of the man, he was a portentous thing, born for the chaſtiſement of the naughtineſs of men, of cruel hatred and unparallel'd cruelty; yet of a moſt propenſe and munificent mind towards his Friends, and withal reverencing Virtue ſo much in his very Enemies, that for its ſake he would pardon injuries, and relinquiſh hatred.

Phalaris his diſpoſition.

* ϑαυμασίας πάου.

11. That is ſcarce credible which Clearchus relateth in (a) Athenæus, that he was tranſported with ſo great cruelty, as to have ſerved up to his table ſucking and new born Infants. (b) Ælian hath a more likely ſtory concerning Chariton and Melanippus. Chariton loved Melanippus with an extravagant and immodeſt Love, as appeareth from the hiſtorian. Melanippus having a conteſt with one of Phalaris his friends, was commanded, and at laſt forced to deſiſt, which taking very ill, he complained of it to his Lover, and deſiring his aſſiſtance for killing the Tyrant, thought of taking in other young men into the conſpiracy. Chariton deſired of him to truſt him alone with the matter to take an opportunity to revenge him, unwilling that both of them ſhould miſcarry in it if it were diſcovered; and on a time made at Phalaris with his dagger, but was prevented by his Guard, which he had continually about him. Being examined concerning his Complices, he endured great tortures, ſo long, that Melanippus more ſenſible of them than he himſelf, went to the Tyrant, and revealed the whole matter. He admiring the courage and love of both, diſmiſſed them, with this condition, that they ſhould depart the ſame day out of Sicily. This love which appeareth to have been no better than an unnatural luſt, was afterwards by Apollo called divine, whence, as in other reſpects, theſe impure Spirits, the gods of Heathens, betrayed themſelves what they were. And hence it is no wonder that the Philoſophers of old, ſuch as Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Æſchines, Cebes, and the reſt, might approve of this affection towards Males, which the (c) Romans yet abhorred in ſome Ages, the (d) Lacedæmonians held as capital, and the Lake wherein Sodom and Gommorah were ſwallowed up, evinceth to have been contrary to the Law of God and Nature. But as for Phalaris, after he had tyranniſed ſixteen years, he periſhed by the fury of all the multitude of Agrigentum, which, as (e) Cicero writeth, fell upon him. Some thought that his Subjects conſpired againſt him, being principled thereto by the doctrine of Pythagoras, of which opinion is alſo (f) Jamblicus in the life of this Philoſopher. But the whole relation concerning Pythagoras his entercourſe with Phalaris is therefore deſervedly ſuſpected, becauſe the Philoſopher being yet young had ſcarce paſſed into Italy. The death of Phalaris hapned about the firſt year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and the twelfth year of Cyrus his Reign, reckoned from his firſt obtaining of e ingdom of Media.

Chariton and Melanippus.

(a) Lib. 9.

(b) Lib. 2. c. 4.

(c) Val. Max. l. 6. c. 1. Plut. in Marcello.

(d) Ælian l. 3. c. 12.

(e) Offic. l. 2.

(f) Cap. 31.

SECT.

Sect. II.

Of ſuch things as were Contemporary with the Perſian Empire.

A. M. 3525.
Ol. 75. an. 1.
V. C. 274.
Xerxis 6.

Thero Tyrannus of Agrigentum.

1. After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens of Agrigentum recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it till Thero again brought them under. He was the Son of Æneſidamus, and boaſted that he was deſcended from Oedipus. He got the prize at the Race with the Chariot in the Olympick Games, and is celebrated by (a) Pindar the Poet, whoſe Scholiaſt teacheth us, that he was the Father in-Law to Gelon Tyrant of Syracuſe, by his daughter Damareta, and married alſo his brothers daughter: At this time Panatius made himſelf Lord of Leontium, and Cleander of Gela. Cleander, after ſeven years, was ſucceeded by his brother Hippocrates, who ſore afflicted the people of Naxus, of Zancle, or Meſſana, and Leontium, whom he forced to acknowledge him for their Lord. After ſeven years, he was alſo ſlain in a battel againſt the Siculi, having before this made War with the Syracuſians, and by compoſition got from them the City of Camerina. After his death Gelon the Son of Dinomenes (deſcended of the Race of the Rhodians, who with the Cretans and other Greeks had ſeated themſelves in Sicily) that had commanded his Forces with great ſucceſs, and to whom committed the truſt of his Children, breaking all obligations made himſelf Lord of Gela. After he was in poſſeſſion of this Town, a Sedition happening in Syracuſe, betwixt the Magiſtrates and People, he being called in to the aſſiſtance of the Governours that were driven out by the multitude, made himſelf Prince. Such being the danger and infirmity of all Governments, except rightfully ſucceſſive Monarchy. This fell out in the ſecond year of the ſeventy ſecond Olympiad, when Hybrilides was Archon at Athens, the thirty firſt of Darius Hyſtaſpis, and the ſame, as ſome reckon, wherein the battel at Marathon was fought. Now the comportment of Sicilian affairs conſtraining us to ſpeak moſt concerning Syracuſe, ſo conſiderable a place, both as to its ſelf, as a City, and as the ſcene of ſo great tranſactions, requireth a more accurate deſcription.

(a) Olymp. Herod. l. 7. c. 153. &c. Pauſan. l. 6. ſive Eliac. l. poſteriore.

Gelon of Syracuſe.

The Original of Syracuſe.

2. Syracuſe was firſt inhabited by ſome Greeks of Ætolia, and had the name of Ortygia. Theſe were expelled by the Siculi, who poſſeſſed themſelves of the place, and at length were outed alſo by a Colony led hither out of Peloponneſus by Archias the Corinthian, in the eleventh Olympiad, Romulus then reigning at Rome, and the Meſſenian War being very hot in Peloponneſus. This new Colony, becauſe of Archias, and for that many followed him from Corinth, owned that City for its Metropolis, which at that time was moſt powerful at Sea. But many afterwards flocked out of other parts of Peloponneſus, and by little and little the City of Syracuſe ſo increaſed, as it became not only the greateſt, and moſt beautiful of all in Sicily, but of Greek Cities whatſoever, as Cicero affirmeth. It contained, as he writeth, four great Cities; the Iſland, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. Its compaſs was one hundred and eighty furlongs, having, beſides Suburbs, two Ports very commodious for ſhipping, being ſeperated by the Iſland, and grounds about it very fertile, in ſome places riſing into little hills, but compaſſed about with Fennes. The firſt Inhabitants dwelt in the Iſland antiently called Ortygia; then as the City increaſed the other parts were added, whereof the lateſt was Neapolis. As for the ſtate of the City, after it received a new beginning from Archias, the form of the Commonwealth was without doubt the ſame that then was in the Metropolis under the Government of the Bachiadæ, viz. Oligarchical bordering upon Ariſtocracy. Afterwards the common people waxing heady outed the better ſort of the poſſeſſion of the grounds, and ſeizing of the Government, made bad to be worſe, as the ſad changes and deſolations will ſhew. The Exiles (by Herodotus called Gamori) betook themſelves to Gelon the Tyrannus of Gela, who coming to reſtore them with an Army, the people reſiſted not, but received him into the City, whereby obtaining the whole power, he reſtored it not to the Nobility, but made himſelf maſter of Syracuſe. This hapned at the time aforeſaid, and about two hundred and fourty four years after the Plantation of Archias.

Sect. 2.

The acts and power of Gelon.

3. Gelon ſo uſed his power as he was loved by all, and feared by none. He every way much inlarged, adorned, and inriched the City: out of all Conquered Towns he took the Nobleſt, and worſt diſpoſed Citizens, and brought them to Syracuſe. He procured the affections of almoſt all that dwelt in Sicily, and ſo greatly ſtrengthn'd himſelf, that he was able with a Navy of two hundred Triremes, and as great an Army as all Greece could ſet forth againſt Xerxes, to help the Græcians in the Median War; and had gone to their aſſiſtance, if they would either have granted him the Command of the Land Army or the Fleet. When he could obtain neither of thoſe, he employed his Forces againſt the Carthaginians, who had been called into Sicily by the Egeſtans, and on the ſame day wherein the Greeks obtained their victory at Salamine, got ſo great an one over them at Himera a Maritime Town, that his glory is thought to have equalled, if not exceeded, the other of Themiſtocles. At this time the Carthaginians were very powerful, and become eminent; whoſe affairs being by neceſſity to be joyned with ſuch matters as relate to this Iſland of Sicily, a more convenient place cannot be had, to ſpeak ſomething (as this work requireth) of the Original, and progreſs of their Commonwealth.

His ſucceſs againſt the Carthaginians.

The Original of Carthage.

4. Carthage was a Colony of Tyre, and Tyre of Sidon the moſt antient Metropolis of Phœnicia, mentioned by Homer with commendation for ingenious induſtry (who hath not one word concerning Tyre) and built by Sidon the eldeſt Son of Canaan. Tyre was built about the two thouſand ſeven hundred and fourty ſeventh year of the World, and two hundred and fourty years before Solomons Temple, as (a) Joſephus hath obſerved. The Greeks thought it received its name from Tyrus the Founder: and (b) ſome invented a fable of a Nymph, called Tyros, beloved by Hercules. But Tſor in the Phœnician language ſignifying a Rock, the ſituation it ſelf ſufficiently declareth the Original of the name, which upon this account was communicated to three other places, beſides this eminent City, viz. (c) two in the Continent, and another in the ſame Iſland. Near the Iſland of this famous City ſtood Palætyrus, or Old Tyre, mentioned by Joſhua, and called a ſtrong City even at the diviſion of the Land of Canaan, which hapned about two hundred years before the building of that whereof we ſpeak. Now (d) Joſephus maketh the Temple of Jeruſalem to have been founded in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram King of Tyre, who was ſon to Abebaal, by Joſephus called Abibalus, and by Euſebius, Abelbalus. Hiram, or Huram according to the Hebrews, (by the Greeks called Irom and Syron (for Horom) by Eupolemus) was a great friend to David, and ſupplied Solomon his Son with materials, and work-men for building the Temple. He alſo propoſed hard queſtions to Solomon to be unfolded, as Menander teſtified, who tranſlated the Tyrian Annals into the Greek language: He ſtrengthned, and inlarged the City of Tyre, as Dius alſo wrote, and reigned thirty four years. After him his Son Beleaſtartus reigned ſeven, and Abdaſtartus nine, who being ſlain by the four Sons of his Nurſe, the eldeſt of them reigned twelve years. Then Aſtartus the ſon of Baleaſtartus twelve, his brother Aſtarimus nine, who was ſlain by his brother Phelles. Phelles reigned but eight months, being killed by Ithobalus the Prieſt of Aſtarta, who reigned thirty two years; after him Badezorus his ſon ſix, then Mettinus his ſon nine, and laſtly, Pygmalion fourty, in the ſeventh of whoſe reign his ſiſter Dido built the City of Carthage in Africk. Therefore from the beginning of Hirams reign to the building of Carthage intervened one hundred and fifty five years and eight moneths; and whereas the Temple was founded at Jeruſalem in the twelfth of his reign, from the building of the Temple to that of Carthage paſſed one hundred and fourty three years and eight months, as Joſephus collecteth from the Teſtimony of Menander the Epheſian, in his firſt book againſt Apion.

(a) Antiquit. l. 8. c. 2.

(b) Stephanus Byzantius. Pollux. lib. 1.

(c) Scylax in deſcriptione Phœnices vide Bocharti Canaan lib. 2. cap. 17.

(d) Antiquit. lib. 8 cap. 2. & Contra Apionem lib. 1.

The ſeveral opinions concerning the building of Carthage.

5. But Appian in his Hiſtory of the Punick Wars, writeth that Carthage was built by the Tyrians, fifty years before the deſtruction of Troy, which precedeth the former date three hundred and ſixty years. He nameth as founders Zorus and Carchedon, according to the opinion of the Greeks, who thought them the Captains of the Colony; whereas Tſor, or Zor, was the name of the Metropolis, and Carchedon of the new City, Carthada ſignifying a New City, in the Phœnician language, as Solinus witneſſeth. Strabo again will have the Phœnicians to have led out Colonies as far as the Pillars of Hercules, and planted ſome, a little after the Trojan War, upon the Maritime Coaſts of Africk, with which Virgil cloſing, feigneth Dido to have reigned at Carthage at that time; whereas ſhe was three hundred years later, according to the Teſtimony of the Phœnician Annals; ſo as Servius upon the Poet affirmeth the whole ſtory of Æneas and Dido to be a fiction fiction, and utterly againſt the courſe of Hiſtory. Further, Euſebius noteth that ſome accounted Carthage built one hundred and fourty three years after the deſtruction of Tray, about the 2966 year of the World, and the twenty third of the reign of David, one hundred and ſixty four years or more before the time aſſigned to Dido by Menander. For the reconcilement of theſe ſeveral aſſertions it muſt be conſidered that Carthage conſiſted of three parts, viz. Cothon, Megara, and Byrſa, whereof the firſt was the Port, and the laſt the Citadel compaſſed about by the ſecond, called Magalia and Magaria, but more truly Megara, ſignifying properly in the Punick Lauguage, dwellings in a ſtrange Country. 'Tis conceived that theſe might be built at ſeveral times; as that part about the Haven before the War of Troy; the other ſome time within one hundred and fourty four years after the deſtruction of it, which might rightly, in reſpect of the other, be called Carthada, or New Town; and laſtly, the Byrſa by Dido one hundred and ſixty ſix years after. For the Phœnicians being maſters at Sea, might according to their pleaſure, as they had occaſion, ſend out Colonies, which they began to do from the time that Joſhua expelled them out of the Land of Canaan. The Greeks themſelves believed that Cadmus made an expedition into Africk, and there built many Cities, as appeareth out of Nonius; and he built the Citadel at Thebes about the time of Joſhua. In Procopius his age, who lived under Juſtinian the Emperour, about the five hundred and fourtieth year of Chriſt, the two Pillars were yet ſtanding, which thoſe Canaanites erected that fled from the Face of Joſhua, in that part of Africk, called Tingitana, as the inſcription teſtified, which we formerly mentioned, and Euſebius writeth that theſe ſame Canaanites led Colonies into Tripolis in Africk. Laſtly, amongſt ſeveral other Cities built by the Phœnicians, the moſt conſiderable, after Carthage, was Utica, ſome ten miles diſtant from it, which Ariſtotle, from the Phœnician Hiſtories reporteth to be two hundred and eighty ſeven years antienter than Carthage, and Velleius Paterculus to have been built by the Tyrians a few years after Gades, about the time of Codrus, who being contemporary with Saul, this City obtained the name of Utica or Ityca, that is (ſaith Bochartus) in the Phœnician language, Old or Antient.

Lib. 1. p. 48.

It conſiſted of three parts.

Utica.

The Story of Dido.

6. Dido was Siſter to Pygmalion King of Tyre, and wife to Sichæus, or Sicharbas their Uncle the Prieſt of Hercules. Sichæus being murdered by Pygmalion for his Wealth, ſhe out of hatred to, or for fear of her Brother fled into Africk, with all ſhe could take, and thereby diſappointed the murderer of his prey. The Story goeth, that coming into Africk, ſhe and her Companions were repelled by Hiarbas the King of that place, till they craftily deſired to buy of him ſo much Ground as an Ox's hide would compaſs. The Africans laughed at their folly, and out of a deſire to ſee what uſe they could make of ſo little Ground, ſwore to make good the Bargain. The Phœnicians then cut the Hide all into one ſmall thong, with which they encompaſſed twenty furlong, and thereon built a Caſtle, thence, (ſaid the Greeks) called Byrſa. But learned men explode this Story of the Hide as a meer invention, and a fable raiſed from a falſe explication of the word, which in the Hebrew Tongue is Boſra, and ſignifying a fortified place, or Caſtle, is changed into Byrſa for the better ſound, becauſe the Genius of the Greek language ſuffereth not S and R to be joyned together. Juſtin out of Trogus relateth that Hiarbas King of Mauritania ſent for ten of the principal Carthaginians, and required Dido in marriage, threatning elſe to make War upon them. At their return they told her he deſired ſome one who might teach his people breeding and manners, but none could be found that was content to leave his Countrey, and joyn himſelf with the Barbarians, whoſe Lives were like to thoſe of wild Beaſts. She blaming them all exceedingly, that they preferred their private commodity before the good of their Countrey, to which if need required they ought their very lives, they opened to her the whole matter, ſaying, that what ſhe would impoſe upon others, ſhe ought not her ſelf to refuſe. Being caught with this wile, ſhe long called on the name of Sichæus, her husband, with many tears and great lamentation, then taking three moneths time for the doing of what there was neceſſity for, ſhe made a pile of wood, as though to make a Parentation to Sichæus, and appeaſe his Ghoſt before her ſecond marriage. Having killed many Beaſts, ſhe aſcended the Pile with a Sword in her hand, and turning to the people ſaid, that now ſhe was going to her Husband, and therewithal killed her ſelf. Before the name of Dido (which ſome make to ſignify Loved or Amiable, and others more probably Wandring or Erratick) ſhe had that of Eliſſa, betokening a Divine Woman, or Virago. The Latin word Virago, in Greek written Ouirago, is in Euſebius corrupted into Origo, Menander Epheſius apud Joſephum ut prius. Juſtin lib. 18.

Appian. lib. de bellis Punicis.

Servius in Æneiad. lib. 1.

Vide Bocharti Canaan. lib. 1. c. 14. & Simſon. ad A. M. 3132.

Sect. 2. go, and being applied as a name to the City, and not to the woman, by a miſunderſtanding hath much perplexed Joſephus Scaliger and others.

The form of Government at Carthage.

7. Carthage being then re-edified, or inlarged by Dido, and the Colony ſhe brought thither, about the 3132 year of the World, in the days of Johas King of Judah, and Jehu of Iſrael, three hundred and ten years after the deſtruction of Troy, ninty ſeven before the firſt Olympiad, and one hundred and twenty before the building of Rome, was at firſt under Monarchical Government; but afterwards rejecting it, indured many hazards and hardſhips, which followed looſe liberty, whereof moſt are briefly recited by Juſtin in his eighteenth book, and thoſe that follow. The (a) Philoſopher compareth this Commonwealth with thoſe of the Cretans and Lacedæmonians, ſaying that it was mixed of Ariſtocracy and Policy, as he calleth it. (b) Polybius ſaith it was compoſed of Kingly, Ariſtocratical, and Democratical Governments, and (c) Iſocrates maketh it Oligarchical at home, and in War Monarchical. As two Kings at Lacedæmon had the firſt rank of Magiſtracy with equal power, ſo at Carthage two perſons, by them called Suffetes, and by Ariſtotle, and Polybius, and Corn. Nepos, termed Kings, yet only nominal; As the former were for life, ſo theſe were but Annual (in which reſpect (d) Livie compareth them with the Conſuls of Rome) and their dignity being hereditary, thoſe were yearly elected out of any noble Families. Such were eſpecially preferred as were accounted moſt eminent for Virtue, and able to defray the charges of their place. Ariſtotle commendeth this above the Lacedæmonian cuſtom, all but that concerning their wealth, imputing it as an error to the Legiſlator; who ought another way to have provided for Magiſtrates, that they might attend publick buſineſs without any detriment to themſelves, and ſo be preferred meerly for their Virtue.

(a) Polit. lib. 2 cap. 9.

(b) Lib. 16.

(c) In Nicocle pag. 61. totius operis editi Genevæ 1636.

(d) Lib. 10.

The Suffetes.

8. Theſe Suffetes were more rightly in their own Language called Sophetim, the Hebrew name of thoſe chief Judges amongſt the Iſraelites, who from Joſhua to Saul governed their Commonwealth, and the Hiſtory of whoſe actions by us called Judges, hath the ſame title of Sophetim, for that interpretation which renders it Sophim (i. e. Overſeers) at the firſt ſight appeareth leſs probable. Their Office was to * aſſemble the Senate, in which doubtleſs they preſided and propoſed. They decided cauſes Criminal, but their power was confined to home, nothing appearing of their medling with warlike matters, or having command of the Armies. To theſe Suffetes was added a Senate, which becauſe Ariſtotle compareth it with that of Lacedæmon, may be ſuppoſed elective out of the beſt ſort and moſt antient men, and the Senators it's likely injoyed the dignity all their lives. How many they were in number doth not appear; but that herein this Senate exceeded the other of Lacedæmon, is to be gathered from * Juſtin, who ſpeaketh of one hundred perſons that out of it were choſen for Judges, to take account of the actions of all Generals at their return from the Wars. This Senate, as that at Rome, was the chief member, and as the Soul of the State, wherein the Suffetes propounding, as the Conſuls there, all things of moment were brought to it: eſpecially what concerned thoſe great things of Empire: viz. Peace, War, and Leagues. The Suffetes deliberating with the Senate, if it was unanimous, and they reſolved the ſame thing, their Decree was Law to the whole State; but if the Senate and Suffetes diſagreed, then was the matter referred to the People.

Senate.

* Livius ibid. Lege Ubbonem Emmium in Deſcr. Reip. Carthaginienſium.

* Lib. 19.

Concio or Aſſembly.

9. In the Concio or Aſſembly of the People, any one of the rabble might ſpeak his mind freely, and without danger contradict the Magiſtrates. The People's Decree concerning any thing referred, was taken for the ultimate determination of the whole and State, and being once paſſed was ſo binding, that it was not lawful to offer any thing againſt it, which Ariſtotle reprehendeth (and well may he) as too Popular, and too much declining from the beſt form of a Commonwealth, affirming this Conſtitution to have no place in the beſt modelled States. But * Polybius diſſenting from the Philoſopher, where he compareth the Carthaginian with the Laconick and Roman Commonwealths, ſheweth that it was poiſed of the three kinds of Government, that the Suffetes were as Kings, the Senate held the place of Optimates or Nobility, and the People a convenient Power. Yet he addeth, that when Hannibal made War upon the Romans, (which happened ten years after the death of Ariſtotle,) the State of Carthage declined from its antient and beſt condition, the People having aſſumed more than formerly, when the Raman Senate's authority was yet whole. This he thinketh to have much incommodated their affairs, and brought great advantage to the Romans. But what authority the People had during the beſt and moſt antient State

* quo ſupra

Conſule Polybium.

State, he no where in thoſe Books and fragments that are remaining, declareth. Emmius thinketh that it conſiſted in electing Magiſtrates, making Laws, Leagues, Peace, and War; in appointing and ordering Negotiations, Cuſtoms, Tributes, and ſuch like things, which concerned the generality, and reſpected the profit of the multitude. But ſome of theſe things ſeem rather to have fallen under the conſideration of the Kings and Senate; however the diſorders that followed, as in all other ſuch Governments, will ſatisfie the Reader in his opinion of the excellency of Monarchy.

Council of 104.

10. Beſides the Senate there was a Council of one hundred and four men, whereof Ariſtotle only informeth us, and which, according to the round number, from him we may call the Centumvirate. They had power to chuſe five men out of their Body, who had very large and great authority; Both theſe ſorts of Magiſtrates retained their power longer than any other, enjoying it both before and after they came to be of the five, which thing was plainly Oligarchical. But in that they were not choſen by lot, but by the Suffrages of the People, and ſerved without Wages; in that they alone took cogniſance of, and judged controverſies, and publick actions, none being remitted to others, as the cuſtom was at Lacedæmon, this he taketh notice to be Ariſtocratical. He compareth the power of the Centumvirate with that of the Ephori at Sparta, whereby he teacheth us, that the power of judging lay in it. And as the Ephori were (according to him) Conſervators of Popular Liberty at Sparta, protecting the Plebeians againſt the power of the great ones, ſo it is likely, from theſe words of Ariſtotle, that thoſe one hundred men at Carthage were the keepers of the Popularity. Herein he preferreth them before the Ephori, that they were not choſen out of the Rabble, but the better ſort of Citizens, wherein lay alſo a piece of Ariſtocracy; for mean perſons being preferred to greateſt places, do much hurt a Commonwealth, ſaith he, and have already endamaged that of the Lacedæmonians. Amongſt civil Officers there were ſome that made inſpection into the manners of the Citizens, as Corn. Nepos telleth us in the life of Amilcar, the Father of famous Hannibal, from whom they removed a beautiful young man called Aſdrubal, becauſe he was reported to be more familiar with him, than modeſty required. There was alſo a Prætorſhip which had authority to look to the Cuſtoms and Tributes, and alſo to prefer Laws, as appeareth by Hannibal, who being choſen into this Office, not only reformed the Cuſtomers, but alſo taking notice of the corruption of Judges, procured a Law for them to be choſen every year. But whether there were more than one of theſe Officers, is not to be diſcovered from antient Writers.

Cenſors.

Pretorſhip.

Faults in the Common-wealth.

11. Beſides the Faults before mentioned, Ariſtotle reprehendeth the Cuſtom of chuſing the Suffetes for their riches, which openeth a door to avarice and indirect practices thence ariſing. He alſo noteth it as a fault, that one and the ſame man had ſeveral Offices, which yet they eſteemed as a great honour. One deteſtable practice they uſed of old, to ſacrifize to their Gods humane Sacrifices, when any affliction or diſaſter fell upon them, and even their own Son, as Plato witneſſeth, which cuſtom they ſeem to have brought with them out of Palæſtine, every year ſending thither ſuch kind of Preſents unto Hercules, as we find in Pliny. Another abſurd Law they had, which forbad any Citizens to learn the Greek Language, leſt they ſhould hold intelligence with the Enemy, becauſe one Suniator had ſo done with one Dionyſius the elder, as Juſtin writeth. This indeed was laudable, that this City abhominated Drunkenneſs, and ſeverely prohibited Wine as much as to be taſted in the Camp, as Plato recordeth in his Laws. This alſo Ariſtotle commendeth, that, for an incouragement to warfare, they had a Law which gave liberty to a Soldier to wear ſo many Rings as he had ſerved times in the Field. The People were by their natural conſtitution, moroſe and ſurly, obedient to their Magiſtrates, tyrannical towards their Subjects, moſt dejected in time of fear, and cruel in anger, reſolute in their deſigns, notwithſtanding all force of flattery, and ſo infamous for their breach of faith, that the Punick faith or truſt became a Proverb. As for their greatneſs and Dominion, the deſcription thereof is to be left to it's proper place. Now muſt their affairs abroad in Sicily and other parts, be defined with the matters of that Iſland.

Lib. 30. cap. 5.

Good Laws.

The diſpoſition of the people agreeable with their government.

12. At what time, or upon what occaſion the Carthaginians firſt came into Sicily is uncertain, (a) Livie will have them firſt called in by the Sedition of the Iſlanders, in the year that T. Quintius (Sirnamed Cincinnatus, as alſo Penno) and Cn. Julius Mento were Conſuls, which was in the beginning of the Peloponneſian

(a) Decad. 1. lib. 4.

Peloponneſian War, the three hundred and twenty third year of the City, fifty years after the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, and conſequently as many from the Victory which Gelon got over them; a groſs miſtake. (b) Juſtin out of Trogus, having firſt related their impious cuſtom of pleaſing their gods by humane Sacrifices, addeth, that the divine powers being therewith diſpleaſed or averſe to them, when they had long unhappily made War in Sicily, they tranſlated it into Sardinia, and there loſing the greateſt part of their Army, received a grievous overthrow, whereupon they baniſhed Mazæus their General, (by whom they had conquered a great part of Sicily, and done great matters againſt the Africans) with that part of the Army which remained. The Army taking this in great diſdain, ſent to the City to deſire a repealing of the Act of baniſhment, and threatned by force to reſcind it, in caſe they were thereto conſtrained by a denyal of their ſute. Their meſſage being deſpiſed, they beſieged the City, and after a few days took it. Mazæus calling the People together, complained of the injury, excuſed the neceſſity of the War, and inveighed againſt the contempt of his Victories. He ſaid he would pardon all, but ſuch as had been authors of the injurious Exile of their fellow-Citizens; and accordingly putting ten of the Senators to death, he reſtored the City to its Laws. Not long after being accuſed of an intention to make himſelf abſolute, he was puniſhed both for his paricide committed againſt his Country, and his own Son (as Juſtin termeth it) whom being a Prieſt, he had crucified, for refuſing to come to him before he had finiſhed his ſuperſtitious rites, and when he came appeared in his purple and other ornaments, which Mazæus thought unſuitable with the condition of him his Father. Him ſucceeded Mago, by whoſe induſtry the wealth, dominion, and reputation of the Carthaginians, for matters of War, increaſed.

(b) Lib. 18.

Mazæus.

Mago.

13. Mago being the firſt, who by ordaining military diſcipline, had laid the foundation of Empire, and added to the ſtrength of the City, as well by introducing Virtue as the Art of War, left two Sons behind him, Aſdrubal and Amilcar, who by treading in his paths, ſucceeded as well to the greatneſs as the Patrimony of their Father. Under their conduct the State made War in Sardinia, and fought againſt the Africans, who demanded Tribute for the ground on which Carthage ſtood, which alſo at length they conſtrained the Carthaginians to pay. Aſdrubal died of his wounds in Sardinia, whoſe death was ennobled by publick mourning, eleven Dictatorſhips, as Juſtin calleth them (by which ſeemeth to be underſtood no other than ſo many times ſending out, or commiſſionating as General, with full power in the field, yet ſo as to be under the commands of the State) and four Triumphs: and the Enemies of Carthage took heart, as if with the Captain its force and power was alſo dead. The Inhabitants of Sicily then vexed with the continual injuries of the Carthaginians, betook themſelves to Leonidas the brother of the King of Sparta, and a great war inſued, wherein both parties long ſtruggled with various Fortune. At this time came Ambaſſadors from Darius (the Son of Hyſtaſpes) King of Perſia, commanding the Carthaginians to forbear offering humane Sacrifices, and eating mans fleſh, requiring them to burn their dead rather than to bury them, and demanding aſſiſtance againſt the Greeks, with whom he was about to ingage in War. They denied to afford any ſuccours becauſe of their continual Wars with their neighbours; but obeyed him in the reſt, leſt they ſhould ſeem too ſtubborn, ſaith Juſtin; yet that they ſtood not to their word, the teſtimonies of Plato, Diodorus, and Pliny, do certifie. Whilſt theſe things paſſed, Amilcar was ſlain in the War of Sicily, leaving three Sons: Amilco, Hanno, and Giſgo. Aſdrubal alſo left ſo many, viz. Annibal, Aſdrubal, and Sappho. Of theſe, Annibal is miſtaken for Annibal the great, by one who hath made ſome ſhort Notes upon * Juſtin, and Amilcar his Uncle, for Amilcar Barchas Father to the famous Annibal, and Mago alſo for another of this name, that lived * many years after in the days of Dionyſius the younger, and Timoleon. The Annotator wondreth what came into Juſtin's mind to make Annibal (the great) the ſon of Aſdrubal, and well he might, if any ſuch thing had been intended; he alſo referreth the Reader to the life of Timoleon, to find that Mago killed himſelf, and was after his death nailed to a croſs, becauſe he fought unproſperouſly in Sicily, which Plutarch intendeth of another perſon. Of this groſs miſtake of one (whoſoever he was) that took upon him to inform beginners, Students in Hiſtory are to take notice and beware.

Juſtin lib. 19.

Darius his meſſage to the Carthaginians.

* Margine ad l. 19. excuſ. Londini, pro Felice Kingſtonio. 1651.

* Vide infra parag. 53.

14. For this Amilcar ſeemeth no other than the very ſame that was ſlain in the battel with Gelon of Syracuſe, in the ſixth year of Xerxes; Son to Darius King of Perſia, from which was made a digreſſion into the affairs of Carthage. With Amilcar periſhed one hundred and fifty thouſand Carthaginians; the Captives that remained of his Army, filled all the Cities of the Iſland, and the State of Carthage was conſtrained to beg peace, having, as ſome ſay, made this War at the inſtance of Xerxes, that thereby the Greeks in Sicily might be diverted from helping their Friends. After this, Gelon was offered the Kingdom of Sicily; but he generouſly refuſed it, whereby he obtained the greater glory and love. At length, having ſetled all things well, he died full of honour at Syracuſe, after he had held the principality about thirteen years. In the third year of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad his elder brother Hieron ſucceeded him. He rebuilded Catana, and changed its name into Ætna, the Mountain of which name about this time brake out into flames, as fifty years after it did alſo. In the beginning of his reign he was much unlike to his brother Gelon, being ſuſpicious, cruel, covetous, and turbulent: then caught with a lingering diſeaſe, he was much amended by the converſation of moſt Learned men. After this he fought proſperouſly againſt the Carthaginians, who now again returned into Sicily, overthrew Thraſydæus of Agrigentum in a great battel, and drove him to deſperation: at length he incurred the hatred of the Syracuſians, uncertain for what cauſe, and ſhortly after withdrawing himſelf to Catana, there died in the ſecond year of the ſeventy eighth Olympiad, when he had held the Principality from the death of Gelon eleven years and eight moneths.

The great defeat of Amilcar.

Hieron of Syracuſe.

Herod. l. 7. c. 153.
Ælian var. hiſt. lib. 13. c. 37.
A. M. 3527.
Ol. 75. an. 3.
V. C. 276.
Xerxis. 8.

15. After him his brother Thraſybulus ſeized upon the power, whoſe practices ſtirred up the Citizens to recover their liberty with the haſtening of his ruine. For being ſet upon by them, he was overthrown, and reduced to ſuch a ſtraight, that he fled into Locri on the Coaſt of Italy, and there killed himſelf, having held the Soveraignty ten moneths from the death of Hieron. The Syracuſians now gladly reſumed their liberty; yet not therewith content, that they might the more ſecure it, they freed alſo many other Cities of Sicily, from Tyranni and forrein Garriſons. But not long after they fell into a moſt pernicious Sedition. For excluding thoſe from honours whom Gelon had brought into Syracuſe for the eſtabliſhment of his own intereſt, they themſelves bearing all Offices of Magiſtracy, and governing the Commonwealth, though they took not away from the other the freedom of the City, the lately made Denizons not enduring it, conſpired together, being in number ſeven thouſand of ten thouſand which Gelon had brought in. Three years after liberty recovered, they ſudainly fell upon the two parts of the City: the Iſland and Acradina. The natural Inhabitants overpowering them in numbers, beſieged them cloſe, and overthrowing them in a Sea fight, at length conſtrained them to acquieſce in the preſent ſtate of things, or elſe quit the City, after the Sedition and tumult had endured two years. In the mean time by the conduct of Ducetius a Sicilian, thoſe planters that Hiero had placed in Catana, were thence ejected, and the old Inhabitants reſtored to the place, whom he had caſt out: now alſo the whole Iſland was reſtored to its antient condition, the Exiles being repoſſeſſed, and new comers driven out, who ſetled themſelves at Meſſana, the utmoſt part of the Iſland.

Thraſybulus.

The Syracuſians recover their liberty.

A. M. 3538.
Ol. 78. an. 2.
V. C. 287.

Ariſt. Polit. l. 5. c. 3.

16. That form of a Commonwealth was now eſtabliſhed at Syracuſe, which Ariſtotle properly calleth Policy, mixed of Oligarchy and Democracy; which, how dangerous it was, appeared ſhortly. For, after ſome years, the State continuing in this form, and the number of Citizens increaſing, one Tyndarides, an eminent man, and very rich, egged on by his ambition, brought it into great danger. For binding to him the indigent rabble by his gifts, and uſing them as a Guard, he manifeſtly preſſed towards the Soveraignty, but by the Union of thoſe who were in greateſt grace with the people, he was repreſſed, and when the beggerly ſort would needs undertake his protection, killed in a tumult. When others not at all deterred by this example aſpired after ſuch power as threatned liberty, the people for to humble thoſe that carried their heads higheſt, in imitation of the Athenians brought in the uſe of the Petaliſm. As they by their Oſtraciſm removed ſuch Citizens for ten years, who for their reputation and intereſt were dangerous to the freedom of the City, ſo the Syracuſians by the Petaliſm removed ſuch like for five years. This kind of baniſhment, without loſs of honour, or fortune, was called in Greek Petaliſmos, becauſe his name whom any one would have baniſhed was written in a leaf of an Olive, according to * Diodorus, both which in the ſame language were

The form of the Syracuſian Commonwealth.

The Petaliſm.

* Quem lege ad Olymp. 812. ann. 2.

were ſignified by the word Petalos. But this conſtitution, as the other at Athens, could not long continue. For thoſe eminent perſons who were moſt fit for ſtate Affairs, for fear thereof by little and little withdrew themſelves from publick buſineſs to a private life. Hereby the Commonwealth fell into the hands of bold, raſh, unskilful, and the naughtieſt ſort of men, whence grievous incommodities and dangers followed. By theſe things the people were moved to abrogate the Law of Petaliſm, and the better ſort returned to the care of the Commonwealth, after which it remained in quietneſs for ſome time, but again relapſed, as neceſſarily it muſt, from the infirmity of its Antimonarchical Government.

Quickly abrogated for weighty reaſons.

The Wars of the Syracuſians.

17. Abroad the Syracuſians had War with the Tuſcans in Italy; with Ducetius Captain of the Siculi, as alſo the Agrigentines, Trinacrians, Leontines, and Ægeſtans in Sicily, wherein moſt commonly they had the better, and either fully brought under, or bound to them by Leagues, moſt of the Cities in the Iſland. Leontium a moſt flouriſhing Town was utterly deſtroyed when it now gaped after the Empire of Sicily, the principal Citizens being removed to Syracuſe, and the multitude driven into Exile. Out of theſe motions they fell into the Athenian War in the firſt year of the ninty firſt Olympiad, concerning which we have already ſufficiently ſpoken. Syracuſe was ſo exhauſted therein with expences and ſlaughters, that upon the brink of Ruin it was meerly preſerved by the wiſdom and valour of Gylippus, a ſtranger of Sparta; and not only preſerved, but made victorious to admiration, and inabled to return to the Athenians ſo great overthrows by Land and Sea. This War which begun in the fiftieth year after the recovery of their Liberty (by means of the Egeſtans, who craved aid of Athens againſt them and the Selinuntians) laſted not fully three years, leaving a ſufficient warning to all, of the viciſſitude of human affairs, and ſhewing, that they who gape after Dominion, and are buſie to inlarge their bounds, being carried out by the force of ambition rather than reaſon, often fall into a neceſſity of defending their own Eſtate, and ſometimes loſe all.

Lib. 2. cap. 4. Diod.

A. M. 3593. Olymp. 92. ann. 1. V.C. 342. Darii Nothi 12.

The State new modelled by Diocles.

18. The multitude grown exceeding high upon this ſucceſs, would not reſt ſatisfied with its former privileges, but ſo ordered the matter, that the temper of this Commonwealth more and more degenerated. Diocles a man of principal note, who had perſwaded them to put to death Nicias and Demoſthenes the Athenian Generals, being of a moſt ſevere and rigid diſpoſition, eloquent tongue, and great reputation for wiſdom, perſwaded the people to change the Commonwealth, and elect Magiſtrates by lot, whereas formerly they were left to the Suffrages of the People. The former way inclined to Oligarchy; but, by this, admiſſion was given to the meaneſt and unfitteſt Perſon to Govern, which ill agreeth with the fame of Diocles his wiſdom. Some think that the multitude having got a promiſe from the great ones in the late danger, in caſe they would well demean themſelves, now wreſted this Law from them, that Diocles perſwaded the Nobility, and the better ſort to give way to the time for avoiding ſome greater miſchief, and then he with his Collegues having power from the whole State, as Diodorus addeth, form'd this new Commonwealth with convenient Laws, whereby this liberty was bounded, and other things ordered as they thought, but falſly, made for publick good. This Diocles was in puniſhment of vice rigid, and inexorable, and yet moſt juſt in what was deſerved by any man. His Laws were ſo well thought of by the vulgar, that many Cities of Sicily received them on their own accord, the whole praiſe of the invention being given to him, though he had others joyned with him in the work, that were excellent for Wiſdom and Prudence. In after-times one Cephalus under Timoleon, and Polydorus under Hieron, were deputed to the making of Laws, but neither of them were accounted Legiſlators, but both Commentators upon him, who in the form of his Speech was ſomething ſhort and obſcure.

Diod. ad Olymp 91. ann. 4.

19. Diocles amongſt other Laws ordained, that it ſhould be Capital for any man to come into the Forum, or place where the people was wont to meet, with his Arms, and that neither the plea of ignorance nor any other excuſe ſhould ſtand him in ſtead that ſo offended. Afterwards it hapned that he himſelf having iſſued out againſt the Enemy who made incurſions, as he returned with his Sword, heard of a tumult in the Forum, and ſo went directly thither, not thinking what he had about him. Being for this reprehended by a private man as breaking his own Laws, he cried out he would do no ſuch matter, but eſtabliſh them with his Blood, and therewithal killed himſelf. In the Commonwealth thus new modelled by him, 'tis uncertain what order there was, or what method was obſerved in acting. There was a Senate conſiſting of ſix hundred men, as we underſtand from Diodorus; but the fame of it was very obſcure, and the Power, as may be gathered, exceeding ſmall, which maketh it be ſo ſeldom mentioned. The Multitude was ſole Lord of all, and daily meeting together created the chief Magiſtrates, diſpoſed of the Militia, placing, and diſplacing Officers therein, decreed War, made Peace, contracted Leagues and Alliances, exerciſed Power as to life or death, granted Indemnity, baniſhed, and recalled at their pleaſure. Other things of leſſer moment were left to Magiſtrates, which were various, as in other popular Commonwealths. They were annual; as the Generals abroad, two, three, four, or more, as the people pleaſed; the General at home who was over the Militia of the City in time of Peace, and had great authority. Others were choſen by lot, as Judges, Treaſurers, Cenſors, and ſuch like, amongſt which were alſo thoſe that overſaw the matters at Sea, the City having an excellent ſite for trading. But things could not thus long ſtand, the Government being ſuch, and wherein the wiſeſt ſort could do leaſt, and the fooliſh unexperienced rabble was moſt powerful, though having no skill in State Affairs they little minded what they did, and only aimed at their private advantage. Hereby they were eaſily led aſide by one, who cunningly, though underhand, wrought his own deſigns. For ſcarcely were eight years paſſed over from the overthrow of the Athenians, when Dionyſius the Son of Hermocrates, a man of a ſubtile Head, and deep diſſimulation, ſo fooled the multitude, as obtaining from it a Guard for his Perſon, he invaded the Tyranny in the fourth year of the ninty third Olympiad, the very ſame that the City of Athens was yielded up to Lyſander. How this was effected muſt more particularly be related, to let the Reader behold the danger of Antimonarchical Government, and the happineſs of a People under that of hereditary Kings.

Dionyſius inſlaveth Syracuſe.

How this was effected by degrees.

20. The Citizens of Ægeſta (who had entred into League with Athens againſt the Syracuſians, and been cauſe of the Athenian War, by reaſon of the controverſie betwixt the Selinuntians and them about ſome Grounds) were in great fear after the overthrow of their Friends to be called to account, and quitted thoſe Grounds for which they had conteſted. But their adverſaries not reſting ſatisfied with the reſtitution of theſe Territories, but ſeizing alſo upon part of the adjoyning Region, they ſent to Carthage for help, giving up themſelves into their protection. The Carthaginians were very deſirous to be maſters of this City, ſo fit for their purpoſe of Conquering Sicily, but on the other hand they ſtood in fear of the Syracuſians, who had ſo lately grapled with, and worſted the Power of Athens. Yet their Ambition prevailing, they promiſed them aid, which they committed to the care of Hannibal, then one of their principal Magiſtrates, giving him Commiſſion to make War if the caſe ſhould ſo require. After the death of Amilcar the Affairs of Carthage had been managed by his, and his Brothers Sons, being ſix in number, under whoſe conduct War was made upon the Moors and Numidians, and the Africans were alſo conſtrained to remit the Tribute which had been formerly paid them for the ſite of the City. Now it was, that this great and numerous Family being dangerous to the liberty of the City, by doing and judging all things, one hundred Judges were choſen from amongſt the Senators, who received an account from the Generals at their return from the War, that by this awe they might ſo manage Affairs abroad, as having an Eye upon Juſtice, and the Laws at home. To Amilcar in Sicily ſucceeded his Son Amilco, who having good ſucceſs in the War, both by Land and Sea, on a ſudden loſt his Army by the force of Peſtilence, for which diſaſter there was a ſad mourning at Carthage (as it is largely deſcribed by Juſtin) and he at his return killed himſelf. Hannibal was his Brothers Son, being the Grandſon of Amilcar by his Son Geſco, or Giſco, * as Diodorus informeth us,

Juſtin. lib. 19.

* Ad Olymp. 92. ann. 3.

21. Hannibal having an inbred Hatred againſt all Greeks, and an earneſt deſire by his own acts to redeem the credit of his Family, was glad of an opportunity to gratify his Countrey, and near upon ſeventy years after the overthrow, and death of his Grand-Father, undertook the Employment. He firſt ſent to the Syracuſians, referring the matter betwixt the two Cities unto them, that the Selinuntians refuſing to ſtand to any award, as he knew they would, a more ſpecious pretence might be obtained for the War. They accordingly oppoſing it, the Syracuſians decreed to hold them as Allies and Confederates, and alſo to be at Peace with the Carthaginians; but the two concerned Cities falling upon each other, both Syracuſe and Carthage was thereby drawn into the Quarrel. Hannibal then having both in Spain and Africk made great preparations, the next year landed at Lilybæum the moſt Southern Cape of

A.M. 3595.
Olymp. 92. ann. 3.
V. C. 344.
Darii Nothi 14.

Ad ann 4.

Selinuns taken by the Carthaginians.

Sicily towards Africk, and ſetting upon the Selinuntians at unawares with a vaſt Army, took their City in the tenth day of the Siege, wherein he made Captive ſeven thouſand perſons, ſixteen thouſand being ſlain, and two thouſand and ſix hundred eſcaped to Agrigentum. He permitted Empedion and his kindred to people it anew, under condition of paying Tribute to Carthage. This was the condition of Selinuns, after it had ſtood two hundred and fourty two years from its firſt founding by the Megarians, who being deſcended from Megara in Greece firſt came into Sicily under conduct of Lamis, and built a Town upon the River Pantacius, called Trotilus. Thence Lamis departing with ſome of his Colony went to the Leontines and Chalcidians, with whom having lived ſome time he was driven out by them, and planting ſome Inhabitants in Thapſus, after his death they left the place, and under the conduct of Hyblon the Sicilian King, who betrayed the Countrey, inhabited Megara, and were called Hyblæans. After two hundred and fourty five years they were driven hence by Gelon of Syracuſe, but one hundred and fourty five years before this, they ſent out a Colony with Pammilaus, which built Selinuns.

And Himera.

22. Hannibal from Selinus marched to Himera, having a particular grudge againſt that place for his Grand-father's death. Falling on it with all his might, he was repulſed for a little time by the reſolute valour of the Inhabitants, but the Wall being beaten down with his Engines, he ſhortly took it. Many Women and Children had withdrawn themſelves out of the City; of thoſe men which he took he carried up three thouſand to the Hill where his Grandfather had been ſlain, and there killed them, being before uſed with all kinds of indignities; then raſed he the City which had been inhabited two hundred and fourty years, and diſmiſſing his Mercenaries and Subjects of Sicily departed home, where he was received with greateſt expreſſions of Honour and affection for having done in three moneths what other Captains would have required far larger time to effect. After his departure, Hermocrates the Syracuſian (who having been ſent as General to the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, was condemned to baniſhment in his abſence, through the malice of his Enemies) returned with a conſiderable Force into Sicily, and to ingratiate himſelf with his Country-men, repeopled Selinus, and fell upon the Tributaries of Carthage. The more ſtill to indear himſelf, he took up the Bones of thoſe Syracuſians that fell at Himera, and in a cariage ſent them to the City, well knowing, that this would procure as love to him, ſo envy and hatred to Diocles his main adverſary, who having been the Captain of the Slain, had taken no care for their Burial. Diocles much oppoſed their publick Sepulture, but the People reſolutly decreed it, then baniſhed him, and yet they recalled not Hermocrates, being jealous leſt he ſhould improve his power and abilities to the making of himſelf abſolute. He then being in deſpair of returning by fair means, attempted to do it by force, and getting in to the City, was amongſt his complices killed by the multitude.

Diodorus ad Olymp. 93. an. 1.

A. M. 3598.
Ol. 93. an. 2.
V. C. 347.
Idem. ad. an. 2.

23. In the ſecond year of the ninty third Olympiad, the Syracuſians ſent to Carthage to complain of the late War, and to deſire that for the time to come they would forbear all hoſtility, to which they returned an ambiguous anſwer, and made all poſſible proviſion for an Army, wherewith to ſubdue the whole Iſland. Before they tranſported any Forces they ſent a Colony thither, which at the hot Waters built a City, and called it Thermæ. The year following they ordered Hannibal to go over as General, who excuſing himſelf by reaſon of his Age, they joyned with him Imilco the Son of Hanno, one of the ſame Family. Theſe two Generals then made Levies throughout Africk, hired Soldiers out of Spain, the Iſlands Baleares, and Italy; and got together an Army of twelve hundred thouſand men according to Timæus, but after Ephorus his reckoning three hundred thouſand. As they were paſſing over, the Syracuſians met them, and ſunk fifteen of their Veſſels, but with the reſt Hannibal paſſed ſafe over, and fell upon the rich and ſtately City of Agrigentum, which contained two hundred thouſand Perſons. The Agrigentines wanted not aſſiſtance from their Friends, all the Greek Cities being deeply concerned in their welfare, and the Syracuſians gave the beſiegers a conſiderable defeat, who demoliſhing the Tombs and Monuments the better to get to the Walls, had thereby pulled down a Peſtilence upon themſelves, ſaith Diodorus, wherein Hannibal died. But Imilco (or Imilcar) thereby not diſcouraged, continued the Siege, expiating the offence, as he thought, by ſacrifizing a Boy to Saturn, and drowning a company of Prieſts in the Sea as an offering to Neptune. His Soldiers mutinying for Proviſions, he ſupplied, by taking of the Ships which loaded with neceſſaries were ſent from Syracuſe to the beſieged. Hereby he ſtarved them within, and conſtrained them to quit

Ad an. 3.

the

And Agrigentum.

the City, being guarded to Gela by armed men. Imilcar found extraordinary rich plunder in it, whereof ſome rarities he ſent to Carthage, amongſt which was Phalaris his Bull, though Timæus the Hiſtorian carping at all others, by denying that there was ever any ſuch thing, is juſtly cenſured by Diodorus. For Scipio Africanus the younger, two hundred and ſixty years after, having deſtroyed Carthage, reſtored this Engine to the Agrigentines, with whom it was yet remaining when Diodorus wrote his Hiſtory.

24. Imilcar having, after a Siege of eight months, thus maſtered Agrigentum, a little before the Winter ſolſtice, deſtroyed it not preſently, that therein he might quarter his Soldiers that Winter. All the Iſland was ſtruck with great fear upon report of what had hapned; ſome of the Sicilians departed to Syracuſe, and others tranſported their wives and children with their wealth into Italy. The Agrigentines being got ſafe to Syracuſe, accuſed their Captains, as having betrayed their Country, and the Syracuſians were alſo blamed by the reſt for having choſen ſuch Generals, as by their diſhoneſty had brought Sicily into extreme danger. A meeting being had at Syracuſe, and great fear of a War poſſeſſing all men's minds, none dared to ſpeak one word, or give any advice. All ſticking at the matter, at length ſtood up Dionyſius the Son of Hermocrates, and accuſing the Captains of having betrayed Agrigentum, earneſtly moved the People to puniſh them forthwith, and not ſtay the time prefixed by Law. For this unlawful and ſeditious motion, the Magiſtrates fined him; but one Philiſtus a wealthy man, who afterwards wrote his Hiſtory, bade him proceed, promiſing to pay his fine, though it were a whole day together. Animated hereby he proceeded, urging that the Captains had been corrupted to betray the intereſt of Sicily, and accuſing others of the better ſort of Citizens as affecting Oligarchy. He therefore moved that new Officers might be created, ſuch as were not eminent for power, but good will towards the People, for that the other uſurping dominion deſpiſed the common ſort, and made their own markets out of the publick; whereas thoſe being of lower fortunes, by a conſciouſneſs of their own weakneſs could not attempt ſuch a matter.

Dionyſius his tricks for making himſelf abſolute.

25. Having diſcourſed theſe things fitly to the humour of the multitude, and his own deſign, he made no ſmall impreſſion in the minds of the Vulgar, who having had the fidelity of the Captains in queſtion before, gave credence to theſe ſlanders, and depoſing them, made new, amongſt which was Dionyſius, having got much credit for his valour againſt the Carthaginians. The foundation thus laid, he beat his head all manner of ways how to accompliſh his device, and reſolved if poſſible to get his Colleagues removed. For this purpoſe he never would meet in council with them, giving out they hatched clandeſtine deſigns againſt the State, and ſeeing the Citizens much affrighted at an approaching War, procured the Exiles to be called home, hoping that they being obnoxious to him, and deſirous of innovation, would be fit for his purpoſe, taking great delight in ſeeing their Enemies killed, and their goods ſold, their own Eſtates being reſtored to them. At this time it hapned that a Sedition falling out in Gela, he had an opportunity to lead thither two thouſand Foot, and four hundred Horſe, where procuring their principal men to be put to death, and their Eſtates confiſcated, he thereby much ingratiated himſelf with the multitude and Soldiers. At his return he found the People juſt departing from the ſhows of the Theatre, which asking him news, he ſaid he knew none, but that their Governours were greater Enemies to the State than the Carthaginians, by whoſe flatteries they now kept holy-day, and who fleecing the Commonwealth, cheated the Soldiers of their wages. Now was an innumerable Army hovering upon the borders, and ready to invade, which they not at all regarded. This he underſtood a little before, but now fully, having received a meſſage from Imilco that deſired his connivance. Wherefore for his part he would lay down his Office, not induring that others making merchandiſe of the Commonwealth, he alone ſhould, together with the Citizens, bear the burthen, and undergo the danger; and yet alſo be accounted as treacherous as the reſt. For this night every man in great fear went home to his houſe. The next day he called them together, and loading his Colleagues with great invectives, ſo ſtirred the multitude, that ſome beginning to cry out he was to be made Dictator, for that they had formerly had experience how convenient the conduct of a ſingle Perſon was, by the example of Gelon his Victory over Amilcar; the multitude out of hand created him General with full power. Then to bind faſt the Soldiers to him, he procured a Decree for double pay, alleging that it would make them more valiant in that time of danger, and bidding the People take no thought about raiſing money.

The miſery of People deſtitute of rightful and hereditary Princes.

26. The wiſer ſort had all along ſufficiently underſtood whither theſe actions tended, but the multitude ſtopped their ears againſt all accuſations, as proceeding from the malice of the great ones. But now upon further conſideration they began to ſuſpect him, and repent they had put the power out of their own hands, which he being aware of, leſt the diſcontent ſhould ſo ſeize upon the generality as thereby to procure him any let or hindrance in the full compleating of his deſign, he drew out the Army to Leontium, which now was uſed as a Fortreſs or Garriſon, and there ſhutting himſelf cloſe up, pretended a great conſpiracy againſt his life. The day following he called the multitude together, and alleging many probable reaſons to perſwade them to believe the danger, obtained to have ſix hundred men as a guard for his perſon, which he ſhould chuſe out where he pleaſed. This number he increaſed to one thouſand, picked out, and conſiſting of ſuch as were deſperate in fortune, and thereupon backed with ſtomach and reſolution. He called the Mercenaries, and ingaged them to him with good words; then new modelling the Army, gave ſuch commands therein as he knew would beſt ſerve his own turn: he gave free admiſſion to all Exiles and malefactors, knowing ſuch would be effectual for all his purpoſes. Having thus in imitation of Piſiſtratus got him a guard, and made himſelf Tyrant, at his return to Syracuſe he openly ſhewed himſelf ſuch, placing his Tent in the Arcenal. The People murmured in vain, being beſet with ſtrangers and mercenaries at home, and in continual fear of a War hanging over them from abroad. To eſtabliſh himſelf he took to wife the daughter of Hermocrates, who did ſuch ſervice againſt the Athenians, and was ſlain in attempting to ſeize on the City: he alſo gave his own ſiſter in marriage to his wives Brother, thinking it his intereſt to be allied to ſo great a Family. Then aſſembling the People, by his devices he procured Daphneus and Demarchus the moſt potent of his Adverſaries to be put to death; and ſo from a Scribe and a man of mean condition, he became Maſter of the greateſt Greek City, continuing ſuch for thirty eight years, unto his end.

A. M. 3599.
Ol. 93. an. 3.
V. C. 348.
Darii Nothi 18.

Idem ad an. 4.

A conſpiracy againſt him

Diſappointed.

He maketh peace with the Carthaginians.

27. Imilcar having wintred in Agrigentum, at Spring-time razed the City, and then fell upon Gela. The Inhabitants betook themſelves to Dionyſius for help; but his endeavours not well ſucceeding, they were forced to quit the Town, and leave it alſo to the diſpoſal of the Enemy. Dionyſius made the Citizens of Camerina to do the ſame, poſſeſſing them with a fear of the Carthaginians, ſo that departing thence in haſte, ſome with their Gold and Silver, others with their Wives and Children only, and the ways being full of both ſexes and ages, who miſerably ſhunned ſervitude by Exile, the Syracuſian Horſemen pitied them exceedingly, and accounting this but a fetch of their Tyrant, to make himſelf Maſter of the place, conſpired how they might kill him in the way, and the rather, becauſe they had obſerved how remiſs, or rather induſtriouſly treacherous, he had been in the relief of Gela. He keeping the Mercenaries cloſe to him, they could not execute this deſign, but rode faſt to Syracuſe, where being eaſily admitted, they rifled his Palace, and uſed his Wife ſo harſhly that ſhe died. They were ſecure of him as at a great diſtance from them; he conjectured the ſame, and in poſt-haſte coming to Syracuſe, ſet fire on one of the gates, and ſo got in. Then ſlaughtered he ſuch of them as he could light of, as alſo of thoſe Citizens whom he knew to be moſt averſe to him, ſome he ſlew, and others he expelled the Town. Scarcely were things ſetled, when a meſſage came from Imilcar, inviting the Syracuſians, though conquered, unto Peace. Dionyſius moſt gladly imbraced the offer, ſo that is was made upon theſe terms: The Carthaginians were to have ſubject to them, beſides their old Tributaries and Colonies, the Sicani, Selinuntians, Agrigentines, and Himerians, and alſo the Gelæans, and Camerineans, who might inhabit their Towns unwalled, but be tributary to Carthage. The Leontines, Meſſenians, and all Sicilians, were to be free and the Syracuſians ſubject to Dionyſius. All ſhips taken on both ſides were to be reſtored. Theſe things confirmed, Imilcar paſſed over into Africk, having loſt half of his Army by the Plague, which ſo raged alſo in Africk, that great multitudes both of the Carthaginians and their Aſſociates fell thereby.

28. Dionyſius knowing that the Syracuſians now eaſed of the War, would buſie their heads how to recover their liberty, to prevent ſuch a deſign, fortified that part of the City called the Iſland, which he cauſed to be inhabited with his own confidents: he alſo divided the publick grounds to ſuch as he thought fit, and admitted ſtrangers to equal privileges with the Citizens. Having thus as he thought ſecured his eſtate, he reſolved to march againſt ſuch Sicilians as he thought moſt

Sect. 2.

Another deſign againſt him

aſſiſted the Carthaginians, and was about to beſiege Erbeſa, when the Citizens of Syracuſe now armed, conſidering what an opportunity was put into their hands, and repenting they had not aſſiſted the Horſemen in their revolt,reſolved to declare for their liberty. The attempt generally took, the Citizens ſtood upon their defence, and the Tyrant was beſieged, for whoſe head a great ſum of money was offered. He was much caſt down, and thought to reſign his power, according as ſome adviſed him; but Philiſtus turned his mind, and made him reſolve to venture all rather than do it. Bethinking himſelf how he might circumvent the Citizens, he ſent to them, pretending a willingneſs to quit all, if they would but permit him to carry away his goods; and at the ſame time he diſpatched a meſſage to the Campanians (mercenary Soldiers of Campania in Italy) offering them large rewards if they would ſtand by him. The Syracuſians conſented he ſhould depart with five ſhips, and then, as if their liberty was fully recovered, grew ſecure, remiſs, and idle, disbanding ſome of their men, neglecting their guards, and taking their pleaſure in the fields: The Campanians allured by his promiſes broke in to him, ſome Troops of Mercenaries alſo came to his aſſiſtance, with which he ſet upon the Towns-men, and eaſily putting them to flight recovered his power. He hindred his men from killing, and a great number flying to Ætna, he ſent to them, offering them pardon,which ſome imbraced, and others refuſed to venture themſelves upon it.

Fruſtrated.

His Wars.

29. When he had well re-ſetled himſelf, he made War upon ſeveral Towns in Sicily, ſome of which he took, and having an eye upon the Carthaginians, ſtrongly fortified his City of Syracuſe. He reſolved with himſelf to make War upon them, hoping that all thoſe Towns which in time of Peace willingly ſubmitted to their yoak, would now revolt to him. Underſtanding that in the Athenian War a line had been drawn before Syracuſe, from Sea to Sea, and thereby acceſs into the Country cut off, with admirable celerity he raiſed a wall to prevent this for the time to come, labouring himſelf amongſt the workmen, to cauſe them the more chearfully to undergo the toil: Then did he make extraordinary proviſions of all ſorts of Arms, compleatly furniſhed himſelf with ſhipping, and hired Soldiers from all parts. Thus provided, he cauſed all the goods of the Carthaginian Merchants, and others dwelling there, to be ſeized by the multitude of the Syracuſians, to whom now he carried himſelf more mildly, being very ready to begin the War; eſpecially upon ſo profitable terms. Other Sicilian Towns followed his example, out of hatred to the Carthaginians for their cruelty, of whom ſuch as were amongſt them they unmercifully handled in way of requital, which taught that State to deal more favourably afterwards with ſuch as they took, in remembrance of the viciſſitude of humane affairs. Then diſpatched he a meſſenger to Carthage, to denounce War from the people of Syracuſe, except they would ſet at liberty all the Greek Cities of Sicily. They were much ſtruck therewith, being exceedingly ſpent with Peſtilence, but refuſed to do it, and as they might, made proviſion for reſiſtance. Dionyſius beſieged Motya one of their Colonies, and chief Fortreſs for War. Upon his ſhips Imilco, as yet not ſufficiently provided, made an attempt, and beating up the Camp preſently retired again; ſo that Dionyſius became Maſter of the Town.

Diod. ad Olymp. 95. an. 3, 4.

30. Ere he had taken Motya he beſieged Ægeſta, the Inhabitants whereof would not betray their truſt, and made excurſions into the Territories of their Friends. But the Spring following the Carthaginians having created Imilco King, ſent him over with a vaſt Army, wherewith he firſt worſted Leptines, whom Dionyſius had commanded to attend his motions; then took Eryx, and preſently recovered Motya. He had Panormus betrayed to him: he took Lipara, and after that Meſſana with his ſhips, the Inhabitants having ſent their Forces out of the Town to meet his Land-Army. When he took Motya, Dionyſius brake up his Siege and retreated to Syracuſe; now hearing that he intended to ſet upon Catana both by Sea and Land, he ſent Leptines with the Fleet after Mago the Carthaginian Admiral, and he himſelf marched by Land to meet with Imilco. Leptines according to order made after as faſt as he could, and attacking the Enemies Fleet, at firſt ſunk diverſe Veſſels; but when he was now almoſt incompaſſed with Mago's ſhips which were in number five hundred, not able to fight at ſuch diſadvantage, he was forced to fly out into the Main, and in his flight loſt one hundred Veſſels. Dionyſius kept on his march, intending to fight Imilco; but was ſtopped by the interceſſion of his friends, who feared leſt in his abſence Mago might with his whole Fleet ſet upon Syracuſe, and take it. He therefore Idem ad Olymp. 95. ann. 1.

A.M. 3609.
Olymp. 96. an. 1.
V. C. 358.
Artax. Mnemonis, 9.

therefore returned to the City, and diſpatched away Meſſengers into Greece and Italy for aid.

Syracuſe beſieged.

31. Mago by Sea with two hundred ſhips, and Imilcar by Land with thirty thouſand Foot, and three thouſand Horſe, beſieged Syracuſe, who for that the Citizens refuſed to give battel, waſted their grounds for thirty days, and after that took the Suburbs of that part of the City called Acradina. His Army was taken with a ſudden pannick fear, and ſeized by a ſore diſeaſe; yet notwithſtanding he drew a line for the Fortification of his Camp, and built three Forts upon the Sea, wherein he put his proviſions, and ſent into Sardinia and Africk for more. Afterwards Polyxenus father-in-law to Dionyſius returning out of Peloponneſus and Italy with thirty long ſhips, and Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian, to the aſſiſtance of the Syracuſians, they took a victualling ſhip from the Carthaginians. They doing their endeavour to reſcue it, the Syracuſians drew out their whole Fleet, and ingaging, took the Admiral Gally, and ſpoyled twenty four Veſſels. After this the Carthaginians durſt not ſtir abroad, and the Syracuſians puffed up with this Victory, thought of recovering their former liberty. Dionyſius coming in at the Port, called them together, incouraged them in the War, and gave them hopes of finiſhing it ſhortly to their ſatisfaction. Here before his face, one Theodorus in many words exhorted his fellow Citizens to throw off the yoak, and either take the Militia into their own hands according to the Laws, or deliver it up to the Lacedæmonian General. But Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian, according to his inſtructions from his ſuperiours (who had now eſtabliſhed an Oligarchy whereever they could, agreeable with their own Government and intereſt, or gave way to the power of a ſingle man rather than that of the People) ſaid openly, that he was ſent to help them againſt the Carthaginians, and not to overthrow the power of Dionyſius; ſo that the people were at ſo unexpected a thing utterly quelled, murmuring much againſt the Lacedæmonians, who had now twice deceived them in the recovery of their freedom. Dionyſius affrighted hereat, made ſhew afterwards of great humanity, to gain the affections of the people.

Another attempt againſt him.

Fruſtrated.

A grievous plague ſeizeth on the Carthaginians.

32. The Carthaginians were at this time ſeized with a moſt grievous Plague, which Diodorus attributeth to their rifling the Temples of Proſerpina and Ceres, as the Meritorious cauſe, and to the unwholſomneſs of the place beſet with Fens, as the effectual means that wrought the diſtemper. A grievous diſeaſe had formerly fall'n upon the Athenians in the ſame place. For before Sun-riſe, becauſe of a cold vapour that roſe from the Fens, a cold and ſhaking ſeized on the body, then at noon a ſuffocating heat. So many men being gathered together into one place, the contagion began firſt with the Africans, who, though they died in great numbers, were at firſt all buried. Afterwards the number increaſing, ſuch as looked to the ſick dying alſo ſhortly after them, none would venture to come near the infected. But beſides want of attendance, no remedy could be had for the evil. For from the ſtench of the dead, and putrefaction of the Fenniſh Air, in the beginning of the diſeaſe a Catarrh, and then preſently an Angina, or ſwelling of the neck, took the Patient. Theſe were followed by a Fever, pains in the Spina, and numneſs of the legs, which drew after them a Dyſentery, and Spots over all the body. Some were taken with madneſs, and abolition of memory, who wandring up and down the Camp beat all they met. At length all the endeavours of Phyſicians were void, through the vehemence of the diſeaſe, and ſuddenneſs of death, for on the fifth, or at the furtheſt on the ſixth day they died in great torment. Dionyſius underſtanding this ſad condition of the beſiegers, thought it convenient to ſally out upon them, and ſent eighty ſhips to fall on their Navy. The Land Army firſt arriving took two of their Forts, and diverted them from their ſhips, which as ſoon as they ſaw in danger, they again retired to them; but with little advantage. For the Syracuſians boarded and ſlaughtered them in great numbers, and Dionyſius, with his Land Army, fired fourty of their Gallies that rode at Anchor in the Haven of Daſco. The night approaching broke off the fight, and then the Carthaginians ſent to Dionyſius three hundred Talents, begging leave to depart; which he granted (with exception to all Sicilians and other Mercenaries) being unwilling they ſhould be quite defeated, that through fear of them his Subjects might be the better contained in obedience. After the flight of the Carthaginians, the Sicilians departed home, and all the reſt were ſlain or taken, except the Spaniards, who gathering themſelves into a round body, ſent to Dionyſius to enter into Alliance with him; which he accepted.

Sect. 2.

Diod. ad Olymp. 96. ann. 3.

Idem ad ann 4

Dionyſius ſetteth upon Rhegium.

33. Dionyſius being ſecure of the Carthaginians for ſome conſiderable time, provided againſt his Mercenaries, which badly affecting him, he prevented by taking of their Leader, and beſtowing on them the City and Territories of Leontium. Then did he make new Leavies, and replanted Meſſana with its antient Inhabitants the Meſſenians; but ſeeing the Lacedæmonians his Friends offended with it, he removed them to another place near the Sea, which they called Lyndarides, and wherein they did thrive exceedingly, Conquering and laying ſeveral places to their demeſnes. Having fortified Meſſana, the Inhabitants of Rhegium (who formerly jealous of his growth, had ſhown their bad affection to him) conceived it to proceed from ſome deſign againſt their City, which ſtood over againſt it in Italy, upon the very Crag of the Promontory, where Sicily was ſuppoſed to have been broken off from the Continent, whence it had the name of Rhegium. They ſent Heloris to beſiege Meſſana, whereupon he determined to make War againſt them; but the Sicilians ſeizing upon Tauromenium, he firſt reſolved to recover it. He continuing his Siege all Winter, in a dark night got a certain Fort into his Hands, and made way for all his Army into the Town; but the Inhabitants gathering together, and reſiſting, from the higher ground, beat back his men, whereof ſix hundred were ſlain, and he himſelf eſcaped very narrowly, after which the Agrigentines and Meſſenians forſook him. The year after, he ſet upon Rhegium on a ſudden, burnt the Gates, and ſet Ladders to the Walls; but was repulſed by the ſtrong oppoſition of the Citizens. By this the Inhabitants of theſe Sea-Coaſts of Italy, ſeeing how far his covetouſneſs and ambition extended, made a League amongſt themſelves, and appointed a common Council, both for the reſiſtance of him and the Lucanians, who made War upon them at the ſame time.

Mago

Idem ad Olymp. 97. ann. 1.

Forced to return.

34. Mago was yet in Sicily, and was once overthrown in Battel by Dionyſius. The Year following his Superiours ſent over great Supplies, gathered as well out of Sardinia and Italy, as Africk, to the number of eighty thouſand men, wherewith he overran the Countrey and withdrew moſt of the Cities from their Obedience, till he came to the Agyrinæans, whom he could neither remove by fair nor foul means from their reſolution. Dionyſius with his Mercenaries and Syracuſians marched out againſt him, ſending before to the Agyrinæans to be in readineſs, who thereupon met him, and joyned their Forces with his Army. Mago now in an Enemie's Countrey was ſore ſtraightned for Proviſions, which made the other reſolve to draw out the War in length, and not to try his Fortune quickly by Battel. The Syracuſians being earneſt for fighting, upon his refuſal forſook him and departed home. This put him upon a reſolution to make free and liſt all Slaves, but even then came Ambaſſadors from Mago to treat of Peace, which he accepted upon this condition, that the Sicilians ſhould be under his authority; and ſo Mago returned home. After this Dionyſius ſeized on Tauromenium, and then baniſhed the greateſt part of the Sicilians from that Town.

Dionyſius his ſecond expedition againſt Rhegium.

Ad an. 3.

A. M. 3615.
Olymp. 97.
ann. 3.
V. C. 364.
Artax Mnem.
15.

Rhegium.

35. The next year but one, being the 3615 year of the World, into which fell part of the third year of the ninty ſeventh Olympiad, wherein Rome was taken by the Gaules, as ſome compute, Dionyſius once more undertook an expedition againſt Rhegium. He landed his Army, conſiſting of twenty thouſand Foot and one thouſand Horſe in the Territories of Locris, waſting all with Fire and Sword, his Navy, which conſiſted of one hundred and twenty Gallies, attending his motions all along, till at length he pitched his Camp near the Streights. The Italians inhabiting that part of Italy called Magna Græcia, hereupon diſpatched away ſixty Ships to help them of Rhegium, upon which he fell, and had taken or deſtroyed them, but that the beſieged iſſuing forth, repelled him with Darts and Arrows, and taking the opportunity of a Storm, drew the Ships to Land; ſo that in this Fight he loſt ſeven Ships with fifteen hundred men, and eſcaping drowning but narrowly, fled to Meſſena. Then Winter drawing on, he made a League with the Lucanians, who after his departure, for a private quarrel betwixt them, invaded the Thurians. Theſe ſending for aid to the reſt of the Italian Cities, would not ſtay for it, which they might juſtly expect according to Covenant, but iſſuing out againſt the Enemy, purſued them into their own Territories, who then taking them at advantage cut off many thouſands of them. The reſt ſeeing ſome Ships ſayl by, caſt themſelves into the Sea to ſwim to them, thinking they belonged to Rhegium. But it proved Dionyſius his Fleet ſent under conduct of his Brother Leptines to aid the Lucanians; yet Leptines took pity of them, and landed them ſafe; he alſo perſwaded the Lucanians for a pound of Silver a man to releaſe their Priſoners, paſſing his word for the money, and at length made them Friends. But hereby he loſt the favour of his Brother (who hoped to devour both ſides, and make himſelf maſter of Italy, when they ſhould have ſufficently weakned one another) ſo that being diſplaced, Thearides the other Brother was made Admiral in his ſtead.

His third expedition.

Idem ad ann. 4: *& Olymp.*98. ann. 1, 2.

He taketh it.

A. M. 3618. Ol. 98. ann. 2. V. C. 367. Artax. Mnem. 18.

36. Dionyſius his mind was ſtill upon Rhegium, to which City he bore mortal hatred, becauſe ſome years before having ſent to them for a Wiſe, they returned him anſwer, that their Hangman had a Daughter, which if it pleaſed him to accept they would give to him. Therefore the Year following he ſet Sayl once more againſt them, who then looking for no mercy in caſe he ſhould take the Town, ſent to him, deſiring they might be moderately uſed. He required a Tribute of three hundred Talents, all their Ships, with one hundred Hoſtages, and then went againſt Caulonia, the Inhabitants whereof he removed to Syracuſe, razed the Town, and beſtowed the Ground upon the Locrians. But his deſign was not thus accompliſhed againſt them of Rhegium; his reſolution was not to diſmiſs them upon the former Terms, but by taking away their Ships to prevent the bringing in of Proviſions by Sea, that he might the more eaſily ſtarve them in a Siege. Bethinking himſelf how with any ſhew of Credit he might break the League, at length hovering yet about the Straights, he deſired a ſupply of Proviſions from them, pretending he would ſhortly return to Syracuſe; but he put it off from day to day, excuſing himſelf by his own indiſpoſition, or ſome other pretext, ſo that plainly ſeeing his drift, at length they flatly denied to ſend him any more Victuals. This he pretending to receive with great indignation as an afront, he laid cloſe Siege to the Town, and battered the Walls. The Inhabitants making one Phyto their General, armed all that could carry Weapons, and making many brave Sallies out upon him, burnt his Engines, and gave him a dangerous Wound with a Lance. But the Siege continuing, after eleven moneths they were driven to ſuch want, as a Buſhel of Wheat was ſold for ten Pounds, and at length they were forced to come out of the Walls, and there graze like Cattel, whereat he was ſo far from being moved with Compaſſion, that he ſent Beaſts thither to eat up the Graſs from them. Great heaps of Carkaſſes lying in the Town, and the Viſages of the living being by Famine rendred like unto them, they at laſt delivered up the Town. Such as could redeem themſelves with a pound of Silver he releaſed, and ſold the reſt. Phyto the General, after grievous torments, he drowned in the Sea, with his whole Family.

His ſtudies.

*Idem ad ann.*3.

Idem. ad Olymp. 99. an. 1.

Ad an. 2.

He overthroweth the Carthaginians:

37. After the deſtruction of Rhegium, Dionyſius lying idle at home, applied himſelf to Poetry, being heretofore much addicted to it. Whilſt he lay before Rhegium he ſent his Brother Thearides to the celebration of the Olympick Games, there to repeat his Verſes, which by their baldneſs drew the auditors into ſuch a diſtaſt, that they rifled the Ambaſſadors Tents. He called together the beſt Poets from all quarters to judge of his Skill. He alſo drew over to him Plato the Philoſopher, whom at firſt he uſed very courteouſly, but afterwards offended at him for his freedom of Speech, he brought him into the common Cage, and there for five pounds ſold him as a Slave. The Philoſophers coming over on purpoſe redeemed him, and then ſent him into Greece with this Memento in his Ear, That A Philoſopher muſt either very rarely, or very pleaſantly converſe with Tyrants. A year or two after this he put out to Sea with ſixty Veſſels, pretending an intention to clear the Coaſts of Pyrates, but wanting Mony, according to his cuſtome towards the Temples of Sicily, he ſeized upon a Chapel near Argylla, on the Coaſts of Italy, which being exceeding rich, he plundered of one thouſand Talents, and got much ſpoil from the Inhabitants of the place, who oppoſed him. Being now furniſhed with mony, he reſolved to renew the War againſt the Carthaginians, and the next year drew divers of their tributary Cities from their Obedience. The Carthaginians made great preparations for defence, raiſing a numerous Army, which they committed to the conduct of Mago. He poured out a great number of men both into Sicily and Italy. In the Iſland, Dionyſius overthrew him in a Battel near Cabala, wherein were ſlain more than ten thouſand of his men, and five thouſand taken: he himſelf with the reſt retired to an Hill, where fighting manfully he was ſlain, and his men ſent to Dionyſius to deſire Peace.

38. Dionyſius anſwered, that the only way to obtain their deſire, was to quit Sicily, and pay the charges of the War. To this he ſeemed to aſſent, but alledged they had no power to deliver up the Cities, and therefore deſired a Truce for ſome time to adviſe about it. During the Truce, Mago's Son being advanced into his Father's place, trained the Soldiers, and exerciſed them continually, ſo as he brought them into a good condition for fighting, and then at the end of the Truce led them down, and gave battel inſtead of receiving Peace. Now were the Sicilians ſo puffed up by their late Victory, that the other took advantage of their careleſneſs, and ſo playd the men, that though Dionyſius in his wing, and Leptines his brother in the other, fought moſt valiantly, and the former prevailed; yet the latter being ſlain, his party was preſently put to flight, in which great execution was done, the Carthaginians giving no quarter; ſo as fourteen thouſand Sicilians are ſaid to have been ſlain. The Conquerours departed to Panormus, and thence ſent to Dionyſius, offering to have the quarrel taken up, which he gladly imbraced. Both ſides were to retain what they already had, only the Carthaginians took to themſelves the City and Territories of Selinus, with ſo much ground belonging to Agrigentum as reached to the River Helycus, and required of Dionyſius one thouſand Talents. Long after this he reſted from War, but ſtill grudging the Carthaginians any footing in Sicily. This moved him at length with great preparations both by Sea and Land to invade their Territories, wherein he took ſome Towns, waſted the Country, and beſieged Lilybæum; but perceiving it very ſtrong preſently again roſe up from before it. Then hearing that the Arcenal at Carthage was fired, he careleſly behaved himſelf, and ſent one hundred and thirty Gallies to ſeize on the Haven of the Erycinians, commanding all the reſt to return to Syracuſe; but the Enemy unexpectedly with two hundred ſhips well manned, fell upon them in the Haven, and took moſt of them; then winter coming on, they made Truce, and each departed to their own places. Not long after, Dionyſius died after a Surfet he got by feaſting, for joy he was pronounced Victor in Poetry at Athens, after he had reigned thirty eight years, in the firſt of the one hundred and third Olympiad, A. M. 3637. three hundred and ſixty ſix before the ordinary Æra of Chriſt. It had been told him by an Oracle, that he ſhould die when he overcame his betters, which he had applied to the Carthaginians.

And receiveth an overthrow from them.

Deodor. ad Olymp. 103. an. 1.

He dieth.

His wives and iſſue

Vide Ælian var. hiſt. lib. 13. c. 10.

Plutarch. & Corn. Nepos in Dione.

Dionyſius his ſon ſucceeddeth him.

39. Dionyſius married two Wives in one day: Doris born at Locri, and Ariſtomache Daughter to Hipparinus of Syracuſe, and Siſter to Dion. By the former he had a ſon called Dionyſius; by the later no Children for a long time (for which cauſe he put to death the mother of Doris, upon ſuſpicion of having practiſed ſomething upon Ariſtomache to cauſe her barrenneſs) but afterwards begot of her two ſons and as many daughters. When he lay ſick, Dion inquired of the Phyſicians concerning his condition, whether he was in any danger, that if ſo, he might move him about the ſharing of his Kingdom; for that he thought his ſiſters Children might juſtly expect their part therein. The Phyſicians told this to young Dionyſius, who found himſelf ſo concerned in it, that to prevent his Father's diſcourſing with Dion, he compelled them to give him that which laid him ſo faſt aſleep that he never could awake, and ſo he ſolely ſucceeded him.

His diſpoſition.

Plutarch & Nepos ibid.

A. M: 3637. Ol. 103. an. 1. V. C. 386. Artax. Mnem. 37.

Omnis Ariſtippum decuit color & ſtatus & res Horat. Vide Diog. Laertium in vita, Ælian var. hiſt, l. 12. c. 47.

40. Dionyſius the younger at firſt gave ſuch hopes of a pliable diſpoſition, that Dion prevailed with Plato to return to Syracuſe, thinking that by his inſtruction he might be made a good and temperate Prince. But Dion's emulators fearing he might be changed from his former courſe, which though bad in it ſelf was more convenient for them, recalled Philiſthus (one who was baniſhed by the late Dionyſius, and being a learned man, wrote the hiſtory of his life) that they might have one to oppoſe to Plato. He according to what was injoyned, and his private intereſt, upheld him in his extravagancies, as many other flattering Philoſophers did; eſpecially Ariſtippus of Cyrene the Scholar of Socrates, who had ſo great a command of his own temper, that he could apply himſelf * ſuitably to all times and perſons. Plato, when he came, found Dion in great troubles, being for his nobility and courage both envied and feared by Dionyſius, who, four months after, ſeeing the People much addicted to him, baniſhed him to Corinth, pretending he ſent him thither for the good of them both, that the one might be out of fear of the other. Becauſe he ſaw that this diſpleaſed all men, he ſent him all his movables, but kept his wife and his ſon, marrying her afterwards by conſtraint to Polycrates one of his Guard. This much ſtartled Dion's friends, and Plato amongſt the reſt, by whom Dionyſius fearing that ſomething might underhand be wrought againſt him, he gave them good words, and laboured to keep Plato, who earneſtly deſired now that War was begun in Sicily to be diſmiſſed; eſpecially ſeeing his mind far remote from the love of Philoſophy. By his importunity he got leave to depart, upon condition that, when Peace was made, Dion ſhould be recalled, and he return with him.

41. When the time came, Dionyſius earneſtly deſired the return of Plato, but would have Dion diſcontinue a year longer, who earneſtly beſought Plato to return to Syracuſe, for that it was reported that the Prince now was wonderfully taken with Philoſophy. He ſtifly refuſed to do it, objecting his age, with the breach of Covenants, but being again urged on all ſides, a Ship was ſent for him, and large Letters were written, wherein the Tyrant promiſed to deal with Dion as his Friends ſhould judge reaſonable; many of the beſt ſort alſo in Sicily and his acquaintance were ſent to accompany him over. Wherefore Plato once more undertook the Journey, with intention to reconcile Dion to Dionyſius, and reduce the Tyrant to a more ſtrict and commendable life. But not long after his arrival Dionyſius ſtopped Dion's Revenues, which Plato taking ill, once prevailed to have the ſtoppage removed, for otherwiſe he would be gone; but when the Ships were departed, and Plato's paſſage thereby prevented, he again ſequeſtred the Eſtate. After this he fell plainly out with Plato, for holding that Faith was to be kept with Heraclides, who was ſuſpected to have raiſed a Sedition, and put him out of his Court, ſo as the Philoſopher was glad to take up his quarters with the Mercenary Soldiers, amongſt whom alſo Slanders were ſpred concerning him, ſo that he ſignified his condition to his Frinds at Tarentum in Italy, who with much adoe prevailed with the Tyrant to ſend him home ſafe. Such was the entertainment of Plato with Dionyſius both Father and Son.

Diodor. ad Ol. 95. an. 2. &c.

Plutarch in Dione.

Dion invadeth Sicily.

42. Though Dionyſius had left to him an hereditary War with the Carthaginians, yet giving up himſelf wholly to Luxury and Sluggiſhneſs, he was unfit to manage publick Affairs, and therefore made Peace with them. But Dion being now at Corinth, together with Megacles his Brother, and Charicles the General of Dionyſius, raiſed as many Mercenaries as he could, which not in number paſſing five hundred, he tranſported in two Ships of burthen into Sicily, leaving Charicles (or rather Hercules) behind, to bring after more Ships; ſuch was his courage, that he durſt venture with ſo inconſiderable a Force upon ſo great a Power. After his landing, multitudes flocked to him as he paſſed through the Iſland, and out of Syracuſe it ſelf, whom Dionyſius in ſuſpition had diſarmed. To them he gave Weapons, having brought many over with him for ſuch a purpoſe. By the time he got unto the City he was five thouſand ſtrong, which he eaſily entred, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of thoſe Captains that Dionyſius had left there, who at this time was upon the Coaſts of Italy. Upon his declaring to the People that he came to reſtore them to their antient liberty, they made him and Megacles their chief Generals with full power. Dionyſius ſeven days after returned and got into the Caſtle, which ſtanding in the Iſland was ſevered from the reſt of the City, whence he ſent for ſome to treat of Peace, that he might gain time. The People overreached, ſent their Commiſſioners, whom he kept with him, till ſeeing the Citizens negligent and careleſs by reaſon of their hopes, he poured out his Mercenaries upon them; but Dion with much labour repelled them, and ſlew eight hundred men. After this he ſent again to deſire a Treaty, but Dion anſwered, that his only way to obtain Peace was to lay down his power, and content himſelf with certain Honours; whereat he was much vexed, and took Counſel how any way he might revenge himſelf.

A. M. 3649.
Ol. 106. an. 1.
V. C. 398.
Ochi 6.
Philip. 5.

He expelleth Dionyſius.

43. Philiſtus whom he had made Admiral, fought with the Syracuſians, now not inferior to him in number of Ships, and loſing the day loſt alſo his life; having either killed himſelf, becauſe he would not be taken, or been tormented to death after he fell into his Enemies hands, both which are ſaid. Then did Dionyſius offer half of his Kingdom to Dion, and afterward was content to quit it all; but he was anſwered by him, that he muſt leave the Caſtle, and be content with certain Goods and Honours: and it was agreed, that with his movables and Mercenary Soldiers he ſhould have leave to paſs into Italy. The People hardly granted this, as being confident to ſubdue him by Force; but he leaving ſome ſtout men to defend the Caſtle, departed in the twelfth year of his Reign, with his Treaſure and rich ſtuff into Italy, undiſcovered by Heraclides, who ere this arrived out of Peloponneſus with a good Force, and was ſet over the Navy. Heraclides being much blamed for this, that he might re-ingratiate himſelf, perſwaded one to ſtir up the multitude to an equal diviſion of the Grounds, which being oppoſed by Dion, he out of emulation procured him ill will, and cauſed the People to create twenty five Prætors, whereof he himſelf was choſen one. Dion's Mercenaries by this new Model deprived of their pay, deſired him to uſe their help in revenging himſelf upon his ingrateful Country-men. He then took upon him to be their Leader, and marched away to Leontium.

Is diſobliged.

The Syracuſians purſued, and oppoſed them in their way; but being forced with loſs to retire, the Leontines received him with much Honour, gave to the Soldiers their Arrears, and made them free of their City.

Redeemeth Syracuſe.

44. But ere long there was an occaſion for the recalling of Dion. The Soldiers whom Dionyſius had left in the Caſtle of Syracuſe, being diſtreſſed by want of Proviſions, reſolved over night, that the next day they would yield it up; but that very morning appeared a Fleet ſent to their relief, over which Nipſius a Neapolitan had the command. The Syracuſians iſſuing forth againſt it, had the better; but then growing ſecure, and giving up themſelves to gormandizing and drunkenneſs, Nipſius thought a good opportunity to be offered for the redeeming of his Credit, and fell upon the City, ſending ſome over the Wall, who killing the Sentinels, opened the Gates for his Soldiers. The new Captains of the Syracuſians being drunk, could take no order for reſiſtance, ſo as great ſlaughters were made in every place, the Garriſon Soldiers iſſuing out of the Caſtle, and great plunder with many Priſoners was carried away. Now the Citizens ſaw that no help remained for them, but only in Dion, to whom they ſent, begging of him, that laying aſide all thoughts of private Injuries, he would now ſuccour his diſtreſſed Country. He being armed by precepts of Philoſophy againſt private grudges, marched for Syracuſe, and was met by a number of old men, women, and children, who with lamentable cries implored his help. As the Garriſon Soldiers were buſie in Plunder, and had ſet the Houſes near the Forum on Fire, he brake in upon them, diſtributing his men to the ſeveral quarters of the City. They fell upon them all in diſorder, and burthened with Plunder, killed four thouſand; and ſo forcing up the reſt into the Caſtle, cleared all.

Envied.

Corn Nepos in Dione.

45. Dion having atchieved much honour by this act, was made General of the Land Forces; but Heraclides his Emulator ſtill retained his Admiralſhip. This vexed him ſo, that he gave out ſome words that a Commonwealth could not be well governed by many, which procured him great envy, as if he thereby ſignified that he would get the Soveraignty over all. He ſtudied not how to palliate the matter, but ſought to carry on all things by an high hand, and in a way of Force; and either procured Heraclides to be made away, or connived at thoſe whom he formerly hindred from doing it; after which he ſeized on the goods of his Enemies, and diſtributed them to his Soldiers. But preſently again Money failing him, and having none to run upon but his Friends, he was conſtrained either to loſe them or his Soldiers, who being alſo diſpleaſed for want of pay, the common people might ſafely revile him, affirming that the Tyrant was not to be endured. Whilſt he with thoughts of theſe things tormented himſelf, there came to him one Callicrates (or Callippus) an Athenian, a moſt cunning diſſembler and irreligious perſon. He told him, that ſeeing he was in ſuch danger, both in reference to Soldiers and People, his beſt way was to have ſome friend, who counterfeiting himſelf his Enemy, ſhould hold intelligence with his adverſaries, and thereby diſcover all their Plots and Practices againſt him. This part, by Dion's conſent, he took upon himſelf, and under this pretence really and indeed practiſed his deſtruction, which Dion's Wife and Siſter hearing of, therewith acquainted him, but he regarded them not, giving too much credit to what Callicrates had promiſed. The women nevertheleſs brought Callicrates into the Temple of Proſerpina, and there made him ſwear, that he had not at all plotted againſt Dion's life; but he minding no Religion, but being egged on more forward to the accompliſhment of his deſign, ſent certain young men, natives of Zacynthus, in to him, whilſt he was private in his Chamber, who being eaſily admitted, for the knowledge his Family had of them, fell upon and preſently bound him: but being unarmed could not kill him, till one Lyco a Syracuſian reached them a Sword in at a Window; his Guard hearing, but ſtirring not. He died in the fifty fifth year of his age, and the fourth after his return out of Peloponneſus, being much lamented after his death, though before called Tyrant, and what ever elſe could expreſs him odious.

Plunged into great difficulties,

Circumvented by Callicrates, and ſlain.

Callicrates expelled by Hipparinus, and ſlain.

46. Callicrates after Dion's death ſeized on the Principality, which he held but thirteen moneths; for then Hipparinus Son to Dionyſius the elder, by Ariſtomache Dion's Siſter, expelled him, and placed himſelf in his Father's Kingdom, which he enjoyed two years. Callippus (or Callicrates) with Leptines went againſt Rhegium, which was held by a Garriſon of Dionyſius his Soldiers, which taking, he was there ſlain by Leptines, and Polyſperthon, it's ſaid; with the ſame

Sword

Sect. 2.

Naſæus.

Juſtin. l.21.

Sword wherewith Dion was killed. After Hipparinus, Naſæus obtained the Soveraignty over Syracuſe, and then Dionyſius recovered it in the tenth * year after his expulſion. In this time of his exile he made himſelf Lord of Locri, where his mother was born, and tyrannized over the Inhabitants ſix years in a moſt cruel manner; raviſhing their Virgins, and playing other pranks ſuitable to his diſpoſition. There he raiſed a Company of men, and coming over on a ſudain to Syracuſe, there finding all men in deep ſecurity, he expelled Naſæus, and erected his Tyranny afreſh. When he was gone, the Locrians expelled his Garriſon, and in revenge for his raviſhing their Virgins tormented his wife and two daughters to death, by thruſting ſharp Needles under their Finger Nails. The Commonwealth of theſe Locrians being very famous, is commended much by the antients, not only Diodorus Siculus and Strabo, but more antient than they, as Plato and Demoſthenes; the former in his diſcourſe which he makes to have been betwixt Socrates and Timæus a Locrian Philoſopher of the Pythagorean Sect, concerning the nature of things, and Original of the World; and the later in his Oration againſt Timocrates, an Author of new and pernicious Laws. Something is therefore according to the nature of our deſign to be ſaid of it.

Dionyſius recovereth Syracuſe.

Ælian l.9.c.8.

A. M. 3658.
*Ol.*108.*ann.*2.
V. C.407.
Ochi 15.
Phil. 14.

Zaleucus modelleth the Locrian Commonwealth.

Lege Ubbonem Emmium de Repub. Locrenſium.

47. Zaleucus (as he was accounted) a wiſe, juſt, and honeſt man, born of an Eminent Family at Locri, was the modeller of this Commonwealth. Euſebius thinketh he flouriſhed about the twenty ninth Olympiad, but Diodorus and ſeveral others making him a Scholar of Pythagoras, who taught in Magna Græcia, reckon him as Contemporary with Charondas the Law-giver of the Thurians, another of Pythagoras his Scholars, and who is famous for the ſtrictneſs and ſeverity of his Laws, which he is ſaid to have confirmed by his death in the ſame manner as Diocles did his; the ſame ſtory being told of him. According to their account he muſt have flouriſhed about the eightieth Olympiad. In the beginning of his Laws, or his Preface to them, this to ſome appeareth to have been his deſign; to affect the minds of his people with piety towards God, as the Original of all Right and Juſtice, the Lord and Governour of Heaven and Earth, as alſo an hater and puniſher of wickedneſs. Then preſcribed he Laws, not very many in number, but moſt effectual for the defence of Juſtice, reſtraining Vice, preſerving concord and tranquility in the State, preventing innovations, and for the eſtabliſhment of themſelves; which as long as obſerved (and they were obſerved long) preſerved the Commonwealth in ſafety. He thought a few ſtable and unalterable Laws well obeyed, to be more profitable for a State than an infinite multitude of weak ones, which are eaſily changed by thoſe that have a mind to innovate, and he concluded, that the ſpeedieſt way to the ruine of a Commonwealth was by change and innovation. That his opinion was true, the example of Athens abundantly demonſtrated, which erring in this point paid dearly for it, as Demoſthenes often complaineth; and of Rome alſo, which being infected with this itching diſtemper, at length was conſtrained to ſubmit to the power of one man. It being almoſt impoſſible, but that popular Governments ſhould reel and ſhake, what ever might happen to this inconſiderable City. He commanded his Laws to be ſtrictly obſerved, and the Magiſtrate to proceed according to the Letter of them, without giving his own gloſs, or pronouncing ſentence according to his private fancy. To this purpoſe is moſt memorable of all his Laws, that which Demoſthenes and * Polybius relate concerning one who ſhould afterwards prefer a new Law, abrogate any old one, alter any thing in it, or diſpute concerning the meaning of it. He was to come into the Council of one thouſand men with an halter about his neck, where ſpeaking his mind, if to them he ſhould demonſtrate his opinion to be profitable for the State, then was he to be diſmiſſed ſafe, and the Law admitted; but if it ſhould appear contrary, then was he to be ſtrangled forthwith in the ſight of the Council.

* Quo prius.
* *Lib.*12.7.

The form thereof.

48. Zaleucus choſe one thouſand men out of all the People, in whom he appointed the Supreme Power to reſide. It is not to be doubted but he ordained alſo a Senate of a far leſs number, by which daily and leſſer matters ſhould be diſpatched: that there were alſo certain Magiſtrates and Courts of Juſtice, which had orders preſcribed to them, we need not queſtion; though we find one only Magiſtrate in * Polybius, called Coſmopolis, who ſeemeth either to have preſided in the Senate, or the greater Council. Zaleucus took care for preventing diſſentions amongſt Citizens, pride in the greater ones, and either favour or hatred in Courts of Juſtice. To cut off the pride and vanity of women, he forbad any to go abroad with more than one waiting woman, except ſhe were either drunk, went out of the City by night, or betook her ſelf to an Adulterer; to deck her ſelf either with coſtly apparel, except ſhe profeſſed the trade of a Strumpet. He forbad men in like manner to wear Gold Rings, or a Mileſian Garment, under pain of being accounted Whoremongers and Adulterers. Ælian * mentioneth a Law of his, prohibiting any one to drink ſtrong Wine, except by the Phyſicians order, though for health's ſake, upon pain of death, and another, * commanding that an Adulterer convicted ſhould loſe both his eyes. Concerning the later a notable thing hapned to the Law-giver himſelf, whoſe ſon being found guilty of this Crime, all the people were willing for his ſake to remit the puniſhment, but he would not ſuffer his Laws to be broken, but to preſerve ſight to his ſon, commanded that one of his own, and another of the young man's ſhould be pulled out.

* *Var. Hiſt.l.*2 *c.*37.
* *Lib.*13.*c.*24.

